Faraday, Michael (1791–1867). English chemist and physicist. As a journeyman bookbinder he heard a lecture by Sir Humphry Davy who impressed him so deeply that he resolved to turn all his attention to the natural sciences. He became one of the greatest chemists of his time and a pioneer in the young science of electricity. His publications are numerous. His monograph on candles deserves to rank as a classic in popular scientific literature.

Farange, Maise. See What MAISIE KNEW. farce. An exaggerated type of comedy, full of ludicrous incidents and expressions. The word is the OFr. farce, stuffing (from Lat. facere, to stuff); originally meaning a passage in the vernacular inserted in a Latin text or liturgy, the farce in medieval France came to resemble the earlier Fabliaux, but specifically for dramatic representation. Like La Farce de maitre Pierre Paternel, the most famous, most farces were written in octosyllabic couplets, and burlesqued the foibles and vices of ordinary life, setting the pattern for future French comedy.

Farewell Address (Sept. 17, 1796). The address prepared by George Washington just before his retirement from the presidency. Probably written with the aid of Hamilton and Madison, it was never delivered publicly. In it Washington explained his reasons for refusing to run for a third term and warned against the dangers of the party system. He advised the U.S. to avoid permanent alliances with foreign nations and to trust to "temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies." It did not contain the phrase "entangling alliances," with which it is often associated and which appeared in Jefferson's first inaugural address.

Farewell to Arms, A (1929). A novel by Ernest Hemingway. It deals with the romance of Frederic Henry, an American lieutenant in the Italian ambulance service during World War I, and Catherine Barkley, an English nurse. She becomes pregnant, and after the disastrous Italian retreat from Caporetto (superbly described by Hemingway), Henry deserts, joins Catherine, and escapes with her to Switzerland, where she dies in childbirth. This is one of the best-known novels depicting the tragedy and destruction of World War I.

Far from the Madding Crowd (1874). A novel by Thomas Hardy. Bathsheba Everdene is loved by Gabriel Oak, a young farmer who becomes bailiff of the farm she inherits; by William Boldwood, who owns a neighboring farm; and by Ser-

Leon, a handsome, inconsiderate young adventurer. She marries Troy, who mistreats her and squanders her money. When he leaves her and is presumed drowned at sea, Bathsheba becomes engaged to Boldwood. Troy however reappears, and is murdered by Boldwood, who goes mad as a result of his action and is sent to an institution instead of being sentenced. Bathsheba then marries Gabriel, the steadiest and most faithful of her three suitors.

Fargue, Leon Paul (1876-1947). French poet. His early works reflect the influence of Mallarmé's symbolist salons. Fargue moves through a surrealistic concern with the reality of the dream world to an eerily melancholy expression of the poetry of modern city life. His style varies from regular verse to poetically rich prose in such works as Tancrède (1911), Espaces (1921), D'après Paris (1931), and La Piétion de Paris (1939).

Farinelli (real name Carlo Broschi; 1705-1782). Italian castrato soprano, the most famous singer of the 18th century.

Farmer George. King George III of England (1738-1820), who reigned from 1760 to his death; so called from his farmerlike manners, taste, dress, and amusements.

A better farmer ne'er brushed dew from lawn.

Farnol, [John] Jeffery (1878-1952). English writer of popular historical romances, such as The Broad Highway (1910) and The Amateur Gentleman (1913).

Farquhar, George (1678-1707). English comic dramatist of the early 18th century. His plays reveal the growing taste for sentiment, which was beginning to replace the brilliance and wit of the Restoration. His best-known plays are The Beaux' Stratagem, The Recruiting Officer (1706) and The Constant Couple (1699).

Farrago, Captain. See Modern Chivalry.

Farrar, Geraldine (1882- ). American dramatic soprano. She knew many roles but was most famous as Carmen and Madame Butterfly. She acted in several silent films. Such Sweet Compulsion (1938) is her autobiography.

Farrell, James T[homais] (1904- ). American novelist. Known for his lengthy studies of lower-middle-class Irish-Catholic life, Farrell was born in the South Side section of Chicago, which forms the background for his own works. His stories dealing with Studs Lonigan began to appear in 1932; they aroused heated controversy, for Farrell practiced a frankly naturalistic mode of writing that did not hesitate to unveil the crudities of life among the people of his novels. The characters of the novels, which sometimes use a stream-of-consciousness technique, are presented with what is often a sociologist's objectivity. The emphasis is on poverty, religious bigotry, economic inequality, individual frustration, vice, and the destructive influence of environment. Some critics assert that the very dreaminess and turgidity of Farrell's style has defeated the author's aim, but others praise the powerful, cumulative effect of personal tragedy that distinguishes Farrell's most famous work; the Studs Lonigan trilogy, which is comprised of Young Lonigan, The Young Manhood of Studs Lonigan, and Judgment Day. Five other novels concern Danny O'Neill. Farrell's Note on Literary Criticism (1936) is one of the most important literary statements of the "proletarian" point of view of the 1930's. The Silence of History (1963) also deals with an Irish-American youth in Chicago in the 1920's.

fasces. In ancient Rome, a symbol of authority. They were bundles of birch or elm rods fastened together by a red strap with the blade of an ax projecting from the bundle. The fasces were carried by the left hand, on the left shoulder by the victors who accompanied magistrates. The rods and the ax represented the king's authority to punish or execute criminals. Within the city of Rome, the ax was removed in recognition of the accused's right to appeal to the people in the matter of life and death.

Benito Mussolini's Fascist Party, which controlled Italy from 1922 to 1944, used the fasces as its emblem. Fasces have appeared on U.S. coins and adorn many government buildings.

fascism. An authoritarian and totalitarian political system characterized by aggressive nationalism and the absolute sovereignty of the state over individual rights and interests. Its principles were put into practice by Benito Mussolini and his Fascist Party in Italy. See Vilfredo Pareto; Nazi.

Fasolt. See Fawner.

Fast, Howard (1914- ). American novelist and short-story writer. Born in New York City, he is known for his vivid historical novels, many of which espouse radical political causes. Citizen Tom Paine (1943) and Freedom Road (1944) avowedly grew out of his association with the Communist Party. Fast later broke with communism, describing his disillusionment in The Naked God (1957).

Among his better-known novels are The Americans (1946), a sympathetic treatment of Governor John Peter Altgeld of Illinois, and Spartacus (1958), a portrayal of the Roman revolutionary leader.

Fastnachtspiel (Ger., Shrovetide-play). A form of simple, often slapstick, comedy with a clear moral message, current in Germany in the 15th and 16th centuries. The earliest example, however, comes from the 13th century, and the origins of the form are thought to go back to spring fertility rites among the Germanic tribes. Hans Sachs is considered to have perfected the form.

fata (It., a fairy). A female supernatural being introduced in Italian medieval romance, usually under the sway of Demogorgon. In Orlando Innamorato we meet with the "Fata Morgana" (see Morgan le Fay); in Boiardo, with the "Fata Silvanelle," and others.

Also called Fata Morgana is a sort of mirage in which objects are reflected in the sea, and sometimes on a kind of aerial screen high above it. It is occasionally seen in the neighborhood of the Straits of Messina, and named from Morgan le Fay, who was fabled by the Norman settlers in England to dwell in Calabria.

fateful raven. The emblem on the Danish standard, Landeyda, which was consecrated to the war god Odin. It was said to have been woven and embroidered in one noontide by the daughters of Regner Lodbrok, son of Sigurd. If the Danish arms were destined to defeat, the raven hung his wings; if vic-
Faulkner, William

Faulkner, the (Gr., moira; Lat., parce or fatu). In Greek mythology, 3 daughters of Nyx (Night). They controlled the destinies of men. Originally birth-goddesses, the Fates came to be represented as three old women who spun the thread of life. They were identified by Hesiod as Clotho (or Klotho), who spun the thread; Lachesis, who measured it out; and Atropos, who cut it. Generally, even Zeus himself is subject to their decisions.

Father. (The) (1887). A play by August Strindberg. Dealing with the psychological antagonism between men and women, The Father centers on the Captain and his inability to prevent the female members of his family from subjugating him. His wife, Laura, tortures him by leading him to suspect that Bertha is not his daughter, spreads rumors that he is insane, and finally succeeds in driving him mad and to his death.

Fathers and Children or Fathers and Sons (Ottzy i deti; 1862). A novel by Ivan Turgenev. It portrays the conflicts between the older aristocratic generation and the new democratic intelligentsia in Russia during the 1860’s. The chief character is the nihilist Bazarov, who espouses a strictly materialistic attitude toward life. His chief adversary is Pavel Petrovich Kirsanov, an uncle of Bazarov’s friend Arkadi, who upholds the aristocratic traditions in the face of Bazarov’s ridicule. The novel, which is considered one of Turgenev’s finest works, originally aroused widespread controversy in Russia, with both radicals and conservatives denying the accuracy of the portrayal of Bazarov. One side considered it slandered the younger generation; the other accused Turgenev of presenting too favorable a picture of the nihilist. Only Dmitri Pisarev among the radicals accepted the portrayal of Bazarov as accurate.

Father William. A humorous ballad by Lewis Carroll appearing in Alice’s Adventures in Wonderland; it is a parody of The Old Man’s Comforts (1799), a poem by Robert Southey.

Fatima. (1) According to the Koran, the daughter of Muhammad, and one of the 4 perfect women. The other three are Khadijah, the prophet’s first wife; Mary, daughter of Imran; and Asia, wife of the Pharaoh drowned in the Red Sea.

(2) The name usually given to the last wife of Bluebeard.

(3) A female hermit in the Arabian Nights (1548) who was murdered by the African magician as a part of his schemes against Aladdin.

Faulconbridge, Philip. In Shakespeare’s King John, the natural son of Richard I (Coeur de Lion). Leader of John’s forces, he is a blunt, fiercely patriotic Englishman who sums up his philosophy in his final speech:

This England never did, nor never shall,
Lie at the proud foot of a conqueror,
But when it first did help to wound itself.

. . . Nought shall make us rue,
If England to itself do rest but true.

Faulkner, William (1897-1962). American novelist and short-story writer. Faulkner, who was awarded the Nobel Prize in 1949, is generally recognized as a great American novelist. In his novels, many of them set in the imaginary YOKNAPATAWPHA COUNTY, he created a complex social structure within which he explored the burden of the Southern past, the inability of the Southern aristocracy to meet the demands of modern life, the relations between Negro and white, and the alienation and loneliness that so beset 20th-century man. But more than this he drew an immense gallery of characters, vivid and unforgettable.

Faulkner came from an old Mississippi family, and elements of the family past appear in his books. His great-grandfather Col. William C. Faulkner (who later spelled his name Fulkner) wrote a popular romance, The White Rose of Memphis (1880). His violent death in 1889 furnished his great-grandson with material for SARTORIS and THE UNMAQUISHED, in which Colonel John Sartoris is modeled on Colonel Falkner. In 1918, William Faulkner enlisted in the Canadian Air Force but did not see active service. After the war he briefly attended the University of Mississippi and worked at many odd jobs. He published a book of verse, The Marble Faun, in 1924 and, with the help of Sherwood Anderson, secured the publication of his first novel, Soldier’s Pay, the following year. Neither this book nor his second novel, Mosquitoes (1927), are considered among Faulkner’s best.

In Sartoris (1929), Faulkner created Yoknapatawpha County, which was to be the setting for most of his subsequent works. In the same year appeared The Sound and the Fury, usually considered among Faulkner’s masterpieces. Although the styles of the two books are radically different—The Sound and the Fury owes much to James Joyce and the stream-of-consciousness technique—both deal with the breakup of old aristocratic Southern families. In As I Lay Dying, Faulkner relates a terrifyingly comic story of a ritualized burial journey. But it was not until Sanctuary that Faulkner created a sensation and achieved anything like popular success. Faulkner himself did much to mislead the reaction to this novel by suggesting that it was hurriedly written as a mere potboiler. It is true that Sanctuary is often grotesquely shocking, but it is, nevertheless, a book of great craft, allegorical in intent.

It was followed by Light in August, which relates the agonizing story of Joe Christmas, and the equally brilliant Absalom, Absalom!, considered by Cleanth Brooks to be Faulkner’s best book.

For many critics, Absalom, Absalom! marks a high point in Faulkner’s development. While The Unvanquished has occasionally been highly praised, it is generally considered one of Faulkner’s weaker books. The Hamlet is the first part of the trilogy that now includes The Town (1957) and The Mansion (1959).

The collection Go Down, Moses and Other Stories contains the justly famous story The Bear, Intruder in the Dust and Requiem for a Nun, in some ways a sequel to Sanctuary, are generally not thought to be Faulkner at his best. The same judgment has been made of A Fable, in which Faulkner left Yoknapatawpha County for the French army in World War I. Other works are These Thirteen, A Green Bough (verse, 1933), Doctor Martino and Other
Faunus

In the 1930s, many critics saw only the melodramatic violence in Faulkner’s writing. It was not until Malcolm Cowley’s introduction to The Portable Faulkner in 1946 that the continuity and consistency in Faulkner’s work, as well as his concern with “the tragic fable of Southern history,” were really seen and understood.

Faunus. In Roman mythology, a rural deity, grandson of Saturn and father of Lavinia’s father Latinus. He, as well as Silvanus, came to be more and more identified with the Greek Pan, with whom he had many traits in common. His priests were the Luperci, his main festival the Lupercales. When not viewed as an individual, he appeared in the multiformity of the fauns, possibly under the influence of the Greek pans, satyrs, and sileni in their relation with Pan. The fauns were satyrlike beings with tails, horns, goat’s legs and feet, and furry, pointed ears. Two festivals called Faunalia were held on February 13 and December 5.

Hawthorne wrote a novel, The Marble Faun (1860), in which it is hinted that the hero is a faun. It was suggested by the statue of a youthful faun by Praxiteles, now in the Capitoline Museum in Rome. The same title is used by William Faulkner for a collection of verse (1924).

One of the best-known poems of Stéphane Mallarmé is his L’Après-midi d’un faune (Afternoon of a Faun). Debussy’s orchestral tone poem Prélude à l’après-midi d’un faune (Prélude to Afternoon of a Faun, 1892) became the firm foundation of its composer’s fame.

Fauré, Gabriel [Urbain] (1845–1924). French composer, organist, and teacher. He became choir director at the Madeleine in Paris in 1877, and organist in 1896, taught composition at the Paris Conservatoire from 1896, and was its director from 1905 to 1920. His best-known works are the Requiem Mass (1887), and many songs, which include settings of poems by Verlaine, Rimbaud, Baudelaire, and Sully Prudhomme. Maurice Ravel was a pupil of his.

Faust. A legendary figure, the subject of many literary works. The historical personage behind all the various Faust legends seems to have been a German necromancer named Georg Faust (1480?–1538). Bits of his life are known from contemporary testimony, including that of Philipp Melanchthon, but it is impossible to make a complete biography of him. His career was not without success, for he sometimes gained influence in powerful ecclesiastical and worldly courts. The power he enjoyed, combined with the boasting for which he was famous, captured the imagination of many after his death, and various altered and exaggerated versions of his exploits soon began to appear in print (see Faustbuch). The name Johann, given him in the folk books and by Marlowe in Dr. Faustus, probably results from confusion with a different magician.

Johann Wolfgang von Goethe was first attracted to the Faust legend by the Faustbuch and a Faust puppet show he saw in his youth. But it was not until 1808 that the completed play, Faust, Der Tragödie erster Teil (Faust, The First Part of the Tragedy) first appeared. It is in this Part I that Goethe develops the character of Faust as the old scholar who yearns to comprehend not so much all knowledge as all experience, but finds that in order to do so he must promise his immortal soul to the destructive tempting spirit, Mephistopheles. The latter helps rejuvenate Faust, who then falls in love with and seduces a young girl named Gretchen. She bears him a child, but panics and drowns it, and the last scene of Part I is set in the dungeon where, awaiting execution for her crime, she refuses to flee with Faust and puts her trust in God.

In Part I, Mephistopheles promises to show Faust both “the small world” of personal feeling and experience, and “the great world” of history, politics, and culture. This distinction neatly parallels the difference between the two parts. In Part II (1832), which is much longer and more allegorical than Part I, Goethe took the opportunity to develop many of his ideas on mythology, cultural development, art, statesmanship, war, courtly life, economics, natural science, and religion, to the extent that the plot is sometimes lost from view. Toward the end, Faust attempts to justify his existence by reclaiming land from the sea in order to found an ideal society, but the plan fails. Faust’s soul is finally rescued by a choir of angels who speak the motto Wer immer strebend sich bemüh’t, /Den können wir erlösen (“He who exerts himself in constant striving, /Him we can save”). See Urfaust; Wagner; Walpurgisnacht; Mothers, The; Homunculus; Helen; Euphorion; Eternal Feminine.

Thomas Mann, in his Doktor Faustus, does not directly treat the Faust legend, but uses it as a parallel to the fall of his own hero, Adrian Leverkühn.

The Faust legend has inspired several operas, including Boito’s Mefistofele (1865), Berlioz’ Le damnation de Faust (1889), and Busoni’s Doktor Faust (1925). The most famous of these is Charles Gounod’s Faust (1859), which is based on Goethe’s play.

Faust, Frederick. See Max Brand.

Faustbuch, Das (Ger., “Faust-book”). A term referring to any of the several German folk books (Volksbücher) which relate the career of Dr. Johann Faust. The first such book was printed by Johann Spies in 1587, and many variations appeared shortly afterwards. Goethe’s main sources, however, seem to have been a much later version by Nikolaus Pfitzer (1674) and an abridgment of Pfitzer’s book which appeared in 1725.

Faustian. Of or pertaining to either the historical Faust or any of his fictional counterparts. From this basic meaning the term has broadened until, in modern usage, it is often used when characterizing any unswerving and unquenchable will to possess all of human knowledge or experience.

Faustina [Annia Galeria]. The name of 2 Roman empresses. Faustina the Elder was married to the emperor Antoninus Pius, and died in a.d. 141. Faustina the Younger, her daughter, was married to the emperor Marcus Aurelius, the adopted son and successor of Antoninus, and died in 175. Both were notorious for their evil lives, though Marcus Aurelius professed to believe his wife the best of women. Swinburne’s poem Faustine was written with these empresses in mind.

Fauves, les. A group of French artists (Rocault, Derain, Dufy, Vlaminck, etc.) who grouped around Matisse and exhibited together from 1905 to 1907. The movement is characterized by the use of violent
Feininger, Lyonel

A kind of Saturnalia, popular in the Middle Ages. Its chief object was to honor the ass on which Jesus made his triumphant entry into Jerusalem. This blasphemous mummery was held on the Feast of the Circumcision (Jan. 1). The office of the day was chanted in travesty, then a procession was formed and all sorts of foolery was indulged in. An ass was an essential feature, and from time to time the whole procession imitated braying, especially in the place of “Amen.”

Feast of Lanterns. A popular Chinese festival. It is celebrated at the first full moon of each year. Tradition says that the daughter of a famous mandarin fell into a lake one evening. The father and his neighbors went with lanterns to look for her, and happily she was rescued. In commemoration thereof, a festival was ordained, and it grew in time to be the celebrated Feast of Lanterns.

Federalist, The (1787–1788). A series of 85 papers or essays written to urge New York voters to approve the U.S. Constitution. About 50 of the series are said to have been written by Alexander Hamilton, the others by James Madison and John Jay. The essays were intended to show how the proposed constitution would create an effective national government in conformity with republican principles. They are now considered outstanding studies in the practical application of political theory.

Fedín, Konstantín Aleksandrovič (1892– ) Russian novelist. After serving in the Red Army during the civil war, Fedín became connected with the Serapion Brothers and published his first story, The Orchard (Sad) in 1920. The theme of the story, which recurs in several of his later works, is the conflict between the old and new in changing Soviet society. His first novel, Cities and Years (Gorodu i gody; 1924), also uses this theme, contrasting the Alluring Andrei Startzov, a type of SUPERFLUOUS MAN, with the devoted Communist, Kurt Wahn, who eventually kills Startzov as a traitor to the cause. The novel constituted a departure from the style then prevalent in Russian fiction. Instead of the wildly romantic treatment of its subject, rendered in vivid and exotic language, as was the method of Pilyyak, Vsevolod Ivanov, and other young writers, Fedín used the calm, objective description and sober psychological probing typical of the 19th-century Russian novel. He departed from it, however, in his complicated handling of the chronological sequence of the narrative, beginning with the novel’s denouement, and flashing back and forth in time to tell his story.

Fedín’s second novel, The Brothers (Bratya; 1928), treated the same theme of an individual’s acclamation to the revolution in a manner even closer to the classical Russian novel’s realism. His next large work, The Rape of Europe (Pokhizheniye europy; 1934–1935), concerned relations between the West and the new Soviet society.

After the war Fedín published two more novels, which are considered his best works: First Joys (Peryye radosti; 1945–1946) and Unusual Summer (Neobyknovennoye leto; 1948). Both portray life in the Volga region of Saratov shortly before World War I and during the revolution.

Feininger, Lyonel [Charles Adrian] (1871–1956). American artist. Of German descent, and associated with the Bauhaus throughout its existence, he became a leader of the nonrepresentational movement in painting. In his landscapes of sea or city he divides forms and space into segmented planes, limited by straight lines. His son Andreas Feininger (1906— ), a talented photographer, has published The World As I See It (1963).

Feisi or Feiysai, Abul Feis ibn Mubarak (1547–1595). Indo-Persian poet and scholar, crowned king of poesy (c. 1572) by the Mogul Emperor Akbar the Great. He translated parts of the Mahabharata into Persian.

Félibrige. An association of Provencal poets. It was founded near Avignon (1854) for the cultivation of Provencal as a literary language. The school's first leader was Joseph Roumanille, and its membership included Frédéric Mistral, Rémy Marcellin (1832–1908), Jean Brunet (1823–1894), Paul Giéra (1816–1861), Anselme Mathieu (1829–1925), Alphonse Tavan (1833–1905) and Théodore Aubanel (1829–1886).

Felipe, León. Pen name of León Felipe Camino Galicia (1884— ). Spanish poet. He is best known in Spain for his early work, Versos y oraciones del camino (1920), and abroad for the larger volume Antología rota, 1920–1947 (1947). His poetry, simple and direct, reveals the influence of Walt Whitman whom Felipe has translated.

Felix Holt the Radical (1866). A novel by George Eliot. Felix Holt is an ardent young man of strong social convictions who attempts, by living as a watchmaker among the lower classes in his area, to encourage them to better themselves. Against him is set Harold Transome, who is running for Parliament as a radical, yet possesses none of the social sense of Felix. Felix finds himself in love with Esther, imagined to be the daughter of the local curate, Rufus Lyon. Eventually, Esther has to choose between Felix and Transome. As a complication, Felix, in his efforts to prevent the workers from rioting on Election Day, has accidentally killed a man and is on trial. His trouble brings Esther to the realization that she loves him, and when he is pardoned she becomes his wife. Running through the novel are the legal problems concerning the inheritance of the Transome property, and the attending mystery surrounding Esther's birth.

Felix Krull. See Confessions of Felix Krull: CONFIDENCE MAN.

Fell, Dr. See John Fell.

Fell, John (1625–1686). English scholar and prelate, subject of the well-known quatrain by Thomas Brown (1663–1704):

I do not love thee, Dr. Fell,
The reason why I cannot tell;
But this I know, and know full well,
I do not love thee, Dr. Fell.

Brown is said to have composed these lines when Fell, who was dean of Christ Church, Oxford, promised to remit a sentence of expulsion if the youth could make an impromptu translation of Martial's 33rd epigram:

Non amo te, Sabiti, nec possum discere quae;
Hoc tanum possum discere non amo te.

Fellini, Federico (1920— ). Italian motion-picture director and writer. He appeared as an actor for a short time before 1940, when he began his career as a script writer and director. Among the films for which he has received international acclaim are La Strada (1956), La Notte di Cabiria (1957), La Dolce Vita (1960), and 8½ (1963).

Felltham or Feltham, Owen (1602–1668). English essayist, poet, and character writer. His two major works are Resolves, Divine, Moral, and Political (1628) and A Brief Character of the Low Countries (1652). An ardent Royalist, he once referred to Charles I as "Christ the Second."

Feltton, John (1592–1628). English soldier and assassin. In 1628 he assassinated the Duke of Buckingham, who had refused him the command of a company, and was hanged at Tyburn. He appears in Dumas' The Three Musketeers (1844).

Femmes savantes, Les (The Learned Ladies, 1672). A comedy by Molière. It satirizes women who devote themselves to women's rights, science, and philosophy to the neglect of domestic duties and wisely amenities. Philaminte, who is capable of discharging a servant for employing bad grammar, wants to marry Henriette, her daughter, to Trissotin, a man whose tastes and opinions match her own. Her daughter Armande advocates Platonic love and science, and her sister Belise is a self-styled philosopher who imagines that everyone is in love with her. Henriette, who has no sympathy with the lofty flights of her female relatives, is in love with Clitandre, but is prevented from marrying him until her father loses his property through the "savant" proclivities of his wife and Trissotin withdraws his suit of the girl. Clitandre and Henriette are thereupon united, Clitandre declaring his beloved the "perfect" or thorough woman—in distinction, Molière implies, to the rest of her family.

Fénelon, François de Salignac de la Mothe (1651–1715). French prelate and writer. Fénelon's success in tutoring the duc de Bourgogne, grandson of Louis XIV, won him an appointment to the Académie française, the title of archbishop, and a favored position at court. He lost favor embracing the unorthodox doctrines of Quietism, and upon publication of his epic Télemâque, which in offering political advice to the dauphin indirectly reproved the policies of the king, Fénelon was exiled to his diocese. Liberal in his political and educational theories, Fénelon expressed his convictions in De l'Éducation des filles (Concerning the Education of Girls, 1687) and Table de Chaulnes (1711).

Fenian cycle. In Gaelic literature, a group of tales revolving around the deeds of Fiann mac Cumhaill and his son Osín, or Oisín. The term Fenian comes from "fian," a band of warriors. The chief Fenian text is the Colloquy of Old Men, a discussion between St. Patrick and Ossian; also important is The Pursuit of Diarmaid and Gráinne. Paganism is somewhat modified in the Fenian cycle, Christianity reaching Ireland in the old age of Ossian.

Fenians or Fenian Brotherhood, an anti-British secret association of disaffected Irishmen founded in New York in 1857 with a view to securing the independence of Ireland. The movement spread over the U.S. and through Ireland (where it absorbed the pre-existing Phoenix Society); several attempts at insurrection in Ireland were made as well as an invasion of Canada from the U.S. Eleven "national congresses" were held by the Fenian Brotherhood in the U.S. between 1863 and 1872, after which it continued as a secret society. It was a forerunner to the Irish Republican Brotherhood. The name Fenian is derived from Fionn mac Cumhaill, the name of the great, semimythological hero of Ireland. See CLANNA-GAEL; SINN FEIN; YOUNG IRELAND; EASTER REBELLION.

Fenollosa, Ernest Francisco (1853-1908). American poet, art critic, and Orientalist. After living in Japan and teaching for 12 years at the University of Tokyo, Fenollosa returned to the U.S.; he became curator of the Boston Museum of Fine Arts and was a widely received lecturer. He later returned to Japan, and finally moved to England, where he died. His collected poems appeared as East and West (1893). Epochs of Chinese and Japanese Art (2 v., 1912), his greatest art book, was published posthumously. During the Westernization of Japan, Fenollosa saved many ancient art treasures from mishandling and destruction. His private collection formed the nucleus of the Fenollosa-Weld Collection in the Boston Museum. After his death, Fenollosa's wife turned his notes and papers over to the poet Ezra Pound. From Fenollosa's work, Pound made the celebrated translations from Li Po that appear in his Cathay (1915), as well as the versions of classical Japanese drama found in Certain Noble Plays of Japan (1916).

Fenrir or Fenris-wolf. In Scandinavian mythology, the wolf of Loki and brother of Hel, typifying the goading of a guilty conscience. It was said that when he gaped, one jaw touched earth and the other heaven. Odin sought vainly to chain him but the wolf was expected to swallow Odin at the day of doom. Percy MacKaye wrote a dramatic poem entitled Fenris the Wolf (1905).

Fenton. In Shakespeare's Merry Wives of Windsor, a young gentlemen who woos and finally wins "sweet Anne Page." He had formerly been a companion of Prince Hal.

Ferber, Edna (1887- ). American novelist and short-story writer. Edna Ferber started her long career as a highly successful writer of fiction with several collections of short stories. Her best-selling novels include The Girls (1921); So Big (1924), which was awarded a Pullitzer Prize and which deals with the struggles of the widowed Selina Dejong to support herself and her son Dirk; Show Boat; and Cimarron (1930), a story of the spectacular land rush of 1889 in Oklahoma. In collaboration with George S. Kaufman, Miss Ferber wrote several popular plays: Minnie (1924), based on one of her best short stories; The Royal Family (1927), which exhibited the Barrymores in a humorous vein; Dinner at Eight (1932), about a fashionable dinner party; and Stage Door (1936). Among her many later novels are Giant (1952) and Ice Palace (1958).

Ferdinand II of Aragon or Ferdinand V of Castile (1452-1516). King of Spain. In 1469 Ferdinand married Isabella of Castile and, upon her accession to the throne in 1474, the two great kingdoms of Spain were permanently united. During their reign Ferdinand and Isabella sought to consolidate royal power and to assure the religious purity of Spain. The first aim they accomplished by destroying the privileges of the unruly Castilian nobility and by limiting the once-considerable independence of the towns. The second aim was achieved by the establishment of the Spanish Inquisition (1478) and by the conquest (1492) of Granada, the last Moorish kingdom in Spain. In the same year the Jews of Spain were ordered to become Christians or face expulsion; the same alternatives were offered to the Moors of Castile in 1502. Perhaps the most important event of their reign was the discovery of America in 1492 by Christopher Columbus, whose voyage was made possible by Isabella. Ferdinand expanded Spanish power in Europe as well, acquiring Naples in 1503 and the kingdom of Navarre in 1512. Upon the death of Isabella in 1504, he ruled Castile as regent for their demented daughter, Joanna the Mad. In 1506 he took a second wife, Germaine de Foix.

Ferdinand Count Fathom, The Adventures of (1753). A novel by Tobias Smollett. The titular hero, son of a harried mother, is an amoral Machiavellian rogue who nearly succeeds in destroying Monimia, the fiancée of his master and friend, Count de Melvil. Reduced to ignomy and disgrace when his schemes miscarry, he is finally rehabilitated by the benevolent Melvil, and reforms under an assumed name. The novel professes to terrify the inquisitive into virtue through an appeal to the "impulses of fear." Fathom, completely reformed and prosperous, reappears as a character in The Expedition of Humphrey Clinker.

Fergus. A famous warrior in the ULSTER CYCLE of Gaelic literature. Fergus also appears in James Joyce's Ulysses (1922).

Ferlinghetti, Lawrence. See Beat movement.

Fernández de Avellaneda, Alonso. See Don Quixote.

Fernández de Lizardi, José Joaquín (1776-1827). Mexican novelist and journalist. Fernández de Lizardi is often called El Pensador Mexicano (Sp., the Mexican Thinker), the name of a newspaper he established in 1812 as a vehicle for his ideas on morality and patriotism. It is, however, as a novelist that he is best known, notably for El periquillo sarniento, often considered the first Hispanic-American novel, and for La quizoista y su prima (1818-1819), which was inspired by Rousseau's theories of education.

Fernández de Moratín, Leandro. See Leandro Fernández de Moratín.

Fernández Flórez, Wenceslao (1886- ). Spanish writer. The journalistic style of his early newspaper career reappears in the ironic humor of his novels, including Valorpeta (1917), Las siete columnas (The Seven Pillars, 1926), and Los que no fuimos a la guerra (1930).

Fernández y González, Manuel (1821-1888). Spanish novelist and dramatist. He is known for his prolific output of historical novels patterned on the works of the English romanticists. His best-known novels are _Los siete infantes de Lara_ (1853), _El cocinero de su Majestad_ (1857), and _Historia de un murciélago_ (1857). He also wrote the drama _Cid Rodrigo de Vivar_ (1858).

Ferney, the patriarch or philosopher of. Epithet for Voltaire (François Marie Arouet). Ferney is the name of the estate that Voltaire bought near Geneva in 1758 and where he spent the last 20 years of his life. He is known as the patriarch of Ferney because of his fatherly interest in the management of the estate and in his staff of servants. For them and for the local inhabitants, Voltaire built a pottery factory and a church. His grand manner of entertaining his numerous famous visitors also explains this epithet. Secure from political and religious interference at Ferney, because of its geographical location, Voltaire poured forth innumerable vitriolic pamphlets attacking just about everyone who disagreed with him.

Ferragué, Ferrau, Ferracute, or Fерagus. In Ariosto's _Orlando Furioso_, a Saracen knight, son of Lanfusi. Having lost his helmet in a river, he vowed to wear none other than Orlando's. In the _Orlando Innamorato_ of Boiardo, he was supposed to wed Angelica, as her brother Argaglia wished; but she fled from him. In the Ariosto continuation, he is finally killed by Orlando when wounded in the navel, his only vulnerable part.

Ferrar, Nicholas (1592-1637). English theologian. With several members of his family he established a religious colony at Little Gidding in Huntingdonshire that was renowned for its piety. Ferrar translated religious works, wrote the _Story Books of Little Gidding_, first published in 1899, and was responsible for publishing the work of George Herbert, his friend. The last of T. S. Eliot's _Four Quartets_ (1943) is entitled _Little Gidding_, the poet using Ferrar's community as an example of achieved spiritual life.

Ferras, Edward. See _Sense and Sensibility._

Ferraud, Sir. See Faerie Queene, _The._

Ferrex and Porrex. Sons of King Gorbusch in the _History of the Kings of Britain_ by Geoffrey of Monmouth. The king divided his kingdom between them, but Porrex drove his brother from Britain. When Ferrex returned with an army he was slain, but Porrex was shortly after put to death by his mother, whose favorite was Ferrex. The story forms the basis of the Tudor drama _Gorbouche_ (1992), the first English tragedy by Norton and Sackville.

Ferumbras. See _Fierabras._

Feste. Olivia's clown in Shakespeare's _Twelfth Night_. He takes part in the pranks against Malvolio, and he also sings the well-known song, "O mistress mine!"

Festin de pierre, Le. See Dom Juan ou le _Festin de Pierre._

Festus. See Philip J. Bailey.

Fet, Afanasi Afanasyevich (1820-1892). Russian lyric poet. Fet was the illegitimate son of Afanasi Sheshin, a landowner, and a German woman named Foeth (Fet in Russian). He retained the name Fet throughout his literary career. His first volume of poems (1840) received little notice. With the publication of two more books of verse in 1850 and 1856, however, Fet's reputation was established as a lyric poet whose work was unexcelled in its melodic quality, his chief themes being love and nature. The quality and the concerns of Fet's work were not palatable to the utilitarian critics of the 1860's. They cited his poetry as an example of the sterility of "art for art's sake." One of their favorite targets for ridicule was a short poem by Fet, _Shopot, robkoe dykan'èe_ (Whispering, timid breathing). An impressionistic description of the break of dawn, the poem contains no verbs. The unfriendly critical reception of his work induced Fet to stop publishing poetry for more than 20 years. He lived quietly on his estate near the home of his friend, Leo Tolstoi. In the 1880's, several more volumes of Fet's poems were published.

Feuchtwanger, Lion (1884-1958). German novelist. He was noted for his treatment of historical and political themes, and for his application of psychoanalytic ideas to the development of character. Among his novels are _Die hälsische Herzogin Margarete Maultasch_ (The Ugly Duchess, 1923), _Jud Süss_ (1925, translated as Power), _Der jüdische Krieg_ (1932, translated as Josephus), and _Der Wartesaal_ (The Waiting Room), a trilogy including _Erfolg_ (Success, 1930), _Die Geschwister Oppenheim_ (1933, translated as _The Oppermans_), and _Exil_ (1939, translated as Paris Gazette). Feuchtwanger was active as a pacifist and a socialist, and was forced into exile by the rise of Nazism. He was a friend of Bertolt Brecht and collaborated with him on several plays including _Leben Edwards II von England_ (Life of Edward II of England, 1923), and adaptation of _Edward II_ by Marlowe. See Arnold Zweig.

feudalism or feudal system. The system of distribution of land and political allegiance prevalent throughout Europe during the Middle Ages. According to its purest form, the king owns all the land over which he rules, but gives portions of it as inheritable fiefs to his vassals, in exchange for loyalty and a specified amount of military service. These feudal lords similarly divide their land among their followers, and the subdivision continues, forming a pyramidal hierarchy in which each nobleman has an obligation to the lord above him and authority over those below him. At the base of the pyramid are the serfs, the farmers who belong to the land they work, owing most of its produce to its lord and changing masters when the land changes hands through gift or marriage alliances or wars.

The feudal system was dominant from the 9th to the 14th century, when the rise of the merchant class and the growing importance of the towns began to change the social structure. Some feudal elements, however, such as the hierarchy of the propertied class of nobles, continued through the 19th century.

Feuerbach, Ludwig (1804-1872). German philosopher. He analyzed religion from a psychological and anthropological viewpoint in _Das Wesen des Christentums_ (The Essence of Christianity, 1841) and _Das Wesen der Religion_ (The Essence of Religion, 1843). Denying the traditional antithesis of the divine and the human, he maintained that divinity is man's projection of his own human nature. Love and the family, the basis of human relations, are the essence of religion. This tendency toward secularization of religion in the mid-19th century is also found in the work of David Friedrich Strauss and Ernest Renan.
Feuillants, Le Club des. A French political club born of a schism between members of the Jacobin Club in July, 1791. They were more moderate than the Jacobins in their wholehearted support of the constitutional monarchy provided for by the Constitution of 1791, and in their distrust of the political influence of the Parisian mob. The Feuillants came to power early in 1792, but were soon replaced by the Girondins over the question of war with Austria. Their political power rapidly waned and they were superseded by the Jacobins after the fall of the monarchy in September, 1792. The club's members met in the old convent of the Feuillants, a branch of the Cistercian Order, hence its name.

Feuillet, Octave (1821–1890). French author and playwright. One of the most appreciated, popular writers of his period, Feuillet is the author of the sentimental novel Roman d'un jeune homme pauvre (1858). The young hero of this tale refuses to marry his wealthy beloved and later destroys the proof which would enable him to take possession of her family fortune. His honor does not go unrewarded, however, for he soon inherits an even larger fortune and is at last united with his love. Feuillet's dramas, which received the same approval as his novels, include La Belle au bois dormant (1867) and La Partie de dames (1883).

Fleuilleton. The section of a French newspaper devoted to tales, serials, light literature, and criticism. The title of this early 19th-century phenomenon is derived from the French feuille (a leaf) as the first feuilletons were printed on the detachable, lower portion of the page. The word is now applied to pamphlets, generally of a political nature, that are distributed on the street.

Few Figs from Thistles, A (1920). A collection of poems by Edna St. Vincent Millay. The second of her collections, this volume differs from the earlier Renascence and Other Poems (1917) in its greater tone of sophisticated flippancy. Seeming to epitomize youthful Bohemianism, the poems were widely quoted in Greenwich Village, among the best known of them being First Fig, Recuerdo, and The Philosopher.

Fiammetta. The lady celebrated by Giovanni Boccaccio in his verse and prose works. The literal meaning of her name, flickering or darting fire, suggests his passion for her. Fiammetta is also the title of a psychological romance written by Boccaccio in 1344–1346, in which she is the heroine describing her abandonment by Panfilo and her subsequent grief. Since she is also called Maria, it was once assumed that Fiammetta was really Maria d'Aquino. Modern scholars now hold that she was purely fictional, a Boccaccian equivalent of Laura and other ladies of the lyric tradition.

Fichte, Johann Gottlieb (1762–1814). German philosopher and political thinker. An important force in the development of German romanticism, in his Grundlage der gesammten Wissenschaftslehre (Foundation of the Complete Theory of Knowledge, 1794), he developed the distinction made earlier by Kant between phenomenal reality and the thing-in-itself (see Critique of Pure Reason). He maintained that the essence of the universe is ego—mind, that is, spirit—and that the ego itself posits the material world by a process called productive imagination.

Man's ideas do not come from experience of the material world, for his mind is part of the universal creative ego and finds fulfillment in self-conscious unity with it. Fichte's main political work is Reden an die deutsche Nation (Addresses to the German Nation, 1808), in which his earlier enthusiasm for the French Revolution is replaced by a stern condemnation of Napoleon. Fichte, who believed in the nobility of the German spirit, hoped that Germany would unite and free Europe from French rule.

Ficino, Marsilio (1433–1499). Italian philosopher and scholar. The first and most influential Platonist of the Renaissance, as a child he was taken into the Florentine household of Cosimo de' Medici for the express purpose of learning the philosophy of Plato and his followers, the Neoplatonists. He soon became the center of a group of intellectuals, including Angelo Poliziano and Pico della Mirandola, loosely called the Florentine Academy. He translated Greek works into Latin, wrote such commentaries as the famous one on Plato's Symposium (in Latin and Italian), and composed original treatises. His main impulse seems to have been the desire to reconcile Platonism (actually Neoplatonism) with the tradition of Christian thought, as in his Theologia platonica de immortalitate animorum (The Platonic Theology of the Immortality of Souls). Among the many European and English writers influenced by his writings are Benvieni, Pico della Mirandola, Bembo, Castiglione, Spenser, and Chapman. Among the poets who read and used him, it was frequently the Platonic theory of spiritual or philosophic love that appealed rather than theological or cosmological theory.

Ficke, Arthur Davison (1883–1945). American poet and critic. Ficke's interests were divided between art—especially Japanese art—and poetry. In the former field he published Twelve Japanese Painters (1913) and Chats on Japanese Prints (1915). As a poet he was noted for his sonnets; his two interests combined in Sonnets of a Portrait Painter (1914). He was involved with Witter Bynner in the Spectra hoax.

Fiddler's Green. The Elysium of sailors; a land flowing with rum and lime juice; a land of perpetual music, mirth, drinking, drinking, and tobacco; a sort of Dixie Land or land of the leal.

Fidei Defensor. See Defender of the Faith.

Fidelio (1805). An opera by Ludwig von Beethoven, based on Bouilly's Lenore. The hero is Don Fernando Florestan, a state prisoner in Spain, and the heroine his faithful wife Leonora, who disguises herself as a man and under the name Fidelio becomes the jailer's servant in order to protect her husband and bring about his release. It is the only opera Beethoven wrote. Beethoven composed four overtures for Fidelio that are often performed in concert.

Fidessa. See Faerie Queene, The.

Field, Arthur William (1888–1937). Australian novelist. Born in Gosport, England, Field was sent as a boy to Australia where his early literary influences were Charles Dickens, Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, and Alexandre Dumas. He led an adventurous life as a shepherd, cowhand, gold miner, fur trapper, and soldier. Many of his actual experiences are vividly related in his books: House of Cain (1929), Murder Down Under (1937), The Devil's Field, Eugene (1850-1895). American poet and journalist. Expelled from three colleges because of his pranks, Field turned to journalism. He settled in Chicago, where he wrote a column, "Sharps and Flats," for the Daily News. Collecting his newspaper verses into several books, he published The Tribune Primer (1882), A Little Book of Western Verse (1889), Love Affairs of a Bibliomaniac (1896), and several other volumes. He wrote many popular and sentimental poems for children, including Little Boy Blue (1899).

Field, Michael. Joint pen name of Katharine Harris Bradley (1846-1914) and Edith Emma Cooper (1862-1913). English authors, they collaborated (from 1884) on lyric poetry and poetic closet dramas. Their lyrics—their best work—are represented by A Selection From the Poems of Michael Field (1923).

Field, Nath[han] or "Nid" (1587-?). English actor and dramatist. He became one of the Children of the Chapel Royal in 1600, remaining with that company until 1613, when he was absorbed into the Lady Elizabeth's Players. Two years later he joined the King's Men. He was apparently an excellent actor, generally playing the part of young lovers. His name comes 17th on the list of 26 actors in the 1623 Shakespeare folio. He was the author of two comedies, A Woman Is a Weathercock (1609?) and Amends for Ladies (pub. 1618), and is believed to have collaborated with Philip Massinger, John Fletcher, and Francis Beaumont.

Fielding, Henry (1707-1754). English novelist and playwright, an important figure in the development of the English novel. His career as a dramatist has been eclipsed by his career as a novelist, and all that is remembered today of his plays is Tom Thumb, a brilliant farce, and Pasquin (1736) and The Historical Register for 1736 (1737), two social and political satires. Robert Walpole's Licensing Act of 1737 ended the use of the stage for political satire, and so terminated this phase of Fielding's career. Turning to the study of law, he was admitted to the bar; in 1749 he became London's first police magistrate and, with the organization of the Bow Street Runners, a pioneer in the detection of crime.

In the meantime his literary career continued. From 1739 to 1741 he edited the periodical Champion. When Richardson's Pamela was published, Fielding was moved to parody it, first in Apology for the Life of Mrs. Shamela Andrews, and once again, more brilliantly, in Joseph Andrews. In 1743 he published three volumes of Miscellanies, which included his ironic satire Jonathan Wild. Tom Jones, his greatest novel, and Amelia, an early example of social realism, appeared soon after. In 1754, in an attempt to restore his failing health, he made a trip to Portugal and wrote an account of it in A Journal of a Voyage to Lisbon. He died at Lisbon.

Field of the Cloth of Gold. A plain near Guines, France. There Henry VIII (of England) had his interview with Francis I (of France) in 1520; so called from the splendor and magnificence displayed there on that occasion.

Fierabras or Ferumbras. One of Charlemagne's Paladins in medieval French and English romance. A Saracen giant, son of King Balant of Babylon, he has conquered Rome and taken the holy relics. But Olivier defeats him in a duel, and he becomes a Christian knight. His sister Floripas is also baptized and marries Guy of Burgundy.

Fiesole. A village near Florence, Italy, chiefly famous for a Dominican monastery decorated by Fra Angelico.

Fiesole, Mino da (1431-1484). Tuscan sculptor. His tombs, particularly that of Pope Paul II (1473), portrait busts, and reliefs, are known for their finish, delicacy of detail, and strongly devotional aspects.

fifteen, the. The Jacobite rebellion of 1715, when James Edward Stuart, "the Old Pretender," with the Earl of Mar, made a half-hearted and unsuccessful attempt to gain the throne of England. The reference is to the year of the attempt, to distinguish it from the forty-five (1745) revolt of "the Young Pretender," Charles Edward Stuart.

Fifteen Decisive Battles of the World (1851). A historical work by Sir Edward Creasy (1812-1878). The author discusses those battles which in his opinion have effected some great and permanent political changes in Western history. The battles under discussion are Marathon; Syracuse; Arbela; Metaurus; Teutoburg Forest; Chalons; Tours; Hastings; Orléans; the defeat of the Spanish Armada; Blenheim; Pultowa; Saratoga; Vlany; Waterloo.

fifth column. Enemy sympathizers engaged in sabotage. The term was first used during the Spanish Civil War (1936–1939) by General Mola, who stated in a broadcast that he had four columns of soldiers advancing on Madrid and a fifth column of sympathizers within the city who would arise to attack the defenders from the rear. It was made the title of a play (1938) by Ernest Hemingway; the term came into wide use during the German invasion of Holland, Belgium, Luxemburg, and France in 1940, when fifth columnists were active. During World War II, the term applied to a systematic organization of spies penetrating the civilian life of the enemy country to acquire information, obstruct military preparations, alarm, confuse, and divide the populace, and assist or join the invading army. It was also applied to citizens who were enemy sympathizers. The fifth column, in fact and in rhetoric, is the modern equivalent of the Trojan Horse.

Fifth Monarchy Men. A fanatical sect of millenarians in England at the time of the Common-wealth, who maintained that the fifth monachy, when Christ should reign on earth 1,000 years, was near at hand and that they must establish it by force. They listed Assyria, Persia, Greece, and Rome as the preceding four monarchies. Their uprisings (1657 and 1661) came to nothing.

Figaro. The rascally hero of two comedies by Beaumarchais: The Barber of Seville and its sequel Le Mariage de Figaro, ou La folle journée (1784). The complicated plot of the latter play concerns Count Almaviva, who is tired of his wife Rosine and tries to find solace elsewhere. Figaro, now the count’s doorkeeper, loves Suzanne, Rosine’s maid. Almaviva, himself taken with Suzanne, is in favor of the marriage between Figaro and Suzanne, provided he can exercise his feudal rights over Suzanne. His attempts to achieve his ends are constantly thwarted by various conspiracies, rendering him constantly ridiculous. His infidelity to Rosine is exposed, and Figaro, having outwitted his master, finally marries Suzanne. Beaumarchais’ bitter criticisms of the ruling classes caused the play to be suppressed for three years; he was even imprisoned five days for his seductivity; but the public demanded its performance, and its success was possibly the greatest any play has ever had in the history of French theater. In Figaro’s famous, daring monologue (Act V, scene 3), he says: “What have you [the nobility] done to deserve such wealth? You took the trouble to be born, and nothing else.” Mozart composed an opera based on this play: Le Nozze di Figaro (The Marriage of Figaro, 1786), in which the political implications are absent.

Filarete, II. Real name, Antonio Averlino (c. 1400–1470). Florentine sculptor and architect. He worked for the Sforza family in Milan, where he built the Ospedale Maggiore (1457) and the Medici bank. In Rome, he carved the bronze doors for the old St. Peter’s, which were retained for the present structure. His treatise on architecture, Trattato dell’architettura (1464), was described by Vasari as “perhaps the most stupid book ever written;” it contains plans for what he called Sforzinda, an ideal, walled-off symmetrical city.

Filippo, Francesco (1398–1481). Venetian diplomat and scholar. Like other Humanists of the Italian Renaissance, he wrote Latin verse and translated from Greek, which he had studied at Constantinople (see Humanism). His activities as teacher and scholar centered in the university at Florence and the court of Milan.

Filicaia, Vincenzo da (1642–1707). Italian lyric poet. A member of the Arcadian Academy, he is known for his odes and sonnets on religious and patriotic themes. His most famous sonnet, Italia, was translated by Byron in Childe Harold’s Pilgrimage (Canto III, I. 110).

Filioque controversy. An argument that long disturbed the Eastern and Western branches of the Christian Church. The difference of opinion still forms one of the principal barriers to their fusion. The point was: Did the Holy Spirit proceed from the Father and the Son (filio-que), or from the Father only? The Western Church maintains the former position and the Eastern the latter.

Filippovna, Natasha. In Feodor Dostoievski’s novel This I Sort, the beautiful, tortured woman whose proud nature is continually exacerbated by the memory of a shameful seduction in her youth. Prince Myshkin tries to help her, but is able only to offer her her pit. She finally runs away with the passionately jealous Roonzhin, who kills her.

Filocolo, II. A lengthy prose romance by Giovanni Boccaccio. Its title, a Greek coinage meaning Love’s Labor, refers to the trials of its leading characters, Fiorio and Biancofont. Derived from the French tale of Floris et Blancheflor, it was elaborated with many episodes and digressions by Boccaccio which later were used by European and English writers. The most famous of these digressions is the Thirteen Questions of Love.

Filostroto, II. A romance in octaves by Giovanni Boccaccio, whose title means “a man overwhelmed by love.” The man is Trojan Troilo (Troilus), who loves and wins Criseida with the help of her cousin and his friend Pandaro (Pandarus). But when she leaves the Trojan camp to return to her father on the Greek side, she quickly betrays Troilo’s trust, leaving him stunned by grief. Boccaccio drew the plot from the Roman de Troie of Benoît de Sainte-More, then supplied Chaucer with the story of his Troilus and Criseyde. See Guido delle Colonne.

Filumena, St. (Philomena). A saint unknown till 1802. A grave was discovered in that year in the catacomb of St. Priscilla on the Salarian Way (leading from Rome to Ancona), with this inscription on tiles: “tumena paxte cymph,” which, being rearranged, makes Pax tecum Filumena. Filumena was at once popularly accepted as a saint, though never canonized, and so many wonders were worked by her that she has been called La Thaumaturge du Dix-neuvième Siècle. In 1961, the Vatican officially prohibited her further veneration.

Financier, The (1912). A novel by Theodore Dreiser. It is the first volume in the trilogy that includes Titan Titan and The Stoic (1947). All three deal with a typical industrial and financial magnate of the late 19th century. Dreiser admitted that he based his central character, Frank Algeron Cowper-wood, on the figure of Charles T. Yerkes (1837–1905), who gained control of the Chicago street-railway system. The book begins with a famous scene in which Cowperwood as a young boy in Phila- delphia watches a lobster devour a squid, this act becoming for him a symbol of what life really is. Working his way upward, the hero is caught in a stock-market crash and receives a prison sentence for illegal dealings. At the end of the book, when he is released, he marries and goes to Chicago to begin his climb again.

Fin de partie. See ENIDGAE.

Fingal, An Ancient Epic (1761). An epic poem by James MACPHERSON. Purportedly a translation from Gaelic, the poem was attributed by him to OSSIAN, son of Fingal, and told of the adventures of the legendary hero Fingal or FIONN MAC CUMHAIL.

Finnabair. In Gaelic literature, the Irish GEniVers, daughter of Mhyx and Ailll. One of the figures in the Ulster cycle, she appears in such tales as the Cattle-Raid of Cooley and Red Bricrenn.

Finnegans Wake (1939). The last and most revolutionary experimental novel by James Joyce. It is almost inaccessible to readers who have not done some special study; a great many volumes of explication have been published since the novel's first, controversial appearance. The main difficulty is in the language. Joyce uses an elaborate language of his own devising, made up of puns, portmanteau words, and words from foreign languages, with endless philological variations. He incorporates literary, historical, and philosophical allusions; names of people and places in Dublin; Irish references; slang; phrases from newspapers, popular songs, art, and the world of sport; and words and syllables from every other imaginable source. By means of this complex language and its rich connotations, Joyce is able to relate his slight, rather obscure central story to the whole historic, psychological, religious, and artistic experience of mankind. Critics relate Joyce's difficult linguistic method to the scholasticism he encountered during his strict Catholic education, and his presentation of different levels of meaning simultaneously to the influence of medieval allegory.

Most literally, the novel presents the dreams and nightmares of H. C. Earwicker and his family as they lie asleep at night. Their anxieties, secret thoughts, unexpressed desires, and the events of the past day recur in their minds. Humphrey Chimpden Earwicker, a Protestant Irishman of Scandinavian descent (and thus, like Bloom of Ulysses, an outsider) is the middle-aged keeper of a tavern in Dublin. He has a wife, Anna, and three children: Isobel, a daughter now in her teens, and twin sons, Kevin and Jerry. At some time in the past Earwicker has accosted someone in Phoenix Park, but it is never made clear whether this was a young girl or a man; he still feels guilty and fears investigation by the authorities. In his dream Earwicker's personal guilt is related to various religious taboos and legends, and he is associated with Lucifer, Adam, Humpry Dumpty, and other figures. Another sexual taboo and guilt complex in Earwicker's dream concerns his daughter Isobel, whom he subordinates as a love object; however, Jerry avoids incest he transforms her into the self of the Fair and himself into Tristram. He also imagines himself as Jonathan Swift, the Irish writer who loved two women. Because of the similarity in names, Earwicker is also associated with earwigs (see PERSE O'REILLY). Earwicker represents Everyman and general maleness. His initials, HCE, are interwoven throughout the book, particularly in the recurrent phrases Here Comes Everybody and Haveth Childer Everywhere. Anna, his wife, like Molly Bloom of Ulysses, resents the universal feminine principle, and becomes identified with the River Liffey, personified in the novel as Anna Livia Plurabelle. The Anna Livia Plurabelle sections are among the most remarkable in the novel, being triumphs of Joyce's poetic prose. Eventually all the women in the novel merge into this figure as the river merges into the sea. Earwicker's two sons are complementary opposites. Jerry, who appears as Shem the hoosegow, is a rebellious, introverted artist of the type of Stephen Dedalus, and Kevin, or Shaun the Postman, is a man of action and an average, extroverted citizen.

In structure the novel is entirely circular, ending in an unfinished sentence which is completed by a half sentence at the beginning. The history of mankind and the river-to-sea progression of time and individual life are also seen as circular. In Christian thought the fall of man is followed by the resurrection; Earwicker's mysterious misdeed took place in Phoenix park, and the title of the novel refers both to the Irish hero Finn MacCool, who was supposed to return to live some day to be the savior of Ireland, and to Tim Finnegan, the hero of a music hall ballad about a man who jumped up indignantly in the middle of his own wake. Joyce used the ideas of cyclical repetition of Giambattista Vico; Freud's dream psychology; Jung's theory of a collective unconscious; and Giordano Bruno's theory of the complementary but conflicting nature of opposites (Shem and Shaun).

Joyce began writing Finnegans Wake in 1922. During the 17 years of its composition the novel was known as Work in Progress, and several parts of it were published separately as they were completed; the whole work was revised before publication.

Finn MacCool. See FIONN MAC CUMHAIL.

Finnsburg (or Finnesburh), The Fight at (8th century?). Old English (Anglo-Saxon) poem, of which only a 50-line fragment is extant. In the version of the story incorporated in BOWULP, King Finn of the Frisians has married Hildeburgh of the Danes, but treacherously attacks her brother Hnaef and his followers while they are his guests. The following spring the Danes under Hengest kill Finn and carry Hildeburgh back to Denmark.

Fionn mac Cumhail. Also known as Finn mac Cumhail, Finn MacCool. Legendary Irish hero, hero of the FENIAN CYCLE, and leader of the Fenians, a band of warriors. He is now believed to have an historical basis, dating back to the third century B.C. The Fenians and Fionn himself were famous for their remarkable strength and stature, their fearlessness, and their extraordinary feats. As a child, Fionn was educated in the forest by a poet. His profound wisdom came from his having tasted the salmon of knowledge which fed on the hazelnuts of wisdom. His life is one of countless adventures with giants and hags; in the service of the high king at Tara, he performs many deeds, and it is for the king that he organizes the Fenian wars. In the story of Fionn, his life knows two great loves: his first wife, Sedh, mother of his son Osín, or OSSIAN, and his second wife, Gráinne, who betrays him with his kinsman Diarmuid. The PURSUIT OF DIARMUID AND GRÁINNE is the best known of the stories of Fionn. Fionn is the hero of James Macpherson's poem Fingal, An Ancient Epic, a spurious translation from the Gaelic.

Firdiši or Firdelis. In the Orlando poems of Boiardo and Ariosto, the daughter of King Dil-stone. As a child she was stolen from her parents and brought up with Brandimarte, a knight whom she loves and follows everywhere on his adventures. Eventually, the revelation of her royal birth enables them to marry, but Brandimarte is killed soon after. She builds a tomb for him and encloses herself within it to await her own death.

Fiorentino, Ser Giovanni. The Italian author of a collection of 50 novelle in imitation of the Decameron of Boccaccio, entitled by later readers Il Pecorone (The Numbskull). The author, about whom nothing is known, says he finished the tales in 1385. One of the stories, "Giannetto and the Lady of Belmont," provided Shakespeare with the pound of flesh and other details of The Merchant of Venice.

Firbank, Ronald (1886–1926). English novelist. Heir of the decedents of the 1890's, and a Catholic, Firbank was an escapist who created fantastic, elegant wish-fulfilment myths, and a wit who was master of brilliant dialogue. Gaily vicious, his characters are society ladies, ecclesiastics, lesbians, kings, nuns, and Negroes. The mid-century is seeing a revival of interest in his work, with a successful musical-comedy adaptation of Valmouth. The Flower Beneath the Foot (1923) is a romance and a saint's life. Prancing Nigger (1924) is a sympathetic account of a Negro family in Haiti who leave their village to educate their daughters—disastrously—in the big city. Concerning the Eccentricities of Cardinal Firelli (1926) describes that digitary's death in pursuit of a pretty choirboy through the cathedral.

Fir Bolg. In Gaelic literature, the 3rd race to invade and inhabit Ireland. They were defeated by the fourth race of invaders, the Tuatha Dé Danann.

Firdousī or Firdusi or Firdausi. (Born Abul Qāsim Mansur or Hasan; 941–1026). Persian epic poet. His major work is the epic Shah-Nama. It was written at the request of the Sultan Mahmud ibn Sabuktigin who wanted a history of Persia. Its completion required 35 years. When it was finished in 1010, the sultan did not send the promised reward of a thousand gold pieces for every thousand couples (60,000 in all), but substituted silver instead. In anger Firdousi gave the silver away, wrote a bit-terly scurrilous satire that he sent to the sultan, and fled to exile. In Baghdad he wrote a long poem, Yusuf and Zuleikha, on the Koranic version of the loves of Joseph and Potiphar's wife, a popular theme in Persian literature. After nine years he returned to his birthplace of Tus, Persia, where he died shortly thereafter.

Firenzuola, Angelo (1493–c. 1548). Florentine author. His best-known work is the dialogue Della bellezza delle donne (1541) concerning the beauty of women. This work is a study of the Renaissance concept of the ideal female type familiar in the literature of the period.

Fire of London, Great. A fire that broke out in a baker's shop in Pudding Lane in 1666 and burned for three days and three nights. Much of the city was destroyed, including the old Gothic cathedral of St. Paul's. In his Diary, Samuel Pepys described how the fire spread "in corners and upon steeples, and between churches and houses as far as we could see . . . in a most horrid malicious bloody flame."

First-Born. See GIANTS.

First Folio. The first collection of the plays of William Shakespeare. It was compiled by his fellow actors John Heminges and Henry Condell, and published in 1623, seven years after his death. It contained 36 plays (omitting Pericles, but otherwise including all the plays now considered to be authentic) arranged under the headings of comedies, histories, and tragedies. It was dedicated to Shakespeare's patrons, the earl of Pembroke and the earl of Montgomery, and for many years was considered to be a more authoritative text than the earlier quarto editions of individual plays. Several editions appeared, the third of which (second issue, 1664) included seven additional plays of which only one, the sometimes-disputed Pericles, is considered to be the work of Shakespeare. A facsimile edition of the First Folio was published by the Oxford University Press in 1902, and by Yale University Press in 1954.

Fischer, Lisbeth. See Cousine Bette, LA.

fish. As a symbol for Christ it was used by the early Christians. The letters of the Greek word for fish, ἰχθύς, formed an acrostic of the words Jesus Christ, Son of God, Saviour.

Fisher, Dorothy Canfield [formerly Dorothy Canfield] (1879–1958). American novelist and short-story writer. Mrs. Fisher was a kindly but discriminating interpreter of American life, especially in New England, from the beginning of her career. Among her most widely read novels are The Squirrel Cage, The Bent Twig (1915), The Brimming Cup, Rough Hewn (1922), Her Son's Wife (1926), and The Deepening Stream (1930). In Four-Square (1949) 17 of her short stories were collected. The best of her nonfiction work is Vermont Tradition; The Biography of an Outlook on Life (1953).

Fisher, [Alvero] Vards (1895– ). American novelist. Fisher first became known with his tetralogy of novels dealing with the life of Vridar Hunter, an autobiographical hero who is carried through childhood, adolescence, and maturity in a quest for the meaning of life: In Tragic Life (1932), Passions Spin the Plot (1934), We are Betrayed (1935), and No Villain Need Be (1936). His novel about the early Mormons, Children of God (1939), won him the Harper Prize Novel award. With Darkness and the Deep (1943) he began a series of stories portraying the development of primitive man, which he called Testament of Man. Peace Like a River (1958), My Holy Satan (1959), and Orphans in Gethsemane (1960) are part of this series. Two later books are Love and Death (1960) and Suicide or Murder: The Strange Death of Meriwether Lewis (1962).

Fisherman’s ring. The Pope’s signet ring for attesting papal briefs. It bears his name incising a figure of Peter, a fisherman and first bishop of the Roman Church. A new ring is made for each Pope and is destroyed at his death, to avoid forged documents.

Fitz Boodle Papers, The (1842-1843). A series of sketches and tales by William Makepeace Thackeray. The principal character is a lazy young nobleman, George Savage Fitz Boodle, with a flair for Bohemian life.

Fitzgerald, Edward (1809-1883). English translator, man of letters. During his lifetime, Fitzgerald was known (and by few) for his wit and personal sweetness; he was “dead old Fitz” to such as Thackeray and Tennyson. His Six Dramas of Calderon (1853) was poorly received when published, though later acclaimed as great translation. His famous translation of the Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám was ignored until discovered by Dante Gabriel Rossetti and others after Fitzgerald’s death. His reputation is largely founded on this poem, so free in rendition as to be virtually an original work, and masterful in its concentration, music, and command of tone. Fitzgerald’s Letters and Literary Remains (ed. W. A. Wright, 1899) are also of much interest.

Fitzgerald, Francis Scott [Key] (1896-1940). American novelist and short story writer. One of the most gifted writers of his generation, Fitzgerald became known for his novels and stories of the 1920’s; he called it the “Jazz Age” and described it as “a new generation grown up to find all Gods dead, all wars fought, all faiths in men shaken.” As a spokesman for the Jazz Age, Fitzgerald created glittering characters, cynical and irresponsible, trying to turn life into an endless, gay party; as the moralist he felt himself essentially to be, he infused his novels and stories with the sense that something was desperately wrong.

Fitzgerald was born in St. Paul, Minnesota, where his mother’s well-to-do middle class family had its roots; he was named after the author of The Star-Spangled Banner, an ancestor of his father. He attended Princeton, but did not receive his degree; here it was that he began his lifelong friendship with Edmund Wilson. He served in the army, but never saw action, and in fact spent most of his time working on his first novel This Side of Paradise. Published in 1920, it was a spectacular success both financially and critically. In the same year he married the beautiful Zelda Sayre and together they embarked on a life that reads like one of his novels, commuting between the plush hotels and better speakeasies of the U.S. and the fashionable resorts of Europe, where they mingled with other wealthy, sophisticated expatriates. They made homes on the Riviera, and in Paris, New York, Long Island, and Washington. It was a glamorous life that was to end tragically with Zelda’s ineradicable mental illness and Fitzgerald’s breakdown.

Fitzgerald followed his first success with a collection of short stories Flappers and Philosophers (1920), and a second novel The Beautiful and the Damned (1921), in which he describes the pervading goal of his day as “the final polish of the shoe, the ultimate dab of the clothes brush, and a sort of intellectual There!” Tales of the Jazz Age (1922) and The Vegetable (a play; 1923) were followed by The Great Gatsby, often considered his finest work. As was his custom, he immediately followed the novel with another collection of short stories, All the Sad Young Men (1926).

From this point on in his career, Fitzgerald had an increasingly difficult time in keeping abreast of the enormous financial and emotional demands besetting him. His next novel, Tender is the Night, was not published until 1934, its progress having been constantly interrupted with attempts to meet his expenses by writing stories for magazines. The strain of Zelda’s severe mental illness and of trying desperately to bring her back to health contributed to his own personal crisis which he described in The Crack-Up (1936). His determined, and to some extent, successful efforts to put the pieces of his life back together and to devote himself to writing ended with his early death. His last novel, The Last Tycoon (1941), incomplete at his death, is considered by many critics to be his best.

Fitzgerald was also a master of the short story form; among his finest are The Rich Boy, The Diamond as Big as the Ritz, and Babylon Revisited.

Fitzgerald has been the subject of a great number of biographical and critical works; the central character of Budd Schulberg’s novel The Disenchanted (1950) is modeled closely on Fitzgerald in his declining years. His Letters, edited by Andrew Turnbull, appeared in 1963.

Fitzgerald, Robert David (1902— ). Australian poet. His work is noted for its vitality and metaphysical content. His Essay on Memory won the Australian-wide competition that took place during the 150th anniversary celebration. His writings include The Greater Apollo: Seven Metaphysical Songs (1927), To Meet the Sun (1929), Moonlight Acre (1938), This Night’s Orbit (1953), Between Two Tides (1952), and The Wind at Your Door (1959).

Fitzmaurice-Kelly, James (1857-1923). English authority on Spanish literature. He wrote authoritative works in his field and was editor of The Oxford Book of Spanish Verse (1913).

Five. The. A group of late 19th-century Russian composers who, fervent nationalists, hoped to develop an indigenous school of music. It consisted of Mily Balakirev (1837-1910), who was leader, César Cui (1835-1918), Mussorgsky, Borodin, and Rimsky-Korsakov.

Five Classics. Works in the Confucian canon. They are: Book of Odes, Book of Changes, Book of Rituals, Book of Documents, and the Spring and Autumn Annals. Together with the Four Books, they served as the basis of Chinese education until recent times.

Five-Foot Shelf. A popular name for the Harvard Classics.

(2) The Five Civilized Nations or Tribes were the Cherokee, Chickasaw, Choctaw, Creek, and Seminole, so called because they had gone far in absorbing the civilization of the white settlers.

Five-Year Plan. A period of industrial construction and consolidation in the Soviet Union. The first plan lasted from 1928 to 1932. At the instigation of the literary group RAFF, many novels, stories, and plays were produced depicting the time. Among the best were works by Valentin Kataniev (Time, Forward!) and by Leonid Leonov.

Flaccus, Quintus Horatius. See Horace.

Flag Day. June 14, celebrated in the U.S. as the anniversary of the formal adoption of the Stars and Stripes in 1777, though not a legal holiday.

Flagellants. Members of religious associations who hold that the wrath of God can be appeased only by self-flagellation. The first wave of this movement spread over Europe, starting from Italy, about the year 1260. Scenes of public processions with the exhibition of bloody self-castration were repeated on a larger scale at the time of the plague called the black death (about 1348). For a modern group with similar tenets see彭特نت.

Flagstad, Kirsten (1895-1962). Norwegian dramatic soprano. She was famous for her Wagnerian interpretations, especially in the role of Isolde. Her autobiography, The Flagstad Manuscripts (1952), was narrated to the music critic, Louis Biancoli.

Flaherty, Robert Joseph (1884-1951). Canadian explorer, writer, and pioneer documentary motion-picture director. From 1910 to 1916, he led a number of expeditions into the subarctic regions of eastern Canada. Among his classic documentary films are Nanook of the North (1922), Moana of the South Seas (1925), Tabu (1931), Man of Aran (1934), Elephant Boy (1935), and Louisiana Story (1948). He wrote the autobiographical A Film-Maker's Odyssey (1939) and the novels The Captain's Chair (1938) and White Master (1939).

Flame of Life, The (Il Fuoco). A novel by Gabriele D'Annunzio. It deals with the love affair of La Foscara, a great tragic actress in her prima, and Stelio, a young poet. Inspired by the author's liaison with Eleonora Duse, the novel caused a scandal upon publication.

Flaminio, Marcantonio (1498-1559). Venetian lyricist. He is noted for his prolific output of secular and religious verse in Latin during the Renaissance. Especially noteworthy is the Lusus Pastorales (Pastoral Fancies, 1552), eight books of bucolic verse.

Flanders, Moll. See Moll Flanders.

Flaubert, Gustave (1821-1880). French novelist. Born at Rouen in Normandy, Flaubert is one of the great literary artists of the 19th century. Although his name is associated with the naturalist movement, his artistic beliefs and ideals may not be so neatly summarized. Victor Hugo, Chateaubriand, and Gautier were the writers whom Flaubert most admired. A deep strain of romanticism in his own nature, which found expression in lyricism and vivid imaginings, was resolutely curbed in the service of his theories of art. Like Gautier, Flaubert believed in perfection of form and in the absolute value of art - part pour l'art ("art for art's sake"). In technique, his work is marked by exactness and accuracy of observation, extreme impersonality and objectivity, and extraordinary balance and precision of style. But his precise, careful portrayal of object and event, although naturalistic in method, was not naturalistic in aim. Flaubert's concern was to create reality through the art of exact selection and the chiseled perfection of his style. Beset by ill health and by personal misfortune, he led a solitary life of rigid discipline. His obsession with the writer's craft is legendary. Hour after hour, he would labor over the rhythm or the music of a particular sentence, seeking le mot juste. He wrote Madame Bovary, Salammbô, L'Éducation Sentimentale, Tentation de Saint-Anoine (The Temptation of Saint Anthony, 1874), and the unfinished Bouvard et Pécuchet (1881). The short stories Un Cœur Simple (A SIMPLE HEART), La Légende de Saint-Julien-l'Hospitalier, and Hérodiade appeared in the single volume Trois Contes (1877); these masterful tales revealed Flaubert's great command of this genre.

Flavius. In Shakespeare's Timon of Athens, the "true and honest" servant of Timon. His loyalty to Timon never wavers, even when his master is reduced to ruin. Flavius shares his savings with Timon's other servants and offers to give Timon the remainder.

Flavius and Marullus. In Shakespeare's Julius Caesar, two tribunes, supporters of the defeated Pompey. They bitterly reproach the Roman masses for their fickleness, reminding them that they had once paid Pompey the same homage that they now give to Caesar.

Flaneur. In Shakespeare's Macbeth, the son of Banquo. After the assassination of his father, he escapes to Wales. From him, according to legend, proceeded in a direct line the Stuart line of Scotland, thus fulfilling the witches' prophecy that Banquo's descendants would be kings.

Flecker, James Elroy (1884-1915). English poet and dramatist. He is known for his iconoclastic manner, his interest in Greece and the Orient, and the pictorial richness of his writing. His poetic works include The Bridge of Fire (1908), The Golden Journey to Samarkand (1913), The Burial in England (1915), and Collected Poems (1916). His plays are Don Juan, produced in 1925, and Hassan, which was widely celebrated in the 1923 production. He wrote one novel, King of Avalon (1914). Flecker was called "the last of the Parnassians."

Flecknoe, Richard. See MacFlecknoe.

Fleet marriages. Clandestine marriages that were performed without banns or license by needy chaplains, in Fleet Prison, London. As many as thirty marriages a day were sometimes celebrated in this manner. This practice was suppressed and declared null and void in 1774.

Fleet Street. A street in London now synonymous with English journalism and newspaperdom. It was a famous thoroughfare centuries before the first newspaper was published there at the close of the 18th century. The name derives from the old stream, the Fleet, now subterranean, which flowed nearby.

Fleming, Henry. The hero of Stephen Crane's novel The Red Badge of Courage and of his short stories Lynx-Hunting and The Veteran (see Whithmuser Stories). In the novel, Fleming learns the meaning of fear and later, almost accidentally, of courage.

Fleming, Ian (1908-1964). English author of crime and adventure fiction. The hero of most of his novels is James Bond, a secret agent for British Intelligence. Among Fleming's works are From Russia With Love (1951), Casino Royal (1954), Dr. No (1959), Goldfinger (1959), and Thunderball (1961).
Fleming, Paul (1609-1640). German baroque poet. Although a close follower and admirer of Martin Opiz, he shows more depth of personal feeling in his verse. A complete edition of his works, Teutsche Poemats (German Poems, 1642), appeared posthumously.

Fleming, Peter (1907- ). English travel writer and novelist. Among his books are Brazilian Adventure (1933); News from Tartary (1936); Operation Sea Lion (1957), dealing with a projected invasion of England during World War II; Siege at Peking (1959), about the Boxer Rebellion; and Bayonets to Lhasa (1961), an account of a British invasion of Tibet in 1904.

Fleshy School of Poetry, The (1871). An article in the Contemporary Review by Robert Buchanan. It is a vitriolic diatribe against the poetry of the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood, particularly that of Dante Gabriel Rossetti. These writers were accused of morbidity, nastiness, perverted sensuality, and indifference to larger and more exalted concerns of poetry. Buchanan, who wrote the piece over the signature Robert Maitland, at first denied authorship, but was later obliged to admit it. Swinburne became involved in the celebrated quarrel that followed, and his trenchant reply is to be found in Under the Microscope (1872). The Fleshy School of Poetry was reprinted in the volume Notorious Literary Attacks (1926), edited by Albert Mordell. See Stealthy School of Criticism.

Fletcher, Giles, the younger (1588-1623). English poet. He is best known for Christ's Victorie and Triumph in Heaven and Earth (1610), a religious poem modeled on the work of DuBartas and Spenser, which is thought to have had a great influence on Milton's Paradise Regained (1671). He was the son of Giles Fletcher, the elder (1549-1611), who wrote Licia (1593), an early book of sonnet sequences.

Fletcher, John. See Beaumont and Fletcher.

Fletcher, John Gould (1886-1950). American poet and critic. First associated with Imagism and later with the Agrarians, he felt that modern poetry needed new patterns and new subject matter. His Selected Poems (1938) won a Pulitzer Prize. Irritations: Sands and Spray (1915), his first volume of poetry, was followed by such other collections as Goblins and Pagodas (1916), Breakers and Granite (1921), The Black Rock (1928), and XXIV Elegies (1935). His prose works include a book on Gauguin (1921), John Smith—Also Pocahontas (1928), The Two Frontiers: A Study in Historical Psychology (1930), and the autobiography Life Is My Song (1957).

Fletcher, Phineas (1582-1650). English poet. The brother of Giles Fletcher the younger, he was a follower and imitator of Spenser. He is best known for The Purple Island (1633), an allegorical poem on man in terms of the topography and settlement of an island. Among his other works are Locustae (1627), an anti-Jesuit poem in Latin, its paraphrased English title being The Apollonists; Britain's Idea (1627), a mythological poem in the manner of Spenser and first published as the work of Spenser; Fiscatory Eclogues and Other Poetical Miscellanies (1633). Milton's Satan is believed to have been suggested by the Lucifer of The Apollonists.

Fleurs du mal, Les (The Flowers of Evil, 1857). A volume of poetry by Charles Baudelaire. Faced with the conflict of good and evil, Baudelaire discards the conventional distinctions and seeks beauty or good in the perverse, the grotesque, and the morbid. His sensibility, painfully alive to all emotions and sensations, lends unity to the various poems.

Flies, The (Les Mouches; 1943). A play by Jean Paul Sartre. The plot is an adaptation of Aeschylus' story of Orestes. Zeus shares with Aegistheus "the bitterness of knowing men are free," although the townsfolk are content to let their king shoulder their decision-making along with their responsibility for guilt. Orestes is the dangerous man who knows that he is free, and that "human life begins on the far side of despair." To teach his people to be free and responsible, Orestes kills Aegistheus and takes with him the crowd of repulsive flies, the Furies of the Greek drama, who symbolize conscious acceptance of the consequences of one's acts. When it was first produced during the Occupation, the play had overtones of a call to resistance to the Vichy government's collaboration with the Nazis.

Flint, F[rank] S[tuart] (1885-1960). English imagist poet (see Imagism) and translator. His collections of poetry are In the Net of the Stars (1909), Cadences (1915), and Otherworld (1915).

Flirtatious Mother, The. See Philippe Quinault.

Flite, Miss. In Charles Dickens' Bleak House, a pathetic old woman, demented because of the delay of her suit in chancery.

Floating Island. See Faerie Queene.

Flodden or Flodden Field, Battle of. A battle in Northumberland on Sept. 9, 1513. James IV of Scotland was defeated and killed by the forces of the earl of Surrey, who was in charge of the action in the absence of Henry VIII. The battle, in which there were up to 10,000 Scottish dead, among them all Scotland's leaders, was made the subject of poems by John Skelton, Thomas Deloney, and others. The battle is described in the 6th canto of Sir Walter Scott's Marmion, A Tale of Flodden Field.

flood myths. A very widespread theme in mythology is the destruction of the world by a flood and the survival of one human being, often with his family, thanks to the good will of a god. The most famous flood narrative, that of Noah, is based closely on the far older Babylonian story of Utnapishtim, told in the Epic of Gilgamesh. This in turn was based on the Sumarian legend of Ziusudra. In Hindu mythology, Vishnu appears to Manu, the first man, as a fish and warns him of the coming flood; the god himself leads Manu's ship to a safe mooring in the mountains of the North. In the Greek myth, Deucalion (see Deucalion's Flood), the son of Prometheus, is the hero who, with his wife Pyrrha, is saved and repopulates the earth. The Hiittite Noah was Ullush. Stories of a great flood are also found in many parts of Asia, in Australia, and in North and South America, though they are uncommon in Europe. It has been suggested that these myths arose either from traditions of local floods or from attempts to explain striking configurations of the landscape.
Flora. In Roman mythology, goddess of flowers. Hence, in natural history all the flowers and vegetable productions of a country or locality are called its flora.

Flora. See Turn of the Screw, The.

Flores (or Floris) and Blanchefleur (Fr. Flore et Blancheflor). A medieval metrical romance in French and English. Flores and Blanchefleur are a Christian prince and princess who are brought up together and fall in love. Before Blanchefleur is carried off as a slave by the Saracens, she gives Flores a ring that will tarnish when she is in danger. It warns him, and he pursues her through many adventures to an Oriental Emir's harem, which he enters concealed in a basket of roses. When he is discovered, the lovers are sentenced to death, but are pardoned by the Emir because of the beauty of their love for each other. Boccaccio adapts this tale in his Il Filocolo.

Florian, Jean Pierre Claris de (1755-1794). French dramatist, novelisit, and fabulist, admitted to the French Academy in 1788. His comedies, such as Les Deux billets (1799) and Le Bon ménage (1782), depict bourgeois life in which Arlequin appears as a sentimental character. Marie Antoinette called Florian's novels "milk soup," such was their insipidity; among these are Galatée (1783, adapted from Cervantes) and Numa Pompius (1786, a feeble imitation of Pénélon's Télémaque). His fame rests on his agreeable, limpid Fables, which are similar to those of La Fontaine, though much less pessimistic.

Florimell. See Faerie Queene, The.

Florio, John (1553-1625). English lexicographer and translator. The son of an Italian Protestant refugee, Florio compiled an Italian-English dictionary, A World of Words (1598), revised as Queen Anne's New World of Words (1611); he is best known, however, for his famous and enduring translation of Montaigne's Essays (1603).

Floris. See Flores and Blanchefleur.

Florismart. One of Chelamagne's paladins in medieval romances, a close friend of Roland.

Florizel. The son of Polixenes, king of Bohemia, in Shakespeare's Winter's Tale. During a hunting expedition, he sees Perdita, supposedly the daughter of a shepherd, falls in love with her, and courts her under the assumed name of Doricles. When Polixenes objects to the match, Florizel flees with her to Sicilia, where it is revealed that she is the long-lost daughter of that country's king, Leonides.

Flower and the Leaf, The (15th century). Anonymous allegorical poem of about 600 lines in rhyme royal, for a long time erroneously attributed to Geoffrey Chaucer. The knights and ladies of the Flower, fond of frivolous sports and amusements, are given shelter from a shower by the more serious company of the Leaf.

Flowering Judas (1930). A collection of short stories by Katherine Anne Porter. Originally printed in a limited edition, it was later reprinted with four stories added. It was the first major work to establish its author's reputation.

Flower of Chivalry. An epithet. It was often applied to Sir Philip Sidney, statesman, poet, and soldier (1554-1586) and to the Chevalier de Bayard, le Chevalier sans Peur et sans Reproche (1476-1524).

Fluellen. A pedantic Welsh captain in Shakespeare's Henry V. He attempts to draw a comparison between Henry and Alexander the Great, but after he points out that one was born at Monmouth and the other at Macedon, both of which begin with the same letter, and that there is a river in both cities, he finds that he has exhausted his parallels.

Flute. See Bottom.

Flutter, Sir Fopling. See Man of Mode, The.

Flying Dutchman. A legendary spectral ship. Supposedly, it can be seen in stormy weather off the Cape of Good Hope; it is considered an omen of ill luck. Sir Walter Scott, in his note to Rokots, says that the ship was originally a vessel laden with precious metal, on which a horrible murder was committed; then plague broke out among the crew, and no port would allow the vessel to enter. The ill-fated ship still wanders about like a ghost, doomed to be sea-tossed, never more to enjoy rest. Captain Marryat's novel The Phantom Ship (1839) tells of Philip Vanderdecken's successful but disastrous search for his father, the captain of the Flying Dutchman. Wagner's opera The Flying Dutchman (Der Fliegende Holländer; 1843) embodies the legend in a different form. An old Dutch captain, in the midst of a struggle with the elements, has sworn an impious oath to round the Cape even if it takes an eternity to do it. The curse, which is laid on him for centuries, will only be lifted if he finds a wife willing to sacrifice everything for his sake. The opera deals with the lifting of the curse by the Norwegian maiden Senta.

Foch, Ferdinand (1851-1929). Marshal of France, made supreme commander of the Allied forces in 1918, the last year of World War I.

Fogazzaro, Antonio (1842-1911). Italian novelist and poet. A representative of liberal Catholicism, he attempted to reconcile traditional dogma with modern science. His finest novel, Piccolo Mondo Antico (The Patria, 1898), dramatizes the antithetical attitudes toward religion held by Franco Maironi, a rigid Catholic, and his wife Luisa, a rationalist. Only a shared tragedy succeeds in reconciling their mutual antagonisms in favor of a trusting Christian faith. Other major novels include Malombra (1881), The Politician (Daniele Cortis; 1885), Piccolo Mondo Moderno (1901), Il Santo (1906), and Leila (1911). They describe a curious symbiosis of exalted mysticism and impassioned sensuality, suggestive of symbolist influence. Il Santo was judged heretical by church authorities. See Franco Maironi.

Földes, Jolán, Anglicized as Yolanda (1903- ). A Hungarian novelist, permanently established in London. Her novel The Street of the Fishing Cat was awarded the All-Nations Novel prize in 1956.

Folengo, Teofilo or Girolamo (1496-1544). Italian satiric poet and Benedictine monk. He is famous for his mock epic poem, Baldus. Published in two parts totaling 25 books, the poem was written in Macaronic Latin, a mixture of the classical tongue with Italian. In its satire it was influenced by earlier writers like Erasmus, Pudz, and Boiardo; its chief impact was on Rabelais, who used several of its characters and incidents. It has sometimes borne the title Macaronicae, and Folengo, also, has been known by the pseudonym he affixed to the poem, Merlin Cozi.

Fomorians. In Gaelic literature, a race of giants who periodically came from the sea to raid prehistoric Ireland and inevitably tangled with whomever happened to be inhabiting the island at the time. See BATTLE OF MOTTURA, THE.

Fontaine, Jean de la. See Jean de la FONTAINE.

Fontainebleau. A town 37 miles southeast of Paris. Its palace was from the Middle Ages a favorite residence of the royal families of France. Several treaties were signed there. The forest of Fontainebleau is considered the most beautiful in France. It was the resort of the Barbizon school of painters, also known as the Fontainebleau or Fontainebleau-Barbizon school.

Fontane, Theodor (1819-1898). German novelist, perhaps his country’s greatest master of the social novel. In his youth, he was primarily a ballad writer but is not highly regarded as such; and it was not until the 1870’s that he turned to novel writing. His style is realistic and witty, and he uses a great deal of dialogue to recreate the atmosphere of the society he depicts. Without being excessively gloomy, he is constantly skeptical of men’s ability to rise above the foolishness they have inherited from the past. Most of his novels treat the decline of the Prussian nobility and the rise of the bourgeoisie, and most of his plots concern either persons who are living in the past or those who unsuccessfully try to transcend traditional values. His best-known novels are Irrungen, Wirrungen (Mistakes, Confusions, 1888), about a nobleman who finally chooses a socially acceptable bride over the girl he loves; Frau Jenny Treibel (1892), about nouveau riche families who jockey for social position by marrying their children to the right persons; and Zwei Briest (1899), his greatest work, about a middle-class girl who is obliged by her family to marry the old baron who had once been her mother’s sweetheart. As a critic, Fontane was one of the first to appreciate the young authors of naturalism, particularly Gerhart Hauptmann.

Fontanne, Lynn (1887– ). British-American actress. She is married to the actor Alfred Lunt, with whom she has starred in many stage productions, mainly light comedies. One of her finest performances was as the old lady in Dürrenmatt’s The Visit of the Old Lady.

Fontenelle, Bernard le Bovier de (1657-1757). French man of letters. Entretiens sur la pluralité des mondes (Conversations on the Plurality of Worlds, 1686), the best known of his writings, discusses the solar system in terms easily grasped by the general reader. In Dialogues des mors (Dialogues of the Dead, 1683), historical figures conduct imaginary and witty dialogues on a variety of philosophical subjects. Ostensibly opposing the pagan belief in oracles and upholding the scientific method, the Histoire des oracles (History of Oracles, 1686) levels a subtle attack at religious orthodoxy and blind obedience to authority. In Digressions sur les anciens et les modernes (Digressions upon the Ancients and the Moderns, 1688) Fontenelle sides with the moderns, predicting unlimited progress in the arts and sciences.

Fonvizin, Denis Ivanovich (1745-1792). Russian satirical dramatist. He is best known for two classic comedies: The Brigadier (Brigadier; 1769) and The Minor (Nedoros’t; 1782). The second play, considered his masterpiece, satirizes the barbaric habits of the semieducated gentry of the time.

Fool, Lear’s. In Shakespeare’s King Lear, the strangely wise companion in motley who travels in the storm with Lear, commenting on the behavior of mankind and peppering his words with song. The character is enigmatic in intent, “a pestilent gall” to Lear because of his bitter, mocking wit. He disappears at that point in the play at which Cordelia returns to help Lear, and he is believed in some way to represent truth, a trait also reflected in Cordelia, sometimes referred to by Lear as his “fool.”

Fool of Quality, The (1765-1770). A long novel by Henry Biscoe, describing the education of young Harry Moreland, destined to become earl of Moreland and to marry a princess of Morocco. It presents, as Charles Kingsley remarked, “the education of an ideal nobleman by an ideal merchant prince”; and it teaches that “all virtues, even justice itself, are merely different forms of benevolence.”

Fools. Attendants at court. From medieval times until the 17th century licensed fools or jesters were commonly kept at court, and frequently in the retinue of nobility.
of wealthy nobles. Thus we are told that the regent Morton had a fool, Patrick Bonny; Holbein painted Sir Thomas More's jester, Patison, in his picture of the chancellor; and as late as 1728 Swift wrote an epitaph on Dickie Pearce, the fool of the earl of Suffolk, who died at the age of 63 and is buried in Berkeley Churchyard, Gloucestershire. Dagonet, the fool of King Arthur, is also remembered.

Among the most celebrated court fools are: Rayère, of Henry I; Scogan, of Edward IV; Thomas Killigrew, called "King Charles jester" (1611-1682); Archie Armstrong (d. 1672), and Thomas Derrie, jesters in the court of James I; James Geddes, to Mary Queen of Scots; his predecessor was Jenny Colquhoun; Patch, the court fool of Elizabeth, wife of Henry VII, Will Sommers (d. 1560), Henry VIII's jester, and Patche, presented to that monarch by Cardinal Wolsey; and Robert Grene, jester in the court of Queen Elizabeth I.

The fools of Charles V of France were Mitton and Thévenin de St. Léger; Haincelyn Coq belonged to Charles VI, and Guillaume Louel to Charles VII. Triboulet was the jester of Louis XII and Francis I (1487-1560): Busquet, of whom Brantôme says "he never had his equal in repartee," of Henri II; Sibilot and Chicot, of Henri III and IV; and l'Angély, of Louis XIII.

The guild fools of medieval times played an important part in the spread of literature and education. They formed a branch of the Troubadour organization, a force that permeated Europe.

Fool's Errand, A (1879). A novel by Albion W. Tourgée. This book, published anonymously by "one of the fools," was admired by the public and the critics. The fool's errand was the attempt to rebuild the South, after the Civil War, in the image of the North. The novel concludes that Reconstruction is a failure. Tourgée discusses such groups as the new Ku Klux Klan in the passages of social history interwoven with the story. The story of a Union colonel from Michigan who moves to a Southern plantation after the war, the novel is semi-autobiographical.

Foote, Samuel (1720-1777). English playwright and actor known for his sensational and libellous plays. In The Minor (1760), Foote satirizes Methodism and George Whitefield; in The Maid of Bath (1761), he derides the suitors of the famous singer Elizabeth Linley, then wife-to-be of Richard Sterdan. His "scandal-chronicle" comedies gave Foote an opportunity to display his remarkable mimicry and to caricature mercilessly his enemies. Foote's other popular "noonday-skits" include The Diversions of the Morning (1747), An Auction of Pictures (1748), and Taste (1752). His biting wit earned him the epithet "the English Aristophanes."

Forbes, Esther (1894- ). American historical novelist. Miss Forbes's favorite setting is New England. Among her books are: O Grated Lady (1926); A Mirror for Witches (1928), a powerful novel of a 17th-century girl accused of witchcraft; The General's Lady (1938); Johnny Tremaine (1943); The Rising of the Tide (1948); and Rainbow on the Road (1954). Paul Revere and the World He Lived In (1942) was awarded a Pulitzer Prize.

Forbes, Kathryn. Pen name of Kathryn Anderson McLean (1909- ). American writer. Miss Forbes's short stories about her maternal grandmother, a Norwegian immigrant, were collected as Mama's Bank Account (1943). I Remember Mama, a dramatization of the book by John Van Druten, appeared the following year. Miss Forbes is also the author of Transfer Point (1947), the story of a 10-year-old girl and a San Francisco trolley car, and Dog Who Spoke to Santa Claus (1956), a collection of Christmas stories.

Forbidden City. The city of Lhasa in Tibet. It was so called because of the hostility of the lamas to visitors other than pilgrims. Also the section of Peking with the Imperial palace, which was formerly closed to the general public.

forbidden fruit. Figuratively, unlawful indulgence, from the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil eaten by Adam and Eve in disobedience of God's command. According to Muslim tradition, the forbidden fruit was the banana or Indian fig, because fig leaves were employed to cover the disobedient pair when they felt shame as the result of sin.

Forced Marriage, The. See Sangarelle (3).

Ford, Ford Madox. Original name, Ford Madox Hueffer (1873-1939). English novelist and editor. His mother was the daughter of Ford Madox Brown, the Pre-Raphaelite painter, and sister-in-law of William Rossetti. Violet Hunt was Ford's mistress for some time. His best novels, The Good Soldier and the tetralogy Parade's End, are studies of the emotional relationships in marriage and adultery. The early novels The Inheritors (1901) and Romance (1903) were written in collaboration with Joseph Conrad, whose oblique narrative method Ford admired and imitated. He wrote critical studies of Conrad (1924) and of Henry James (1913). An important literary editor, Ford founded the English Review in 1913 and edited the Transatlantic Review, from Paris, from about 1924. He "discovered" D. H. Lawrence (see Miriam) and was a friend of James Joyce and Ezra Pound. Among his volumes of autobiography and memoirs are No Enemy (1929), Return to Yesterday (1931), and It Was the Nightingale (1933). During the 1950's, Ford began to be increasingly recognized as a major 20th-century writer.

Ford, Henry (1863-1947). American industrialist. Founder of the Ford Motor Co. (1903), he is famous for introducing the principles of mass production to the manufacture of inexpensive automobiles. The Ford Foundation, established in 1938, has done much toward furthering peace, improving college salaries, and protecting freedom of speech, even though Ford himself was often extremely conservative in his social outlook. With Samuel Crowther he wrote several books, among them My Life and Work (1929).

Ford, John (1585-1640). English dramatist. He is known for his portrayal of passion and for his concentration on incest and other sexual abnormalities, as revealed in such works as 'Tis Pity She's a Whore and The Broken Heart. These characteristics are less apparent in Perkin Warbeck. His other plays include The Lovers' Melancholy (1628), The Lady's Trial (1638), The Fancies, Chaste and Noble (c. 1635), Love's Sacrifice (1630), The Sun's Darling (1624), and The Witch of Edmonton (c. 1623), written with William Rowley and Thomas Dekker.
Ford, Paul Leicester (1865-1902). American novelist and historian. His fame rests principally on two novels: The Honorable Peter Stirling and Janice Meredith. With his brother, Worthington Ford, he issued some important bibliographies, Winnowings in American History (15 v., 1890-1891). Among his various historical and biographical works are The True George Washington (1896) and The Many-Sided Franklin (1899).

Forster, C[ecil] S[cott] (1899–). English novelist, creator of Horatio Hornblower. He is best known for his Hornblower books, but he also wrote the successful Payment Deferred (1926), a crime novel; The Gun (1933), and The African Queen. His recent works include The Naval War of 1812 (1957) and Hunting the Bismarck (1959).

Forest Lovers, The (1898). A popular historical romance by Maurice Hewitt. Set in the Middle Ages, it is the story of the colorful adventures of Prosper le Cai. Out of pity he marries a waif who turns out to be the Countess Isoult of Morgraunt.

Formalism. A movement in Russian literary theory and criticism during the 1920's. It was characterized by its members' interest in aesthetic as opposed to social aspects of art. Although they lost the dominant place in Soviet literature to the advocates of proletarian and socialist art, the movement did inject a healthy interest into Russian literary criticism in the nature of literature and the problems of literary craft. Such interests had been generally subordinate to social concerns since the 19th-century critic Vissarion Belinski set the tone and direction of Russian criticism with his socially-oriented analyses and evaluations. The leading formalist theorists and critics were Victor Shklovsky, Boris Eikhenbaum, Yuri Tynyanov, Victor Zhirmunski, Boris Tomashevski, and Victor Vinogradov.

Fornovo, battle of. In 1495, the French troops of King Charles VIII fought an army of Italian and mercenary troops and safely extricated themselves from defeat. However, a year later, at Astella, they were defeated; for the Italians, it was a major victory against the foreigner; and the basis of the fame of their leader, Francesco Gonzaga.

Forso Clavigera. See John Ruskin.

Forster, E[dward] M[organ] (1879–). English novelist, short-story writer, and essayist. He is known for his liberal humanism, notably exemplified in his greatest novel, A Passage to India, which is a study of the prejudices and injustices of the English rule over colonial India. With quiet irony, in all his novels he reveals the moral and emotional deficiencies of English middle-class life. Howard is based on his well-known motto "Only connect." Forster believes that people of different races and classes should "connect" with one another, and that within themselves individuals should "connect the prose with the passion"—be imaginative, mystical, and sensitive to nature as well as practical. Like Norman Douglas and D. H. Lawrence, Forster believes that middle-class English people tend to lack the capacity for passion and intuition, and must learn it from other countries, especially Southern Europe, and perhaps from the lower-class English. The novels Where Angels Fear to Tread and A Room with a View, both set in Italy, revolve about this theme. Forster's novels are technically enriched by the symbolic and structural devices discussed in his critical work Aspects of the Novel.

Brought up in the country he later celebrated as Howards End, Forster was educated at King's College, Cambridge and continued to live there and in the village of Abinger. His novel The Longest Journey gives a picture of Cambridge life. Abinger is celebrated in Abinger Harvest (1936). In Cambridge and London Forster was associated with the Bloomsbury group. He traveled to Europe and India, and lived in Alexandria for a while, writing about it in Pharos and Pharillon (1923), a collection of essays. He also wrote a number of short stories, chiefly of an allegorical kind, which he published in The Celestial Omnibus (1911) and The Eternal Moment (1928).

After an early burst of creative activity, Forster wrote no more novels. After 1924 he published only collections of literary and sociological essays such as Abinger Harvest and Two Cheers for Democracy (1951), biographies, and books of literary criticism. One of the great English novelists of our time, Forster has sometimes been underestimated because all his work belongs to the first quarter of the century.

Forster-Nietzsche, Elisabeth (1846-1935). Sister of Friedrich Nietzsche. In her additions to the works he left unfinished when he went insane, especially Der Wille zur Macht (The Will to Power, 1901), she distorted his views to make him appear a racist.

Forsyte Saga, The. A series of novels by John Galsworthy. Galsworthy continued to write novels about the Forsyte family throughout his life, but strictly the Saga consists of The Man of Property (1906), In Chancery (1920), and To Let (1921). The whole work was published with two additional "interludes," Indian Summer of a Forsyte and Awakening, in 1922. The Forsytes are a large upper-middle-class London family of conventional, materialistic businessmen. When the Saga opens, 10 members of the oldest generation are still alive. Most of the novels are concerned with two members of the second generation, Soames Forsyte and Young Jolyon, and their children.

The "man of property" of the first and best-known novel is Soames Forsyte, a typical member of the Forsyte family. His wife Irene, whom he regards as just another piece of property, falls in love with Philip Bosinney, a young architect. Soames devotes all his money and power to punishing them, and Philip is killed in an accident. In Chancery tells of the Forsytes' divorce. Irene marries Young Jolyon, the only sensitive member of the Forsyte family, and Soames marries a French girl, Annette. In To Let, Soames' daughter Fleur falls in love with Jon, the son of Young Jolyon and Irene; when the young couple learn the truth about their parents Jon draws back in order to remain loyal to his mother.

A Modern Comedy (1929) is a second series of novels about the Forsytes; it consists of The White Forty stripes save one.

Monkey, The Silver Spoon, Swan Song, and two "interludes." This series carries the story up to Galsworthy's own day and is full of descriptions of the contemporary scene—toward which the aging author was unsympathetic. Most of the novels are about Fleur, her husband Michael Mont, and their friends. End of the Chapter (1933) is a little-read trilogy which is also concerned with Fleur and her friends. The Forsytes recur in many of Galsworthy's short stories and even in novels centered about other families.

In The Forsyte Saga itself Galsworthy satirizes Soames Forsyte and his materialistic values and champions the artist, the rebel, and the underdog. But in later novels he praises Soames' solid traditionalism, preferring him to the members of the modern young generation.

Fort, Paul (1872–1960). French poet and dramatist. In 1890 he reacted against the naturalist Théâtre Libre of Antoine by founding the Théâtre d'art, which became the influential Théâtre de l'Oeuvre under the director Luks-Poë. Fort wrote a number of symbolic plays with historical subjects for the new theater, among them La Petite Bête (1890), Yasabeau (1924), and Les Compères du Roi Louis (1927). A native of central France, he celebrated her history and culture in forty volumes of Ballades françaises and Chroniques de France (1897–1951), versified poetry usually printed as prose paragraphs.

For the Time Being (1944). A Christmas oratorio in verse and prose by W. H. Auden. It retells the Nativity story in contemporary idiom, with modern allusions, and with some comic, music-hall ballads as well as lyrical choruses. Auden equates the bad political and spiritual condition of the world just before the birth of Christ with the contemporary situation.

Fortinbras. In Shakespeare's Hamlet, the prince of Norway. A man of action unlike the introspective Hamlet, he has planned to invade Denmark but, deterred by his uncle and Claudio, marches on Poland instead. When Hamlet dies, Fortinbras arrives to claim the Danish throne and to restore order to the kingdom.

Fortuna. In Roman mythology, the goddess of fortune or chance. She was identified with the Greek Tyche, and she was often depicted with a rudder, as the pilot of destiny, with wings, or with a wheel. The wheel of fortune was a widely used symbol in medieval art and literature, forming the concept on which Lydgate's Falls of Princes (1494) and Chaucer's Monk's Tale from the Canterbury Tales (1387–1400?) were based.

Fortunate Islands. Also called Islands of the Blessed or the Happy Islands. Imaginary islands in the ocean. Here the souls of the good lived in eternal bliss. The name was later applied to Canary and Madeira Islands.

Fortunatus. A hero of medieval European legend. A native of Cyprus, he meets the goddess of Fortune, who offers him any one of her gifts: wisdom, long life, riches, and the like. He chooses riches, and she gives him a purse that refills itself whenever he draws from it. On his travels he steals a magic wishing cap from the sultan of Cairo. These apparent treasures, however, eventually prove the ruin of him and his two sons, pointing the moral that worldly goods do not bring happiness. The story first appears in print in a German collection of 1509. It was dramatized by Hans Sachs in 1553, Thomas Dekker in 1660, and J. L. Tieck (Phantasus, 1812–1815). See Schlemihl, Peter.

Fortunes of Nigel, The (1822). A novel by Sir Walter Scott set in the period of James I, in which James himself is a character. It relates the attempts of Lord Nigel Oliffant to secure his properties and a wife.

Forty. A number of frequent occurrence in Scripture. Hence it was formerly treated as, in a manner, sacerdotal. Moses was 40 days in the mount; Elijah was 40 days fed by ravens; the rain of the flood fell 40 days, and another 40 days expired before Noah opened the window of the ark; 40 days was the period of embalming; Ninevah had 40 days to repent; Jesus fasted 40 days; He was seen 40 days after His resurrection.

St. Swithin betokens 40 days' rain or dry weather; a quarantine extends to 40 days; 40 days, in the Old English law, was the limit for the payment of the fine for manslaughter; the privilege of sanctuary was for 40 days; the widow was allowed to remain in her husband's house for 40 days after his decease; a knight enjoined 40 days' service of his tenant; a stranger, at the expiration of 40 days, was compelled to be enrolled in some tithing; Members of Parliament were protected from arrest 40 days after the prorogation of the House, and 40 days before the House was convened; a new-made burgess had to forfeit 40 pence unless he built a house within 40 days.

The ancient physicians ascribe many strange changes to the period of 40; the alchemists looked on 40 days as the charmed period when the philosopher's stone and elixir of life were to appear.

Forty-five, the, sometimes '45. The second rebellion of the Jacobites which occurred in 1745 and failed. Prince Charles, "the Young Pretender," had to escape to France with the aid of Flora Macdonald. See Fifteen, the.

42nd Parallel, The (1930). A novel by John Dos Passos, 1st book in the trilogy later called U.S.A. (q.v.). Set in the period immediately before World War I, the novel interweaves episodes from the lives of several characters with the "newsreel" and "camera eye" devices and with biographies of Eugene Debs, Luther Burbank, William Jennings Bryan, Andrew Carnegie, Edison, and others.

The characters, some of whom appear in other parts of the trilogy, include Fauny McCready ("Mac"), who eventually joins the Mexican Revolution; the ruthless J. Ward Moorhouse; Eleanor Stoddard, with whom he has an affair; and Charley Anderson, who later becomes a war hero and airplane manufacturer. These various interlocking strands are designed to show the U.S. on the eve of the First World War, rather than the development of particular individuals. Although the book is sometimes confusing, it is, nevertheless, a powerful presentation of a vast canvas of human nature and history.

Forty stripes save one. A punishment. The Jews were forbidden by the Mosaic law to inflict more than 40 stripes on an offender, and for fear of breaking the law they stopped short of the number. If the Thieves contained three lashes, 13 strokes would equal forty save one.

Forty Thieves. See Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves.

For Whom the Bell Tolls (1940). A novel by Ernest Hemingway. Set against the background of the Spanish Civil War (1936–1939), it tells the story of Robert Jordan, an idealistic American college professor, who has come to Spain to fight with the Republican army. He has been assigned to a band of guerrillas led by Pablo and his wife, Pilar, a powerful peasant woman. Jordan’s task is to blow up a bridge of strategic importance. He falls in love with Maria, a young Spanish girl who has been raped by the Fascists, and, during the three days they are together, they try to forget the imminent event in their passion for each other. There is jealousy and distrust among the peasant members of the guerrilla company, several are killed, and the inefficiency and jealousies of the Communist leaders are revealed, but Jordan carries out his mission. He blows up the bridge successfully, but is wounded and left on the hillside to die. The title of the novel is taken from one of the best-known passages in the Devotions of John Donne.

Foscarì, Francesco (1373–1457). Famous doge (leader) of the Venetian republic. His long service to his city ended tragically with his expulsion from office. The story of how his enemies used the weaknesses of his son to humiliate him attracted the interest of Lord Byron, who immortalized the affair in his Two Foscari.

Foscolo, Ugo (1778–1827). Italian novelist, poet, and patriot. He was the author of Le Ultime Lettere di Jacopo Ortis (1802), the first Italian novel in the modern sense of the word. Influenced by Goethe’s Werther, and told in the form of exchanged letters, it relates the story of the futile love of the young student Ortis for a married woman; Ortis’ sufferings, compounded of fruitless passion and frustrated patriotism, eventually drive him to suicide. Foscolo’s best-known poem, I Sepolcri (1807), reveals his dual poetic personality in its romantic spirit and neoclassical style.

A zealot for the cause of Italian national unity, he fought with Napoleon’s Italian army and went into voluntary exile when Austria regained possession of Veneto and Lombardy. While in England (1816–1827), he wrote critical essays on literary, historical, linguistic, and political topics relating to Italy.

Foster, Stephen Collins (1826–1864). American song writer and popular composer. Among his best-known songs are My Old Kentucky Home, Old Folks at Home, Old Black Joe, and Jeanie with the Light Brown Hair. His Ole! Susanna appeared in 1848 and, becoming extremely popular with the gold-rush “forty-niners,” established his success. Many of his songs were used by the Negro minstrel troupes popular at the time and have become genuine American folk songs. Foster died, almost destitute, in the charity ward of Bellevue Hospital in New York.

Fouché, Joseph. Duke of Otranto (1763–1820). French minister of police. A master of political intrigue, Fouché was renowned for his espionage system. He served in turn as minister of police, senator, minister of the interior, and again as minister of police. In 1816, Fouché was exiled from France. Stefan Zweig has written a biographical study entitled Joseph Fouché.

Fountainhead, The (1943). A novel by Ayn Rand. The hero of this widely sold book, who is supposedly modeled on Frank Lloyd Wright, is an architect of enormous conceit who nevertheless succeeds in justifying his faith in the permanent values of honest design.

Fountain of Youth. In popular folk tales, a fountain supposed to possess the power of restoring youth. Expeditions were fitted out in search of it, and at one time it was supposed to be in Bimini. See Ponce de León.

Fouqué, Friedrich von. Baron de la Motte (1777–1843). German author of fantastic tales and sentimental romances. He was prominent in the movement of German Romanticism. His most famous work is the tale Undine.

Fouquet, Jean (c. 1420–c. 1480). French painter. The leading representative of French 15th-century painting, he was deeply influenced by both the work of the early Florentine school and the Flemish tradition of the Van Eycks. The court painter of Louis XI, he is known equally as a miniaturist and portrait painter.

Fouquet or Fouquet, Nicolas (1615–1680). French superintendent of finance under Cardinal Mazarin. At best a haphazard financier, Fouquet bestowed generous favors upon men of letters and incurred the disfavor of King Louis XIV. Arrested by royal order in 1661, he was tried for speculation and sentenced to life imprisonment. He died after 19 years in prison.

Fouquier-Tinville, Antoine Quentin (1746–1795). French revolutionist. He was a public accuser of unexampled ferocity before the Revolutionary Tribunal (March 1793–July 1794). He wrote articles of accusation against Marie Antoinette and Robespierre, who was once his benefactor.

Fourberies de Scapin, Les. See Scapin.

Four Books. The four principal works in the Confucian canon. They are: The Analects, the Great Learning, The Mean, and the Mencius. Except for the Analects, these were relatively unimportant works until raised to an exalted status by Chu Hsi during the Sung Dynasty (960–1279). From this time they were used as the primary textbooks in the Chinese educational system and served as the basis for civil service examinations until 1905. See the Five Classics.

Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse. The personifications of the evils of war who appear in the Revelation of St. John the Divine (Rev. 6). They are Conquest, Slaughter, Famine, and Death, and are seen on white, red, black, and pale horses, respectively. The Spanish novelist Vicente Blasco-Ibáñez entitled his widely read novel of World War I The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse (Los cuatro jinetes del apocalipsis; 1916); it has twice been produced as a motion picture.

Four hundred, the. The inner circle of New York society, the elite. The term originated in 1892 when only 400 guests were invited to a ball given by Mrs. William Astor since her ballroom had space for only that number. See Four Million, The.

Four Hymns to Love and Beauty (1956). A set of poems by Edmund Spenser. The first two, A Hymn in Honor of Love and A Hymn in Honor of Beauty, were written in Spenser’s youth. According to his introductory note, he desired to “amend” his youthful praise of natural love and beauty, and so wrote the second two hymns to heavenly love and beauty. All four poems, however, partake strongly of the Platonic and neo-Platonic ideas that mark much of his work, and there is little ideological conflict between the two sets of hymns.

Fourierism. The social system advanced by François Marie Charles Fourier (1772–1837), French reformer and economist. In order that men might live in the harmony to which they were naturally predisposed and which could be developed under proper conditions, Fourier envisioned a society in which economic activities would be carried on by phalanxes, groups consisting of some 1600 persons, who would live in common buildings called phalansteries. Products would be divided among the members of each phalanx, with labor receiving the largest share; private property, however, would not be abolished. A republican form of government, with elective officials, would be established. Fourier outlined his ideas in several works, including Théorie des quatre mouvements (1808), Traité de l’association domestique agricole (1822), and Le Nouveau Monde industriel (1829–1830). A number of Fourieristic communities and periodicals were founded in France, and several novels by George Sand show the influence of his ideas. Introduced into the U.S. in 1842 by Albert Brisbane, Fourierism was adopted by the members of Brook Farm.

Four Million, The (1906). A collection of 25 short stories by O. Henry. The title, referring to the actual population of New York City at the time, was selected as a rebuttal to Ward McAllister’s famous remark that “there are only about 400 people in New York society.” The book contains O. Henry’s famous story, The Gift of the Magi, although perhaps its best piece is An Unfinished Story. O. Henry’s favorite characters—shop girls, tramps, the humble and lowly in general—people these tales and give utterance to the author’s unique brand of gently ironic sentimentality.

Fournier, Henri. Real name of Alain-Fournier.

Fournier, Pierre. See Pierre Gascó.

Four P’s, The (performed c. 1520; published 1544). An Interlude by John Heywood. It is a debate among a Palmer, a Pardoner, and a Potecary, with a Pedlar acting as judge, as to who can tell the biggest lie. The Palmer, who asserts that he never saw a woman out of temper, wins the prize.

Four Quartets (1936–42). A long poem by T. S. Eliot. Considered by many critics to be Eliot’s major poetic achievement, it is an elaborate, allusive meditation on time and eternity, consisting of four poems named for four different places. The first (published in 1936), is set in Burnt Norton, a house with a rose garden in which children are playing. The second is The Dry Salvages (1940), the village in England from which Eliot’s 17th-century ancestor set out for the New World. The Dry Salvages (1941) is a group of rocks off the coast of Massachusetts, where Eliot lived as a boy; the poem also has descriptions of the Mississippi, St. Louis having been his childhood home. The last poem (1942) is inspired by Little Gidding and its chapel. It is a wartime poem; there are references to the bombing in London alongside references to the English Civil War. The whole work is as elaborately constructed as a piece of music, with its recurrent imagery, series of symbols (the separate poems are concerned, respectively, with air, earth, water, and fire), and literary, historical, and Christian references. Each poem ends with some words about the poet’s craft and the problems of creating a work of art.

Four Saints in Three Acts (1927). An opera by Virgil Thomson to a libretto by Gertrude Stein, first produced in 1934 with an all Negro cast. The text exemplifies Miss Stein’s unique style: repetitive, sonorous, contradictory, and obscure. The opera is actually divided into four acts, with about a dozen saints, some historical and others fictitious. One famous line is “Pigeons on the grass alas.”

Four senses. The 4 varieties of Scriptural interpretation: 1. historical or literal, 2. allegorical, 3. moral, 4. analogical. “Jerusalem is literally a city in Palestine, allegorically the Church, morally the believing soul, analogically the heavenly Jerusalem.”

Fourteen. (1) In English prosody, a line containing 14 syllables, usually 7 iambic feet. It was widely used in English verse about the middle of the 16th century. See Poulter’s Measure.

(2) A poem of 14 lines, a sonnet or any other variation of this length, is now sometimes referred to as a fourteen.

Fourteen Points. A statement of American peace aims during World War I. It was made by President Woodrow Wilson in an address to Congress on Jan. 8, 1918. Briefly abridged, the Fourteen Points are as follows:

1. Open covenants of peace, openly arrived at.
2. Freedom of navigation upon the seas, except by international action.
4. Adequate guarantees of reduction of national armaments to the lowest point consistent with domestic safety.
5. An impartial adjustment of all colonial claims, with fair consideration for the interests of populations and governments concerned.
6. Full cooperation in obtaining for Russia an unhampered opportunity for the independent determination of her own political development.
7. The evacuation of Belgium.
8. The restoration of Alsace-Lorraine to France.
9. The readjustment of Italian frontiers on clearly recognized lines of nationality.
10. Autonomous development for the peoples of Austria-Hungary.
11. The relations of the Balkan states to be determined along historically established lines of allegiance and nationality.
12. Autonomous development for other nationalities under Turkish rule; freedom of the Dardanelles.
13. The establishment of an independent Polish state.
14. The establishment of a general association of nations for the purpose of affording mutual guaran-
fourth estate

The daily press. It is reputed to be the most powerful of all, the others being the Lords Spiritual, the Lords Temporal, and the Commons. Edmund Burke, referring to the Reporters' Gallery, is credited with having said, "Yonder sits the fourth estate, more important than all," but it does not appear in his published works.

Fourth of July. An American national holiday in celebration of the Declaration of Independence, July 4, 1776, which declared the 13 colonies free and independent and absolved of all allegiance to Great Britain. It is also called Independence Day.

Fowler, Gene. Real name, Eugene Devlan Fowler (1890–1960). American writer. Born in Denver, Colo., Fowler had a successful career both as a newspaperman and script-writer. He is best known, however, for his lively biographies of picturesque contemporaries whom he knew personally. The first of these, The Great Mouthpiece (1931), was about a New York lawyer. It was followed by Timberline (1933), an account of two Denver editors. His best book is Good Night, Sweet Prince (1943), a biography of John Barrymore. Other books include Beau James (1949), the story of Jimmy Walker; A Solo in Tom-Toms (1946); and Schnozzola: The Story of Jimmy Durante (1951).

Fowler, Henry Watson (1858–1933). English lexicographer. With his brother F. G. Fowler (1870–1918), he wrote The King's English (1906). Fowler compiled a number of dictionaries based on the great Oxford English Dictionary. His most famous work is A Dictionary of Modern English Usage (1926), a remarkable compilation of learning, wit, humor, and good taste.

Fox, Charles James (1749–1806). Celebrated English statesman and orator. He was a Tory member of Parliament at the age of 20, and two years later became lord of the admiralty under Lord North. Removed from his post at the insistence of King George III, who disliked him both for his personal independence and for the dissoluteness of his life, Fox led the opposition to North's coercive measures against the American colonies. He was foreign secretary (1782–1783), first under Rockingham and then in Portland's coalition ministry, the latter being turned out of office by the king's intervention against Fox's India reform bill. He was kept out of office by the king until 1806 when William Pitt the younger died and he again held the portfolio of foreign secretary in the so-called All-The-Talents ministry during the last year before his own death. Fox once gave a toast: "Our Sovereign, the people." He urged abolition of slavery, favored the French Revolution, and objected to English participation in continental wars. He loved literature and made one venture into authorship with History of the Early Part of the Reign of James II which, unfinished, was published two years after his death.

Fox, George (1624–1691). The founder of the Society of Friends, or Quakers. The son of a weaver, and an apprentice to a cobbler, he became an itinerant lay preacher. He was an unusual combination of mystical and highly practical man, a fact that led him to denounce social evils in forthright terms that nine times landed him in prison. Nevertheless, he was very widely respected and loved for his remarkable personal qualities. He traveled as a missionary to the West Indies and America, and to Holland and Germany. Beginning about 1650, many persons had been so attracted to his teachings that they were organized in the Society of Friends, who were nicknamed Quakers. Because of his limited education, his writings were incoherent though often effectively expressed.

Foxe, John [William], Jr. (1863–1919). American writer of fiction. He achieved enormous popularity with his two best-selling novels, The Little Shepherd of Kingdom Come and The Trail of the Lonesome Pine. An earlier novel, The Kentuckians (1898), contrasts the prosperous inhabitants of Kentucky's bluegrass region with its impoverished mountainers. Fox's short stories and sketches were collected in A Cumberland Vendetta (1895), Hell for Certain (1897), Blue Grass and Rhododendron (1901), and Christmas Eve on Lonesome, and Other Stories (1904).

Foxe, John (1517–1587). English martyrologist. Educated at Oxford, Foxe was made a Deacon in 1550. He was exiled between 1554 and 1559, the years of the reign of the Catholic Mary I, during which time he wrote a first Latin draft of his great work on martyrs. A revised and longer version was published in English in 1563 as Acts and Monuments of These Latter Perilous Days (commonly known as The Book of Martyrs). Two volumes, enlarged further, appeared in 1570. The Acts and Monuments was tremendously influential, being used practically as a companion-volume in the Bible in English churches and households for many years. The work is of interest historically for its many accounts of the deaths of contemporary Protestant martyrs.

especially the Syphilis sive de morbo gallico (Syphilis or the Gallic Disease), a combined mythological and scientific treatment of the subject. He is also the author of an important critical treatise, the Navigerius, which uses the dialogue form to discuss Renaissance literary problems and theories.

Fra Diavolo (1830). A highly popular comic opera by D. F. E. Auber. It is founded on the exploits of Michele Pezza (1771-1806), a celebrated brigand and renegade monk, who evaded pursuit for many years amidst the mountains of Calabria. The libretto is by Scribe.

Frudabio. See FAERIE QUEENE, THE.

Fragonard, Jean Honoré (1732-1806). French painter. A versatile imitator of Antoine Watteau and Giambattista Tiepolo, he painted and drew landscapes, mythological love-scenes, and fashionable outdoor gatherings. With verve and charm, he extended the popularity of rococo up to the time of the French Revolution.

Fra Lippo Lippi (1855). A poem in the form of a dramatic monologue by Robert Browning. The painter, speaking to street guards of Florence who have come upon him in the midst of a night adventure, gives his biography and his views on life and art. See Fra Lippo Lippi.

Framley Parsonage, The. See BARTHESEY, CHRONICLES OF.

France, Anatole. Pen name of Jacques Anatole François Thibault (1844-1924). French novelist, poet, and critic. An eminently civilized man of letters, Anatole France occupied the chief position in the French literary world for many years. In 1872, he published Les Poèmes d’ors, a volume of poetry in the manner of the Parnassians—pure in form and classical in spirit. A poetic drama Les Noces corinthiennes was published in 1876. France’s career as a critic began in 1888, when he was appointed literary editor of Le Temps, a popular daily. His criticism is avowedly impressionistic and subjective, the imaginative play of a finely developed mind and cultivated sensibility responding to and revealing his world and age. Elected to the French Academy in 1896, he reached the peak of his fame during the turn of the century. By the time of his election he had published his famous novels The Crime of Sylvester Bonnard; Thaïs, made into an opera by Massenet (1894); At the Sign of the Reine Pédaude; The Red Lily; and a volume of short stories, L’Oeuf de Nacre (The Mother-of-Pearl Box, 1892). Highly allusive in nature, France’s subtle and ironical work displays an urban cynicism and tolerant mockery. His style, like the tone of his writing, is sophisticated, delicate, and graceful. His later novels include Penguin Island, The Gods are Athirst, and the Revolt of the Angels. Histoire Contemporaine (1896-1901) is a collection of four satirical novels: The Elm Tree on the Mall, The Wickerwork Woman, The Amethyst Ring, and M. Bergeret à Paris. France’s autobiographical works include Le Livre de mon ami (My Friend’s Book, 1885), Pierre Nozière (1899), Le Petit Pierre (Little Pierre, 1918) and La Vie en Fleur (The Bloom of Life, 1922). The relaxed detachment of many of France’s writings may be juxtaposed with his passionate interest in the Dreyfus case. France’s character, like his career, is interesting for its many facets. He was awarded the Nobel Prize for literature in 1921.

France, king of. In Shakespeare’s King Lear, the husband of Cordelia, Lear’s youngest daughter. Recognizing her virtues, he marries her although she has been disowned by her father.

France, rulers of. Like earlier members of his house, Pepin the Short ruled the domain of the Franks as mayor of the palace on behalf of the ineffectual Merovingians; the Carolingian dynasty began when Pepin set aside the last of the “do-nothing kings” and had himself crowned in 751.

Francesca, Piero della. Real name: Piero dei Franceschi (1420–1492). Italian painter and mathematician. Born in Umbria, he came in contact with the monumental tradition of Masaccio and the scientific studies of Brunelleschi and Alberti during a stay in Florence. His own work, in which an almost abstract simplification of forms is fused with a sensitive observation of light effects, creates a world of great solidity, simplicity, and calm. He wrote two mathematical treatises on perspective and on the five regular solids, and was the first to treat optics and perspective with a purely scientific method. Among his masterpieces are The Legend of the Holy Cross, a series of frescoes in the sanctuary of the church of St. Francis at Arezzo; The Portrait of Federigo da Montefeltro; The Resurrection; and the Brera Madonna, his last work. His leading pupils were Melozzo da Forli and Luca Signorelli. Francesco da Rimini. See Paolo and Francesca.

Francis I (1494–1547). King of France (1515–1547). After conquering Milan by his victory at Marignano (1515), Francis tried unsuccessfully to be elected Holy Roman Emperor and waged four wars against his victorious rival Charles V, who advanced claims to the French duchy of Burgundy and also to Milan. The first war (1521–1525) came to an end when Francis was defeated and taken prisoner at Pavia. In the second war (1527–1529) he lost his hold on Italy by the treaty of peace signed at Cambrai for him by his mother Louise of Savoy and known as the Paix des Dames. The third war (1536–1538) led to a truce. The fourth war (1542–1544) was terminated with the peace of Creepy which left Francis in possession of Burgundy while Charles retained Milan. Francis' reign is marked by the Renaissance in France. He himself was a patron of the arts. His sister was the celebrated Margaret of Navarre.

Franciscans. Also called Friars Minor, Minorites, and Grey Friars. A Catholic religious order. It was founded by Saint Francis of Assisi (1209) simply as a confraternity and approved informally by Pope Innocent III (1210). The members made the usual vows of obedience, chastity, and a strict poverty permitting no possessions and dependent solely on the offerings of the faithful. Honorius III confirmed (1223) a new set of rules (including the requirement of a novitiate, etc.) for the now numerous order; but administrative struggles over the conviction of some that the order should be permitted to own the buildings it used and other necessities eventually split the order (1415) into the Conventuals, following the modified rules, and the more traditional Observants. About 1528 even stricter reforms were instituted by a third branch, the Capucins. About 1214 Francis had instituted a second order for nuns, called Poor Clares from their leader St. Clara; and about 1221 he organized the Brothers and Sisters of Penance as a third order of laymen, hence called Tertiaries. This important innovation was soon imitated by other religious orders.

Francis Ferdinand (1863–1914). Archduke of Austria, nephew of Francis Joseph and heir to the imperial throne of Austria. His assassination at Sarajevo, Bosnia, by Gavrilo Princip, a member of a Serbian secret society, precipitated the outbreak of World War I.

Francis Joseph I or Franz Josef (1830–1916). Emperor of Austria (1848–1916). He succeeded to the throne upon the abdication of his uncle, Ferdinand I, during the revolution of 1848 in Vienna. Throughout his reign he opposed the forces of liberalism and maintained a traditional imperial court. There was much tragedy in his personal life: he was the brother of the ill-fated Maximilian of Mexico; his wife Elizabeth was assassinated in 1898; his only son Rudolf committed suicide; and the assassination of his nephew and heir, Archduke Francis Ferdinand, precipitated World War I.
neyed to Rome in 1210 and received verbal confirmation from the Pope. Francis joined a pilgrimage to Palestine (1219–1220), then resigned his leadership of the now numerous Friars Minor because of internal disputes about administration.

Francis' approach to religion was characterized by its joyousness and its love of nature; he called both animate and inanimate creations his brothers and sisters, and his preaching to the birds has become a popular subject for artists, as has the episode when two years before his death he is said to have received on his body the stigmata resembling Christ's wounds after 40 days of fasting on Mount Alverno. He was canonized as a saint in 1228, two years after his death; and about a century later the legends and anecdotes about his life, along with his sermons and sayings, were collected as the Little Flowers of St. Francis (Fioretto di S. Francesco d'Assisi).

Franck, César Auguste (1822–1890). Belgian-French organist and composer. Among his works are the Symphony in D minor and the Mass for Three Voices, from which comes the familiar Panis Angelicus. His style is romantic and expansive, full of choral harmony and restless modulation. Among his pupils were Alexandre Guilmant, Vincent d'Indy, and Charles Bordes. These three founded a school, the Schola Cantorum (1894) to perpetuate their master's influence and methods.

Franco, Francisco (1892– ). Spanish political leader. Chief of staff of the Spanish army at the beginning of the Civil War (1936–1939), Franco became leader of the insurgents after the death of generals José Sanjurjo and Goded. With the help of Germany and Italy, favored by British and American "nonintervention," he consolidated his position and assumed dictatorial powers shortly after the fall of Madrid (March 28, 1939). He is sometimes known as el Caudillo ("the leader").

Franco, Matteo (1447–1494). Florentine poet and priest. A partisan of the Medici, he wrote verse concerning the behavior of his parishioners, and exchanged sonnets with Pulci in a bitter literary feud. The Sonetti were first published in 1759.

Franco, Niccolò (1515–1570). Italian poet. Born in Benevento, he was the author of a group of dialogues and verses entitled La Filena (1537–1542). He was at first a friend and partisan, then a bitter enemy of Aretino.

Franco-German War. Also known as the Franco-German War (1870–1871). A war between France, then ruled by Napoleon III, and Prussia, whose prime minister at the time was Otto von Bismarck. Relations between the two powers deteriorated when Bismarck supported the candidacy of Prince Leopold Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen, a relative of King William of Prussia, to the vacant throne of Spain. Prince Leopold eventually withdrew, but Bismarck, who wanted war, edited the famous Ems Telegram describing an interview between William and the French ambassador in such a way as to make it seem that the king had insulted France, which retaliated by declaring war on July 19, 1870. The French were overwhelmed by the well-trained, well-organized Prussian forces, and a large part of the French army and Napoleon himself were forced to surrender at Sedan. A republic was then proclaimed in Paris, which was besieged by the Prussians and capitulated on Jan. 28, 1871. By the treaty of Frankfort, France lost the provinces of Alsace and Lorraine and agreed to pay an indemnity of five billion francs; an army of occupation would remain in France until the indemnity was paid. Bismarck used the victory to complete German unification, and after the states of Bavaria, Baden, and Württemberg had joined the German Confederation, King William was proclaimed German emperor on Jan. 18, 1871 in the Hall of Mirrors at Versailles.

Frank, Anne (1929–1944). German-Jewish girl who hid from the Nazis with her parents and several friends in an Amsterdam warehouse from 1942 to 1944. Her diary, covering the years of hiding, was found by friends and published as Het Achterhuis (Du., "the annex"; 1947); it was later published in English as The Diary of a Young Girl (1952). Against the background of the mass-murder of European Jewry, the book presents a vivid picture of a group of hunted people forced to live and survive together in almost intolerable proximity. Written with humor as well as insight, it offers an extraordinary picture of a girl growing up and conveys all the preoccupations of adolescence and first love. The diary ends three days before the Franks and their friends were discovered by the Nazis. Anne died in the extermination camp at Bergen-Belsen in 1944. The book was dramatized as The Diary of Anne Frank and performed the world over.

Frank, Bruno (1887–1945). German novelist and playwright. He was influenced by Thomas Mann and noted for his historical and psychological realism. His best-known works are Zwölftausend (Twelve Thousand, 1927), a play, and Cervantes (1934), a story.

Frank, Waldo [David] (1889– ). American writer. Frank has been noted for his criticism of contemporary civilization, often from the point of view of political liberalism. Novels of his that attracted attention were The Dark Mother (1920), Rahab (1922), Holiday (1923), The Death and Birth of David Markand (1934), The Bridegroom Cometh (1938), Summer Never Ends (1941), The Invaders (1948), and Not Heaven (1933). His works of nonfiction include Virgin Spain (1926), Dawn in Russia (1925), Chart for Rough Water (1940), Bridgehead: The Drama of Israel (1957), The Rediscovery of Man (1958), and Cuba: Prophetic Island (1961).

Frankau, Pamela (1908– ). English novelist, daughter of Gilbert Frankau. Among her novels is A Wreath for the Enemy (1954), the story of a girl growing up.

Franken, Rose (1895– ). American novelist and playwright. She is best known for the Claudia series of novels, dealing with the happy domestic life of a girlish heroine. A stage version of Claudia (1929), the first novel in the series, was produced in 1941. Her other plays include Mr. Dooley, Jr. (1932) and Another Language (1934).

Frankenstein, or the Modern Prometheus (1818). A romance by Mary Wollstonecraft Shel-
LEX. Frankenstein, a young student, animates a soulless monster made out of corpses from churchyard and dissecting rooms by means of galvanism. Longing for sympathy and shunned by everyone, the creature ultimately turns to evil and brings dreadful retribution on the student for usurping the Creator’s prerogative, finally destroying him. Several movies have been based on the novel. Mrs. Shelley gave no name to the monster, but he is commonly called Frankenstein after his creator, the student. This, of course, is an error.

Frankie and Johnny. One of the most famous of American folk ballads. It relates Frankie’s pursuit and murder of her unfaithful sweetheart, Johnny. The refrain is: “He was her man, but he done her wrong.” It inspired a series of paintings by Thomas Hart Benton, another by John Held, Jr., and several dramas.

Franklin, Benjamin (1706–1790). American statesman, author, inventor, printer, and scientist, sometimes called “the wisest American.” The son of a Boston tallow chandler, Franklin was apprenticed at 12 to his brother James, a local printer, to whose newspaper he contributed a series of Addisonian essays, the Dogood Papers (1722). In 1723 he ran away to Philadelphia, where he set up his own newspaper, and in 1767 he and Richard’s Almanack, and with intense energy established a subscription library, a philosophical society, a fire company, a hospital, a militia, became postmaster of Philadelphia, proposed the University of Pennsylvania, devised bifocal spectacles, a stove, and a water-harmonica. He later performed electrical experiments leading in 1752 to his invention of the lightning rod, which earned him election to the Royal Society in London, the compliments of Louis XV of France, and several honorary degrees. Active for the colonies throughout the Revolution, he helped draft and was a signer of the Declaration of Independence. He concluded an alliance with France (1778) and was one of the diplomats to negotiate the treaty of peace with Great Britain (1783). In 1787 he attended the Federal Constitutional Convention. His Autobiography is considered one of the classics of the genre. Herman Melville introduced him into Israel Potter (1855), and he also appears in Harry Bacheller’s In the Days of Poor Robin (1922).

Franklin Evans, or The Inebriate (1842). A novel by Walt Whitman. In this conventional temperance tract, a country boy suffers degradation and torment when he falls under the influence of alcohol in New York City. Finally reforming, he lives an honorable life.

Franklin’s Tale, The. One of the Canterbury Tales of Geoffrey Chaucer. Apparently it is based on a tale in Boccaccio’s Il Filocolo and similar to his tale of a Garden in January in the Decameron, although Chaucer attributes it to a Breton lay. The Franklin opposes the views in the Wife of Bath’s Tale, saying that love flies when constrained by sovereignty. In his tale, Dorigen accepts her husband Arveragus (or Arviragus) as her servant in love but her lord in marriage. When Arveragus goes off to war, she refuses the advances of the squire Aurelius, playfully promising that she will be his when he removes all the rocks from the coast of Brittany. Arveragus returns, and Aurelius pine until a magician succeeds in making it appear that the rocks have disappeared. Aurelius reminds Dorigen of her promise. She decides she should rather kill herself than dishonor her marriage; but when Arveragus learns the story, he says she must keep her promise, and sends her to meet Aurelius. The squire meets this display of nobility by releasing her from her promise, and the magician, not to be outdone, releases the squire from his $1000 debt, since the magic did not achieve its purpose.

Fraser, George Sutherland (1915– ). Scottish poet and critic. Associated with the New Apocalypse movement, he wrote Vision and Rhetoric (1960) and works on Dylan Thomas and Ezra Pound.

Fraunhofer lines. The dark lines in the solar spectrum, caused by the passage of light through certain gases in the atmosphere. They were named after the Bavarian physicist Joseph von Fraunhofer (1787–1826), who was the first to classify them. See Gustav Robert Kirchhoff.

fраваши. In Persian religion, a spiritual protector or guardian angel of each individual, especially of the believer. It is the pre-existing archetype of every man in the presence of Oumuz and corresponds to the Roman Genius.

Frazer, Sir James George (1854–1941). Scottish scholar and anthropologist. He is best known for his famous work The Golden Bough, which is noted for its important contributions to the study of early religion and anthropology. Other works include Totemism (1887); Folk-Lore in the Old Testament (1918); and numerous translations of such classical writers as Ovid, Pausanias, and Apollodorus.

Fréchette, Louis [Honoré] (1839–1908). Canadian poet and journalist. He is best known for La légende d’un peuple (1887), a series of epic poems inspired by the leading events and personages in French-Canadian history. In 1880 the French Academy honored two other poetic works by Fréchette, Les fleurs bordées (1879) and Les oiseaux de neige (1880), and he became Canada’s first poet laureate.

Frederic, Harold (1856–1898). American novelist and journalist. He is known for realistic portrayals of small-town and rural life. His most popular novel, The Damnation of Theron Ware, was a pioneering work in the development of psychological realism. Frederic is credited with helping to prepare the way for the works of Stephen Crane and Theodore Dreiser. Seth’s Brother’s Wife (1887) is a story of a triangular love affair. In the Valley (1890) is a historical novel dealing with the battle at Oriskany in 1777.

Frederick II, known as Frederick the Great (1712–1786). King of Prussia (1740–1786). He was an enlightened despot who built up the Prussian state through vast territorial acquisitions and domestic reforms. An enthusiastic amateur of music he composed and played chamber music. He was a patron of the arts, friend of Voltaire. He wrote voluminously, almost always in French. He built the palace of Sans Souci (1747) near Potsdam. During his later years he was known as der Alte Fritz (Old Fritz).

Frederick, Duke. The uncle of Rosalind and father of Celia in Shakespeare’s As You Like It. “Of rough and envious disposition,” he has usurped his older brother’s dukedom, but he is finally converted by a monk and enters a monastery.

Frederick the First. See BARBAROSSA.

Frederick the Great. See FREDERICK II.

Free Kirk. The church organized by those who, in 1843, left the national Church of Scotland (thereafter often referred to as the Auld Kirk), in order to be free from state control in spiritual matters. In 1829 the United Free Church of Scotland was reunited with the established Church of Scotland, thus bringing together the large majority of all Scottish Presbyterians.

Freeman, Douglas Southall (1885-1953). American historian. An editor of the Richmond News Leader, Freeman won a Pulitzer Prize for his exhaustive Robert E. Lee (4 vols., 1934). He continued his studies with Lee’s Lieutenants (3 vols., 1942-1944) and then went further back in American history with a seven-volume life of George Washington (1948-1957), the last volume of which was completed by his assistants, J. A. Carroll and M. W. Ashworth.

Freeman, Mary E[leanor] Wilkins (1852-1930). American novelist and short-story writer of the local-color school. She is known for her use of dialect and her character studies of the frustrated and decadent New Englanders left after the Western expansion. Among the collections of her short stories, the genre in which she did her best work, are A Humble Romance and Other Stories (1887), A New England Nun and Other Stories, and The Wind in the Rose Bush (1903). Her novels include The Revolt of Mother (1890), Jane Field (1893), and The Portion of Labor (1901).

Freemasons. A fraternal organization claiming, without basis, to trace its origins to Hiram of Tyre and the Temple of Solomon. The modern secret fraternity had its origin in England in the 18th century, and its connection with masons, the workers in stone, arises from the fact that the founders adopted many of the practices of the old masonic guilds as being most suitable to their purpose. These medieval guilds consisted of workmen who, by the nature of their calling, had to move from place to place, and their secret passwords and other rituals were adopted so that when on their travels they could prove without difficulty that they were actually Free and Accepted Masons, and so secure the comradeship of their brother masons as well as get employment. In each district where cathedrals and churches were being built, lodges were created, much as a branch of a trade union would be today, and these had their masters, wardens, and other officials.

Free-Soil party. An American political party opposed to the extension of slavery. It was formed in 1848 by antislavery Democrats and Whigs and by members of the Liberty party. In 1848 Martin Van Buren, their presidential candidate, failed to carry a single state and, by splitting the Democratic vote in New York, helped win the election for Zachary Taylor, the Whig nominee. In 1854 the Free-Soilers were part of the coalition that formed the Republican party. See BARNBURNERS.

free verse or vers libre. In prosody, verse free of the rules of versification. Free verse is composed in lines cadenced according to meaningful stress rather than the mechanical alternation of accent and non-accent; the starts, stops, and pauses of line division play an important part in its rhythm.

The term vers libre was coined by the French poets of the Symbolist movement (see SYMBOLISM), notably Jules Laforgue and Gustave Kahn to describe their verse technique. Whitman, of course, had written verse before them, as had the ancient Hebrew poets of the Psalms and other parts of the Bible.

Free verse became the prevailing poetic form for a brief time in the 1920’s, and subsequently in the 20th century has continued as one of the main prosodic streams alongside traditional and modernist traditional forms. Poets who have worked substantially in free verse in English include: H. D. (Hilda Doolittle), Robinson Jeffers, D. H. Lawrence, Amy Lowell, Edgar Lee Masters, Ezra Pound, Carl Sandburg, Wallace Stevens, and William Carlos Williams.

Fregoso, Federico (1480-1541) and Ottaviano (d. 1524). Genoese noblemen. The nephews of Guidobaldo of Montefeltro, they appear as interlocutors in The Courier of Castiglione. Federico was later made archbishop of Salerno by Pope Julius II; Ottaviano became doge of Genoa in 1513, and later served as governor when it fell to Francis I.

Freiligrath, Ferdinand (1810-1876). A German liberal political poet, a revolutionary during the 1840’s and later a strong admirer of Bismarck. His most famous volume is the Glaubensbekennnis (Declaration of Faith, 1842) that led to his break with the Prussian government.

Freischutz (Ger. “free-shooter”). Legendary marksman popular in German folk lore of the 14th to 16th century. The Devil gives him seven bullets, six of which will infallibly hit what the marksman aims at, but the last will be directed by the Devil. The account in Apel’s Gespensterbuch (book of ghosts, 1810-1815) suggested Weber’s opera Der Freischütz (1821), libretto by Friedrich Kind (1768-1843). The woodcorman Max must win a sharpshooting contest to win the hand of Agathe. Because his marksmanship is not perfect, he allows his colleague Caspar, already a servant of the Devil, to arrange for him to make a pact with the Black Huntsman for the magic bullets. The seventh shot, aimed at a dove, would have killed Agathe, but her bridal wreath deflects it, and Caspar dies instead.

Frémont, John C[harles] (1813-1890). American explorer, soldier, and politician. Frémont, an officer in the U.S. Topographical Corps, made three important expeditions to the Far West, and his Report of the Exploring Expedition to the Rocky Mountains (1843), which he wrote with the help of his wife, Jessie, daughter of Thomas Hart Benton, was widely read. During the Mexican War, he played a controversial role in the conquest of California; he was later found guilty of mutiny and disobedience by a court-martial and although President Polk remitted his sentence, he resigned from the army. In 1855 he ran for the presidency on the anti-slavery platform of the newly formed Republican Party. After the outbreak of the Civil War, Frémont was given a command in the Department of the West, but was removed because of his radical anti-slavery policies. From 1878 to 1883 he was territorial governor of Arizona. Irving Stone's Immortal Wife (1944) is a biographical novel about the Frémonts.

Fremstad, Olive (1871–1951). Swedish-born American dramatic soprano. Although she began singing as a contralto, she soon proved herself a foremost interpreter of soprano roles in both German and Italian opera. Theo Kronborg, the heroine of Willa Cather's novel, The Song of the Lark (1915), was modeled after her.

French, Alice. Real name of Octave Thaët (1850–1934). American novelist and short-story writer. Miss French's stories, laid mostly in the villages of rural Arkansas, are part of the local-color school. Her special interest was the labor problem; she advocated cooperatives rather than labor unions. Among her books are The Man of the Hour (1905), Knitters in the Sun (1887), and The Heart of Toil (1893).

French Academy. See Académie française.

French and Indian War (1754–1763). The last, most decisive conflict in the 150 years' struggle between France and England for possession of the North American continent. It was the American phase of the Seven Years War and ended with the cession of Canada to Great Britain in the Treaty of Paris (1763).

French Renaissance. The French Renaissance roughly encompasses the 16th century.

Fervor for the Italian Renaissance took hold of the French court following the military campaigns of Charles VIII, Louis XII, and Francis I in Italy. As traffic between Italy and France increased, French art, architecture, and most particularly literature felt the effects. Clément Marot introduced the Italian sonnet into French poetry, Queen Margaret of Navarre wrote the first collection of French tales modeled on the Decameron of Boccaccio. However, the Italian influence in this period was more intellectual than artistic. French writers developed a new critical spirit and moral sense from reading Greek and Latin literature, which had been rediscovered in Italy. They were humanists, interested in the full development and enjoyment of man's capacities, and they cultivated a taste for the refinements of Italian Renaissance society.

The influence from the north affected particularly the scholars. It was characterized by a philosophical questioning of the long-entrenched dogmas of the Church. French scholars became avid for knowledge as the old taboos fell and the flood of printed matter opened up formerly neglected fields of learning. Francis I engaged Guillaume Budé as his librarian and, at Budé's instigation, founded the Collège de France, where Greek and Hebrew were taught for the first time. The Collège soon became a rallying point for the "Evangelists," those who sought the basis for faith in the Scriptures themselves, rather than in papal bulls and church decrees.

The two currents of new ideas from the north and from the south merged in the short-lived marriage between humanism and Evangelism which marks the first flowering of the French Renaissance around 1530. The writers of this period shared in differing degrees the general excitement, and all participated in the burst of intense optimism, feverish activity, and exaltation. François Rabelais emerges as the most important literary figure of the period. While his Gargantua and Pantagruel is largely a continuation of the medieval fabliaux in form, it fairly breathes the new spirit in its rich multilingual vocabulary and its sheer amassing of detail in every field of knowledge.

The second half of the century saw a distinct change in the tenor of the French Renaissance. The glorious reign of Francis I was followed by the rule of four ineffective kings (Henry II, Francis II, Charles IX, and Henry III), the last three more or less subservient to their mother, Catherine de Médicis. After the publication of John Calvin's Institutes in French in 1541, the happy alliance between humanism and Evangelism had been irrevocably ruptured. The early Evangelists were succeeded by militant Protestant reformers who not only challenged Roman Catholicism, but menaced the very basis of French royal authority as well, thereby losing its protection. Henceforth, the Protestant Reformation and humanism went their separate ways. The universal exuberance of the first humanism gave way to a notion of a distinctly French art nourished by Italian and classical example but proudly asserting French genius in the French language. Joachim Du Bellay gave the clarion call of this new artistic consciousness with his Défense et Illustration de la langue française in 1549. The Défense signaled the formation of the Pléiade, a group of poets led by Pierre de Ronsard, whose mission was to raise French poetry to the eminence of Italian and ancient poetry. A parallel group of poets at Lyons, headed by Maurice Scève and Louise Labé, had no declared mission, but its poetry was so personal in tone that it too contributed to the liberation of the French literary idiom.

Meanwhile, the rise of Protestantism led to civil war. The country became a bloody battleground of the contending Protestant and Catholic ideologies. Eventually these wars produced their own poets, notably the impassioned Agrippa d'Arbequin. His narrative poem, Les Tragières (1616), recounting the horrors suffered by the Protestant martyrs and the divine retribution to come, introduced into French literature the visions of a soul possessed.

The end of the century saw the birth of a new spirit which was to develop into the classicism of the 17th century. Primitive attempts at a new drama distinct from the popular mystery plays and passion plays of the Middle Ages produced the tragi-comedies of Robert Garnier, from which Corneille would later draw inspiration. The political chaos resulting from the religious wars brought the realization that national stability depended upon a strong central government free from religious ideology. King Henry IV established absolute rule which Louis XIV was later to consolidate. The great literary figure of the period was Michel de Montaigne, friend and unofficial counselor to Henry IV. In his Essays, a genre which he invented, Montaigne reflected the general disillusionment over the first period of humanistic optimism and over the ensuing bloody conflicts of the religious wars. He called for a rejection of ideologies in the interest of the first priority, man himself. His greatest concern was the requirements imposed by human nature for its proper development. To learn these requirements nothing less was needed than a rigorous search for the lessons of individual experience. In turning inward to study human psychology as the source of knowledge, Montaigne gave a new and modern meaning to the term "humanism," which extended beyond France to affect all of Europe. He was the great precursor of the ideal honnête homme of the 17th century.

French Revolution. The world-famous revolution in France of the Third Estate against the clergy and nobility, which formally began in May, 1789, and ended in December, 1799, with Napoleon's dictatorship. Until this time, France had been ruled as a monarchy with two privileged classes: the nobility and the clergy. Under this old order there was no place for either the new class of economically independent bourgeois or the new class of industrial workers. They, as well as the peasants, bore the brunt of excessive spending on the part of the nobility. Heavy taxes, corvées (obligatory services to the king), military service, backward agricultural methods, and internal tariff barriers—all medieval feudal institutions still existing in 18th-century France—were also contributory causes to the revolution; they had been systematically attacked by the major writers of this Age of Reason, particularly by the Physiocrats. The badly needed economic reform which these latter advocated failed because of the unwillingness of the ruling classes to relinquish any of their privileges. France's national debt was also increased by her participation (which she could ill afford) in the American Revolution. On May 5, 1789, the States-General (the assembly of the three Estates of the Realm) was convoked by Louis XVI and Necker in an effort to obtain a general fiscal reform. The third estate, constituting a majority against the ruling classes, defiantly proclaimed itself the National Assembly on June 17, and later, when Louis XVI closed their meeting place, adjourned to an indoor tennis court and took the OATH OF THE TENNIS COURT. The king, on June 27, yielded and legalized this assembly, but at the same time dismissed Necker, at Marie Antoinette's insistence, and surrounded Versailles with his troops. On July 14, a Paris mob led by Desmoulins, stormed the Bastille. Louis then recalled Necker and recognized the legal existence of the Constituent Assembly (as the new National Assembly was called). The Assembly adopted the DECLARATION OF THE RIGHTS OF MAN, proclaiming the fundamental principles of the revolution, and drafted a new constitution creating a limited monarchy. In addition, church lands were nationalized and religious orders suppressed. Meanwhile, radical political clubs, especially the Jacobins, were gaining power in Paris.

Louis XVI finally accepted the constitution and on October 1, 1791, a new Legislative Assembly was convened. In the same year Louis tried to flee France, as many nobles had already done, but was brought back a prisoner to Paris. The Legislative Assembly consisted of members of various political clubs, more or less radical, like the Feuillants, and the Cordeliers. During this era some of the leaders of the revolution wore the bonnet rouge, and "Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity," was their motto. At first, foreign governments were sympathetic to the revolution, but because both the king and French émigrés were inciting European monarchs to intervene on behalf of French royalty, they began to be frightened by the progress of the lower classes. Austria and Prussia issued threats, and on April 20, 1792, war was declared on Austria, and three months later Prussia declared war on France. This war began the succession of foreign wars which in turn led to the Napoleonic Wars. The repeated defeats of the Revolutionary armies were attributed to Royalist treason and on September 2 and 3, 1792, the people invaded the prisons and massacred 1,200 prisoners (the September Massacres). In Paris, the National Convention, headed by Marat and Danton, succeeded the Legislative Assembly, and its first act was to abolish the monarchy; the king was tried for treason and beheaded on Jan. 21, 1793. The Convention tried to continue the war, which by now included England, Spain, and most of the other European countries, but it was torn by internal dissention among the Girondists, the Montagnards, and the Cordeliers. The Convention established the COMMITTEE OF PUBLIC SAFETY which ruled France. Robespierre, now in control of the Jacobins, joined the Committee at the insistence of Saint-Joseph, and, as its leader, established a virtual dictatorship. The period following is known as the Reign of Terror, which, because of its excesses, was eliminated by the Convention's coup of 9 Thermidor. Once Robespierre was executed, a period of reaction set in, and a new constitution in 1795 overthrew the Directory. The incompetence, corruption, and intrigues of the Directory, and the military reverses of the army brought France on the brink of disaster. Napoleon Bonaparte, hero of the Italian Campaign, returned from Egypt, and with the help of the army and his supporters, overthrew the Directory on 18 Brumaire, and established the Consulate. He was the ruler of France until 1814 when the Bourbon kings were restored to power.

French Revolution, The (1837). A history in 3 parts by Thomas Carlyle. Critics have preferred to call it a drama or a prose epic rather than a history. The central motif is the nemesis that follows upon the oppression of the poor. The work established Carlyle's reputation as a historian and remains widely read to this day.

Freneau, Philip [Morin] (1752-1832). American poet. One of the first American poets to achieve renown for his verse in the U.S., he is best known for his political poems, most of them written at the time of the American Revolution: A Poem on the Rising Glory of America (1772), written in collaboration with Hugh Henry Brackenridge on their graduation from Princeton; American Liberty (1775); General Gage's Confession (1775); and The British Prison-Ship (1781), an account of his experiences as a prisoner of war after capture at sea near the West Indies. His poems on nature and on the Indian, considered precursors of the romantic movement in America, include: The Wild Honey Suckle (1786), The Indian Burying Ground (1788), On a Honey-Bee Drinking from a Glass of Wine (1809).

Freneau was anti-Federalist in his politics and a deist in religion. Admired by Jefferson, he edited the National Gazette from 1791 to 1793, in which he attacked Alexander Hamilton.

Fréquente Communion, La. See Antoine Arnauld.

Frere, John Hookham. Pen name William and Robert Whistlercraft (1796-1845). English diplomat, satirist, and poet. After holding several important offices Frere became ambassador to Spain at the outbreak of the Spanish insurrection against Napoleon. Dissatisfaction with his part in early English defeats in the Peninsular War forced his replacement and retirement from diplomacy. His articles for the Anti-Jacobin (1797), an antiradical weekly, are good examples of his satirical writing. His famous translations of Aristophanes (1839) and other writing is collected in his Works (1872).

Freud, Sigmund (1856-1936). Austrian psychologist, the originator of psychoanalysis. Freud was trained as a medical doctor at the University of Vienna. He graduated in 1881, but never practiced internal medicine. He soon became interested in neuropsychology and studied hypnotism and cerebral anatomy.

He became dissatisfied with hypnotism as a treatment for hysterical patients. However, he had noticed that some patients had fallen into reveries in which they had talked about their problems and afterwards had felt better. From these observations he began to formulate his theory of "free association" which is the kernel of psychoanalysis. In Freudian practice, patients under the guidance of an analyst make an attempt to recall emotional episodes that aggravated conflicts, and thus recognize and release frustrated emotions. Freud used dream interpretation as one of his basic tools in analysis. The patient's dreams were analyzed for their symbolic content and were used as a guide to the patient's internal life. Freud viewed dreams as a person's means of expressing repressed emotions, and repression was seen as the source of neurotic behavior.

Freud postulated the existence of three internal forces that govern a person's psychic life: (1) the id, the instinctual force of life, as such it is uncontrollable and isolated; (2) the ego, the executive force that has contact with the real world; (3) the super-ego, the governing force, or moral conscience, that seeks to control and direct the ego into socially acceptable patterns of behavior.

As his theories began to take concrete form, Freud started to publish his findings. The Interpretation of Dreams (1900) was one of the first reports on his independent studies of the unconscious. By this time his work had begun to attract attention outside his native Vienna, and others took up his cause. In 1908 the first International Congress of Psychoanalysis met in Vienna. Many young doctors, some of them now famous in their own right, attended this meeting; among them were Alfred Adler, A. A. Brill, Ernest Jones, and Carl Jung.

From the beginning the very nature of his work made Freud the center of controversy. His theories about sex have been, in general, misunderstood by the public and in varying degrees rejected by many of his followers. Freud maintained that the primary motivating factor in human psychology and human behavior is sexual, but he did not limit this to its purely erotic connotations. The sexual instinct, as Freud saw it, has many of the aspects ordinarily referred to as "social." He found elements of strong sexuality among children and ascribed most neuroses to the repressive influence of social and individual inhibitions on sex.

While many of Freud's ideas have been superseded he is still considered the great innovator in the field of psychiatry, and is almost worshiped in some circles. The work of only one other man in this century, Albert Einstein, has had as great an impact on man's way of thinking and acting. Freud's influence has been especially strong on artistic expression, both the fine arts and literature. Such authors as Thomas Mann and James Joyce have embodied much of his thought in their works.

Among Freud's important works are Three Contributions to the Theory of Sex (1910), Wit and Its Relation to the Unconscious (1916), Leonardo da Vinci: A Psychosocial Study of an Infantile Reminiscent (1916), Totem and Taboo (1918), The Ego and the Id (1927), and Moses and Monotheism (1939).

Freud, a Jew, was forced to flee from the Nazis in 1938. He and his family moved to England where he died, an honored and respected man.

Frei or Freyr. The Scandinavian god of peace and fertility, the dispenser of rain, and the patron god of Sweden and Iceland. The son of Njörd and husband of Gerda, he was originally one of the Vanir but was received among the Asir after the war between the two. Among his treasures was a magic ship, Skí rh-batnir, which could be folded up like a tent, a golden helmet and the crest of a wild boar, Gullinbursti, and his horse, Blodigjof (Bloody hoof).

Freyja. The Norse goddess of love, fertility, and death. She was the wife of Odin, but he deserted her for Frigg for she loved finery better than her husband. One account says that she flies through the air with the wings of a falcon, another that she rides in a chariot drawn by two cats. The chief legends concerning Freya relate the efforts of the giants to carry her off. In one instance Thor, dressed as a veiled bride, impersonates Freya in order to recover his hammer from the giant Thrym.

She is also known as Frea, Friga, Frigga, Frige, and the like, and it is from her that our Friday is named. In Teutonic mythology, Freya and Frigg are the same.

Freyre, Gilberto [de Mello] (1900- ). Brazilian sociologist, anthropologist, and social historian. Freyre is best known for The Masters and the Slaves (Casa-Grande e Senzala; 1933) and The Mansion and the Shanties (Sobrados e Mucambos; 1936), brilliant studies of Brazilian patriarchal society from the 16th to the 19th centuries. In these and later books, notably Brazil: An Interpretation (1945), revised and expanded as New World in the Tropics (1959), he has maintained that the fusion of diverse ethnic and cultural elements—Portuguese, American, and African—has resulted in a distinctively Brazilian civilization. The Portuguese settlers in Brazil, he claims, were particularly suited for creating this new tropical culture because of their racial tolerance and previous colonial experiences in India and Africa.

Freytag, Gustav (1816-1895). German novelist and playwright, known for his detailed realism in both style and choice of subject matter. He was a political liberal and was strongly interested in the problems of his day, as is seen in his comedy Die Journalisten (The Journalists, 1854), which deals with international politics, and his novel Soll und Haben (Should and Have, 1855) about commercialism. But he always attempted to see his own time in the light of the past, as in Die Ahnen (The Ancestors, 1873-1880), a series of six novels covering most of German history, and Bilder aus deutscher Vergangenheit (Scenes from the German Past, 1859 ff.), a historical study.

Friar (Lat., frater, brother). A monk, especially one belonging to one of the four great mendicant orders: Franciscans, Dominicans, Augustinians, and Carmelites.

Friar John. An anachronism for Frère Jean des Entommeures (Fr., entamer, to carve the first slice, hence Friar John of the Hearty Eaters or Trenchermen), a major character in Rabelais' Gargantua and Pantagruel. As Gargantua’s companion in arms in Book I, he is the hero of the war against Microchle. At the end of the war Gargantua gives him the abbey of Thelema as a reward for his bravery. Friar John has all the faults of monks but none of their vices. Ignorant, uncivil, and glutinous, he is also frank, lusty, and courageous. Rabelais clearly had great affection for Friar John and created in him one of his most picturesque characters.

Friar Laurence. See Friar Laurence.

Friar Rush or Bruder Rausch (Ger. "intoxication"). In late medieval German legend, a demon disguised as a friar. He leads monks and friars into wickedness by all sorts of devious and generally amusing devices. He appears in the English prose History of Friar Rush (1568) and several minor tales and plays.

Friars Minor (Lat. fratres minoris). The Franciscans.

Friar's Tale, The. One of the Canterbury Tales of Geoffrey Chaucer. The Friar and the Summoner reveal their enmity, and the Summoner promises to retaliate after the Friar tells his tale. The Friar describes an extremely low and dishonest summoner who meets the Devil disguised as a bailiff. The two swear friendship and gossip about their respective techniques of extortion. They pass a carter cursing his horse and cart and hay for being stuck in the mud, his words consigning them to the Devil. But the Devil explains to the Summoner that he cannot take them because the carter does not really mean the curse. Then the Summoner decides to extort money from an innocent woman by threatening her with a summons to the archdeacon for adultery. He ignores her words that send him to the Devil, but the Devil ascertains that she really means them, and gleefully carries the Summoner off to Hell.

Friar Tuck. A fat, jovial vagabond friar in the Robin Hood ballads and a character in the May-day plays. His costume consists of a russet habit of the Franciscan order, a red corded girdle with gold tassel, red stockings, and a wallet. He appears in Sir Walter Scott’s novel Ivanhoe (1820) as the "holy clerk of Copmanhurst."

Fricker, Sara. See Samuel Taylor Coleridge.

Friday. The sixth day of the week. It is named for the goddess Freya. In the Romance languages it is named for the corresponding Roman goddess Venus. Friday is traditionally the day when Adam was created, when he was expelled from Paradise, when he repented, when he died, when Christ was crucified, when the dead will rise for the last judgment. In many Christian churches Friday is a fast day. To spill salt on Friday is a bad omen. It used to be the day for the execution of capital punishment and is often called hangman’s day.

Frieda. See Frieda von Richthofen Lawrence.

Friend of the Family, The, or The Village of Stepanchikovo (Selo Stepanchikovo; 1859). A short novel by Feodor Dostoevsky. It portrays the horrible spectacle of a petty and talentless ex-toady, Poma Fomich Opiskin, ruling a household by playing on the guilt feeling he induces in the master of the house. Poma, with his immense aptitude for hypocritical self-righteousness, is a sort of Russian Tartuffe.

Frigga or Frigg. The supreme Norse goddess of Asgard, and wife of Odin. She presided over marriages and may be identified with the Roman Juno. In Teutonic mythology, she is identified with Freya.

Frisch, Max (1911- ). Swiss playwright and novelist, writing in German. He is noted for his ironic and original treatments of the problems of man in the age of technology. Among his plays, which show the influence of Bertolt Brecht, are Alz der Krieg zu Ende war (When the War Was Over, 1949), and Don Juan oder Die Liebe zur Geometrie (Don Juan or The Love of Geometry, 1953). His two best-known novels, both of which treat the problem of human identity in the modern world, are Stiller (1954) and Homo Faber (1957).
Frison-Roche, Roger (1906– ). French novelist. He has produced adventure stories such as First on the Rope (Premier de cordée, 1943), Grand Crevasses (1948), and The Lost Trail of the Saharas (1950).

Frobisher, Sir Martin (1535?–1594). English navigator. Frobisher led three expeditions in search of the Northwest Passage between 1576 and 1578, and discovered Frobisher Bay. He commanded the Triumph against the Spanish Armada, was vice-admiral under Sir Francis Drake in his expedition to the West Indies (1586), and vice-admiral in Sir John Hawkins’ expedition to the Portuguese coast in 1590.

Fröding, Gustaf (1860–1911). Swedish poet. A writer of lyric and religious verse, Fröding’s first collection of poems, Guitarr och dragharmonika (1891), revealed his unique poetic gifts; he achieves a blend of irony, melancholy, and humor. Other early collections were Nya dikter (1894), and Stank och flitkar (1896). The poem en morgondrom in the latter volume was branded pornography and led to a court case. Acquitted, but shaken and deeply disturbed, Fröding suffered a mental breakdown and was confined to an asylum in 1898. Although he left the asylum, the remaining years of his life were marked by ill health. Gralstänk (1898) contains a series of religious poems expressing a faith in the divinity of all things in the world.

Frog, Nicholas. A character in John Arbuthnot’s The History of John Bull who represents the Dutch people.

Frogs, The (Batrachoi, 405 B.C.). A comedy by Aristophanes. In it, Dionysus, the patron of the drama, having grown weary of the lack of inspiring dramatists in Athens, decides to go down to Hades to bring back Euripides. Knowing that Heracles has already been there, he borrows his famous lion skin as a disguise, and sets off with his slave Xanthias. When he arrives in Hades, he discovers that Heracles, who had once stolen the guardian dog Cerberus, is not popular there, and hastily changes costume with Xanthias. After further confusion over which of the two is actually Dionysus, the god finds Euripides. However, having listened to an argument between him and his rival playwright AESCHYLUS, he decides to return to earth with Aeschylus instead, because he is the weightier playwright. Besides being a charming comedy, the play is a striking example of the freedom of speech allowed the writer of Old Comedy. Dionysus is made an absurd figure, though he was the patron of the festivals at which the comedy was performed.

Froissart, Jean (1337?–1410). French poet and historian. He enjoyed the patronage of Queen Philippa of England from 1361 until her death in 1369, and then the protection of two French noblemen. He traveled widely throughout western Europe seeking firsthand accounts of the events of the Hundred Years’ War. His Chronicles (1369–c. 1400) give a vivid picture of Europe from 1325 to 1400, although dates and geography are often inaccurate, and the history is often distorted by perspective, the first volume sympathizing with the English, the last three espousing the French cause. The description of events until 1356 is largely a revision of the chronicle by Jean le Bel (c. 1290–c. 1370).

Froissart also wrote a number of graceful lyrics and a long verse romance, Mélador.

Frollo, Claude. The villain of Victor Hugo’s novel The Hunchback of Notre Dame. Frollo is an archdeacon whose reputation for sanctity is seriously undermined by his base passion for Esmeralda.

From Here to Eternity (1951). A novel by James Jones. It is a story of life in the regular army before the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor in 1941. A sprawling (861 pages), powerful, occasionally vulgar book, it caused a sensation at its publication. Jones’s writing is vigorous, vivid, and fluent. The title is taken from the well-known phrase “darned from here to eternity,” a quotation from Gentlemen Rankers, Kipling’s poem of British army life.

Fromm, Erich (1900– ). German-born American psychoanalyst and philosopher. Fromm came to the U.S. in 1934 and has worked for the National Institute for Social Research in New York City and taught at various universities. His books have done much to elucidate and popularize many current philosophical and psychological ideas. His works include Escape from Freedom (1941); Man for Himself: An Inquiry into the Psychology of Ethics (1947), its sequel; Psychoanalysis and Religion (1950); The Forgotten Language: An Introduction to the Understanding of Dreams, Fairy Tales, and Myths (1951); The Art of Loving (1956); May Man Prevail? An Inquiry into the Facts and Fictions of Foreign Policy (1961); Beyond the Chains of Illusion: My Encounter with Marx and Freud (1962); and The Dogma of Christ, and Other Essays on Religion, Psychology, and Culture (1963).

From Morn Till Midnight (Von Morgens bis Mitternachts; 1916). A play by Georg Kaiser. The hero, a bank teller, attempts to break out of his pitifully circumscribed existence by embezzling a large sum of money. He embarks on a wild spree, spending money by the fistful in a frantic pursuit of pleasure that is to give meaning to his life, but is finally disillusioned and commits suicide.

Fronde. An insurrectionary French political party during the minority of Louis XIV and the ministry of Cardinal Mazarin. The Fronde revolted against the crown (1648–1652), but, though successful in temporarily holding the capital, were unable to achieve their aim of curbing royal power. Members were called frondeurs by the Court Party, who likened them to boys slinging stones in the streets and scampering away at the approach of authority.

Frondeurs. See FRONTON.

Front de Bœuf, Sir Reginald. A vicious opponent of Ivanhoe, in Scott’s novel. He dies at the siege of his castle at Torquilstone.

Frontino. A fiery seer in the Orlando Furioso of Ariosto. Formally belonging to Sacripante, it was stolen by the dwarf Brunello and given to the warrior Ruggiero.

Frost, Robert (1874–1963). American poet. Although he was born in San Francisco, he is best known for his verse dealing with New England life and character. Frost moved east in 1885, attended Dartmouth and Harvard for brief intervals, and held various odd jobs. From 1900 to 1905 he farmed in New Hampshire. But poetry was his real vocation, and in 1912, after his failure to be published in the U.S., he went to England, where for three years he wrote poetry, talked with poets, and published two collections, A Boy's Will (1913) and North of Boston (1914). The latter book contains several of Frost's best-known poems, including Mending Wall, The Death of the Hired Man, Home Burial, and A Servant to Servants.

Back in America in 1915, Frost began to gather a reputation, following the American publication of North of Boston. Maintaining his own creative independence, aloof from the poetic movements of the day, he next published Mountain Interval (1916), a volume containing The Road Not Taken, An Old Man's Winter Night, and Butches. With New Hampshire (1923), there is the first indication of Frost's awareness of himself as poet; as he says in the title poem, he is "a creature of literature." There is also present a tone of irony that had earlier been muted. The Axe-Helver, Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening, and Two Wolves appear in this volume.

A Further Range saw the introduction of contemporary concerns in Frost's poetry and the beginning of his later tendency toward abstract philosophizing, which was to result in the two verse dramas A Masque of Reason (1945) and A Masque of Mercy (1947). Frost's other collections include West-Running Brook, A Witness Tree (1943), Steeple Bush (1947), Complete Poems (1949), and In the Clearing (1962).

Frost is often seen as opposed to the main tendencies of modern poetry. He is the clear, simple, moral poet who sings of rural, democratic joys and who is, above all, the lover of nature. But although Frost is perhaps most closely akin to Emerson and Emily Dickinson, he clearly learned much from modern poetic movements. If he is the positive poet of rural America, he is also the chronicler of the dark night of the human soul, the sophisticated poet, full of irony and ambiguity. He wrote in traditional verse forms, but within the poems he created a tension of thought and feeling, reinforced by tension between colloquial speech and traditional metrics, that is unmatched in American poetry. The poem, as he said in The Figure a Poem Makes, is "a momentary stay against confusion."

Frost was awarded the Pulitzer Prize in 1924, 1931, 1937 and 1943 for New Hampshire, Collected Poems, A Further Range, and A Witness Tree.

Froth, Master. In Shakespeare's Measure for Measure, a foolish gentleman, too shallow for great crime and too light for virtue. See Mistress Overdone.

frottola. An Italian verse form popular among both folk and learned poets during the early Renaissance. It is characterized by a long discursive style, chiefly in short lines, that comments on topical as well as literary subjects. Its nearest English analogue is the so-called Skeltonic verse practiced by John Skelton.

Froude, James Anthony (1818-1894). English historian. He wrote a History of England from the Fall of Wolsey to the Defeat of the Spanish Armada (1856-1870). As executor of Thomas Carlyle he wrote Reminiscences of Carlyle (1881) and a Life of Thomas Carlyle (1884). With his brother, Richard Hurrell Froude (1803-1836), who contributed to Tracts for the Times, Froude was associated for a time with the Oxford Movement.

Fruitlands. An experimental cooperative community (1842-1843) founded by Bronson Alcott at Harvard, Mass. Its plan included vegetarianism, farming, and teaching. Alcott's daughter, Louisa May Alcott, described the colonists with gentle humor in Transcendental Wild Oats (1876), a fictional sketch.

Fruits of the Earth, The (Les Nourritures terrestres; 1897). A poetic work by André Gide. It is a hymn in prose and poetry to the beauty of all experience, exhorting youth to prepare itself for receiving all the joy of life by casting off all that is artificial or merely conventional. In the 1920's a generation of restless youth welcomed the work as a popular handbook of self-liberation.

Fry, Christopher (1907—). English dramatist. He was born Christopher Harris, but took his mother's name. His plays are usually written verse forms; they are witty and full of poetic conceits. The heroine of The Lady's Not for Burning (1949) is a young witch. Among his other plays are A Phoenix Too Frequent (1949); A Sleep of Prisoners (1951), designed to be produced in churches; Venus Observed (1950); Ring around the Moon (1950), a translation of L'Invitation au Château by Jean Anouilh; The Dark is Light Enough (1954); and Curtmantle (1961).

Fry, Elizabeth (1780-1845). English Quaker philanthropist, noted as promoter of wide-ranging prison reforms, particularly in the treatment of female prisoners. Her Memoirs were published in 1847.

Fry, Roger (1866-1934). English art critic and painter. A member of the Bloomsbury Group, he was a pioneer in introducing the work of Cézanne and other post-expressionist painters. He was at one time curator of paintings at the New York Metropolitan Museum. Among his books are Vision and Design (1920), Transformations (1926), Cézanne: A Study of his Development (1927), and Reflections on British Painting (1934). He also edited Sir Joshua Reynolds' Discourses (1905). Virginia Woolf wrote his biography (1940).

Fudge Family. A family whose adventures are related in Thomas Moors's satire The Fudge Family in Paris (1818). Each member of the family writes letters to friends back home in England; they are meant to satirize the parvenu English abroad.

Fuentovejuna (The Sheep Well, c. 1619). A drama by Lope de Vega. Based on actual historical records, the story takes place during the reign of Ferdinand and Isabella. Commander Fernán Gómez, the lascivious lord of Fuentovejuna, violates Laurencia, a peasant girl of the community. She tells her misfortune to the townspeople who, enraged by her words, storm the commander's castle and put him to death. The king sends a judge to discover the identity of the murderer, but all the villagers, even under torture, will say only that Fuentovejuna killed him. Impressed by the heroic behavior of the people, the king pardons them and puts the village under the crown's protection.

Führer, der (Ger., "Leader"). A title assumed by Adolf Hitler, who claimed to be the true representative of the German people. It was also used by leaders of subdivisions within the Nazi Party.
Fuhrmann Henschel. See Dryman Henschel-Fujiwara. See Heian.

Fujiyama. More correctly Fuji-no-Yama, but commonly called Fuji-san. The sacred mountain of Japan. The mountain, Japan's highest (12,394 feet), is in the province of Suruga, 60 miles southwest of Tokyo. It is a snow-capped volcano, inactive since 1708, a resort of pilgrims and prominent in Japanese art.

Fuller, Henry B[lake] (1857-1929). American novelist. Fuller won success with his first novel, The Chevalier of Penzerti-Vani (1890), written under the pseudonym Stanton Page, but his best-known book is The Cliff Dwellers, the first successful novel about an American city. Working as a book critic for Chicago newspapers, he was active in Chicago's literary circle, especially those engaged in making Poetry the most important magazine of its kind in the country. Fuller himself issued two collections of verse: The New Flag (1899) and Lines Long and Short (1917).

Fuller, [Sarah] Margaret. Marchesa Ossoli (1810-1850). American editor, essayist, poet, and teacher. A brilliant and well-educated woman, Miss Fuller edited The Dial for two years. She had a gift for languages, and translated Goethe, spreading enthusiasm for his work. She held Saturday "conversations" regularly, and wrote critical articles for the New York Tribune. Unfavorably criticizing Longfellow and Lowell, she alienated the Boston Brahmins from the Transcendentalists. In 1846, Miss Fuller went abroad; visiting Italy, she mingled with leading authors, and became involved in Italy's struggle for freedom. She met Giovanni Angelo, Marquis Ossoli, who was 10 years younger than she, and became his mistress. They had a son, and were later married. Miss Fuller became very active in the hospitals when fighting began in Italy; she started to write a book on Giuseppe Mazzini and the war of liberation. In May, 1850, the family set sail for New York; their vessel was shipwrecked off Fire Island. The body of the infant son washed ashore, but the others were never recovered.

Margaret Fuller published a number of books, among them Summer on the Lakes (1844), Woman in the Nineteenth Century (1845), and Papers on Literature and Art (1846). She was attacked in James Russell Lowell's A Fable for Critics, and Hawthorne is said to have modeled his character, Zenobia, in The Blithedale Romance, on the dynamic and paradoxical figure of Margaret Fuller.

Fuller, Roy (1912- ). English poet. Her early poems were sociological, in the manner of W. H. Auden, and her later poems more romantic and mythological. Her collections include Poems (1939) and The Ruined Boys (1959).

Fuller, Thomas (1608-1661). English clergyman and writer. One of the most popular preachers and authors of his day, Fuller was appointed chaplain to Charles II after the Restoration. His writing is remarkable for its wit, tolerance, and common sense. Among his works are The History of the Holy War (1639), an account of Palestine during the Crusades; The Holy State and the Profligate State (1642), a series of character sketches; Good Thoughts in Bad Times (1645), brief essays on contemporary religious con-licts; and The History of the Worthies of England (1662), a collection of biographical sketches.

Fulton, Robert (1765-1815). American inventor. After working as an artist and draftsman, Fulton went to Europe in 1786 where he remained for 20 years, devoting himself to science and mechanics. Although he made several important inventions, he is best known for his applications of steam to navigation. He designed the first commercially successful steamboat, the Clermont, which traveled from New York to Albany (Aug. 17-22, 1807) in 62 hours of operating time.

Fulvia (d. 40 B.C.). A Roman matron married successively to the demagogue Clodius Pulcher, Curio, and Mark Antony. It is said that when Cicero was murdered by Antony's orders, his head was brought to Fulvia who drove a needle through his tongue in revenge for the things he had said against her husband in his famous Philippics.

Furmanov, Dmitri Andrejevich (1891-1926). Russian novelist. He is the author of the much-praised Soviet classic Chapayev (1923). A story of the civil war, it contrasts the characters of an emotional, haphazard guerrilla leader, General Chapayev, and a cool, detached, and efficient Bolshevik commissar, who was Furmanov himself.

Furness, Horace Howard (1833-1912). American Shakespearean scholar. In 1871 he began to edit the New Variorum edition of Shakespeare's works. It was carried to completion by his son, Horace Howard Furness (1865-1930). The elder Furness' treatment of the text of Shakespeare's plays is considered conservative; his edition includes abstracts of previous criticism as well as variant readings. His son's work reveals less scholarship and judgment. On the latter's death, he bequeathed his great Shakespearean library to the University of Pennsylvania.

Furnivall, Frederick James (1825-1910). An English philologist. He was the founder of innumerable English literary societies, including the Early English Text Society (1864), the Chaucer Society and the Ballad Society (1868), the New Shakespeare Society (1873), the Browning Society (1881), the Wyclif Society (1882), and the Shelley Society (1885). He edited the Six-Text Print of Chaucer's Canterbury Tales (1868-1875) and began a dictionary for the Philological Society that developed into the Oxford English Dictionary.

Furor. See Faire Queene, The.

Furphy, Joseph. Pen name Tom Collins (1843-1912). Australian novelist. A perfect example of late literary blooming, Furphy was 60 when his novel Such is Life (1903) was published. And though, as a youth, he showed great promise with a prize-winning poem on the death of Abraham Lincoln, he published only some verses and sketches in the next 20 years, during which period his brilliant style developed. Such is Life caught the notice of only a small group upon its publication. Later, however, the book proved to be a starting point for the longer form of Australian novel. Furphy, a self-educated man, flouted all the rules, and in this way wrote a novel of complete originality. Such is Life has recently been recognized as one of the best frontier novels in English.

Fuzzy Lawcats. An anglicism for the Chats-Fourrés, who inhabit the Wicket, where Pantagruel and his friends are arrested in Rabelais’ Gargantua and Pantagruel. The Fuzzy Lawcats, so called in allusion to the ermine-bordered robes worn by judges, are a rapacious breed who use their incomprehensible subtleties to devour everything. Among them, vice is deemed virtue, and evil passes for good; though they plunder the universe, their authority is unquestioned. Pantagruel and his companions are released only when Panurge, after answering a riddle posed by Graspall, or Grippeminau, archduke of the Fuzzy Lawcats, tosses them a bag full of gold coins. This episode was Rabelais’ most violent satire on the courts of justice.

Further Range, A (1936). A collection of poems by Robert Frost. It contains several humorous and satirical pieces and a group of epigrams called Ten Mills. The longest poem in the book, Build Soil, reflects the poet’s concern with contemporary political developments. Also included in the collection are Desert Places, Neither out Far Nor in Deep, Design, and Provide, Provide.

futurism. A radical movement in literature and art initiated in 1909 by the Italian poet and novelist Filippo Tommaso Marinetti (1876–1944). His Manifesto du Futurisme (1909) called for a revolutionary attitude toward life and art in general, exalting such aspects of contemporary life as speed, machinery, and war. The special manifesto on literature (1912) insisted on courage, audacity, and rebellion as the essential elements of poetry; it advocated freedom for the word (parole in libertà), the abolition of syntax, and similar anarchic, “liberating” tendencies. In the field of art, futurism produced its most interesting works before World War. In their effort to portray dynamic movement and force, futurist painters often presented a moving object in successive stages of motion. Among the representatives of futurist art were the painters Giacomo Bella and Gino Severini and the sculptor Umberto Boccioni. The movement won for a time the endorsement of the Italian fascists.

Futurism influenced modern European literature and art and was also a forerunner of cubism, dadaism, expressionism, and surrealism. Its most immediate effect was felt in Russia where futurists attempted to do away with what they regarded as stale and hackneyed in Russian poetry, especially the kind of work written by the symbolist poets. The chief members of the Russian futurists were Velemir Khlebnikov and Vladimir Mayakovski. The Fauvist attitude of the futurists was revealed in their manifesto, A Slap in the Face of Public Taste (Poshchichina obshchestvennomu vkus; 1912), which voiced their demand: “Throw Pushkin, Dostoevski, Tolstoi... overboard from the steamship of modernity.” The search for new poetic techniques led Khlebnikov to experiment with “trans-sense language” (Russ., zaimnaya yasik or zaum), in which words are shorn of their meanings and used only for their sound values. One of Khlebnikov’s experiments consisted of a poem, written in 1910, made up of neologisms derived from the word smek (“laughter”). Mayakovski, the greatest poet of the group, was more successful in developing a new kind of poetry. His chief features were a rhetorical style, original rhymes, powerful rhythms, and an emphasis on the individual word, rather than the line, as the basis of poetic organization.

Although revolutionary in temper and tone, the work of the futurists was too literary for the Soviet cultural overseers. To propagate their views, the futurists formed the organization known as LEF (Left Front of the Arts) in 1923 and published a journal under that name. The journal failed in 1925, and was revived briefly in 1927–1928 as Novyi LEF (New LEF), but eventually the project died. By this time the proletarian trend in literature, advocated by RAPP (q.v.), was dominant.

So 'ere's to you, Fuzzy Wuzzy, at your 'ome in the Soudan;
You're a pore benighted 'eathen but a first-class fightin' man.

Gabriel. One of the archangels who appears in the Jewish, Christian, and Muslim systems of belief. In Hebrew mythology, he is sometimes regarded as the angel of death, the prince of fire and thunder, but more frequently as one of the Deity's chief messengers and the only angel who can speak Syrian and Chaldee. In the Talmud, he appears as the destroyer of Sennacherib's armies, as the man who showed Joseph the way, and as one of the angels who buried Moses.

Christians hold that Gabriel was the angel of the Annunciation who appeared to the Virgin Mary; he also announced to Zacharias the future birth of John the Baptist. It is he who is to blow the trumpet on Judgment Day.

The Muslims call Gabriel the chief of the four favored angels and the spirit of truth. He was the angel who, according to the Koran, revealed the sacred laws to Muhammad.

Milton, in his Paradise Lost (1667), makes Gabriel chief of the angelic guards placed over Paradise.

Gabriel Conroy (1876). A novel by Bret Harte. The longest of his fictional writings, it gives a vivid picture of mining conditions during the early days of the California gold rush. Among the best-drawn characters is the professional gambler, Jack Hamlin.

Gabrieli, Giovanni (1555-1612). Venetian composer, pupil of his uncle, Andrea Gabrieli (c. 1515-1586), also a composer of note. From 1576 to 1580 he was in Munich with Orlando de Lassus. He was a teacher of Michael Praetorius and Heinrich Schütz. Long associated with the Cathedral of St. Mark's in Venice, Gabrieli brought to its peak the Venetian style of polyphonic writing (pieces for two or more groups of instruments or voices in different parts of the building). He is also important as a bridge between the Renaissance and Baroque styles in music.

Gabrina. In the Orlando Furioso of Ariosto an old hag whose ugliness evokes laughter in anyone who looks at her, but prompts quarrels among the knights who defend her. When the warrior maiden Marfisa, her protectress, defeats the Scottish knight Zerbino, the latter is compelled to keep Gabrina's company and follow her. He saves her from her enemy Ermonide, but she ungraciously charges him with the death of Pinabello. Zerbino, rescued by Orlando, later punishes the false knight Oderico by compelling him to keep Gabrina's company. Eventually, Oderico hangs her.

gadfly. A fly that bites or annoys cattle. In Greek mythology, Hera sent a gadfly to torment the white-horned cow in whose shape Zeus tried to protect his beloved Io from his wife's jealousy. A gadfly also bit Pegasus and caused him to send Bellerophon plunging to the earth.

Gaelic League. An organization founded in Dublin in 1863. Its purpose is to preserve and extend the vernacular use of the Gaelic language, the native tongue of Ireland.

Gaelic literature. The literature of Gaelic-speaking Ireland and Scotland. Irish literature is usually divided as follows: Old Irish (up to 900); Middle Irish (up to 1350); Late Middle, or Early Modern, Irish (up to 1650); and Modern Irish (from 1650). Up until the 12th century, Gaelic literature was entirely oral; it was committed to memory by bards and transmitted orally from generation to generation. In the middle period, a few monks began to set it down lest it be entirely forgotten.

Old Irish literature survives in medieval manuscripts, which are copies of older manuscripts; among the most important of these are Lebor na hUidré (The Book of the Dun Cow), The Book of Leinster, The Yellow Book of Lecan, The Book of Ballymote, and The Speckled Book. The romances and sagas contained in these books have been grouped according to characters and subject matter. The major groupings of these hero sagas are three: the mythological cycle, the Ulster cycle, and the Fenian cycle. The mythological cycle relates various traditions about the early settlement and conquest of Ireland. The Ulster cycle deals with Irish heroes, the greatest of whom is Cú Chulainn. The Fenian cycle deals with a much later period and extends into the Christian era which comes in the extreme old age of Osian or Ossian, poet of the Fenians. The cycles are prose narratives interspersed with poetic dialogue.

The later Middle Irish literature written in Gaelic is generally less significant than that of the older periods; unlike the earlier literature, the bulk of which is anonymous, the later medieval literature was written by known poets, several of whom are worthy of mention. The chief bards of the 13th through 15th century are Gilbride Albanach McNamee (13th century), the religious poet Donough Mor O'Daly (13th century), and Teig Og O'Higgins (15th century). To this late medieval period also belongs the celebrated Gaelic narrative collection The Three Sorrows of Story Telling. The 16th and 17th centuries saw a great poetic revival and the rise of Modern Irish prose. As England conquered Ireland and as Protestantism became firmly established in England, Gaelic literature evinced fiercer patriotism and affirmed Catholicism. The decline of bardic poetry, however, was already under way before Cromwell's arrival (1649) in Ireland. The prose of the 16th and 17th century is transitional; the religious writings and monumental history of Ireland of Geoffrey Keating (1570-c. 1650) is the very foundation of Modern Irish literature. The number of Gaelic-speaking Irish declined somewhat after the arrival of Cromwell and the settling of English in Ireland; however, the potato famine of 1847 dealt the most severe blow, for, in the consequent depopulation of the country, the Gaelic west was hardest hit and the proportion of Gaelic speakers in Ireland dropped in three short years from three fourths to one quarter.

In the later 19th century, through the efforts of Irish scholars, there came the great Gaelic literary revival that continued into the 20th. See Gaelic League; Irish Renaissance.

Galatea. See MARGAWSE, QUEEN.

Galfrone. In the Orlando Innamorato of Boiardo, the king of Cathay. He sends his daughter Angelica and his son Argalia to Paris to fight against Charlemagne and his paladins, the one using her beauty, the other his enchanted arms.

Galahad, Sir. In the later legends of King Arthur, the purest and noblest knight of the Round Table. Best known from Malory's Mort d'Arthur (c. 1469), he is the illegitimate son of Sir Launcelot and the princess Elaine and the last descendant of Joseph of Arimathea. He alone is qualified to fill the Title Perilous at the Round Table, and he alone achieves the quest for the Holy Grail. His career ends in Sarras, after he has completed the quest. Later writers, particularly of the romantic period, wrote newer versions of Sir Galahad into the Arthurian legend. Among these are Tennyson and Mark Twain. The name of Sir Galahad has become, in fact, synonymous with the chivalrous, the perfect knight.

Galápagos Islands. An archipelago of volcanic islands on the equator, west of Ecuador. It is noted for its large tortoises (Sp. galapago, tortoise), elephant seals, and other species that exist nowhere else. It was investigated by Darwin during his voyage in the Beagle, later by William Beebe. It is the setting of Melville's short story The Encantadas.

Galatea (Galatea). (1) A Nereid; see Acts. (2) See Pygmalion.

Galba (5 B.C.-A.D. 69). Roman emperor (A.D. 68-69). He was made emperor after Nero's death by the Praetorian guard, but was killed after a few months because he was unwilling to fulfill the expectations of his followers.

Gale, Zona (1874-1938). American novelist and short-story writer. Born in Wisconsin, Miss Gale is best known for her work dealing with small-town life in the Middle West. She joined the staff of the New York World in 1901, but soon left to devote her time to writing. Her first novel, Romance Island, was published in 1906. The sentimentality that characterized Miss Gale's early writing was evident in her popular series of stories about the mythical Friendship Village. But despite their one-sided view, the author's talent for accurate observation gave them an aura of reality.

During World War I Miss Gale was again living in Wisconsin. Her pacifist views brought her the enmity of her neighbors, and her views of village life were greatly altered. This change of attitude is reflected in both and in her short novel Miss Lulu Berr, which was an immediate success. In the same realistic vein were Faint Perfume (1923), which pitted the sensitivity of her heroine against the grossness of middle-class life, and two collections of short stories, Yellow Gentians and Blue (1927) and Bridal Pond (1930). A strain of mysticism, hinted at in earlier work, was apparent in Preface to a Life (1926) and in much of her later writing.

Galen (Claudius Galenos, 2d century). A famous Greek physician and philosopher. For centuries he was the supreme authority in medicine; hence, any physician.

Galeotto or Galeoto. The Italian name of Gallehault, one of the forms of Galahad, which has attached to itself a quite divergent meaning. Its modern connotations come from a passage in Dante's Inferno telling how Paolo and Francesca read a guilty kiss between Launcelot and Guinevere and yielded to the suggestion. Gallehault was the knight who had brought Launcelot and the queen together, and he performed the same office for Paolo and Francesca, for "Galeoto was the book and he who wrote it. That day we read no more." Hence, though far from the character of Galahad, Galeoto has become a term for a panderer in Italy and Spain. In José Echegaray's tragedy El gran Galeoto, gossip is the "Galeoto."

Galiana. A Moorish princess, whose father, King Gadafle of Toledo, reputedly built a palace for her on the Tagus River. It was so splendid that the phrase, a palace of Galiana, became proverbial in Spain.

Galilei, Galileo. Known as Galileo (1564-1642). Italian astronomer, physicist, and philosopher. Galileo's achievements led to a new physical and mathematical concept of nature. He discovered the isochronism of the pendulum (1583), hydrostatic balance (1586), Jupiter's satellites (1610), sun spots (1610), the moon's libration (1637), among other accomplishments. A staunch advocate of COPERNICUS, he found himself in difficulties with the Church, but was not unduly harassed until the publication of his Dialogo dei due massimi sistemi (Dialogue on the Great World Systems, 1632). The following year he was tried before the Inquisition on charges of proclaiming and defending the Copernican system, which had been denounced as heretical. Unwilling to sacrifice his remaining years and his work to a fruitless heroism, he recanted his views. Legend has it that after doing so, he muttered "Eppur si muove!"

gall. Bile; the very bitter fluid secreted by the liver. The word is used figuratively as a symbol of anything of extreme bitterness. The phrase "gall and wormwood" compounds the bitterness.

The gall of bitterness means the bitterest grief; extreme affliction. The ancients taught that grief and joy were subject to the gall as affection was to the heart, knowledge to the kidneys, and the gall of bitterness means the bitter center of bitterness, as the heart of hearts means the innermost recesses of the heart or affections. In the Acts it is used to signify the sinfulness of sin, which leads to the bitterest grief. According to tradition, pigeons have no gall, because the dove sent from the ark by Noah burst its gall out of grief, and none of the pigeon family has had a gall ever since.

Gall, Franz Joseph (1758–1828). German physician and phrenologist. His major scientific treatise is Anatomie et physiologie du système nerveux en général (Anatomy and Physiology of the Nervous System in General, 1810–1819). See PHRENOLOGY.

Gallegos [Freire], Rómulo (1884–1958). Venezuelan novelist, educator, and political leader. When lack of funds forced Gallegos to abandon his legal studies, he turned to teaching and, from 1912 to 1930, was director of various educational institutions. The publication of Doña Bárbara, Gallegos' best-known novel, aroused the hostility of Juan Vicente Gómez, Venezuela's dictator, who tried to silence the author by offering him a seat in the senate. Gallegos chose voluntary exile instead, living in the U.S. and Spain, where he was an employee of the National Cash Register Co. Returning to Venezuela, after the death of Gómez in 1935, he served briefly as minister of education, directed motion-picture versions of several of his novels, and was an unsuccessful presidential candidate in 1942. In 1945 a coup engineered by Acción Democrática, a liberal political party of which Gallegos had been a founder, overthrew the government, and he was elected president of Venezuela for the term 1948–1952. Late in 1948, however, Gallegos was deposed by a military junta and remained in exile until the overthrow of Marcos Pérez Jiménez in 1958.

As a novelist, Gallegos is famed for his interpretation of the people and customs of the Venezuelan llanos, or tropical prairies. Besides Doña Bárbara, his best-known novels are La trepadora (1925), a psychological study of an illegitimate son who seeks his family's acceptance; Cantaeloro (1934), which relates the adventures of a wandering minstrel on the llanos; Canaima (1935), a story laid in the tropical forest where the evil spirit "canaima" dwells; and Pobre negro (1937), which describes slavery and mulatto life in 19th-century Venezuela.

Gallic Wars. See Commentaries on the Gallic War.

Gallup, George H'orace (1901– ). American public-opinion statistician. Having founded the Institute of Public Opinion (1935) and spent some time measuring public reactions by means of polls, Gallup began to forecast the results of such reactions, particularly in the realm of political elections. He is the author of The Pulse of Democracy: A New Technique for Measuring Reader Interest (1940) and numerous articles on public opinion.

Galotti, Emilia. See EMILIA GALOTTI.

Galsworthy, John (1867–1933). English novelist and playwright, known for his portrayals of the British upper classes and for his social satire. His most famous work is his novel series beginning with The Forsyte Saga (1906–1922); Galsworthy continued to write novels about the Forsyte family throughout his life. His plays are remarkable realistic and satirical studies based on various different social problems. Like Bernard Shaw and other contemporary writers of dramas of ideas, Galsworthy was influenced by the drama of Henrik Ibsen.

Born into an upper-middle-class family like the ones he usually wrote about, Galsworthy was trained as a lawyer and his legal knowledge colors many of his novels and plays. He turned to literature after he had met Joseph Conrad on a voyage. A passionate romance with Ada Galsworthy, his cousin's wife, who encouraged his writing, led to their marriage some 10 years later, in 1905. Galsworthy's earliest works, written under the pseudonym of John Sinjohn, were volumes of short stories and two novels influenced by Turgeniev: Jocelyn (1898) and Villa Rubein (1900). He came to artistic maturity in 1906, with the publication of his novel The Man of Property (the first installment of The Forsyte Saga) and the production of his play The Silver Box. In the work of this early period Galsworthy attacked the smug conventionality and self-righteous hypocrisy of the middle classes, and championed the artist, the rebel, and the underdog (see his play Justices). He became less satirical and more sentimental and traditional in the later Forsyte novels, such as THE COUNTRY HOUSE and THE PATRICIAN, and the plays The Skin Game (1920) and Loyalties (1922). He refused knighthood in 1918 but accepted the Order of Merit in 1929 and the Nobel Prize in 1932.

Galuppi, Baldassare (1706–1785). Italian composer, principally of opera. The work that inspired Browning's poem A Toccata of Galuppi's is thought to have been the Toccata in A major by the Italian composer Pietro Domenico Paradisi (1707–1791).

Gálvez, Manuel (1882–1937). Argentine novelist. Gálvez is best known for his naturalistic novels in which he mercilessly exposed Argentina's social evils, revealing a Dickensian sympathy for the downtrodden. La maestra normal (1914), often considered his best work, is a tale of seduction notable for the author's depiction of the pettiness and monotony of life in the provincial city of La Rioja. Córdoba is the setting for La sombra del convento (1917), which describes the conflict between conservative clericalism and liberalism. Gálvez' most popular novel was Nacha Regules (1919); although its plot is more dramatic, dealing with the redemption of a fallen woman through true love, the novel gives a chilling portrait of conditions in a Buenos Aires brothel and among the poor in general.
Gama, Vasco da (c. 1460–1524). Portuguese explorer. The first European to discover a sea route to the East, he rounded the Cape of Good Hope on Nov. 22, 1497, sailed along the coast of Africa, and crossed the Indian Ocean to reach Calicut on May 20, 1498. He made a second trip to the East in 1502–1503 and was named viceroy of India in 1524. He is the hero of Camões' Lusíadas, and Meyerbeer's opera L'Africaine.

Gambara, Veronica (1485–1550). Italian poet. She wrote sonnets on Petrarchian love themes and on the political events of her day. Her Rime (Verses) and Lettere were published in 1579.

Gambetta, Léon (1838–1882). French lawyer and statesman. Violently opposed to Napoleon III, he served as a member of the new government of National Defence (September, 1870). In a futile attempt to organize national resistance, Gambetta made a spectacular balloon escape during the Prussian siege of Paris. He served as president of the Chamber of Deputies (1879–1881) and as premier of France (1881–1882), during the Third Republic.

Gambler, The (Igrok; 1866). A short novel by Fedor Dostoevsky. The gambling mania of the tale's hero, Aleksei Ivanovich, is a reflection of the author's own tendency. The heroine of the story, Polina, is based on Polina Suslova, Dostoevsky's lover in 1862–1863.

Gamelin, Evariste. Chief character in the novel The Gods Are Thirst by Anatole France. A young artist, Gamelin becomes an avid member of the revolutionary tribunal. Ironically, he himself is put to death by the guillotine.

Gamelyn, The Tale of. A metrical romance in Middle English. Often called The Cook's Tale of Gamelyn, it has been erroneously attributed to Chaucer (see Cook's Tale). Gamelyn is the youngest of three brothers. The eldest robs him of his share of their father's property, and after a series of successes and reverses in claiming it, Gamelyn takes to the forest and eventually becomes chief of a band of outlaws. The second brother tries to help him and winds up in chains, but Gamelyn returns to overthrow their wicked brother, now sheriff, as well as the dishonest judge and jury. Thomas Lodge adapted the story in his romance Rosalynde (1590), a major source for Shakespeare's As You Like It.

Gamesmanship. A term popularized by Stephen Potter through his humorous book Theory and Practice of Gamesmanship, or the Art of Winning Games without Actually Cheating (1947).

Gammer Gurton's Needle (1566). The second oldest English comedy. It was first performed at Cambridge in 1566, and published in 1575. It was formerly ascribed to John Stil (1543–1607), Bishop of Bath and Winchester, but the claim of William Stevenson (d. 1575?) is now generally favored. A coarse and vigorous comedy, it deals with the housewife Gammer Gurton's loss of her needle as she is mending her servant Hodge's breeches; it closes with the painful but farcical discovery of the missing needle in the seat of Hodge's pants.

Gamp, Sarah, usually called Sairey. A disreputable nurse in Charles Dickens' Martin Chuzzlewitty, famous for her bulky umbrella and perpetual reference to Mrs. Harris, a purely imaginary person whose opinions always confirm her own. She is fond of strong tea and more potent stimulants.

Hence, a regular Gamp came to signify a low-class, drink-sodden, unchristianized matron, and an umbrella, especially a large, badly rolled cotton one, came to be called a gamp.

gandharva (Sanskrit, celestial musician). In the Hindu tradition, marriage by the mere exchange of garlands, a love union, recognized by Manu, the Hindu law codifier, as one of the eight acceptable types of marriage.

Gandhi, Mohandas Karamchand, called Mahatma (great-souled) Gandhi (1869–1948). Hindu nationalist leader. He is considered the architect of Indian independence and self-rule. He studied law in England and practiced in India. In 1893 he went to South Africa to help in the struggle of Indian settlers to gain political rights; it was here that Gandhi first used the technique of passive resistance that later became his chief weapon against the British in India. After returning to India in 1914, he supported the British in World War I, but in 1919 he formed the Satyagraha, a political-religious movement of non-cooperation with the British, which caused him to be imprisoned for "civil disobedience." In 1924 he became president of the Indian National Congress, a position he held until 1934. He urged the boycott of all English goods in 1932, the same year that he began his “fast unto death” in protest to the official treatment of the untouchables. He won his point after six days. During World War II he was again arrested by the British. He was shot and killed in 1948 by a Hindu Nationalist. His tremendous popularity in India was due to his devotion to Hindu ideals, his asceticism, his efforts to overcome the social and economic distress of the Indian peasants, and his campaign to eliminate untouchability from Hindu society. His simple costume of white worn by the wrinkled old man in the plain steel glasses appealed to the Western imagination as did the form of his protest that proved effective against the might of the British Empire. His works include Indian Home Rule (1922), Young India (1924) and Autobiography (1949).

Ganelon. Also Gan of Mayence, Gano of Mackson. The traitor among Charlemagne’s paladins. In the Chanson de Roland his betrayal is responsible for the defeat at Roncesvalles, and he figures prominently as the instigator of discord among the knights in Pulci’s Morgante Maggiore, Boiardo’s Orlando Innamorato, and Ariosto’s Orlando Furioso. He is cited as one of history’s notorious traitors in Dante’s Inferno and Chaucer’s Nun’s Priest’s Tale.

Ganesa or Ganesh. The god of wisdom or prudence in Hindu mythology. He is the son of Shiva and Parvati, and is always represented with an elephant’s head. He is propitiated at the commencement of important work and at the beginning of sacred writings because he is the legendary scribe of the Hindu epic, the Mahabharata, which was dictated to him nonstop by the sage Vyasa. His worship is confined largely to west India, but he is one of the most popular Hindu deities.

Ganges or Ganga. The most sacred river of India. It rises in the Himalayas, flows about 1500 miles, and empties into the Bay of Bengal by many mouths. It is also known as the Bhangirathi. Its source, in Hindu legend, lies at the feet of Brahma, and its descent to the earth was through the matted locks of Shiva, the king of yogis or ascetics; hence the ritual necessity for orthodox Hindus to bathe in the holy river on certain days in order to rid of their imperfections. See BHAGIRATHI.

Ganivet, Angel (1865–1898). Spanish philosopher and critic. His most famous work is the philosophical inquiry into the Spanish national character entitled Idearium español (1898), which points the way toward the Generación del 98 in its analysis of ambulía, a lack of will in the Spanish people. Ganivet is also the author of two novels, considered semi-autobiographical in nature, La conquista del reino de Maya (1897) and Los trabajos del inifatigable creador Pio Cid (1898).

Ganor, Genora, Geneura, Ginevra, Genievre, Guinevere, Guenever. Various ways of spelling the name of King Arthur’s wife. She is called Guanhumara or Guanhumar by Geoffrey of Monmouth, but Tennyson made GUINEVERE the popular English form.

Gant, Eugene. The central character in Thomas Wolfe’s autobiographical novels Look Homeward, Angel and Of Time and the River. Gant is a young man of robust energies and intense emotion; he feels “different” from others, and has vast, romantic yearnings toward love, adventure, personal achievement, and a semimystical, unknown goal which carries him on a virtual pilgrimage through the U.S. and Europe. Other characters with the same family name are likewise drawn from life: Oliver Gant, Eugene’s father; Eliza Gant, his mother; and Ben Gant, his older brother.

Ganymede (Ganymedes). In Greek mythology, the cup-bearer of Zeus, successor to Hebe, and a type of youthful male beauty. The son of Tros, an early king of Troy, he was carried off by Zeus on the back of an eagle because of his unusual beauty.

García de la Huerta, Vicente (1734–1787), Spanish playwright. His work is thought to have anticipated romanticism while preserving neoclassical principles. His most successful work is the verse drama Raquel (1778), dealing with the love between Alfonso VIII and a Jewish girl from Toledo, a theme previously treated by Lope de Vega and by Mira de Amescua.

García del Castaño. See Francisco de Rojas Zorrilla.

García Gutiérrez, Antonio (1813–1884). Spanish dramatist. The most popular of his many plays is El trovador (1836), a romantic historical tragedy that was the basis of Verdi’s opera Il Trovatore. He also wrote Venganza catalana (1864) and Juan Lorenzo (1865), sometimes considered his masterpiece.

García Lorca, Federico (1898–1936). Spanish poet and playwright. He is considered the most deeply appreciated Spanish poet, both at home and abroad. Born in Madrid, he began his career with the study of law; however, he abandoned this for verse and travel. After a period of great initial creativity revealing an even greater promise, García Lorca was brutally murdered by Falangists during the Civil War. His tragic death created a vacuum in Spanish literature, which present-day poets are still seeking to fill.

García Lorca’s first poetic venture, Libro de poemas (1921), met with little success, but revealed his poetic bent. His next work, Romanceria gitana (1928), breathing new life into the old tradition of the Spanish ballad, skyrocketed Lorca to fame. The work is a collection of Andalusian ballads, each containing the intense strains of the native gypsy songs (cante-jondo) of the area. One of the best-known of the ballads is Muerte de Antonio el Cemborio. The poet’s preoccupation with death is apparent in the title of his most famous poem, Llanto por Ignacio Sánchez Mejías (The Death of a Bullfighter, 1935). This work is considered to be the greatest elegy in modern Spanish poetry. García Lorca’s well-known collections also include Poeta en Nueva York (The Poet in New York, 1940), which contains the poem El rey de Harlem, and El diván del Tamarit (1936).

García Lorca has an equally merited reputation as a dramatist. His plays, which have been translated into several languages, are among the most popular in Spanish literature. The most famous of his tragedies are Bodas de sangre (Blood Wedding, 1933), which relates the story of a young bride who runs off with a previous lover—he is subsequently murdered by her husband; Yerma (1934); and La casa de Bernarda Alba (The House of Bernard Alba, 1936), the story of a brutal woman bent on a course of action which results in anguish and suicide for her daughters.

García Lorca was also an accomplished musician and amateur painter.

Garcilaso de la Vega (1501?–1536). Spanish poet and soldier. Garcilaso spent much of his brief life in Italy, where he lived, as he himself wrote, “Now using the sword, now the pen” (Tomando, ora la espada, ora la pluma). Often called “the Spanish Petrarca” because of his successful imitation of Italian poetry, he was a close friend of Juan Boscán, whose widow published his works with those of her husband in 1543. Garcilaso wrote 38 sonnets, five canciones, five odes, two elegies, and one epístola or “epistle,” which are notable for their technical excellence and delicacy of sentiment. His first eclogue, dealing with the unhappy loves of the shepherds Salcido and Nemoroso, is generally considered his masterpiece.

Garcilaso de la Vega. Known as El Inca (1539–1616). Peruvian historian. The son of a Spanish knight and an Inca princess, Garcilaso is often regarded as the first spokesman for the South American mestizo. After fighting in European wars for 30 years, he settled in Spain, was ordained a priest, and devoted himself to history. His masterpiece is the Comentarios reales (Royal Commentaries, 1609), in which he described the Inca Empire and its conquest by Spain. Although some critics have claimed that it gives too fanciful and idealized a picture of Inca civilization, it is still considered a major source of information about pre-Columbian America. Garcilaso also wrote Florida del Inca (1605), an account of De Soto’s explorations in what is now the southern U.S.

Garden, Mary (1877– ). Scottish-born operatic soprano. Noted for the dramatic qualities of her singing, she was chosen over Masterlinck’s mistress to sing the first Mélisande in Debussy’s opera, which estranged the poet from the composer. She wrote Mary Colvin’s Own Story (1931) with Louis Biancoli’s help.

Garden, The (1681). A poem by Andrew Marvell. It was written while he was a tutor at the country estate of the Cromwellian general Thomas Fairfax. The poem dwells on the contrast between the innocence, peace, and beauty of the garden and the stress and trouble of the outside world. At the height of his contemplation of the garden, his mind performs a typically Marvellian transformation:

Annihilating all that’s made
To a green thought in a green shade.

Garden in January, A. A tale from Giovanni Boccaccio’s The Decameron. Dionia tells Ansaldo, an unwelcome suitor, that he can have her if he can make her garden as gay with flowers in January as it is in May. With the help of a magican, to whom he promises a generous reward, Ansaldo succeeds. Dionia’s husband, learning of her plight, agrees to the fulfillment of the pact, whereupon Ansaldo matches his generosity by releasing Dionia from the pledge. The magician, too, joins in the general display of courtesy by refusing his reward. This is essentially the Franklin’s Tale of Chaucer.

Garden Party, The (1922). A short story by Katherine Mansfield. While a wealthy woman and her daughters are preparing for their garden party, a poor laborer is killed in an accident. Young Laura is sent to take the widow and orphans the cakes left over from the party; the experience makes her see her own life in a new light for a moment. The reality of the outer world has intruded suddenly and violently upon the delicate artifice she has known as life.

Gardner, Erle Stanley (1889– ). American writer of detective stories. One of the most successful writers of crime detection in the history of American publishing, Gardner, who has written over 100 books, usually employs two sleuths: the lawyer Perry Mason, hero of a long series that began with The Case of the Velvet Claus (1933), and Douglas Selby, who appears in The D.A. Calls It Murder (1944). Using the pseudonym A. A. Fair, Gardner has also created the engaging Donald Lam and Bertha Cool, who are featured in Pass the Gravy (1959) and other works.

Gareth, Sir. In Arthurian legend, one of the knights of the Round Table. In Malory’s Morte d’Arthur (c. 1469) he is the youngest son of King Lot and Margawse. His mother, to deter him from entering Arthur’s court, says jestingly that she will consent to his doing so only if he conceals his name and goes as a scullion for 12 months. He agrees to this, and Sir Kay, the king’s steward, nicknames him “Beamains,” because his hands are unusually fine and large. At the end of the year he is knighted, and obtains his first quest when Linet begs the aid of some knight to liberate her sister Liones held prisoner by Sir Ironside in Castle Perilous. Linet treats Sir Gareth with great contempt, calling him a washer of dishes and a kitchen knave, but he overthrows five knights and frees Liones, whom he marries. Tennyson retells the story in Gareth and Lynette in his Idylls of the King (1839–1872).

While rescuing Queen Guinevere from death at the stake, Sir Lancelot unwittingly kills Sir Gareth, who is standing guard, and thus evokes the woe of revenge from Gareth’s brothers that ultimately effects the downfall of King Arthur’s court and the end of the Round Table. See Sir Gawain.

Gargamelle. In Rabelais’ Gargantua and Pantagruel, the daughter of the king of the Parpaillons (Fr., “butterflies”), wife of Grandgousier and mother of Gargantua. In the eleventh month of her pregnancy she goes into labor as a result of eating too much tripe and, after taking an astringent, gives birth to Gargantua through her left ear.

Gargantua (Sp., “gullet“). The name of a giant-hero in medieval folk literature, whom Rabelais made the father of Pantagruel in his satire Gargantua and Pantagruel. He figures in four of the five books, but as a major character only in La Vie inestimable du grand Gargantua, père de Pantagruel (1534), which is now known as Book I.

Son of Grandgousier and Gargamelle, Gargantuá miraculously enters the world through Gargamelle’s left ear, shouting “Drink, drink, drink!” The narrative continues in a similar vein, recounting his extraordinary childhood and adolescence; his trip to Paris on his famous mare, whose tail switches so violently that she fells the entire forest of Orleans; his lawsuit over stealing the bells of Notre Dame Cathedral to hang around his mare’s neck; his en-cyclopedic course of studies in Paris; his defense of his father's lands against the assaults of Picacho; and his founding of the abbey of Thélème at the war's end. Apart from the bufoonery, the work also provides a biting and realistic satire on various aspects of contemporary society—monasticism, scholastic education, the legalistic pedantry of the theologians at the Sorbonne—and on the causes and effects of tyrannical power. It vividly describes student life in the Latin Quarter of Paris, and provincial life and manners in Rabelais' native Chinon. It contrasts antiquated educational programs with the humanistic studies that were just coming into prominence; despotism with intelligent, humane government; and oppressive monasticism with healthy living.

Gargantua and Pantagruel (1532–1564). The English title for a 5-part satirical work by François Rabelais. Derived in part from the medieval fabliaux, it was published as follows:

Les Horribles et espoirables faits et procès du tres renommé Pantagruel, Roy des Dipsodes, fils du grand géant Gargantua (1532), later known as Book II, recounts the life of Pantagruel up to the war against the Dipsodes in Utopia.

La Vie inestimable du grand Gargantua, père de Pantagruel (1534), which is now known as Book I, describes the life of Gargantua through the founding of the abbey of Thélème.

Le Tiers Livre des faicts et dictz heroïques du noble Pantagruel (Book III, 1546) presents a discussion of the problem faced by Pantagruel's companion Panurge, who cannot decide whether or not to marry. Pantagruel accompanies Panurge as the latter consults a sibyl, a muse, a poet, an astrologer, a theologian, a physician, a philosopher, and a madman, none of whom can provide a solution. Panurge then persuades Pantagruel and his friends to embark on a voyage to the Oracle of the Holy Bottle for the answer. The book is rich in humanistic learning in the fields of divination, botany, and moral philosophy; at the same time it satirizes poets, judges, fortune-tellers, etc.

Le Quat’ Livre (Book IV, 1552), which relates the departure for the Holy Bottle in Cathay, reflects the keen interests of the period in the great voyages of discovery. Although in Book II, Pantagruel had reached Utopia by sailing around the Cape of Good Hope, this time the voyagers follow the North Atlantic route taken by the French explorer Jacques Cartier. Pantagruel and his companions visit several islands, where they meet the Papimaniacs, the Pope-Fish, and other peoples who serve as targets for Rabelais' satirical thrusts against contemporary society. Like its predecessors, this book was condemned by the Sorbonne for its attacks on the Church.

The posthumous Cinquième et dernier livre (Book V, 1564), which includes L'île Sonante, is probably not entirely of Rabelais' authorship. Most modern scholars believe it was published by an imitator who developed sketches and drafts left by Rabelais. As the voyage to Cathay continues, Rabelais launches into a violent satire on religious and legal institutions. (See Furby, L. C. C.) At last Pantagruel and his friends arrive at the temple of the Holy Bottle, where the oracle answers Panurge's question by a single word, "Drink!" This reply has been taken to mean that each man must eventually solve his own problems and that life's aim is a never-ending quest for knowledge, from which comes wisdom.

Rabelais was a man of his time who delighted in satirizing the religious, political, legal, and social institutions and practices of 16th-century France. He displayed a characteristically Renaissance thirst for erudition, but he also exalted the development of all human faculties, in accordance with his basic belief that human nature is fundamentally good. His universal genius reached far beyond his own century and has influenced numerous later writers, including La Fontaine, Molière, Voltaire, Swift, Balzac, Hugo, and Gautier.

Caribaldi, Giuseppe (1807–1882). Italian patriot. An ardent republican and associate of Mazzini, he was forced to flee from Italy because of his political activities and lived in South America (1834–1848). On his return he served in the army of the short-lived Roman Republic and upon its defeat made a dramatic retreat through central Italy. He escaped to the U.S. (1850–1854), where he became a naturalized citizen and worked for a while as a candle-maker on Staten Island. Returning to his native land, in order to secure the unification of Italy, he swore allegiance to King Victor Emmanuel of Sardinia. After taking part in the war against Austria, he invaded the so-called Kingdom of the Two Sicilies with his famous band of 1,000 men known as the Red Shirts. After the conquest of Sicily, he crossed to the mainland and drove Francis II from Naples. When the Sicilian king capitulated and Victor Emmanuel was proclaimed king of Italy (1861), Garibaldi withdrew to his farm in Caperna. He later led two unsuccessful expeditions of liberation against Rome and fought on behalf of the French republic in the Franco-Prussian War. On his statue on the Janiculum overlooking Rome is engraved his famous cry, Roma o morte ("Rome or Death").

Garigliano, battle of (1503). The meeting at which the Spanish forces defeated the French armies in a struggle over possession of the kingdom of Naples, to which both laid claims.

Garland, [Hannibal] Hamlin (1860–1940). American short-story writer and novelist. Garland is best known for his realistic studies of the hardships and frustrations of farm life in the Middle West. Born in Wisconsin, Garland went to Boston and became a friend of William Dean Howells and others in the Boston literary circle. In 1887 he returned to the Midwest, where the barren and difficult lives of the farmers impressed him as being the stuff of fiction. Influenced by the realism of Howells and the single-tax ideas of Henry George, he began to write the stories and sketches published in Main-Traveled Roads. Other stories were collected in Prairie Folk (1892) and Wayside Courtships (1897), later published under the single title, Other Main-Traveled Roads (1910). Always interested in social reform, Garland's novels of the period centered around political corruption: Jason Edwards (1892), A Member of the Third House (1892), and A Spoil of Office (1892). In 1894 Garland issued his famous manifest, Crumbling Idols, a group of essays calling for the repudiation of any imitation of past masters. Garland called his brand of realism "veritism," a concern for truth which emphasized local color, impressionism, and an art which is basically "sociologic." Although he was seldom able to live up to his own precepts, Garland influenced other writers, notably Stephen Crane.

_A Little Norsk_ (1892) and _Rose of Dutcher's Cooly_ (1895) both dealt with the drudgery of farm life. Garland then turned to writing novels about the Indians and the Far West. _The Captain of the Gray Horse_ (1902), which contains an appeal for justice to the Indians, is the most famous of these. _Cavanaugh, Forest Ranger_ (1910) was also very popular. Garland also wrote four autobiographical narratives, the first two of which were _A Son of the Middle Border_ and the Pulitzer Prize-winning _A Daughter of the Middle Border_ (1921).

_Garneau, François Xavier_ (1809–1866). Canadian historian and poet. Garneau is best known for his four-volume _Histoire du Canada_ (1845–1852), the first major literary achievement by a French-Canadian author.

_Garnett, David_ (1892– ). English novelist, son of Edward and Constance Garnett. He wrote fantasies, including _Lady into Fox_ and _A Man at the Zoo_ (1924), and the delicate, odd love story, _Aspects of Love_ (1955). Garnett also published autobiographies which include accounts of his father's Bloomsbury life, beginning with _The Golden Echo_ (1953). He also edited _The Letters of T. E. Lawrence_ (1938) and _The Essential T. E. Lawrence_ (1951). Other recent works include _A Shot in the Dark_ (1958), _A Net for Venus_ (1959), and _The Familiar Faces_ (1962).

_Garnett, Edward_ (1868–1937). English critic, biographer, and essayist. He was the son of Richard Garnett. The best-known publisher's reader in London, he encouraged and helped to publicize such writers as Joseph Conrad, John Galsworthy, and D. H. Lawrence. His wife, Constance Garnett (1862–1946), was renowned for her translations of Dostoevski and other Russian authors, much of whose work she made available to English readers for the first time.

_Garnier, Robert_ (1544–1590). French dramatist. A fervent Catholic, he was concerned with restoring morality and faith during the religious wars. His own conviction expressed itself in the most lyrical and successful tragic verse dramas written in France before the great period of 17th-century French tragedy. His tragic-comedy _Bradamante_ and tragedy _Les Juives_ (1983) are the high points of French Renaissance theater.

_Garratt, the mayor of_. Garratt is in England, near Earlsfield, Wimbledon; the first "mayor" was elected there in 1778. He was really the chairman of an association of villagers formed to put a stop to encroachments on the public common, and as his election coincided with a general election, the society made it a law that a new "mayor" should be chosen at every general election. These elections gave rise to several satirical _Addresses by the Mayors of Garratt_, and Samuel Foote wrote a farce on the subject entitled _The Mayor of Garratt_.

_Garrick, David_ (1717–1779). English actor and theater manager. He was educated in Lichfield and went to London with Samuel Johnson, his teacher and friend. He and his brother started a wine business, but were unsuccessful. Garrick turned to acting and his quick success enabled him to buy part of the patent for Drury Lane; his career as manager began in 1747. He did much to revive Shakespeare's popularity and wrote many theater pieces himself—largely farces and light comedies.

_Garrison, William Lloyd_ (1805–1879). American abolitionist. In 1831 Garrison founded _The Liberator_, a weekly newspaper in which he denounced slavery and slaveholders with such vehemence that he was nearly killed by a Boston mob in 1835. He sought complete and immediate freedom for the slaves and demanded that the North repudiate its ties with the South, condemning the Constitution as "a convenant with death and an agreement with hell." _The Liberator_ ceased publication in 1865 after the passage of the 13th amendment to the Constitution, which abolished slavery.

_Garter, the Most Noble Order of_. The highest order of knighthood in Great Britain, instituted by Edward III on April 23, 1349. St. George is considered its special patron, and it is sometimes called the Order of St. George. Originally limited to 25 knights in addition to the king, it was reorganized and expanded in 1831 to include the Prince of Wales and to provide for the admittance of other members of the royal family, as well as of foreign royalty. The emblem of the order is a blue garter bearing the words _Honi soit qui mal y pense_.

The story is that Joan, countess of Salisbury, while dancing with the King, let fall her garter, and the gallant Edward, perceiving a smile on the faces of the courtiers, picked it up, bound it round his knee, and exclaimed, "Honi soit qui mal y pense." ("Evil to him who evil thinks.") The blue garter and the motto of the order are thus accounted for.

_Garth, Sir Samuel_ (1661–1719). English physician and poet. His best-known work is _The Dispensary_ (1699), a mock-heroic poem satirizing apothecaries. He was also a member of the Kit-Cat Club.

_Garuda_. In Hindu mythology, a supernatural being, half man and half bird, with golden body and red wings. Vishnu rides on Garuda.

_Gas_. The general name given to a loose trilogy of plays by Georg Kaiser: _Die Koralle (The Coral_, 1917), _Gas I_ (1918) and _Gas II_ (1920). Taken together, they constitute a monumental indictment of the overmechanization in modern society.

The hero of The Coral, who is called the Billionaire, has risen to the highest possible position in industry, but is nonetheless constantly tormented by memories of his unhappy childhood. In an attempt to escape himself, he murders the Secretary, who is his double, and acquires the little piece of coral that symbolizes the latter's identity. Though he is executed for the crime, he still feels a kind of exhilaration at having broken clear of his rut. In Gas I, the Billionaire's son has taken over the plant which is now producing the gas that drives all other industry. The machinery fails, however, and there is a huge explosion that brings the son to his senses and prompts him to offer the workers land instead of a new gas plant, to offer them mastery over themselves rather than new enslavement to the machine. But the Engineer persuades the workers to rebuild the plant, and the Billionaire's son is killed in an ensuing riot. In Gas II, the final volume, the state has taken over the gas plant and is using it to fight a war. The workers attempt to make peace with the enemy, but fail; and the Great Engineer then persuades them to produce and use his new superweapon, a gas bomb. The device is detonated, and the play ends in a vision of total annihilation.

Gascar, Pierre. Pen name of Pierre Fournier (1916— ). French fiction writer, journalist. His prisoner-of-war experiences inspired the cruel realism of his short novel The Season of the Dead. The novel was published with the six brutal allegories of The Animals (both 1953) in Beasts and Men. His travels as a journalist, which produced the reports Chine ouverte (1955) and Voyages chez les vivants (1958), also inspired the novel The Coral Barrier (1958), set against the racism and colonialism of Italian Somaliland. The Seed (1959) recalls his own boyhood in a provincial factory town.

Gascoigne, George (1557/59—1632). English poet, playwright, and prose writer. Gascoigne was educated at Cambridge, studied law, and was elected a member of Parliament (1577/79). In 1566 he produced at Gray's Inn The Supposes, a prose adaptation of Ariosto's comedy Gli Supposti, and the first prose comedy in English. This was followed by the blank-verse tragedy Jocasta, written in collaboration with Francis Kinwelmersh and adapted from a play by Euripides. Military adventures took Gascoigne away from England for three years, during which time a collection of his verse and other writings appeared. Called A Hundred Sundry Flowers (1572) and published without his permission, it caused a mild sensation, and Gascoigne himself published an enlarged edition in 1575. The same year appeared his "tragicomedy" A Glass of Government. In July of 1575 he accompanied the party of Queen Elizabeth visiting Kenilworth Castle, where he was commissioned by Leicester to write verses and masques for entertainment. The Prizzly Pleasures at the Court of Kenilworth (1576) contains some of his writings for that occasion. His blank verse satire The Steel Glass (1576) is one of the first satires in English; it was prefixed by a commendatory sonnet by Sir Walter Raleigh—the first of his poems to appear in print. In 1577 Gascoigne dedicated to Elizabeth a collection of moral elegies called The Grief of Joy. He was the stepfather of Nicholas Breton, and is considered one of the leading men of letters during the period before Spenser and after Wyatt and Surrey.

Gaskell, Elizabeth Cleghorn (1810–1865). English novelist. She is known for her depictions of English country life and for her pioneering studies of conflicts between capital and labor in Victorian industrialism. In the former class are the novels Cranford and Wives and Daughters (1864–1866), which show a fine degree of observation and characterization. Her social novels, chiefly Mary Barton and North and South (1855), are notable for their sympathetic portrayal of the oppressed laboring classes in mid-19th-century England. She herself lived mainly in Manchester, a center of the depressed regions. Mrs. Gaskell was the friend of many literary figures in England, including Charlotte Brontë, whose biography she wrote in 1857, and George Eliot, whose work she influenced. Among her other books Ruth (1853) and Sylvia's Lovers (1863) are worthy of notice.

Gaspar or Caspar (the white one). One of the three Magi. His offering to the infant Jesus was frankincense, in token of divinity. At some point in medieval dramatic presentations of the nativity, he became a comic figure. He soon degenerated in Germany into Casperl, a popular comic servant who appeared in puppet shows, notably the Faust play, in which he is Faust's servant.

Gaspé, Philippe Aubert de (1786–1871). Canadian novelist. Gaspé was high sheriff of the district of Quebec for many years until forced to withdraw from public life because of business difficulties and debts. At the age of 76 he published Les anciens canadiens (The Canadians of Old, 1863), a historical romance considered a classic of French-Canadian literature. His Mémoires (1866) is a collection of notes and hints for historians.

Gassendi, Pierre (1596–1655). French philosopher and mathematician. An opponent of the mechanistic world view of Descartes and an advocate of the atomistic theory of Epicurus, Gassendi wrote works on mathematics and philosophy, as well as lives of the astronomers Copernicus, Regiomontanus, and Tycho Brahe. Appointed professor of mathematics at the Collège de France in 1645, he achieved influence in learned and literary circles, and is said to have numbered Molière and Chapelie among his disciples.

gate of horn and ivory gate. In Greek mythology, the two gates of the abode of Sleep. Through them dreams come forth. Those passing through the gate of horn are true.

Gates, Horatio (1728?–1806). American general. At the time he was given credit for repulsing Burgoyne's army at Saratoga (1777), though modern historians maintain that the victory was due at least as much to Benedict Arnold. After suffering a serious defeat at Camden, S.C. (1780), Gates was relieved of his command. See Conway Cabal.

Gatomaquia (The Battle of the Cats, 1634). A mock-heroic poem by Lope de Vega. Notable for its biting irony and wit, this burlesque of the Italian epic deals with the romantic affairs of the cat Zapaquilda and her two suitors, Marramaquid and Micifuf.

Gattamelata (It., Honeyed Cat). The popular cognomen of a notorious Italian condottiere, Erasmo da Narni, who fought mainly for the Venetian republic and died in 1443. His equestrian statue, the work of Donatello, still stands before the church of Saint Anthony in Padua.

gaucho literature. A term used to describe literary works dealing with the gaucho, or outlaw cattle hunter, of the Rio de la Plata region of South America. In many works of this type he is treated realistically, and some writers, notably Sarmiento in his Facundo, decried his influence on the national life of Argentina and Uruguay. Elsewhere, however, he emerges as a romantic symbol of a pure and uncomplicated past.

The literary manifestations of gaucho folklore sprang from the extemporaneous songs of the gaucho minstrels known as payadores. One of the first writers to compose a literary work on the gaucho theme was Hilario Ascasubi (1807–1875), author of Santos Vega (1851; 1872), a poem narrated by the payador Santos Vega, a familiar figure in Gaucho legend. The work is notable for the author's careful description of rural life and setting and for his use of authentic gaucho terminology. Fausto (1866) by Estatico del Campo (1834–1880) is a mock-epic in which a gaucho who has witnessed a performance of Faust describes the action in his own crude language. The outstanding example of gaucho poetry is probably Martín Fierro, whose title character is drawn in heroic proportions.

Among the first prose writers to concentrate on the gaucho was Eduardo Gutiérrez. (1853–1890) whose "thrillers," especially Juan Moreira (1880), demonstrated the vitality of the genre. Gutiérrez' dramatization (1884) of his work was extremely successful, and the gaucho soon became a familiar theatrical character, notably in the plays of Florencio Sánchez.

Soledad (1894) by Eduardo Acevedo Díaz is generally considered the prototype of later gaucho novels. Other novelists concerned with the subject were the Uruguayans Javier de Viana (1872–1926), author of the naturalistic Gaucho (1899), and Justino Zavala Muniz (1897–1980) and the Argentine Benito Lynch, whose Romance de un gaucho (1930) is written entirely in gaucho idiom. Guiraldes' Don Segundo Sombra, an able synthesis of American material and European technique, is widely regarded as the finest gaucho novel.

Gaudeamus igitur (Lat. "Therefore let us rejoice"). The first words of a Latin student song of German origin. The words date from 1267, the tune is 18th century. It is quoted by Brahms in the Academic Festival Overture.

Gauden, John. See Eikon Basilike.

Gaugin, [Éugène Henri] Paul (1848–1903). French painter. One of the most remarkable figures in modern painting, in 1883 he abandoned his job as a brokerage clerk, and the support of his family, in order to devote himself to painting. Poor and restless, he traveled, visiting Vincent Van Gogh in Arles and finally settling out for Tahiti in 1891. He returned to France only once and spent the rest of his life in the South Pacific, living among the natives. Gaugin developed a very decorative, highly original, personal style consisting of simplified forms and generally flat planes limited by a sinuous line and the use of brilliant, pure, unmixed color exaggerated to the point at which a reddish tinge in the foliage becomes pure vermilion, sand pink, and tree trunks blue. Gaugin's painting, especially his color, had great influence on later artists, notably on Henri Matisse and the expressionists. He himself left an autobiographical account of his life on Tahiti, Noa Noa (1897), while W. Somerset Maugham's novel The Moon and Sixpence (1919) is a reconstruction in fictional terms of the whole of Gaugin's life.

Gau (Lat., Gallia; hence, the English adjective Gallic). In classical geography the territory that comprises modern France and Belgium and part of northern Italy, Cisalpine Gaul, that is, Gaul on this (the Italian) side of the Alps, extended almost as far south as Florence. Transalpine Gaul, that is, Gaul beyond the Alps, included all the Gallic, German, and Celtic tribes from the Rhine to the Pyrenees. Gaul has been used as a literary name for modern France.

gauntlet, to run the. To be attacked on all sides, to be severely criticized. The word came into English at the time of the Thirty Years' War as gantlope, meaning the passage between two files of soldiers, and is the Swedish gata, a way, passage and lopp (connected with our leap), a course. The reference is to a punishment formerly common among soldiers and sailors; the company or crew, provided with rope ends, were drawn up in two rows facing each other, and the delinquent had to run between them, while every man dealt him as severe a chastisement as he could.

"To throw down the gauntlet" means to challenge. The custom in the Middle Ages, when one knight challenged another, was for the challenger to throw his gauntlet on the ground, and if the challenge was accepted the person to whom it was thrown picked it up.

Gautama. The personal name of Buddha. His family name was Siddhartha, his father's name Suddhodana, and his mother's Maya. Buddha means the enlightened, the one who knows. He assumed this title at about the age of 36, when, after seven years of seclusion and spiritual struggle, he believed himself to have attained the perfect Truth.

Gauthier, Marguerite. See Dame aux Camelias, L.A.

Gautier, Théophile (1811–1872). French poet and novelist. The early poems and prose tales of Gautier move in the realm of the fantastic and the macabre. In his later poetry, however, Gautier stresses perfection of form and achieves a carefully polished beauty. His emphasis on form and his doctrine of l'art pour l'art (art for art's sake) make him a forerunner of the Parnassian school. Gautier's poetry includes Poésies (1830); Albertus (1832), a fantastic narrative poem; La Comédie des Mort (1833), another long poem dealing with the sensual and the ideal; and Emprunts et Camées (1855), considered the best example of his pure, minutely chiseled style (the Parnassians). Among Gautier's novels and tales are Les Jeune-France (1833), Mille de Maupin (1835), La Lettaturs (1856), and Le Captaine Fracasse (1861–1863).
Gawain, Sir. In ARTHURIAN LEGEND, one of the knights of the Round Table, nephew (in some versions, cousin) of King Arthur, and probably the original hero of the GRAIL quest. One of the earliest figures in the legends of Arthur, he appears in the Welsh Triads and the Mabinogion as Gwalchmei. He is the central figure in two major 14th-century English works: The Alliterative Morte d'Arthur and Sir GAWAIN AND THE GREEN KNIGHT. He is known as “the Courteous” and is first represented as the flower of chivalrous knighthood, but later writers (including Malory) downgraded him. In Malory’s Morte d’Arthur (c. 1469) he is the son of King Lot and Queen MARGAWSE. He is King Arthur’s favorite cousin and one of the most outstanding of the Round Table knights. He avenges the death of his father by killing King Pellinore, kills Sir LAMEKOK, who is the lover of his mother, and kills his cousin Sir Uwayne, who is the son of Morgan Le Fay. Then, when Sir Launcelot unwittingly kills his youngest brother, Sir GARETH, Sir Gawain swears revenge. Twice he challenges Sir Launcelot to single combat at the siege of Beinwic, and the second time is fatally wounded by that great knight who so unwillingly fought him. Returning to Britain, Sir Gawain dies, but not before repenting and writing a letter of reconciliation to Sir Launcelot.

Gay, John (1685–1732). English poet and playwright. A friend of Alexander Pope, he is known for his pungent satire and contemporary realism. The Beggar’s Opera, a satire of Sir Robert Walpole and the court of George II, won him enduring fame. Among his other works are Rural Sports (1713), a poem dedicated to Pope; The Shepherd’s Week (1714), six pastoral works written partly to parody the pastoralists of Ambrose Philips; Trivia, or the Art of Walking the Streets of London (1716), a humorous but realistic depiction of the grotesque aspects of 18th-century London; Polly, a sequel to The Beggar’s Opera, which was suppressed until 1777 because of the virulence of its political satire; and Fables (1727–1738) a collection of 66 tales, the last 16 of which were published posthumously. In the 18th century, these last rivalled The Beggar’s Opera in popularity. See John Rich.

Gay-Lussac, Joseph Louis (1778–1850). French chemist and physicist. Gay-Lussac made the first balloon ascent for purposes of scientific investigation. He discovered hydrosulphuric and oxchloric acids, and his name is associated with the law of volumes, or Gay-Lussac’s law, concerning the proportions in which gases combine.

Gay Science. A translation of gai saber, the old Provencal name for the art of poetry. A guild called the Gai Saber was formed at Toulouse in 1323 with the object of keeping in existence the dying Provencal language and culture. Its full title was “The Very Gay Company of the Seven Troubadours of Toulouse.”

Gaza, Theodore (d. 1475). Greek scholar. Born in Salonika, he was one of the first Greek scholars to arrive in Italy to help stimulate the revival of classical studies during the RENAISSANCE. He taught at Ferrara and in Rome, under the patronage of Pope Nicholas V.

Ce or Gaea. In Greek mythology the personification of the Earth. She is the offspring of Chaos, or at least comes into being after it. Uranus is both her child and husband. Their children, besides such things as seas and mountains are the Titans and Cyclopes. After her separation from Uranus she bore the Erinyes and Giants, being fertilized by the blood from his castration. Later she gave birth to Typhon, whose father was Tarutaros.

Geb. In Egyptian religion, the god of earth, represented in human form, with beard and staff and a goose on his head. He was the husband of his sister Nut, the sky goddess, with whom he fathered Isis and Osiris.

Geber or Jabir (Arab., Jabir ibn Hayyan; fl. 721–776). An Arabian alchemist, born at Thous, in Persia. He wrote in the usual mystical jargon of the period several treatises on the art of making gold, which led to the creation of the word gibberish in imitation of his name.

Geburt der Tragödie aus dem Geiste der Musik, Die. See BIRTH OF TRAGEDY FROM THE SPIRIT OF MUSIC, THE.

Geddes, Norman Bel (1893–1958). American stage and industrial designer. He made his reputation with his first production, Nijinsky, in 1916. Thereafter he designed well over 200 theatrical productions; his settings for Max Reinhardt’s The Miracle (1923) attracted particular attention. He also produced designs for ships, offices, and furniture, and devised a scheme for automobile highways described in his book Magic Motorways (1940).

geese, Capitoline. See CAPITOLINE GEESE.

Gehenna. The New Testament name for the Valley of Hinnom surrounding Jerusalem. It is the place of eternal torment, the “valley of slaughter” (Jer. 19:6) where sacrifices to Baal and Moloch were offered. See TopheT.

Geibel, Emanuel (1815–1884). German poet, capable of classicistic elegance in style, but not known as a creator or innovator. Besides lyrics, he produced several dramas, including a tragedy Brunhild (1858).

Geijerstam, Gustaf af (1858–1909). Swedish novelist and playwright. Such early novels as Gra- kalst (1882), Fattigt folk (1884), and Erik Grane (1885) were gloomy naturalistic studies that delved into abnormal psychology. In his later works, however—Minapokar (My Boys, 1896) and Boken om lille-bror (The Book About Little Brother, 1900), for example—Geijerstam waxed sentimental and domestic. His popular folk plays include Svärfar (1888), Aldrig i lifvet (1891), and Per Olsson och hans käring (1894).

geisha. A Japanese professional singing and dancing girl. Hence, especially in Western misconception, a licensed prostitute.

Gelber, Jack (1932– ). American playwright. His first play, The Connection (1959), with its minutely realistic depiction of drug addiction, its stretches of obscenity and junkie argot, and its improvised jazz assault upon the audience, came to be regarded as an important expression of the generation who grew up in the 1950’s. Gelber’s second play, The Apple (1961), carried the attack on conventional dramaturgy and on the spectator even further and was received with mingled admiration and distaste. As in The Connection, the actors mingled with the audience between the acts, a device pioneered by Eugene O'Neill in Marco Millions.

Gélée, Jacquesmart. See under Reynard the Fox.

Gelli, Giambattista (1498-1563). Florentine shoemaker and amateur moral philosopher. Gelli’s aim in writing his treatises was to popularize learning for his fellow artisans. His Circe (1549), in 10 dialogues, had already been translated into English by 1570. He also wrote 20 short lives of Florentine artists and gave lectures on Dante and Petrarch at the Florentine Academy.

Gemara (Aram., “complement”). The 2nd part of the Talmud. It consists of annotations, discussions, and amplifications of the Mishnah, which is the first part. The Mishnah is the interpretation of the written law, the Gemara is the interpretation of the Mishnah. There is a Babylonian Gemara and a Palestinian Gemara. The former, which is the more complete, is by the academies of Babylon, and was finished by the sixth century; the latter, compiled in Palestine, was completed at the close of the fourth century.

Generación del 98. A group of Spanish writers of the early 20th century. Profoundly affected by the outcome of the Spanish American War (1898), they probed deeply into Spanish life and institutions in order to find the reasons for their country’s disastrous defeat. Members of the group included José Martínez Ruiz, Eduardo Marquina, Antonio Machado, Ramón Pérez de Ayala, Juan Ramón Jiménez, Jacinto Benavente, the brothers Álvarez Quintero, Ramón Valle-Inclán, Flo Baroja, and Miguel de Unamuno. Their goal was the betterment of Spanish life through education and opposition to bossism and to clericalism. In literature the movement advocated simplicity of style, the discarding of exaggeration, international rather than purely Spanish inspiration, the exalting of the countryside, and a contempt for patterns—“it was felt that the pattern of life itself should be sought by playwrights and novelists.”

General William Booth Enters into Heaven (1913). A poem by Vachel LINDSAY. Written after the death of the leader of the Salvation Army, it was first published in Poetry. It is written in the rhythmic drumbeats of a Salvation Army band, and is intended to be sung to the music of Washed in the Blood of the Lamb.

Genesis (Gr., “origin”). The 1st book of the Old Testament. In Hebrew, it is called Bereishith, “In the beginning,” from the initial words of the text.

The first 11 chapters deal with the early days of the creation of the world; the remaining (12-50) are an account of the patriarchs of Israel: Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Joseph.

Genét, Edmond Charles Edouard (1763-1834). French diplomat in the U.S. as minister of the First Republic, “Citizen” Genét hoped to draw the U.S. into France’s war against England and Spain. Attacking the government for its policy of neutrality, he sought to create a change of presidential attitude through popular agitation. He also commissioned privateers in American ports to prey upon English ocean commerce. He was recalled on the insistence of Washington, but meanwhile the Girondists—his faction of moderate republicans ruling the First Assembly—had fallen from power, and he lived for the rest of his life on Long Island.

Genêt, Jean (1910-- ). French dramatist, and essayist. A professional thief who had served a number of jail sentences, he was freed by the intervention of Jean Paul Sartre and Jean Cocteau. His plays reveal a concern with the illusory nature of reality, particularly with the ambiguous definitions of good and evil in a society characterized by repression and hypocrisy. Of all the dramatists of the absurd, Genêt probes most deeply into the inner self: its dreams, illusions, deceptions, and bitterly frustrated longings. Among his stylized, lurid, and nightmarishly disillusioning plays are: The Maids, Deathwatch (Haute Surveillance; 1949), The Balcony, and The Blacks (Les Nègres; 1958). His other works include the prose Our Lady of the Flowers (Notre-Dame des Fleurs; 1949), The Thief’s Journal (Journal de voleur; 1949, with a preface by Sartre), and Poèmes (1948).

Geneva. The capital of the Swiss canton of Geneva. Situated on the Lake of Geneva, or Lac Leman, it was a center of the Reformation under Calvin (1536-1564). It was also the birthplace of Jean Jacques Rousseau. It served as the seat of the League of Nations after World War I.

Geneva Bible. See BIBLE, ENGLISH VERSIONS.

Geneva convention. An agreement made by the European powers at Geneva (1864; supplemented 1868). It established humane regulations for the treatment of disabled soldiers in war. It was revised and brought into accord with modern methods of warfare in 1906 and has since been ratified by almost every country.

Genevieve (earlier Genovefa) of Brabant. Heroine of an old German folk tale, wife of Count Palatine Siegfried of Treves. Their majordomo Golo falsely accuses her of infidelity during the absence of Siegfried, who orders her killed. But the executioner allows her to escape into the forest, where she lives with her infant son, nourished by a doe. Siegfried learns of his error, and six years later, when he discovers the hiding place by chance while pursuing the doe, they are reunited.

Genghis (Jenghiz) Khan (1162-1227). A Mongol emperor. Named Temujin, by his father, who died when the boy was 13 years old, he took the title by which he is commonly remembered, and which means “perfect warrior.” Genghis, with the aid of his mother, quickly regained the supremacy of the allied tribes who had defected after his father’s death, and then proceeded to extensive conquests. He took vast territories in north China, then moved westward through Iran and Iraq, subduing nations wherever he passed. He pillaged considerable sections of India as well. Genghis’ generals ravaged considerable parts of Russia before returning to their homeland.

Barbarously cruel, Genghis was one of the most brilliant generals of history. His successors, however, could not hold his vast empire together, and it lasted only a fairly short period. (See Tamerlane.) His conquests, nevertheless, had far-reaching effects on history, for they set in motion a chain of events that led to the westward invasions of the Turks and helped to establish the Ottoman Empire. See Kublai Khan; Golden Horde.

Génie du Christianisme, Le (The Genius of Christianity, 1802). A treatise on Christianity by François René de Chateaubriand. The author extols Christianity, describing it as the great force that develops the soul of man, and citing it as the chief source of progress in the modern world. This work, not only won great popular approval for Chateaubriand, but also earned him the good will of Napoleon.

genii or ginn. See Jinn.

Genius (pl. Genii). In Roman mythology, the spirit that presides over the birth of every man and attends him throughout his life. (Women had no individual Genii, but were under the general protection of Juno.) The Genius, as the individual life-principle, was especially honored on a man's birthday; considered as one's higher self, it was also called to witness a man's oath. There were also corporate Genii: Genii of the family, the tribe, and the nation. Under the empire, the Genius of the emperor was worshiped throughout the Roman World. Moral philosophers, seeking to explain moral conflict within human nature, posited an opposing, evil Genius. In Christian times these two Genii became the guardian angel and his diabolical counterpart.

"Genius," The (1915). A novel by Theodore Dreiser. The hero of this semi-autobiographical work is Eugene Witla, a Middle Western artist, who becomes the art director of a large magazine corporation, has numerous love affairs, attains financial and social success, and marries Angela, who dies in childbirth. Witla himself suffers a breakdown but recovers his health and devotes himself thereafter to painting and to the care of his daughter. According to Helen Dreiser, in her book My Life with Dreiser (1951), Witla is a composite of three real persons: the artist Everett Shinn, an art editor whom Dreiser knew, and Dreiser himself.

Genronku. The name of a Japanese era (1688-1703). The greatest flowering of Japanese literature and culture during the Tokugawa period (1600-1868) occurred during this era. See Chikamatsu Monzaemon, Matsuo Bashō, and Ihara Saikaku.

genteel tradition. A term first used by George Santayana. In The Gentile Tradition at Bay (1931), he applied it to those American writers at the close of the 19th century who upheld traditional social, moral, and literary standards, emphasizing correctness and conventionality. Among these writers were Richard Henry Stoddard, Bayard Taylor, Edmund Clarence Stedman, and Thomas Bailey Aldrich. Santayana associated the term with New England, and attacked the later flowering of the genteel attitude in Paul Elmer More, Irving Babitt, and the New Humanism.

Gentle Craft, The. A tale by Thomas Deloney (1597), celebrating shoemakers and their craft. Part I deals with St. Hugh, the patron saint of cobblers, and St. Winifred. Part II tells of St. Crispin and St. Crispinian, also patron saints of cobblers. Part III, the best-known section of the story, gives an account of Simon Eyre, the shoemaker Lord Mayor of London.

Gentleman from Indiana, The (1899). A novel by Booth Tarkington. The hero is John Harkless, the young editor of a country newspaper in Indiana, who fights courageously against political corruption and is eventually elected to Congress.

Gentlemen's Magazine, The. An English periodical, founded in 1731 by Edward Cave, a printer at St. John's Gate, Clerkenwell. It was the first periodical to call itself a "magazine." The publication was at first a miscellany of essays extracted from weekly journals, together with a systematic chronicle of current news. Samuel Johnson was a regular contributor and an editor in the early 1740's, and, under his direction, the extracts were largely replaced by original matter. The magazine was issued until 1914.

Gentlemen Prefer Blondes (1925). A humorous novel by Anita Loos. Subtitled "The Illuminating Diary of a Professional Lady," it tells the story of Lorelei Lee, a good-looking but not very intelligent girl, who manages to do very well for herself with Mr. Gus Eisman, the Button King. A satire on "the gold-diggers" of Hollywood, the book had an enormous vogue, though rumor has it that some fraction of its popularity may be ascribed to the fact that it was taken seriously by girls who thought it a useful handbook on how to get rich.

Geoffrey of Monmouth (c. 1100-c. 1155). Medieval English historian. A canon at Oxford, he wrote the important Latin prose History of the Kings of Britain (Historia Regum Britanniae), one of the sources of the Arthurian legend and of considerable literary influence. He is considered to be the creator of the heroic image of King Arthur.

George, St. The patron saint of England since about the time of the institution of the Order of the Garter (c. 1348). He was "adopted" by Edward III. He is commemorated on April 23. St. George had been popular in England from the time of the early Crusades, for he was said to have come to the assistance of the Crusaders at Antioch (1089), and many of the Normans (under Robert, son of William the Conqueror) then took him as their patron.

That St. George is a historical character is beyond all reasonable doubt. He is now believed to have been a Cappadocian official in Diocletian’s army, martyred April 23, A.D. 303. There are various versions of his Acta, one saying that he was a tribune and that he was asked to come and subdue a dragon that infested a pond at Silene, Libya, and fed on the dwellers in the neighborhood. St. George came, rescued a princess (Sabra) whom the dragon was about to make its prey, and slew the monster after he had wounded it and the princess had led it home in triumph by her girde.

The legend of St. George and the dragon is in part a universal folk theme (see ANDROMEDA), in part an allegorical expression of the triumph of the Christian hero over evil, which St. John the Divine beheld under the image of a dragon. Similarly, St. Michael, St. Margaret, St. Sylvestre, and St. Martha are all depicted as slaying dragons; the Saviour and the Virgin as treading them under their feet; St. John the Evangelist as charming a winged dragon from a poisoned chalice given him to drink.

The legend forms the subject of an old ballad given in Percy’s Reliques. Spenser introduces St. George into his Faerie Queene as the Red Cross Knight. See KALYX.

George, Henry (1839–1897). American economist and reformer, known for his study of the problems of poverty. His most famous theory is that of the single tax, or a tax on land, which was the most important form of wealth in his day, set forth most persuasively in Progress and Poverty. Other works are The Irish Land Question (1881), Social Problems (1884), Protection and Free Trade (1885), and Science of Political Economy (1897). The Fabian Society in England and later movements for economic reform in the U.S. were influenced by George’s theories. He died while campaigning for the office of mayor of New York (for the second time) as an independent Democratic candidate.

George, Stefan (1868–1933). German poet. Strongly influenced by Nietzsche in his youth, he adopted an aristocratic doctrine of the poet as a chosen being, from which he never entirely departed; but later in his career, under the impact of World War I, he became more concerned with political reality and developed a conception of the poet as priest, with a duty not only to himself and his art, but also to his people. The poet, he believed, must preserve traditional spiritual values and prevent his people from succumbing to the excitement of wartime brutality and regarding war as an end in itself. Despite his development toward an idealistic patriotism, George’s cultural interests were always international in scope. He was a prolific translator (e.g., Baudelaire, Dante, Shakespeare, the English Pre-Raphaelites) and came into personal contact with the French symbolist poets Verlaine and Mallarmé, by whom he was strongly influenced. Of his own works, the following collections of poems are most famous: Das Jahr der Seele (The Year of the Soul, 1897), Der Stern des Bundes (The Star of the League, 1914), and Das neue Reich (The New Kingdom, 1928). His style abounds in esoteric, mystical allusions and archaic linguistic forms, and his works are rendered still less accessible by innovations in punctuation and typography. The “George-circle,” a small group of literary apostles whom he collected about himself, is credited with a major role in the critical “rediscovery” of such important German writers as Friedrich Hölderlin and Jean Paul Richter, whose works had fallen into neglect around the turn of the century. See Hugo von Hofmannsthal; Friedrich Gundolf; Karl Wolfskehl.

George’s Mother (1896). A novelette by Stephen Crane. This is the story of the mother of George Kelsey, who battles unsuccessfully against the lures of the city for her son’s allegiance. A religious woman, she dies still believing in her idealized view of George, not knowing that she has really lost. The story was early hailed for its social realism and its artful manipulation of common people and everyday events.

Georgians. A group of English poets, whose style dominated the early years of the 20th century, and who wrote poetry of nature and rustic life in the traditional manner of Wordsworth. The trend was inaugurated by John Masefield’s The Everlasting Mercy and A. E. Houseman’s Shropshire ballads; it was turned into a movement by Edward Marsh, who published the biennial anthology Georgian Poetry (1912–1922). The name reflects the accession of King George V in 1910. The chief Georgian poets were Lascelles Abercrombie, Edmund Blunden, Gordon Bottomley, Rupert Brooke, W. H. Davies, John Drinkwater, W. W. Gibson, Ralph Hodgson, Harold Monro, T. Sturge Moore, Robert Nichols, J. C. Squire, Edward Thomas, and Francis Brett Young.

Georgics (Georgics). A didactic poem in 4 books on the subject of agriculture, composed in 37–30 B.C. by Vergil. As Vergil’s Bucolics were based on Theocritus’s Idylls, so his Georgics, also, had a classical Greek precedent: Hesiod’s Works and Days. Although the work was conceived and executed within the classical genre of the simple didactic, it is more than an agricultural handbook: it is the subtle and profound work of a philosopher-poet. Like the De Rerum Natura of Lucretius, to which it is in many ways a reply, Vergil’s Georgics is built upon a solid didactic foundation from which it rises naturally to peaks of impassioned eloquence.

Book I contains advice on farming in general. After giving an account of the ills that followed the assassination of Julius Caesar, the poet prays that the Roman blood spilled at Pharsalus and Philippi may be sufficient to expiate the nation’s ancestral guilt and that the young Octavius Caesar will save the world from civil war.

In Book II, Vergil concerns himself with grapevines and fruit trees, though he again rises above mere instruction. This book also contains a famous parable to the crops and heroes of Italy.

At the beginning of Book III, the poet rededicates himself to his work. He takes up the care and propagation of livestock, and at the end of the book describes the effect of a plague which killed all living things.

Unlike Lucretius, who ends his poem with a similar scene of a plague in Athens, Vergil passes directly into the sunny Book IV of his Georgics and tells a tale of miraculous regeneration. The book is formally concerned with the raising of honey bees, but its most important sections deal with two myths of death and resurrection, one within the other. The bees of Aristaeus, god of beekeeping, have suddenly died. His mother, the sea divinity Cyrene, advises him to consult Proteus, who tells Aristaeus that his bees have been killed by the dryads. The nymphs were avenging the death of Eurydice who, while being pursued by Aristaeus, stepped on a snake and died of its bite. Proteus then relates the pathetic tale of Orpheus and Eurydice. At his mother's suggestion, Aristaeus sacrifices four bulls and four hens to the shades of Orpheus and Eurydice. After he has let their carcasses rot for nine days, he beholds a swarm of living bees issuing forth from the decaying bellies of the cattle.

Geraint, Son of Erbin. A medieval Welsh tale from the Mabinogion in which King Arthur figures. This story has a parallel in the tale Érec et Énide of Chrétien de Troyes. Tennison drew his characters Geraint and Enid in his Idylls of the King (1859–1872) from the same source.

Gerhardt, William Alexander (1895– ). English novelist. A disillusioned satirist, he wrote Futility (1922), the Polyglots (1925), and Resurrection (1934). His other works include the novels Of Mortal Love (1936) and My Wife's the Least of It (1938), the plays I Was a King in Babylon (1948) and Rasputin (1960), The Romanoffs: An Historical Biography (1940), and The Life and Times of Lord Beaverbrook (1963).

Géricault [Jean Louis André Théodore] (1791–1824). French painter. The exhibition in 1819 of his masterpiece The Raft of Medusa, a realistic and dramatic indictment of death and suffering, caused a storm of protest, and marked the beginning of the struggle between the classical and romantic schools of painting. A powerful draftsman and superb colorist, Géricault is equally known for his paintings of animal life and vivid historical scenes.

Germ, The. This "little magazine" was published from January to April, 1850, by the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood. In its pages the Pre-Raphaelites printed poems, reproductions of their paintings, and expositions of their artistic ideas.

Germanicus Caesar (15 B.C.–A.D. 19). Roman general. He was adopted by his uncle, the emperor Tiberius, and received command of the legions in Germany. He scored a huge success in his campaign against the Germans (A.D. 11–16), but just when he was about to conquer the whole country between the Rhine and the Elbe, Tiberius, alarmed at his strength, recalled him to Rome. It was believed by many that Germanicus was poisoned, possibly at Tiberius' bidding. Germanicus had nine children by Agrippina, among whom were the notorious Caligula and Agrippina, mother of Nero.

German romanticism. Romanticism in Germany was not one movement but a series of separate ones. The first of these, called Jena romanticism after the small university town where most of the writers met, flourished around 1798–1802 and centered around the brothers F. and A. W. Schlegel. The Schlegels, however, did not regard themselves as the founders of a romantic movement for, in their definition, romantic meant simply modern (from the Middle Ages on), as opposed to classical (Greek and Latin). As romantic authors, they wished to go beyond the classics, but not to deny them; in fact, they were very much a part of the philhellenic tradition that also produced Weimar classicism.

But they did set out in new directions. F. Schlegel urged writers to strive for a progressive, universal poetry, by which he meant that romantic poetry must constantly develop, that it must not cease to be progressive, and that its ultimate goal must be universal, a synthesized comprehension of the entire world; these ideals of dynamism and universality were opposed to the Weimar classical ideals of balance and limitation. Novalis and Wackenroder strove for a new synthesis of art and religion. And Tieck and Novalis made new advances in the characteristically romantic form of the Märchen, which was later developed by Brentano and E. T. A. Hoffmann.

Finally, after the wars of liberation, under the conservative Prussian and Austrian regimes of 1815–1848, German romanticism again followed the tenor of the times. The Swabian School, which Heine attacked vigorously in his Die romantische Schule (The Romantic School, 1833) and which included Uhland, Kerner, Lenau, Hauff and Schwab, was a primarily conservative group, interested in the preservation of tradition, and was already very like the postromantic Biedermeier movement.

Disparate though it was, there is a unifying principle inherent in German romanticism. In the 15th century, some voices had already been heard against the prevailing rationalism of the age: Hamann, Herder, Jacobi, Klopstock, the poets of the Sturm und Drang and of Weimar classicism. In very general terms, German romanticism may be seen as the culmination of all these movements, the final overthrow of the enlightenment, and the definitive redirection of 19th-century literature into nonrationalistic areas of experience. The philosophers most closely associated with German romanticism were Fichte and Schelling. See romantic irony.
Gerusalemme liberata (1885). A novel by Emile Zola, one of the ROUGON-MACQUART novels. Germinal is a study of the bitter sufferings of workers in the French mines. Zola's intense sympathy for the lower classes and his pleas for social reform find powerful expression in this careful portrait of life in the mines.

Germinie Lacerteux (1869). A novel by the Goncourt brothers. Based on the sordid life of one of the Goncourts' own servants, and composed with attention to realistic detail, this work is naturalistic in both its form and subject matter.

Gernando of Norway. In the GERMISLAE LIBERATA of Tasso, a Christian knight who is the rival of Rinaldo of Este for the command vacated as a result of the death of Dudone. When the quarrel results in his death, Rinaldo is charged with the crime by Goffredo, the Christian general. Like Achilles, Rinaldo stalks off in anger and leaves the Crusaders without one of their leading warriors.

Geronimo. Indian name: Goyathlay (1829-1909). American Apache chief. In 1885-1886 he led an attack on white settlers; he was captured by General George Crook (1829-1890), escaped, and later surrendered to General Nelson A. Miles (1839-1925). He finally settled down with members of his tribe on farmland and ranches at Fort Sill, Okla. There he joined the Dutch Reformed Church in 1903, and dictated an account of his life to Stephen M. Barrett; it was published as Geronimo's Story of His Life (1906). A town in Arizona is named for the Indian chief. During World War II, American parachutists would often begin their jump by calling "Geronimo." The reason for their adoption of the Indian name is unknown.

Géronte. The name of the old man who is a stock figure in early French comedy. By Mollière's time the character had taken on the unpleasant traits exemplified by the Géronte of Le MÉDECIN MALGRÉ LUI.

Gerontion (1920). A poem by T. S. Eliot. Spoken by "an old man in a dry month," it is a despairing poem about old age, aridity, the spiritual decay of the world, and the need and likelihood of salvation.

Gerontius, The Dream of. See DREAM OF GERONTIUS, THE.

Gershwin, George (1897-1937). American composer. He began his career by composing popular songs, soon combined them into musical comedies, such as George White's Scandals (1920-1924), Funny Face (1927), and Of Thee I Sing (1931; the first film music to win a Pulitzer Prize). However, his chief importance resulted from his ability to bring jazz and popular styles into the realm of classical music, especially with the internationally famous works, Rhapsody in Blue (1924) and Porgy and Bess (1935; see Porgy). His songs have been collected in George Gershwin's Song Book (1932). His brother Ira Gershwin (1896— ) was a popular Broadway lyricist who wrote lyrics for many of George's shows.

Gerson, Jean Charlier de (1363-1429). French theologian. Court preacher to Charles VI, he was famous for his sermons in both Latin and French. Gerson was a prominent scholar, the chancellor of the University of Paris, and a delegate to the councils of Pisa and Constance where he strove for church unity and ecclesiastical reforms. He was one of the leading opponents of the Romance of the Rose, which he condemned to be burned (1399) as a threat to morality. The authorship of the Imitation of Christ is sometimes attributed to Gerson, instead of to Thomas à Kempis.

Gertrude. In Shakespeare's Hamlet, the queen and mother of Hamlet. A weak-willed woman, who has married her husband's brother and murderer, she draws from Hamlet the cry: "Frailty, thy name is woman!"

Gertrude of Wyoming (1809). A poem by Thomas Campbell. The setting is in the wilds of the Wyoming Valley in Pennsylvania. The heroine, Gertrude, is the daughter of the patriarch Albert; the hero is Henry Waldegrave, who as a boy spends three years in the patriarch's home and later returns to marry Gertrude. The settlement is attacked by a mixed army of Indians and British and both Albert and Gertrude are shot. Henry then joins the army of Washington.

Gerusalemme liberata (Jerusalem Delivered), The celebrated romantic epic by Torquato Tasso. Written during the Italian Renaissance, some time between 1559 and 1575, it was published in a definitive version of twenty cantos in 1581. The whole work had been translated into English by 1600, the accomplishment of Edward Fairfax. Unlike other Renaissance romances, it was based on the historic events of the First Crusade (1096-1099) and utilized several historical characters. The plot begins with the fictional war in its sixth year and the election of Goffredo (Godfrey) as the chief of the Christian armies encamped on the plains of Tortosa. As they prepare to attack Jerusalem, its king Aladino learns from the enchanter Ismeno that the city will not fall if a statue of the Virgin is removed from a Christian church and placed in a mosque. Finding the statue stolen, Aladino plans revenge on the Christian community of the city, but a young Christian maiden, Sofronia, offers to take the blame, as does her beloved, Olindo, who hopes thereby to save her. Aladino promptly orders both put to death, and they are saved only by the timely appearance of the warrior maiden Clorinda, who offers her sword in return for their lives. Now the pagan warrior Argante (Argantes), having failed to distuade Goffredo from the attack, declares war upon the Crusaders. When the Christians attack the holy city, Argante kills their champion Dudone and the Christians withdraw to do him honors. Heeding the infernal decree of Plutone (Pluto), the enchanter Idræo sends his beautiful niece Armida to confound the Christian camp. She tells Goffredo of her need for ten knights to retake the city of Damascus; he is unwilling, but many more than ten Crusaders follow her away, among them the most puissant in the Christian army. Rinaldo also departs in anger because Goffredo has denounced him for the murder of Gernando, his rival for the command vacated because of the death of Dudone. Argante now challenges the Christian knights and kills Ottone, but his fierce and violent duel with Tancred (Tanered) is interrupted when Ermina, who loves the latter, lures him away by disguising herself as his beloved Clorinda. Goffredo's depleted forces now face the challenge of Solimano (the Soltan, or Solyman), leader of the Arabs, but the archangel Gabriel intervenes to save them. Solimano soon joins forces with Aladino. In the renewed assault by the Crusaders, Tancredi unknowingly wounds Clorinda, who forgives him and is baptized before dying. Goffredo, learning from a vision that only Rinaldo can break the enchantments of Ismeno and free the armies to continue their assault upon the city, sends Guelfo and Ubaldo to bring him back. Dallying with Armida, Rinaldo is finally disenchanted and persuaded to return. With his return, the Crusaders are soon victorious. The unyielding Argante is killed by Tancredi, but the Egyptian forces, spurred by Armida, try to renew the battle. Rinaldo administers the final defeat to the infidels by killing Solimano and subduing Armida. With Aladino dead and the Egyptian king killed by Goffredo, the Crusaders can enter the great city at will. There, at dawn, led by Goffredo, they worship at the sepulcher of Christ.

Gervaise. One of the principal characters in the novels of Emile Zola's ROUGEON-MACQUART series. She first appears in L'ASSOMMOIR.

Geryon. In Greek mythology, a monster with three bodies and three heads. His oxen ate human flesh and were guarded by Orthrus, a two-headed dog. Hercules slew both Geryon and the dog.

Geryoneo. See FAERE QUEENE, THE.

Geschichten Jaakobs, Die. See JOSEPH AND HIS BROTHERS.

Gesmas. The impotent thief. He was crucified with Jesus. In the apocryphal Gospel of NICODEMUS, he is called Gestas. The penitent thief was DISMAS.

Gespräche mit Goethe. See Johann Peter ECKER-MAANN.

Gestapo. The abbreviated name of the Nazi Geheime Staatspolizei (Secret Political Police), taken from the initial syllables of the words. Formed by Goering (1933), it became under HAMMLER the state's arm of terror.

Gesta Regnum Anglorum (Chronicle of the Kings of England, c. 1120-1128). Latin history by WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY. It covers the history of England from 449 to 1128, including an account of Arthur, which indicates that the legends surrounding the hero were already prevalent in England.

Gesta Romanorum ("Deeds of the Romans"). Latin collection of tales, many of them of Oriental origin, very popular in the Middle Ages. It may have been compiled in England in the late 13th century; it was printed in 1473 and frequently thereafter, different versions including about 100 to 200 tales. The episodes are usually arbitrarily assigned to the reign of a Roman emperor, but there is little real history; similarly, a "moral" or "application" follows each tale, purportedly for the use of preachers, but it is not a religious work. Chaucer, Shakespeare, and later English writers have drawn frequently on the tales for plot material.

Gestas. See GESMAS.

Gesualdo, Carlo (c. 1560-1613). Italian composer and Prince of Venosa, near Naples. One of the most curious composers in musical history, Gesualdo was responsible for the brutal murder of his first wife (his first cousin) and her lover. His often experimental madrigals and other compositions are harmonically daring, filled with constant chromatic modulation, and nervously restless. He was a close friend of the poet Torquato Tasso, whose poems he set. Tasso's name has been linked with that of Leonora d'Este, Gesualdo's second wife.

Gethsemane. An olive grove or garden on the western slope of the Mount of Olives. It was here that Jesus went to pray after the Last Supper, and that Judas Iscariot betrayed him to the Roman soldiers (Mark 14:32-45; Matt. 26:36-49). Centuries-old olive trees growing on the site are today tended by monks of the Greek, Armenian, Russian, and Roman Churches.

Get-Rich-Quick Wallingford (1908). A group of related stories by George Randolph Chester (1869-1924). Wallingford, whose name has become part of American folklore, is a company promoter. With his satellite Blackie Daw, he engages in many dubious enterprises, but always manages to escape the hand of the law. Chester continued his adventures in several other books: Young Wallingford (1910), Wallingford and Blackie Daw (1913), Wallingford in His Prime (1913). George M. Cohan made a successful dramatization of the stories in 1910.

Gettysburg. A town in southern Pennsylvania and the site of a major battle (July 1-3, 1863), often considered the turning point of the American Civil War. The Confederates under Gen. Lee were defeated by numerically superior Union troops under Gen. George Meade. Casualties are estimated at about 23,000 for the Union Army, about 28,000 for the Confederates. Though Lee's retreat into Virginia was temporarily blocked by the flooding of the Potomac, Meade's failure to attack permitted the Confederates to escape on July 13 after the river fell.

Gettysburg Address (Nov. 19, 1863). An address prepared and delivered by President Abraham Lincoln at the dedication of the national cemetery at Gettysburg battlefield. Lincoln's brief address, which followed a two-hour oration by Edward Everett, the principal speaker of the day, is perhaps the most moving and eloquent statement of the American creed. Mary Raymond Shipman Andrews wrote "a sentimental footnote to history" in The Perfect Tribute (1906), a fictional account of the delivery and effects of the address.

Ghebers or Guebres. Parsees, or followers of the ancient Persian religion, Zoroastrianism. The name, bestowed upon them by their Arabian conquerors, is now applied generally to fire worshipers.

Ghelderode, Michiel de (1898-1962). Belgian dramatist. In the 1920's he wrote plays for marionettes, and his later works often use a similar stylization. Sometimes the human actors are masked to resemble puppets, for his characters are often the grotesque caricatures of farce and fantasy. Ghelderode was inspired by the flamboyance of Shakespeare and the Golden Age of Spain, the satiric realism of the Flemish painters, and the allegories of traditional folklore. His plays, mingling with burlesque and the mystical, did not begin to be widely known until 1946. They include Chronik der Columbus (1927), Escurial (1928), Barabason (1928), The Women at the Tomb (1928), Chronicles of Hell (Fastes d'enfer, 1929), Pantaleize (1930), Sire Halewyn (1934), Hop, Signor! (1935), and School for Buffoons (L'Ecole des bouffons: 1937).

Ghon was associated with the Nowelle Revue française and published in it a series of critical articles: Nos Directions: réalisme et poésie (1911). He is best known for the religious plays that he wrote after his conversion to Catholicism, especially Le Pauvre sous l'Escalier (1920).

Ghibellines. See GUELPH.

Ghiberti, Luca. Real name, Lorenzo di Cione di Ser Buonaccorso (1378–1455). Florentine sculptor. His style combines tradition and innovation: the grace of medieval sculpture and a vivid pictorial quality, unparalleled elsewhere, caused by the use of perspective and the manipulation of planes in relief. He executed the famous north and east doors of the baptistry of Florence (1402–1422 and 1427–1452, respectively), which are elaborately decorated with panels in gilt bronze relief. Toward the end of his life he wrote three Commentaries (I Commentari) on art, which survive in very imperfect form and include his autobiography and the first account of the lives of the artists of the 14th century.

Ghirlandaio, Filippo. Real name, Domenico di Tommaso Bigordi (1449–1495). Florentine painter. He was noted for his religious easel pictures and his narrative frescoes. Influenced by Fra Lippo Lippi, he in turn influenced the young Michelangelo, who worked in his studio. Among his best-known works are the frescoes behind the high altar of Santa Maria Novella in Florence, especially The Birth of the Virgin; portraits of Florentine humanists of the Medici circle; the touching Portrait of an Old Man and a Boy; the Adoration of the Shepherds in the Sistine Chapel; and the wall frescoes of the Sistine Chapel, done with Botticelli.

Ghisonda. See TANCRED, THE REVENGERS. Ghosts (1881). A play by Henrik Ibsen. Ten years after her husband’s death, Mrs. Alving is about to open an orphanage dedicated to his memory. Her son, Oswald, has just come home from abroad. She reveals to the moralistic Pastor Manders, who many years before had advised her against leaving her husband, that the late Captain Alving had lived and died drunken and profligate, and that Regina, the serving-girl, is actually his daughter. Oswald is beginning to go insane from hereditary syphilis, a legacy from his father; and Mrs. Alving realizes that, in basing her actions on duty rather than love, she has been indirectly responsible both for her husband’s dissoluteness and her son’s insipid insanity. The “ghosts” of the title are the dead conventions and beliefs that prevented Mrs. Alving from living for “the joy of life.”

Giacosa, Giuseppe (1847–1906). Italian dramatist, poet, librettist, and short-story writer. Giacosa is considered the leading Italian playwright of the late 19th century. The themes of his dramas undergo an observable change paralleling the changing literary tastes of the public for whom he wrote. Initially (c. 1870–1890) he composed graceful, charming verse plays reflecting the romantic cult of the Middle Ages and naturalistic interest in scientifically precise descriptions of character and setting. To this period belong La Partita a Scacchi (1873), Il Trionfo d’Amore (1875), La Signora di Challant, written for Sarah Bernhardt (1891). Subsequently he wrote serious social dramas influenced by the problem plays of Henrik Ibsen and the popularity of French, Russian, and English psychological novels. Among his plays of social criticism are Tratti Amori (1888), I Diritri dell’Anim (1900), Come Le Fuglie (1900), and Il Più Forte (1905). In collaboration with Luigi Illica, he wrote the libretti for Puccini’s La Bohème (1896), La Tosca (1900), and Madama Butterfly (1904).

Giacosa’s nondramatic writings include Novelle e Paesi Valdostani (1886), short stories set against the background of his native Val d’Aosta (Piedmont), and a collection of travel essays on America.

Giafar, or Jaffar the Barmecide. Vizier of the Caliph Haroun-al-Raschid and companion of his adventures. He appears frequently in the Arabian Nights.

Giall. In Scandinavian mythology, the river on the frontiers of Niflheim or hell, equivalent to the Greco-Roman Styx. Over it pass the doomed on a golden bridge.

Giambullari, Pietro Franceschi (1495–1555). Florentine historian. His history of Europe, Histoire d’Europe, covering the years 887–947, was published posthumously (1566) in its unfinished state. It was one of the first Humanist (see HUMANISM) histories to look at the past from the wider viewpoint of the Empire, rather than from the narrower interest of one city or state.

Gian ben Gian. In Arabie, a king of the JINN and founder of the Pyramids. He was overthrown by Eblis, the Muslim Lucifer.

Giant Despair. See PILGRIM’S PROGRESS.

Giants (Gigantes) or Earth-Born (Gegeneis). In Greek mythology, offspring of Ge (earth), impregnated by blood from the castrated Uranus (sky). They were in most accounts of human form, but with serpents’ tails instead of feet. They warred on the gods, hurling whole trees and giant rocks. They were finally defeated only with the aid of HERACLES. Immortal, they were buried alive under mountains—generally volcanoes. Possibly oriental in origin, they are thought to have been personifications of the violent forces in nature. They should not be confused with the HUNDRED-HANDED or OTUS AND EPHELITES.

Giants in the Earth: A Saga of the Prairie (1924–1925 in Norwegian; 1927 in English). A novel by Ole E. ROLVAG. The first volume of a trilogy that includes Peder Victorious (1929) and Their Father’s God (1931), it is a stark and realistic work describing the hardships, both mental and physical, of a small group of Norwegian farmers who set out from Minnesota with their families in 1873 to settle in the then unopened Dakota Territory. The novel centers on Per Hansa, his devotion to the land, the growing religious fanaticism of his wife, Beret, and his final disappearance in a blizzard.

The hero of the two succeeding novels is Peder Victorious Holm, Per Hansa’s youngest son, who marries a devout Irish Catholic, Susie Doheny, and later quarrels with her over the raising of their son, Petie.

Giants in the Earth was successfully dramatized (1928) by Thomas Job and made into an opera (1951) by Douglas Moore.
Giaour. Among the Muslims, a term used contemptuously for one, especially a Christian, who does not adhere to their faith.

Byron wrote a poem, The Giaour (1813). In it, Leila, the beautiful concubine of Caliph Hassan, flees with a Giaour to her destruction; the Giaour later becomes a monk and tells his story while on his deathbed.

Gibbon, Edward (1737-1794). English historian, noted for his masterpiece The History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. He formed the plan for this great work during a tour of Italy (1764) while "musing amidst the ruins of the Capitol." He entered Parliament in 1774 and was made commissioner of trade and plantations. The first volume of his "History," which appeared in 1776, was very well received, though his chapters on Christianity provoked severe criticism from some quarters. Succeeding volumes were not as warmly received as the first. Gibbon's Memoirs, put together by Lord Sheffield, were published in 1796.

Gibbs, Cosmo Hamilton. See Cosmo Hamilton.

Gibbs, Sir Philip [Hamilton] (1877-1962). English journalist and novelist. The second of three writing brothers, he was knighted for his work as a frontline correspondent during World War I. His books of essays and social commentary include Realities of War (1920), Now It Can Be Told (1920), and The New Elizabethans (1953).

Gibraltar. A famous rock fortress at the western entrance to the Mediterranean Sea.

Gibson, Charles Dana (1867-1944). American illustrator. The creator of "the Gibson Girl," he modeled his drawings on his wife, the beautiful, dignified, and fashionable Irene Langhorne. Nearly every woman during the gay '90s imitated her clothes, looks, and manners. Gibson also illustrated many books, most notably the stories of Richard Harding Davis.

Gibson, W[ilfred] W[ilson] (1878-1962). English poet, associated with the Georgian group. His most successful poems are about the grim, industrial lives of working people, as in Daily Bread (1910) and Thoroughfares (1914).

Gide, André (1869-1951). French writer and editor. Brought up in an austere Protestant household, Gide reacted passionately against the prohibitions of revealed religion. Yet his search for self—the underlying theme of his more than 80 published works—remained essentially a religious search, and Gide is as well known for his influence as a moralist and a thinker as for his contributions to literature.

At 18 he met Pierre Louÿs and other aspirant writers and artists, and attended the literary salons of José-Maria de Heredia and Stephane Mallarmé. In 1891 he published Les Cahiers d'André Walter, reflecting his spiritual love for his cousin Madeleine and his conviction that physical desire must be suppressed. He published his first poems the next year, but by 1900 he had practically abandoned this form of writing. Gide shared Paul Valéry's fascination with the myth of Narcissus as a symbol of man's hopeless and misdirected yearning for perfection. His friends read the essay Le Traité du Narcisse (1891) as a definition of symbolism, but its theories were actually quite differently intended, and Gide soon separated from the group.

With his first trip to North Africa in 1893, Gide broke with his entire past. He rejected mortification of the flesh, believing that harmony of body and soul was possible only if both were satisfied, and deliberately sought sensual experience. His discovery of homosexual leanings troubled him, but the tolerance of the North Africans and the open encouragement of Oscar Wilde in 1895 freed him of embarrassment. The Fruits of the Earth is a hymn to the joy of the search for experience.

Gide considered himself a disturber of youth, ever urging individual self-cultivation, while paradoxically warning against a narcissistic concern with self. His fiction is autobiographical only to the extent that each major figure is an exaggerated personification of one aspect of his own character. Thus, The Immoralist and Strait is the Gate were conceived as companion pieces to show the unhappy consequences of amoral hedonism in the first and of equally selfish self-abnegation and asceticism in the second.

Always concerned with motivation and the function of man's will, Gide was influenced by Dostoevski (his translations and analyses did much to make the Russian novelist popular in France) and agreed that there are both good and evil impulses, not traceable to common motives such as love, hate, or self-interest. He was fascinated by examples of the apparently disinterested acte gratuit, or gratuitous act, and concluded that it is motivated solely by a personal need to assert one's individuality and thus the only human act that reveals one's essential character; La Pucelle's Adventures presents a murder as such an act.

Gide was twice tempted to find self-development in commitment to something outside himself. His correspondence with his friends Francis Jammes (pub. 1948) and Paul Claudel (pub. 1949) reveal their unsuccessful attempt to convert him to Catholicism. Then on a trip to French Equatorial Africa in 1925 he was horrified by the French treatment of the natives. He expressed his views on the subject in Travels in the Congo (Voyage au Congo; 1927, and Le Retour du Tchad; 1928), and began to advocate the reform of social institutions, becoming an admirer of the ideal of Communism and its practical experiment in the Soviet Union. But he could not accept the party's orthodox dogma without the right to question, and in 1936 was disillusioned by a visit to the Soviet Union, described in Return from the USSR (Retour de l'URSS; 1936) and Afterthoughts on the USSR (Retouches à mon retour de l'URSS; 1937).

The novel The Counterfeiters exposes the hypocrisy and self-deception with which people try to avoid sincerity. Gide's own obsessive concern with personal and public honesty often led him to face public scandal—especially with his insistence that the bounds of the natural include homosexuality. When Corydon drew violent criticism, Gide answered with Ir Ir Die. . . . He pursued this ideal of perfect frankness in his comprehensive private, literary, and philosophical journals (1899-1950), omitting only the details of his marriage with his cousin Madeleine. After her death (1938) he wrote the painful account of their mutual love and unhappiness, published posthumously as Et nous manent in te (1951), translated as Madeleine (1952).

Gide was one of the most influential editors of La Nouvelle Revue Française. In 1947 he was awarded the Nobel Prize for his varied contributions to literature.

Other important works by Gide, available in English, include the satires Paludes (1895) and Le Prophète èse mal enchâlé (1899), collected as Marshalls and Prometheus Misbound (1953); the plays Philocète (1899), Le Roi Candaule (1901), Saul (1903), Béthabé (1912), and Perséphone (1934), collected as My Theater (1951); the play Oedipe (1931) and the tale Thésée (1946), collected as Two Legends: Theseus and Oedipus (1950); and the tales Isabelle (1911) and The Pastoral Symphony, included in Two Symphonies (1931). See Ecole des Femmes.

Gideon. In the Old Testament, a Hebrew liberator, reformer, and one of the judges of Israel for 40 years. With a company of 300 men, he delivered his people from the Midianites. The army was purposely reduced to 300 eliminating all who were afraid and all who drank from a stream instead of lapping the water from their hands. To give the impression of being a huge army, they made a great noise by breaking pitchers and blowing trumpets (Judg. 7:16-20).

Gielgud, Sir [Arthur] John (1904— ). English actor. He has appeared in plays by Wilde, Shakespeare, and Sheridan as well as contemporary works. He has been seen on the movie and television screen in both England and America.

Gifford, William (1756-1826). English literary critic and poet, first editor (1809-1824) of the Quarterly Review. He edited Elizabethan plays and wrote the verse satires The Baviad and The Mæviad (1795).

Gift of the Magi, The (1906). A short story by O. Henry. Containing perhaps the most famous of O. Henry's trick endings, this Yuletide narrative tells how a nearly penniless young husband and wife are each determined to buy the other a suitable Christmas present. He sells his watch to buy her a set of combs; she has her beautiful hair cut off and sells the tresses to buy him a watch fob. The tale was included in The Four Million.

Gilbert, Sir Humphrey (1539?—1583). English navigator. The half-brother of Sir Walter Raleigh, Gilbert made a voyage with him in 1578. He wrote a Discourse of a Discoverie for a new passage to Cataia (published 1576, written and circulated earlier), in which he urged exploration for the discovery of a northwest passage (see NORTHEAST PASSAGE). His arguments probably influenced Sir Martin Frobisher's voyages in search of such a passage in 1576-1578. He established the first British colony in North America at St. John's, Newfoundland (August 5, 1583), but went down with his ship on the return voyage to England.

Gilbert, Sir William [Schwenck] (1836-1911). English dramatist and writer of humorous verse. He is best remembered as librettist of the Gilbert and Sullivan comic operas. Among his other dramatic pieces are The Palace of Truth (1870), Pygmalion and Galatea (1871), and Engaged (1877). Several of the Gilbert and Sullivan operas owe their origin to Gilbert's collection of humorous ballads, Bab Ballads (1866-71), which show his great facility in versifying. He had a penchant for whimsicality, nonsense, and topical satire.

Gilbert and Sullivan operas, also called the Savoy Operas. A series of comic operas, text by William Schwenck Gilbert and music by Arthur Seymour Sullivan, originally produced (1881 et seq.) at the Savoy Theatre in London by Richard D'Oyly Carte. An outstanding achievement in music collaboration, the titles are Thespis or The Gods Grown Old (1871), Trial by Jury (1875), The Sorcerer (1877), H. M. S. Pinafore (1878), The Pirates of Penzance or The Slave of Duty (1880), Patience or Bunthorne's Bride (1881), Iolanthe or The Peer and the Peri (1882), Princess Ida or Castle Adamant (1884), The Mikado or the Town of Titipu (1885), Ruddigore (1887), The Yeomen of the Guard (1888), The Gondoliers (1889), Utopia, Limited (1893), and The Grand Duke (1896). The first of these operas, and the last two, written after a serious quarrel between Gilbert and Sullivan, are almost never performed. Highly satiric, the operas poke fun at contemporary Victorian life. The Gilbert and Sullivan following, called Savoyards after the name of the theater, is still considerable.

Gilberte. The first girl beloved by the narrator in Marcel Proust's Remembrance of Things Past. Daughter of Charles Swann and Odette de Crécy, she repudiates her Jewish background when her mother remarries, and eventually marries Robert de Saint-Loup.

Gil Blas de Santillane, Histoire de (1715, 1724, 1735). A picaresque novel in four volumes by Alain René Lesage. The extraordinary number of episodes in this novel render any coherent plot summary impossible. The setting is Spanish, but the society depicted is really French. The hero, Gil Blas, leaves home at 17 to try his fortune at Salamanca; in his journeys he meets a large number of people—adventurers, thieves, valets, actors, authors, doctors, clergymen, and noblemen. Lesage has very little good to say about any of them. Gil Blas himself, though full of good intentions, is a singularly weak character. One critic (Lester G. Crocker) says that Gil Blas goes through the three stages of innocence, corruption, and the triumph of virtue. Among the more famous portraits in the novel are the ARCHBISHOP of GRANADA, DON ALVARO, and DR. SANGREDO. (See also The Souls of Pedro Garcia.) From the literary historical view, Lesage continues the traditions of the realistic novels written in the 17th century by Charles Sorel, Antoine Furetiere, and Paul Scarron. This novel also affords a good example of the evolution of the French language between the 17th and 18th centuries, in that an increase in the concision of narrative style is apparent.
Gildas (c. 500). An early Welsh historian who wrote about the battle of Mount Badon. This battle was later hailed as the greatest triumph of an historical Arthur who may be the prototype of the literary King Arthur. There is no mention of the name in Gildas' work, however. See ARTHURIAN LEGEND.

Gilded Age, The (1873). A novel by Mark TWAIN and Charles Dudley WARNER. Colonel Beriah Sellers, a schemer who always fails, persuades his friend, Squire Hawkins, to join him in an ill-fated land speculation scheme in Missouri. Hawkins' adopted daughter is seduced by Colonel Selby, whom she later murders. All the characters are modeled on real people; among them are William Weed and his political gang, based on the Tweed Ring in New York. The phrase "gilded age" has been adopted as a description of the hectic post-Civil War period.

Gilder, Richard Watson (1844-1909). American newspaper and magazine editor and poet. He edited SCRIBNER'S MONTHLY (1870-1881) and THE CENTURY MAGAZINE (1881-1909). Among his volumes of poetry are THE NEW DAY (1876) and FIVE BOOKS OF SONGS (1900). Gilder's refusal to receive Robert Louis Stevenson, because rumors had led him to doubt the latter's respectability, has gained him a degree of notoriety.

Gildery. Real name: Patrick Macgregor (d. 1636). Scottish cattle-stealer and highwayman. According to an old ballad, he robbed Cardinal Richelieu in the presence of the king, picked Oliver Cromwell's pocket, and hanged a judge. He was hanged in Edinburgh.

Gildippe. In Tasso's GERUSALEMME LIBERATA, the wife of Odoardo (Edward). Having accompanied her husband on the crusade, this capable fighter deals the infidels many stout blows before being killed by Solimano, their leader.

Giles, St. Patron saint of cripples. The tradition is that Childeric, king of France, accidentally wounded a hermit in the knee when hunting; and the hermit, that he might better mortify the flesh, refused to be cured, remaining a cripple for life. His day is September 1, and his symbol a hind, in allusion to the "heaven directed hind" which went daily to his cave near the mouth of the Rhone to give him milk. He is sometimes represented as an old man with an arrow in his knee and a hind by his side. Churches dedicated to St. Giles were usually situated in the outskirts of a city, and originally without the walls because some cripples and beggars were not permitted to pass the city gates.

Gilgamesh. A mythical hero of Sumer and Babylonia. Though he is best known from the famous Babylonian Epic of GILGAMESH, he was originally a Sumerian hero, the king of the ancient city of Erech. In a Sumerian myth, he comes to the aid of the goddess INANNA, who is distressed because she is unable to cut down the HULUCCU tree in the garden, in order to have furniture made of it: a snake, a dangerous bird, and Lilith have all taken up residence in it. When Gilgamesh chases them away and chops down the tree, Inanna gives him (untranslatable) gifts, but he accidentally drops them into the underworld. His companion Enkidu undertakes to go after them, but fails to observe the precautions essential in such ventures and cannot return. His ghost, however, is permitted to come back long enough to carry on a lengthy conversation with Gilgamesh. The ending of the myth is unknown from the fragmentary tablets on which it was found.

Gilgamesh, Epic of. A Babylonian poem (c. 2000 B.C.). One of the oldest and most important major epics in literature, it was first discovered on clay tablets in the library of Assur-bani-pal (668-626 B.C.). Like the Iliad and the Odyssey, it is composed of far earlier elements of myth and folklore that have been joined into a single poem through a process of gradual accretion. Also, like Homer's epics, it enjoyed immense popularity for centuries; passages from it were frequently quoted in later literature. The epic includes stories, originally separate, of GILGAMESH, a legendary king of Sumerian origin; Enkidu, a sort of primeval man; Umnapishtim, the Babylonian Noah; and several other tales.

Gilgamesh was a mighty, part-immortal king of Erech whose subjects eventually prayed for relief from his tyranny. Taking pity on them, the lord of heaven ordered the goddess Aruru to mold out of clay a hairy wild man named Enkidu. This monstrous creature lived with and ate like the beasts, whom he saved from the snares of hunters. Learning of his existence, Gilgamesh sent a young woman to seduce him, after which the animals would have no more to do with him. The woman told him of Gilgamesh's tyranny, and Enkidu resolved to challenge his power. This he did at the New Year's festival, but when he had defeated Gilgamesh in wrestling, the two became fast friends.

The first exploit that they undertook together was to cut down a cedar in the sacred wood guarded by the monster Humbaba, who breathed fire and plague and had one eye that could turn men to stone. They felled the cedar and Humbaba came roaring to the attack, but the sun-god (at the plea of the goddess Ninsum, Gilgamesh's mother) saved them by blinding the monster with hot winds. After the friends defeated and beheaded Humbaba, the goddess ISHTAR endeavored to seduce Gilgamesh, but he reminded her... bluntly how she had treated TAMMUZ and other lovers, turning many of them into beasts. Furious, she belabored the lord of heaven with threats until he sent the storm bull of heaven against them, but the two youths promptly killed it and offered its heart to the sun-god. Enkidu now had a series of dreams which revealed to him that the gods, outraged at this act, had decreed his death. Lying on his bed, he gradually grew weaker until he died.

Grief-stricken, Gilgamesh determined to learn the secret of eternal life by seeking out the sage Utanapishtim, the only mortal ever to have escaped death. In spite of many trials and warnings, Gilgamesh reached the ocean of death and was rowed across it by the ferryman Urshanabu into the presence of Utanapishtim. The old man told him of how, in the early days of the earth, a great flood had destroyed his fellow men. He, warned by Ea, the god of wisdom, had saved himself and his family by building an ark in which they had floated for seven days and nights until the ark grounded on a mountain. Utanapishtim had then sent out a dove, a swallow, and a raven; and, when the last of these having found dry land did not return, he and his family had offered thanks to the gods for their safety. Utanapishtim and his wife, thereafter, had been sent to the island at the end of the earth where they now lived, and where they had become immortal.

Gilgamesh now understood that this immortality was a special gift of the gods, and that neither Utanapishtim nor any other mortal would ever learn the secret of eternal life. The sage told him, however, of a herb growing at the bottom of the sea that would restore his youth. Taking leave of the old man, Gilgamesh tied stones to his feet, dived into the sea, and found the plant. After he had gone a long way on his journey home to Erech, he stopped to rest and bathe in a spring, laying the plant on the ground. A snake quickly appeared and made off with it; tasting the plant, it cast off its old skin and was made young again. Gilgamesh wept. Now he understood that no human being can escape old age and death. Resigned to the fate that he shared with all men, he returned to his homeland, where he died.

Gillette of Narbonne. The heroine of a tale from Giovanni Boccaccio's The Decameron. As a reward for curing the king of France, she obtains the right to marry Bertrand of Roussillon. The reluctant bridegroom flees angrily to Florence, where he loves a young woman, until discovering that he has slept with his own wife thinking she was his mistress, and that she has borne him two sons, he is finally reconciled. This is essentially the story of Shakespeare's play All's Well That Ends Well.

Gil y Zárate, Antonio (1793–1861). Spanish playwright. He is well known for his abandonment of neoclassic principles; this is apparent in his Carlos II, el hechizado (1844), a moderate romantic drama which attacks reactionary political views. He is also the author of Guzmán el Bueno (1847).

Giménez Caballero, Ernesto (1899– ). Spanish writer and academician. Giménez is the founder of the avant-garde publication La Gaceta Literaria (1927). His best-known writings include Notas marruecas de un soldado (1923); Yo, inspector de alcantarillas (1928), a surrealistic novel; and Genio de España (1931), which is considered his best work.

Ginevra. In Ariosto's Orlando Furioso, a Scottish princess unjustly accused by Lurcanio of causing the death of his brother and her beloved, Ariodante (Ariodantes). Doomed to die unless a champion appears to fight Lurcanio, she tells her story to Rinaldo, who, having learned from her maid Dalinda that Ginevra was betrayed by Polinesso, denounces the latter before the king and then kills him in a duel. Ariodante, who is actually alive and present to defend Ginevra, reveals himself and wins her hand.

Ginsberg, Allen (1926– ). American poet. A leading poet of the beat movement, Ginsberg writes an incantatory, loosely structured line reminiscent of Whitman. Howl and Other Poems (1956) is a violent lament for what society has done to its generation; it became something of a succès de scandale when it was charged with, and subsequently cleared of, obscenity. Ginsberg has also written Kaddish and Other Poems (1961) and Empty Mirror: Early Poems (1961).

ginseng. A Chinese herb valued as a medicine. Its root, often forked, explains why it corresponds in Chinese folklore to the Western mandrake.

Ginza. Street in Tokyo, running from Shimbashi to Kyobashi. It is the center of a high-class shopping and entertainment district.

Gioconda, La. A portrait by Leonardo da Vinci. One of the most famous of paintings, it is better known as the Mona Lisa. Its subject was a Neapolitan noblewoman, Madonna (Mona) Lisa del Giocondo. The portrait, which hangs in the Louvre, is especially noted for the lady's smile, which inspired The Gioconda Smile, one of Aldous Huxley's best-known short stories. It has been pointed out, however, that similar enigmatic smiles were a popular feature of portraits for this period.

Gioconda, La (1876). An opera by Amilcare Ponchielli based on Victor Hugo's Angelo the Tyrant of Padua. The libretto was written by Arrigo Boito under the pseudonym Tobia Goria—presumably through embarrassment over its melodramatic plot.

Gioconda, La (1889). A drama by Gabriele D'Annunzio. The title character is a model for a brilliant young sculptor, Lucio Settala. Out of loyalty to his devoted wife Silvia, he tries to resist the fascination that Gioconda exercises over him. Eventually, however, he leaves Silvia for Gioconda, who feels is the real inspiration of his art. Eleonora Duse, to whom the play is dedicated, scored a great success in the title role.

Giocondo. Hero of an episode in the Orlando Furioso of Ariosto, his name is better known in its French paraphrase Joconde.

Giono, Jean (1885– ). French novelist of the Provence region. This countryside is presented with sensuous realism in such early works as Hill of Destiny (Colline; 1928), Lovers Are Never Losers (Un de Baumugnes; 1929), Harvest (Regain; 1930), and the semi-autobiographical Blue Boy (Jean le bleu; 1932). Preferring a Hellenistic pantheism and the earthy life of the peasant to Christianity and modern civilization, he expressed his love of life in The Song of the World (Le Chant du monde; 1934) and Joy of Man's Desiring (Que ma joie demeure; 1935). Although he fought in the First World War, he went to prison rather than serve in the Second, upholding the principles of his pacifist essay Refus d'obéissance (1937). His other works include the short story La Femme du boudin (1935, filmed as The Baker's Wife, 1939) and the plays Lanceurs de graines (1937) and Le Bout de la Route (1941). Among his novels are Le Grand Troupeau (1931), Les Grands Chemins (1931), and The Malediction (Le Moulin de Pologne; 1952).

Giorgione, II. Real name, Giorgio da Castelfranco (c. 1478–1510). Little is known of his life and scarcely a half dozen paintings can be safely ascribed to him, yet this young and influential student of Giovanni Bellini is known as the chief master of the Venetian school of his day. He is celebrated for the sensuous and poetic grace of his work and for his introduction of a new range of subject matter—idyllic scenes of pastoral love that depend for their effect on the golden color harmony which unifies the whole. Among his authenticated works are the enigmatic Tempest (1506), Fête Champêtre, the Castelfranco Madonna, and Sleeping Venus.

Giotto di Bondone (1266–1337). Florentine painter. The greatest Italian painter of the pre-Renaissance, he was, according to tradition, a pupil of Cimabue and a friend of Dante. Vasari acclaimed him for breaking with the rigid Byzantine tradition of his time by introducing the direct observation of nature, and recounted that, when asked by the pope for a sample of his work, the artist sent only a perfect circle painted with a free movement of his arm from the elbow. His monumental work brought a new strength and force to art. He created architectural and landscape backgrounds for his massive, sensitively drawn figures, while his subdued colors and masterly compositions contribute to the expressive power of each scene. The quality of his genius is best seen in the series of 38 frescoes in the Scrovegni (Arena) Chapel in Padua, depicting the life of Christ and other Biblical subjects (1304–1306); the extent of his actual contribution to the earlier frescoes in the Church of St. Francis at Assisi is debatable. He also frescoed the Bardi and Peruzzi chapels of the Church of Santa Croce in Florence and is said to have done frescoes and mosaics for the old St. Peter's in Rome. In 1334, Giotto became the official architect of Florence. He is generally considered to have begun the construction of the separate campanile, or bell tower, of the Florence cathedral; it is likely that he also cared some of its relics with Andrea Pisano.

Giotto's tower. The campanile of the Duomo (the church of Santa Maria della Fiore) in Florence. It was designed by Giotto, and the construction began in 1334. However, much of the final form of the building may be due to Giotto's successor Andrea Pisano. The Duomo, begun in 1298, was not completely finished until 1888.

Giovannitti, Arturo (1884–1959). Italian-born American poet. A crusader for social and economic change, he was jailed during the Lawrence, Mass., textile strikes, an experience which caused him to write The Walker and several other prose poems. In 1917, he wrote When the Cock Crows, a poem inspired by the lynching of the labor leader Frank Little. His principal collection of verse is Arrows in the Gale (1914).

Giovio, Paolo (1483–1552). Italian Renaissance historian. He wrote a history of his own times; a group of lives of famous men; the Elogia virorum illustrium, a series of prose and verse inscriptions for the portraits collected in his private museum; and a treatise on Impresa, or devices, which was translated by Samuel Daniel in 1585.

Gipsy. See Gypsies.

Girolamo, Giambattista Cinzio or Cinthio (1504–1573). Ferrarese scholar, teacher, and author of novelle, plays, and literary criticism. His collection of 100 novelle, called *Gi*li *Ecatom*mitii, includes the plots of Shakespeare's Othello and Measure for Measure. In his tragedies, Giraldi followed the style of Seneca and was influential in popularizing tragedies filled with horror and bloodshed. He also used happy endings for some of his plays, thus becoming a pioneer of the tragi-comedy. His critical discourses were also important in Renaissance discussion of literary types, and imitation of the ancient writers.

Giraudoux, [Hippolyte] Jean (1882–1944). French dramatist, novelist, essayist, and diplomat. All Giraudoux's works are characterized by a verbal extravagance, an elegance and virtuosity of imagery and style that verges on poetic fantasy; even in a serious play like Tiger at the Gates, it masks the horror of the apparent inevitability of tragedy.

The novel My Friend from Limousin (Siegfried et le Limousin; 1922) was transformed into the play Siegfried (1928), portraying the Franco-German conflict. The plot of the novel Bella (1926) centers in an antithesis within French politics, that of Eglantine (1927) in the social antithesis of a simple-minded country gentleman and a rich Jewish banker. These two and especially the earlier novels Suzaune and the Pacific (1921) and Juliette Visits the Land of Man (Juliette au pays des hommes; 1924) show Giraudoux's predilection for charming young girl characters who represent the candid innocence of divinity, of nature, of ideal Truth. To grow up or to fall in love is to enter the "terrible convent of human beings" with its heartache, disillusion, and even tragedy; his treatment of the Udoine tale in the play Ondine (1939) has the same theme. Giraudoux has a humanistic and compassionate view of the adult world; nevertheless, he delights in escaping from it in extravagant comedies like The Madwoman of Chaillot.

Many of his plays are based on Greek myth or the Bible, but make very free with the legends; for instance, his Judith (1931) falls in love with Holofernes before she kills him. Among his other adaptations—besides the above-mentioned Siegfried and Tiger at the Gates—are Amphitryon 38 (1929), Electre (1937), The Apollo of Bellac (1942), and Sodome et Gomorrhe (1943).

Other works include Amica America (1918), about his stay in the United States; Adorable Clio (1920), vignettes from World War I; the plays The Enchanted (Interméresse; 1933) and The Virtuous Island (Supplément au voyage de Cook; 1935); the novels The School for Indifference (L'Ecole des indifférents, 1911), Simon the Pathetic (1918), The Adventures of Jérôme Bardini (1930), and The Chosen One (Choix des élues; 1938).

Girl of the Golden West, The (1905). A play by David Belasco. The heroine is a courageous saloonkeeper in a Western mining camp who falls in love with an outlaw. The play was the basis of Puccini’s La Fanciulla del West (1910), the first grand opera written on an American theme.

Gironists, or the Gironde, or the Girondins. A middle class political party during the French Revolution (1791-1793). They were so named because many of their members were from the department of the Gironde. Their point of view was republican: they advocated overthrow of the monarchy, an aggressive foreign policy, and were anticlerical. Although the most powerful party for a time, they were overthrown in June, 1793, because of their attempt to soften the ever-rising spirit of fanaticism among the more extreme revolutionaries. Among their ranks were Jacques Pierre Brissot (their leader, and after whom they were sometimes called Brissotins), Condorcet, and the adherents of Madame Roland.

Gironella, José Maria (1917– ). Spanish novelist. His works, which have been very popular in translation, include Un hombre (The Soil was Shallow, 1946), his initial success; the well-known Los expresos creen en Dios (The Cypresses Believe in God, 1951), a tale of events leading up to the Spanish Civil War; and its sequel, Un millón de muertos (1961).

Girty, Simon (1741–1818). American soldier, known as “the Great Renegade.” He deserted from the Revolutionary Army (1778) and later led British and Indian raiding expeditions. Although he is said to have saved the life of Simon Kenton, Girty was widely known for his brutality. He is the title character of Elinor Wylie’s poem, Simon Girty and also appears in Stephen Vincent Benét’s The Devil and Daniel Webster (1937).

Gish, Lillian ([1896– – ]). American stage and screen actress. After her first success in Birth of a Nation, she played in many other films, including The Scarlet Letter, Broken Blossoms, Orphans of the Storm, etc. She appeared on stage in Camille, Uncle Vanya, The Star Wagon, and others. Her sister Dorothy is also well-known as an actress.

Gissing, George [Robert] (1857–1903). English novelist, critic, and essayist. Gissing’s brilliant academic career was cut short when, attempting to reform and support a young prostitute, he was caught stealing money from classmates. He was expelled and imprisoned; soon after he spent a year of privation and wandering in the U.S., then returned to England. He married the prostitute, entering a life of misery and poverty, and when she died, he re-marrried, again unhappily.

Gissing’s love of the classics, the hardships of his life, and his mixed idealism and pessimism, are re-lected in his best-known novels The Nether World (1881) and New Grub Street. These books are characterized by their realism and psychological acuteness, and by the subtlety, grace, and subdued passion of their style. Other aspects of his temperament and talent are exhibited in The Private Papers of Henry Ryecroft and his fine Charles Dickens: A Critical Study (1898). Other novels include Demos (1886), Thrysa (1887), A Life’s Morning (1888), Born in Exile (1892), The Odd Women (1893), and In the Year of Jubilee (1894).

Giusti, Giuseppe (1809–1850). Italian satiric poet. His clever satires held up to ridicule the so-called “humaneness” of the guillotine (La Guiglot-tina a Vapore, 1833), foreign domination of Italy (Lo Stivale, 1836), and many other aspects, both important and trivial, of 19th-century society.

Giustinian, Leonardo (1388–1446). Venetian scholar and poet. Giustinian wrote and composed the music for popular songs in Venetian dialect. He excelled in strambotto, canzonetta, and laude, so much so that variations and adaptations of such of his poems as Se li arbori sapessen favellare (If the trees could speak) are still heard in the Italy of today.

Gjellerup, Karl (1859–1919). Danish writer long resicent in Germany. His interest in German art and music found expression in Richard Wagner i hans Hovedvaerk (Richard Wagner in his Chief Work, the Ring of Niblung, 1890). His novels include En Idealist (1878), Germanernes Laering (1882), and Der Pilger Kamanoto (The Pilgrim Kamanoto, 1906), a novel set in India and the only novel by Gjellerup to be translated into English. In 1917 he shared the Nobel prize for literature with another Danish writer, Henrik Pontoppidan.

Gladkov, Feodor Vasilyevich (1883–1958). Russian novelist. He is famous as the author of Cenement, one of the first proletarian novels of Soviet literature, which had an immense success with Soviet critics. In 1932–1938, Gladkov published Energy (Energiya), describing the building of Dneprpro-stoi dam during the Five-Year Plan. One of his best works is his autobiography, Story of My Childhood (Povest’ o detstve; 1949), reminiscent of Gorki’s autobiography in style and quality.

Gladstone, William Ewart. Called the Grand Old Man (1809–1898). English statesman, financier, and orator. His high abilities were early recognized by his party (Whig), and during the short-lived administration of Sir Robert Peel (December 1834–April 1835), he was made first junior lord of the treasury and then undersecretary for the colonies. During his brilliant career he was chancellor of the exchequer (1852–1855), leader of the Liberal Party (1867), and Prime Minister four times (1868–1874; 1880–1885; 1886; 1892–1894). Milestones in his career are the disestablishment of the Irish Church, two Home Rule bills for Ireland (1886, 1893), both defeated, and the denunciation of Turkish atrocities in Bulgaria. The most prominent man in politics of his time, he was rivaled only by his Tory opponent, Benjamin Disraeli. In spite of his full career, he found time for considerable writing. His works include The State in its Relations to the Church (1838), Letters on the State Persecutions of the Neoplatonic Government (1851), Studies on Homer and the Homeric Age (1858), Juvenis Mundi (1869), and pamphlets on Bulgarian Horrors (1876, 1877), Homeric Syncretism (1876), and Gleanings of Past Year (1879).

Glanvill, Joseph (1636–1680). English clergyman and philosopher, one of the Cambridge Plato-nists. Although he was a scientist and a skeptic who supported the Royal Society in his Plus Ultra, or the Progress and Advancement of Knowledge since the time of Aristotle (1668), in other works he defended the pre-existence of souls and belief in witchcraft. His best-known book The Vanity of Dogmatizing (1661) contains the theme of Matthew Arnold’s poem The Scholar Gypsy (1853).
Glasgow, Ellen [Anderson Gholson] (1874-1945). American novelist. One of her country's greatest regional writers, Ellen Glasgow confined her work to the study of the South as typified in Virginia, her native state. In all, she wrote 19 novels, and Henry Seidel Canby has said, "she was a major historian of our times, who, almost singlehandedly, rescued Southern fiction from the glimmering sentimentality of the Lost Cause."

Although her early books, such as The Battle-Ground (1902), were in the tradition of the Southern romance, she was already in revolt against what she called the "sanctified fallacies" of the South, and the growth of her art may be measured by contrasting these with Virginia, a characteristic study of a woman in a particular time and place. The years following World War I saw the appearance of what was probably her most distinguished work, the novels BAREN GROUND, THE ROMANTIC COMEDIANS, They Stood to Folly (1929), and The Sheltered Life (1932). As she grew older, she became more conservative, rejecting the work of such Southerners as William Faulkner and regretting the loss of manners that the modern world had brought.

Her later works include Vein of Iron (1935) and In This Our Time (1941), which was awarded a Pulitzer Prize. A Certain Measure: An Interpretation of Prose Fiction (1943) is a valuable statement on her art as well as a helpful account of the grand design of her novels. The Woman Within (1954), her autobiography, and Letters of Ellen Glasgow (1955) were published after her death.

GlasPELL, Susan (1882-1948). American novelist and dramatist. Miss Glaspell early wrote short stories and, in 1909, a novel, The Glory of the Conquered. With her husband, George Cram Cook, she organized the PROVINCETOWN PLAYERS, an experimental theater designed to combat the commercialism of Broadway. For its opening, she and her husband wrote the satiric one-act play, Suppressed Desires (1915). Miss Glaspell wrote several other novels: Fidelity (1915), Brooks Evans (1928), and Judd Rankin's Daughter (1945). Among her plays are The People (1917), Bernice (1919), The Verge (1921), and Alison's House (1930), which was based on the life of Emily Dickinson and awarded a Pulitzer Prize. The Road to the Temple (1926) is a biography of her husband.

Glasperlenspiel, Das. See MAGISTER LULLI.

Glass Menagerie, The (1944). A play by Tennessee Williams. With Tom Wingfield narrating both the introduction and the conclusion, the play is set in memory. It takes place shortly before Tom left home for the merchant marines and focuses on his mother, who constantly imagines scenes of the "gentlemen callers" of her girlhood, and on his sister Laura, who has withdrawn from the real world into the private universe of her glass animals. The mother insists that Tom bring home a gentleman caller for Laura, and when he does the friend breaks the horn on Laura's glass unicorn, making the animal less of a freak and allowing her momentarily to break out of the world of her menagerie.

However, after kissing Laura, the friend admits that he is already engaged; Laura's emergence from her fragile world is left in doubt.

Glastonbury. An ancient town in Somerset, England, dating from Roman times. It is traditionally associated with Arthurian legend and with the Holy Grail. It is at Glastonbury that Joseph of Arimathea is said to have established the first Christian Church in England and, earlier, to have planted his staff, which took root and became the Glastonbury thorn that burst into blossom every Christmas eve. Local legend has it that Arthur and Guinevere are buried there, and it has been recorded of the historical Arthur that he was buried there. Most of the Arthurian romances, however, place Arthur in AVALON after his death.

Glauces (Glaukos). Once a fisherman of Boeotia. He became a sea-god endowed with the gift of prophecy and instructed Apollo in the art of soothsaying.

Glauces (Glaukos). In ancient Greek myth, a son of Sisyphus and father of Bellerophon. Because he would not allow his horses to breed, Aphrodite maddened them until they killed him.

Glauces (Glaukos). A mythical leader of Lycian troops in the Trojan War. For the story of his meeting with Diomedes, see DIOMEDean SWAP.

Glauces (Glaukos). In ancient Greek myth, a son of Minos. He drowned in a vat of honey. Minos ordered the seer Polyidios, once he had found the child, to revive him. The Curetes told Polyidios to find the most pat simile for a cow of three colors. When Polyidios mentioned the fruit of the dog rose, he saw a snake and killed it. The snake's mate re-stored the first snake with a herb, which Polyidios promptly used on Glauces with success. Later, however, Polyidios was angry with Minos for confining him to the palace. He had taught the art of divination to Glauces, but on finally leaving Crete, he made Glauces spit into his mouth and the boy forget everything he had learned.

Gleizes, Albert. See ABBATy GROUP, The.

Glencoe or Glen Coe. The valley of the river Coe in western Scotland. It was the scene of the massacre of Glencoe (1692), in which governmental troops led by a member of the clan of Campbell treacherously murdered 38 members of the Macdonald clan because of their Jacobite sympathies.

Glinka, Mikhail Ivanovich (1804-1857). The first important Russian composer. He wrote Ivan Susanin, or A Life for the Czar, the first Russian national opera, in 1836; Russian and Ludmilla, after a poem by Pushkin, in 1842; and overtures, symphonies, and orchestral suites.

Globe, The. Elizabethan playhouse built in 1599 by Richard and Cuthbert Burbage on the bankside of the Thames. The Globe became the permanent home of the Lord Chamberlain's (later King's) Men, Shakespeare's company, and it was here that his greatest plays, including Hamlet, Macbeth, King Lear, and Othello, were first presented. The Globe was un- questionably the most popular theater in London and its design—about which there is considerable controversy among scholars—became the model for the numerous theaters that sprang up in the early years of the 17th century. In June, 1613, the Globe was consumed by fire during a presentation of Shake-Gobbo, Old.

In Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice, the "sand-blind, high-gravel blind" father of Launcelot Gobbo. He encounters his son after an absence in an amusing scene of reconciliation.
Go-Between, The (1953). A novel by L. P. Hartley. A tragic love triangle is observed by an uncomprehending 13-year-old schoolboy, who carries messages between the adult characters.

Gobineau, Comte Joseph Arthur de (1816-1882). French diplomat, writer, and Orientalist. His best-known work, the sociological treatise Essai sur l'intégralité des races humaines (1853-5), advanced an early form of the theory of Aryan, or Teutonic, racial superiority. His skillful Oriental tales, such as Ariette Phrangopaulo (1872), Mademoiselle Irinois (1847), or Adélaïde (1913), represent Gobineau's best writing. He also published works concerning the Italian Renaissance, and Oriental religions and philosophies.

goblin. A familiar demon. It lived, according to popular belief, in private houses and chinks of trees; in many parts miners attribute those strange noises heard in mines to them. The word is the Fr. gobelin, probably a diminutive of the surname Gobel, but perhaps connected with Gr. kobalos, an impudent rogue, a mischievous sprite, or with the Ger. Kobold. As a specimen of forced etymology, it may be mentioned that Johnson, in his Dictionary, records that this word some derive from the Gibellines, a faction in Italy; so that elfe and goblin is Guelph and Gibeline because the children of either party were terrified by their nurses with the name of the other.

Godey, Louis Antoine. See Godey's Lady's Book.

Godey's Lady's Book. An American magazine of the mid-19th century. Famous for its hand-colored fashion plates and its art reproductions, Godey's Lady's Book found its way into 40,000 homes. Louis A. Godey (1804-1878) founded the magazine in 1830, and was its sole editor for six years; he then bought Sarah Josepha Hale's Ladies' Magazine and shared its editorship with her. Mrs. Hale (1788-1879), the author of Mary Had a Little Lamb (1830), was an advocate of women's rights and leader of the movement for a national Thanksgiving Day. Mrs. Hale retired in 1877, Godey died the following year, and the magazine continued publication only until 1898.

Godferneaux, A. See Tristan Bernard.

Godfrey, Thomas (1736-1763). American poet and dramatist. The son of a Philadelphia glazier, Godfrey was apprenticed to a local watchmaker at 13. Wholly self-educated, he wrote songs and Chaucerian adaptations which attracted the attention of William Smith and the young poets at the College of Philadelphia. He died while on military duty in North Carolina. Two years later his friend Nathaniel Evans collected and published his poems as Juvenile Poems on Various Subjects. The volume included Godfrey's Prince of Partlia, often called the first American play.

Godfrey de Bouillon. See Goffredo.

Godiva, Lady (11th century). English benefactress, wife of Earl Leofric of Mercia. According to tradition, she asked her husband to relieve Coventry of certain burdensome taxes (c. 1040), but he insisted that she would do so only if she would ride naked through the marketplace at midday. She did, covered only by her long hair, and Leofric kept his promise. In some versions, she had previously requested all the townspeople to stay indoors at the appointed hour, and not to look at her; one tailor, since known as "Peeping Tom of Coventry," looked through his window, for which a miracle struck him blind. The legend appears as one of Walter Savage Landor's Imaginary Conversations (1829), Alfred Tennyson's poem Godiva, A Tale of Coventry (1842), and a number of other literary works.

Godkin, Edwin Lawrence (1831-1902). Irish-born American journalist, editor, and author. In 1865 Godkin helped to found The Nation and became its first editor. When the magazine became the weekly edition of the New York Post (1881), Godkin became associate editor of that newspaper, and later, editor-in-chief (1883-1900). Among his achievements was the establishment of higher standards for book reviewing. His published works include Reflections and Comments, 1865-95 (1899), and The History of Hungary and the Magyars (1853).

Gododin (c. 600). A poem by the Welsh bard Canu Aneurin (fl. c. 600). It is important in connection with Arthurian legend because it contains the first known reference to an Arthur. The poem is about the battle of Catterach (603) in which the tribe of the Gododin was defeated by the Saxons.

Go Down, Moses (1942). A collection of short stories by William Faulkner. Set in Faulkner's mythical Yoknapatawpha County, the stories are unified by a common theme, the ritual of the hunt—which it be a hunt for Old Ben in The Bear, for the lovesick Negro in Was, for buried gold in The Fire and the Heath, or for the Negro killer in Pantaloons in Black. All but the last deal with the members, black and white, of the complicated McCaslin family, beginning with the second generation in Was and ending with the sixth in Delta Autumn. There is, in addition, an underlying theme of initiation into manhood and the responsibility of carrying out the social traditions.

The Bear, the most famous of the stories and possibly Faulkner's best, deals mainly with the hunt for Big Ben, an enormous and elusive bear. A shorter but equally important section tells how Isaac McCaslin, through the discovery of his grandfather's Negro offspring, rejects his claim to the McCaslin plantation and the guilt of slavery with which it is stained.

Gody Alcaya, Lucila. See Gabriela Mistral.

God's Determinations Touching His Elect. A long poem on the Puritan theory of Grace by Edward TAYLOR, begun around 1685 but unpublished until 1939. It combines elements of the cycle of lyric poems and of the medieval morality play. The imagery is alternately regal and homely, using 11 different verse forms. While not a play, the poem is cast as a drama. The first act traces man's predicament since the Fall; the second shows Christ and Satan battling for man's soul; the third describes the difficulties of the Christian life and the soul's fear of unworthiness; the last shows the soul entering the royal coach of Grace and flying to the feast of love in heaven.

God's Little Acre (1933). A novel by Erskine Caldwell, dealing with shiftless and amoral Georgia mountaineers. The protagonist has set aside one acre of his land the income of which is to go to the church, but he constantly shifts the acre's location according to his own momentary plans and needs.

gods of classical mythology. The deities of the Greeks and Romans. The Romans identified many of their own deities with those of the Greeks. Since Greek mythology was far richer and more imaginative, the characteristics of the Greek gods tended to dominate those of the Roman deities. However, in later ages, knowledge of Greek mythology was generally gained through Roman sources, and the Roman names of the gods—and even the Latinized spelling of the Greek names—were more widely known. Those Greek and Roman deities who, in later times, were regarded as equivalent are as follows:

These were the 12 chief gods, the Olympians of Greek mythology. Other well-known gods were:

- Dionysus (Bakchos)
- Eros
- Hades (Plouton)
- Kronus
- Persephone

A Greek hero equally popular with the Romans was Hercules, whose Latin name is Heracles.

For the chief deities of Scandinavian mythology, see Asat and Vanir.

God that Failed, The (1950). A collection of essays edited by R. H. S. Crossman. Written by persons who were attracted to Communism in the 1930's and were later disillusioned, it is an important document on a phase of modern history and thought. The contributors are Arthur Koestler, Ignazio Silone, Richard Wright, André Gide, Louis Fischer, and Stephen Spender.

Godunov, Boris Feodorovich (1552–1605). Russian czar (1598–1605). After the death of Ivan IV (Ivan the Terrible) in 1584, Godunov became regent for the imbecile Feodor I. He was elected to the throne on the death of Feodor. The mysterious death of the czarevich Dmitri (1591) is presumed to have been caused by Boris to clear his path to the throne. As regent he brought new vitality to the Russian nation, regaining land in Sweden and colonizing Siberia. After he became czar he lost the support of the nobility; his prestige was weakened by the appearance of a pretender claiming to be the murdered Dmitri. Boris died shortly after the false Dmitri invaded from Poland, but before the two men had confronted each other.

The poet Pushkin wrote a play called Boris Godunov, which was the basis of Mussorgski's opera of the same name.

Godwin, William (1756–1836). English novelist and political theorist. A leading radical of the 18th century, he believed that it is impossible to be rationally persuaded and not act accordingly, and that therefore, man could live in harmony without law and institutions; he believed in the perfectibility of man. He was influenced by the ideas of Rousseau and the French Encyclopedists, and in turn had a great influence on the English Romantics, particularly Wordsworth, Coleridge, Shelley, and Byron; Shelley's Preface to his Revolt of Islam is an excellent exposition of Godwin's ideas. Among Godwin's works are An Enquiry Concerning the Principles of Political Justice, and its Influence on General Virtue and Happiness; The Adventures of Caleb Williams, or Things as They Are, a novel; St. Leon (1799) a supernatural tale; and a History of the Commonwealth (1824–1828). Godwin's wife was the feminist Mary Wollstonecraft, and his daughter, Mary Wollstonecraft Shelley, was Shelley's second wife.

Goebbels, Paul Joseph (1897–1945). Minister of propaganda in Nazi Germany. After the collapse of Germany in World War II he poisoned himself and his family.

Goering, Hermann Wilhelm (1893–1946). Minster of aviation in Nazi Germany. Captured by the Allies (1945), he committed suicide before his scheduled execution.

Goes, Hugo van der (1440–1482). Flemish painter. Belonging to the school of the van Eycks, his religious scenes are known for their vigorous personalization of figures, strength of color, and tension in attitudes and spatial conception.

Goethe, Johann Wolfgang von (1749–1832). German poet, playwright, and novelist. Besides writing, he held an important cabinet post at the ducal court in Weimar, directed the theater in that city, and carried on extensive research in science, especially plant biology, on which he wrote Die Metamorphose der Pflanzen (The Metamorphosis of Plants, 1790), and optics, the subject of his Zur Farbenlehre (On the Theory of Colors, 1810). In his scientific studies, he always attempted to see the individual phenomenon as part of an organic, developing whole, in opposition to the categorizing science of his time. His poetic works, too, are characterized by this interest in the natural, organic development of things, rather than in any idealistic schemes.

In his early career (1769–1776), Goethe was recognized as a leading figure in the Sturm und Drang. His well-known poem Prometheus (written 1774?), with its insistence that man must believe not in
William plays the role of a romantic poet, and his emotionalism do not go unnoted. The influence of Schiller, in particular, leads the young Goethe to identify with the city of Weimar. It was there that he first assumed serious governmental responsibility; and it was there that he met the woman he was to marry for a decade, Charlotte von Stein. These years, until 1786, were not very productive for Goethe the writer, but they did contribute much to the characteristic personal balance that appears in his later work.

Goethe spent the years 1786–1788 in Italy, a trip that he later described in his Italienische Reise (Italian Trip, 1816) and which significantly influenced his growing commitment to a classical view of art. In Italy, he completed his play Iphigenia in Tauris, which, along with his Römische Elegien (Roman Elegies, 1788–1790, pub. 1795) and the play Torquato Tasso, is customarily taken as the beginning of Weimar Classicism.

From this point on, Goethe's life was relatively settled and though he traveled much, his base was always Weimar where he was, in effect, the court's cultural director. But his poetic development was by no means finished. In 1794 began his close and fruitful friendship with Schiller, and the ensuing years saw his work expand into new directions, as in the epic poems Reineke Fuchs and Hermann und Dorothea, and the novel Wilhelm Meister. He was also in contact with the founding figures of German Romanticism, especially the brothers Schlegel, but marked romantic tendencies do not begin to appear in his work until later: for example, in the novel Die Wahlverwandtschaften or in Der Westöstliche Divan (The West-Eastern Divan, 1819), a lyric cycle that shares the romantics' interest in the Orient; and in Part II of Faust.

In a sense, Goethe's development came full circle. At the beginning of his so-called classical period (1788–1805) he had repudiated the emotionalism of his own Werther; but as time went on, he tended back toward his earlier attitudes. In his lyric Trilogie der Leidenschaft (Trilogy of Passion, 1824), one poem, addressed to the character Werther, shows the extent of his regained understanding and sympathy for his own youthful works.

At times, Goethe was grossly insensitive to the merits of such great authors as Hölderlin, Kleist, and Heine, but with himself he was never less than honest; despite the extraordinary length of time spanned by his career, he never stagnated, but was always learning and expanding, seeking to grasp more of what he regarded as the poet's proper domain, the entire world.

Valuable material about his life and personality may be found in his autobiographical Dichtung und Wahrheit and in Johann Eckermann's Gespräche mit Goethe (Conversations with Goethe, 1836). See also DAEMONIC; MÄRCHEN; Johann Lavater.

Goethe, William (1605–1679). English reciter. One of the judges at the trial of Charles I, he fled to America in 1660 with his father-in-law, Edward Whalley (1616–1679). Their mysterious wanderings in New England, where they lived for many years, turned them into legendary figures. Goethe's career appears in numerous literary works, notably Scott's Peveril of the Peak (1823), Cooper's The Wept of Wish-Ton-Wish (1829), and J. K. Paulding's The Eribean and His Daughter (1849).

Goefredo (Godfrey de Bouillon). The principal character of Tasso's romantic epic Gerusalemme Liberata. When the poem was first translated by Thomas Carew in 1594, and completed by Edward Fairfax in 1600, its English title was Godfrey of Bullogne. Godfrey, duke of Lorraine, was the chosen commander of the allied Crusaders who assaulted Jerusalem in the year 1099. He was also for a time king of Jerusalem. In Tasso's poem, though divinely appointed, he must contend with infidel forces, enchantments, infernal spirits, and division in his ranks; but he finally leads the triumphant Christian army into the city. In worship at the sepulcher of Christ, he hangs his arms in fulfillment of his vow to recover the holy city.

Gog. In the Bible (Ezek. 38:39), the king of Magog, a northern land whose fierce hordes were to invade Israel. Scholars sometimes identify Gog with Gyges, a ruler of Lydia in Asia Minor. In Revelation 20:7, Gog and Magog symbolize the enemies of the kingdom of God, in this case Gog being associated with Magog, a son of Japheth (Gen. 10:2). Elsewhere (I Chron. 5:4), Gog is a descendant of Reuben, eldest of the 12 sons of Jacob.

In British legend, Gog and Magog are the sole survivors of a monstrous brood, the offspring of the 33 infamous daughters of the Emperor Diocletian, who murdered their husbands and, being set adrift in a ship, reached Albion, where they fell in with a number of demons. Their descendants, a race of giants were extirpated by Brutus and his companions, with the exception of Gog and Magog, who were brought in chains to London and were made to do duty as porters at the royal palace, on the site of the London Guildhall, where their effigies have been at least since the reign of Henry V. The old giants were destroyed in the Great Fire of 1666, and the present ones, 14 feet high, were carved in 1708 by Richard Saunders.

Cogarty, Oliver St. John (1878–1957). Irish physician and writer of memoirs, essays, and poetry. He was said to be the original of Malachi (Buck) Mulligan in James Joyce's Ulysses. His exuberant memoirs are full of reminiscences of his friends, including Joyce, William Butler Yeats, and other Irish writers. Among his books of memoirs are As I Was Going Down Sackville Street (1937) and I Follow St. Patrick (1938).

Gogol, Nikolai Vasilevich (1809–1852). Russian novelist, dramatist, and short-story writer. Gogol was born in the Ukraine in the province of Poltava. His father, a member of the petty nobility, had a small estate and was an amateur playwright. Gogol used some lines from his father's plays as epigraphs for his early stories in the collection Vechera na khotore bliz Dikan'ki (Evenings on a Farm Near Dikanka; 1831–1832). After attending school in the Ukraine, Gogol went to St. Petersburg where he worked as a government clerk and as a teacher, for a short while lecturing in history at St. Petersburg University. His first attempt at literary work, a short poem called Itil'ta (1829) was mildly successful. This encouraged Gogol to try a long narrative poem, Hans Ksotchel'egarten (1829), which turned out to be a disaster. In 1831, Gogol met Pushkin and established a friendship that lasted until the great poet's death. Pushkin was impressed with Gogol's Dikanka tales, which were largely based on Ukrainian folklore with an admixture of Gogol's own fantasy. Even these early tales reveal some features characteristic of Gogol's mature style: a rich mixture of vulgarisms and high-flown rhetorical rhetoric with often sharp juxtapositions between the two levels.

Gogol's next published work was Arabeski (Arabesques, 1835), containing a collection of essays and three of his St. Petersburg stories: Nekotorye prospekty (Newski Prospect), Portret (The Portrait), and Zapiski cunashchego (Diary of a Madman). The last story is a remarkable depiction of the mind of the lunatic Poprishchin, a civil servant who comes to believe that he is the king of Spain. In the same year Gogol published a collection of Ukrainian stories entitled Mirgorod, including Staroves'tskie pomeschiki (Old-world Landowners), Taras Bulba, VII, and Povest o tom, kak posposilja Ivan Ivanovich s Ivanom Nikiforovishem (The Story of How Ivan Ivanovich Quarreled with Ivan Nikiforovich). Two more stories, Kolyska (The Carriage) and Nos (The Nose), appeared in 1836. The Nose is another example of Gogol's predilection for fantasy, a story about a man whose nose abruptly leaves him and gads about town, wearing clothes and riding in a fine carriage. In April, 1836, the first performance of Gogol's satiric comedy The Inspector General was given. The mixed reaction to the play upset the author, who was always extremely sensitive about the public's attitude to his work. He left Russia for Europe, traveled in Italy, Germany, Switzerland, and France, and finally settled down in Rome. Except for short visits to Russia in 1839-1840 and 1841-1842, he was abroad for 12 years. Gogol had taken with him from Russia a few chapters of his novel, Dead Souls, which was completed in Rome and published in 1842 in a four-volume edition of his works. Also in the edition was his famous story The Overcoat and all his previously published work.

After the publication of the first part of Dead Souls, which was well received in Russia, Gogol began writing to friends and publishing requests for material to use in the planned second part of the work. Whether he felt his creative power failing or whether he really believed that accounts of daily life from amateur correspondents would be useful is obscure. In any case, and increasingly obsessed with a religious mania, Gogol aimlessly traveled about Europe, took a pilgrimage to Palestine, and eventually returned to Russia in 1848. His reception in his homeland was cool, at least among the radical intelligentsia. Two years before his return, Gogol had published a didactic work entitled Vybrannye mesta iz perepiski s dru'yami (Selected Passages from Correspondence with Friends, 1846) in which he upheld the autocratic Czarist regime and the patriarchal Russian way of life and advised landowners to allow their peasants to read only the Bible lest they pick up dangerous ideas. The book stirred up a storm of protest among the radicals and elicited a violent letter from the critic Vissarion Belinski, which became at least as well known in Russia, though it was banned from print, as the book that caused it to be written. What Belinski and the other radicals failed to notice was that Gogol himself had never explicitly criticized the social system in Russia. His critics merely assumed that previously such was the implication of his writings. From 1848 until his death (1852), Gogol fell more and more into melancholia, aggravated by his fears of spiritual damnation. Shortly after burning some of his manuscripts, including the second part of Dead Souls, he took to his bed and died.

Gogol is recognized as one of the greatest writers in Russian literature from the point of view of the imaginativeness and stylistic richness of his work. No Russian author has handled the wealth of the Russian language so well. Gogol's choice of everyday life as the basis of much of his work had a profound effect on future Russian literature, although the degree and the purposes of his realism as interpreted by Belinski and later radical critics are doubtful. Whether he intended it or not, Gogol's work was held up as a model for later Russian writers, who turned their attention to a sympathetic observation and realistic description of the lower levels of Russian society.

Despite his later evidences of conservatism and religiosity, Gogol is viewed by Soviet critics, as he was early in his career by Belinski, as a realist who used his work to point out social evils with the aim of bringing about reform. His development in the last years of his life, including the Selected Passages, is regarded officially as the result of mental aberration.

Gold, Michael. Pen name of Irving Granich (1894– ). American writer. One of the major figures in American "proletarian literature," Gold was the first to define the term clearly in his article Towards Proletarian Art published in Liberator magazine (Feb. 1921), while his later novel Jews Without Money (1935) became a model for aspiring proletarian novelists.

Goldberg, Isaac (1887–1938). American writer. He is known for his interest in language, which resulted in The Wonder of Words (1938), and for his books introducing Latin-American literature to the American public: Studies in Spanish-American Literature (1920) and Brazilian Literature (1922). Other works include a book on William S. Gilbert and the Gilbert and Sullivan operettas (1913), Tin Pan Alley (1930), and biographies of H. L. Mencken (1925) and Havelock Ellis (1926).

The golden apple, he drops the beetle, or gold bug, through one eye of a skull, and unearths a fortune. The story takes place on Sullivan's Island off South Carolina.

Golden Apple. See Apple of Discord; Atalanta.

Golden Ass, The (2nd century). The common, alternative title of the Metamorphoses, a satirical romance, by Lucius Apuleius. It is narrated in the first person by Lucius, a licentious young man with insatiable curiosity about people and things. While visiting a sorceress in Thessaly, he induces a maid to steal a magic potion which will turn him into an owl. He takes the wrong potion and turns into an ass instead. In this disapproving form he wanders throughout Greece, passing through the hands of a series of owners who mistreat him. Interspersed throughout the narrative are lively stories of intrigue, witchcraft, and love, most famous of which is Cupid and Psyche. Lucius is finally restored to his human form with the help of the goddess Isis.

Ever since its first appearance, The Golden Ass has enjoyed an unusually sustained popularity. The book's influence has been considerable and can best be seen in such writers as Boecaccio, Cervantes, and Rabelais. Apuleius borrowed his stories and plots from Greek predecessors; he may have based his book on the same work by Lucius of Patrae that inspired Lucian's novel Lucius, or the Ass.

Golden Bough, The (1890-1915). A comprehensive work on comparative religion and mythology by Sir James George Frazer. The general title of the 12 volumes refers to the branch broken from a sacred tree by Aeneas before his descent into the underworld. Although many of his conclusions have been discredited, Frazer's book was a seminal work in its field, and most subsequent scholarship recognizes a great debt to it. In its single-volume condensation, it has become a popular classic. The Golden Bough had a significant influence on the literary world, and played an important part in the conception of Finnegans Wake by James Joyce and of The Waste Land by T. S. Eliot. See King of the Wood.

Golden Bowl, The (1904). A novel by Henry James. The heroine, Maggie Verver, the daughter of an American millionaire, marries the impoverished Prince Achille St. Averil. Her old school friend, Charlotte Stant, who has had an affair with the prince, later marries Adam Verver, Maggie's father, and continues her relationship with her lover. The second part of the novel deals with Maggie's discovery of the liaison and with her reaction to it. This is generally considered to be James's most difficult work.

Golden Calf. An image of worship made of gold earrings and other jewelry by the Hebrews under the direction of Aaron, while Moses was receiving the Ten Commandments (Ex. 20) on Mount Sinai. When Moses returned with the two stone tablets on which were written the laws and found his people adoring the image (a form of Baal-worship), he destroyed the tablets and threw the powdered dust of the calf into the spring of Marah. After he had led his people in repentance, he returned to the mount and received two new tablets.

Golden Dog, The (unauthorized, 1877; auth. ed., 1896). A novel by William Kirby (1817-1906), English-born Canadian novelist and editor. This was the first Canadian novel to achieve widespread popularity. The story, set in old French Quebec, served as a model for numerous Canadian historical romances in the 19th century and later.

Golden Fleece, the. In Greek mythology, the fleece of pure gold, taken from a miraculous winged ram. Athamas, a son of Aeolus and ruler of Bocotia, married the phantom Nephele (see Ixtov), who bore him a son Phrixus and a daughter Helle. He also became the father of Learchus and Melicertes by Cadmus' daughter Ino. Jealous of Nephele, Ino persuaded the Bocotian women secretly to parch the seed wheat, then caused a false oracle to be brought from Delphi: only the sacrifice of Phrixus and Helle would save the crops. At the last moment, a winged, golden ram was sent by Hermes, and Phrixus and Helle escaped on its back. As it flew, Helle fell and was drowned in the Hellespont, the straits thereafter named in her honor. Phrixus reached Colchis at the eastern end of the Black Sea; he gave the ram to King Aetes, who nailed its fleece to an oak in the grove of Ares, and married Aetes' daughter Chalciope, who bore him four sons. The fleece was later seized by the Argonauts and returned to Iolcus.

Golden Horde. A body of Mongol Tartars of the 13th century. They overran eastern Europe, and were so called from the magnificent tent of Batu Khan, grandson of Genghis Khan. The kingdom of the Golden Horde at its height reached from the Dniester to central Asia. It was overthrown by Ivan III of Russia (1480), and broke up into a number of smaller khanates with that of Astrakhan representing the Golden Horde.

Golden Legend, The (1483). A compilation of lives of the saints and other ecclesiastical commentaries, one of the most popular books published by William Caxton. It drew on the material in the Latin Legenda Aurea of Jacobus de Voragine (1230-1298), but was based mostly on French and English versions.

Golden Legend, The (1872). A poem by Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. It is the second part of a trilogy called Christus: A Mystery. The theme is a variant of the Faust legend, reflecting the attitudes of the Middle Ages toward Christian truths.

Golden Rose, the. The annual custom whereby the Pope bestowed upon a worthy individual or place an exquisite rose made of gold. In 1494, Pope Alexander VI presented the rose to King Charles VIII of France in hope of dissuading him from invading Italy—to no avail.

Golden Treasury of the Best Songs and Lyrical Poems in the English Language, The (1861; second series 1897). An anthology of poetry from the 16th to mid-19th century by F. T. Palgrave. A monument to late romantic taste (particularly in its predilection for the short lyric), it was one of the most influential of English anthologies.

Golding, Louis (1895-1958). English novelist. Among his novels of Jewish life in a large industrial town are Magnolia Street (1932) and Five Silver Daughters (1934).

Golding, William (1911— ). English novelist. He is the author of The Inheritors (1955), Lord of the Flies, Pincher Martin (U.S. title The Two Deaths of Christopher Martin), Free Fall (1959), The Inheritors (1962), and The Spire (1964). Golding calls his books fables and uses them to express his rather grim view of the world—the view that most men are basically evil and life is a tooth-and-claw affair. His World War II experiences in the navy and his years spent teaching small boys have helped to shape his philosophical attitudes. Master of strange situations and ironic surprise twists, Golding also enriches his books with symbols and literary, mythological, and Christian allusions.

Goldoni, Carlo (1707-1793). Italian dramatist. Born in Venice, he wrote some 150 comedies through which he became the creator of the modern Italian comedy in the style of Molière, superseding the traditional commedia dell'arte, then vigorously defended by Carlo Gozzi. His comedies, written in Italian and in the Venetian dialect, depict the foibles of the middle and lower classes of Venice and offer a true-to-life portrayal of character and action absent in the older commedia technique of improvisation carried out by stock characters. His finest comedies appeared in the years 1748-1760. Among them are La Bottega del Caffè, La Locandiera, La Vedova Scaltra, La Famiglia dell'Antiquario, and the dialect plays I Rusteghi and Le Barone Chiosote. In his Mémoires (trans., 1877), which like his last plays were written in French, he described his verbal warfare with the traditionalists of the theater and stated: "The secret of the art of a writer of comedies is to cling to nature and never to leave her." A writer for the Italian theater in Paris and pensioned by Louis XIV, he was impoverished as a result of the French Revolution.

Goldsmith, Oliver (1731-1774). Irish-born English poet, playwright, and novelist. Educated in Ireland, he left for Edinburgh in 1752, and never returned. He studied medicine for a while at Leyden in 1754, then made the Grand Tour of the Continent, returning to England in 1756, where he became engaged in literary hackwork, and, for a time, was employed by Samuel Richardson, the printer and novelist. His literary fame began with The Traveller, a didactic poem surveying national modes of happiness, which was praised by Samuel Johnson and other members of the Literary Club. His major works include An Enquiry into the Present State of Polite Learning in Europe (1759), a prose essay attributing the decline of polite learning to the inferiority of poets; The Bee (1759), a periodical containing perhaps his most famous tales—Reveller at the Boar's Head Tavern and Asem, An Eastern Tale; The Citizen of the World, a satiric epistolary novel in imitation of Montesquieu's Lettres Persanes (1721); The Vicar of Wakefield, a novel; The Deserted Village, a poem; and The Good Natur'd Man and She Stoops to Conquer, comedies. A beloved member of Dr. Johnson's circle, he was noted for his comic verbal faux-pas, though it seems that Goldsmith buffooned purposely on occasion without his friends ever suspecting it. At the end of his life he returned to their raillery in a series of brilliant caricatures, The Retaliation (1774). See Goldy; Goody Two-shoes; Hermit, The.

Goldy. The pet name given to Oliver Goldsmith by Dr. Samuel Johnson. David Garrick said of Goldsmith, "He wrote like an angel and talked like poor Poll."

Golgotha. See Calvary.

Goliardic verse. The light Latin verse of 12th- and 13th-century Germany, France, and England by university students and wandering clergies, minstrels, and jongleurs. This poetry was of two types: scurrilous satire defying all kinds of civil and ecclesiastical authority, including the Pope; and gay, nonchalant, ribald celebrations of nature, women, and wine, including some drinking songs still popular. The Goliards, as the authors were called, often referred to a mythical Golias as their leader and patron, ironically dignifying him with the titles of "Bishop" (episcopus) and "Archpoet" (archipoesa). He is sometimes identified with Primus, a 12th-century scholar from Orleans. The Confession of Golias, as well as much other Goliardic verse, was once attributed to Walter Map. A large collection of this poetry was published in Germany as Carmina Burana (1847), some of which J. A. Symonds translated in his Wine, Women, and Song (1884). Carl Orff set Carmina Burana to music in 1935.

Goliath. See David.

Golovlyov Family, The (Gospoda Golovlyovy; 1872-1876). A novel, written under the pen name N. Shchedrin by Mikhail Saltykov. It depicts the dissolution of a Russian provincial landowning family. Arina Petrovna, the rapacious mother of the family, dominates her husband and alienates her four children, caring only for adding to her estates. The land eventually passes to her son Porfiri, who is nick-named Iudushka (Little Judas). He proves to be just as grasping and unloving as his mother had been, driving away his own children. The gloomy chronicle comes to an end with the unctuous Iudushka sinking into ruin and death through drink. The novel is one of the classics of 19th-century Russian realism.

Gomberville, Marin le Roy, Sieur de (1600–1674). French novelist. An original member of the Académie française, Gomberville wrote novels of heroic adventure, usually set in exotic lands and historical periods with which the author had little familiarity. La Caritie (1621), Polexandrine (1629–1637), and La Cythérède (1640) lushly evoked an imagined Central America and North Africa. Polexandrine, the author's most important work, was the five-volume tale of a beautiful island queen and the travels of her knight Polexandrine around the world; it included the first description of seacape and tempest to be found in French literature. Upon his conversion to Jansenism in 1651, Gomberville published La Jeune Alcicidane, a Christian sequel to Polexandrine, with the intention of countering what he supposed to be the nefarious effect of the earlier book.

Gómez de la Serna, Ramóñ (1888–1926). Spanish writer. A prolific author, he is known for his biographies, which range in scope from Goya to Oscar Wilde (1929) and include Lope de Vega (1945), El Greco, Azorín, and Valle-Inclán. His major achievement, however, is his invention and subsequent use of greguería, a strange literary form which joins humor with the metaphoric conceit in a startling manner: "the pillows resting on the window sill are pulcinellas tired of the night's performance," or "Bottle, wine's coffin." This style forms the basis of such works as El torero Caracho (1926), La malicia de las acacias (1927), and La Nardi (1934).

Gomorrah. See Sodom and Gomorrah.

Gompers, Samuel (1850–1924). English-born American labor leader. Arriving in the U.S. in 1863, Gompers joined the cigarmakers' Union and became its president in 1877. He played an important role in the organization of the American Federation of Labor, which he headed from 1886 until his death (except for the year 1895). Devoted to practical ends, such as improvements in wages and hours, he believed that unions should avoid political alliances.

Gonçalves Dias, António (1823–1864). Brazilian poet and ethnologist. Perhaps Brazil's first truly national poet, Gonçalves Dias was a fervent patriot who wrote verse glorifying the Indian and the tropical landscape. His best-known poem is Canção do Exílio (Song of Exile, 1846), whose first lines—"There are palm trees in my homeland, where the sábia sings"—are familiar to every literate Brazilian.

Goncharov, Ivan Aleksandrovich (1812–1891). Russian novelist. Born in Simbirsk (now Ulyanovsk), Goncharov spent his childhood at the family estate. The richness and comfort of the old patriarchal way of life he experienced there was later immortalized in his major novel, Oblomov. Goncharov's idyll in the country ended in 1822, when he was sent to Moscow to complete his education. He was miserable in the city and consoled himself by reading extensively, forming an interest in literature that led him to enroll in Moscow University's faculty of letters. He graduated in 1834 and entered the civil service. Goncharov's first important novel, Obyknovennaya istoriya (A Common Story, 1844), dealt with the loss of idealistic dreams when a young provincial encounters life in the city. The theme was later to be touched on in Oblomov. The critic Vissarion Belinski called Obyknovennaya istoriya "a terrible blow to romanticism, dreaminess, sentimentality, and provincialism."

In 1849, Goncharov had already completed the first chapters of his masterpiece. He published one of the chapters, "Oblomov's Dream," in that year. Work on the novel was interrupted by a world cruise he took as secretary for a Russian expedition on the ship Pallada from 1852 to 1855. He published a description of the journey in The Frigate Pallada in 1858. The following year, Oblomov appeared.

Goncharov retired from government service in 1867 and completed his third novel, Obyv (The Precipice, 1869), on which he had been working for almost 20 years. The novel contrasted the materialist views of the socialists with those of the old Russian patriarchal world. Goncharov's unmistakable preference for the conservative way of life scandalized the radicals. During the remaining years of his life, Goncharov lived a secluded life in his St. Petersburg apartment, occasionally pulling himself free from his mental depression and illnesses to take a trip abroad. His writings during this period consisted mainly of sketches, articles, and reminiscences. The best known of these works is Mil' on terrani (A Million Torments, 1872), an essay on Wise from Wit, the classic Russian comedy by Aleksandr S. Griboyedov.

Concourt, Edmond (1822–1896) and Jules de (1830–1870). French writers known as the Brothers Goncourt, who collaborated in their work. Early leaders in the movement of Naturalism, the Goncourts were forerunners of Émile Zola. Such novels as Germinie Lacerteux and Madame Gervaisais (1869) are studies of pathological or degenerate subjects. La Fille Élisa (1877), written by Edmond alone, is a realistic description of prostitution. The Brothers Goncourt went to great lengths in order to depict a subject with precision and accuracy. To write Sœur Philomène (1861), for example, they went into hospitals, studying the exact conditions. Their work is episodic in form and impersonal in tone. In addition to their naturalistic novels, the Goncourts wrote several studies of 18th-century costumes, art, and furniture. They were also avid collectors of objects d'art and are thought to have been the first to introduce Japanese art into France. See Prix Goncourt.

Goneril. In Shakespeare's King Lear, the eldest daughter of Lear. The instigator of the cruelties perpetrated on Lear, she refuses to house her father's large entourage. Later she plots with Edmund to kill her husband, the duke of Albany, poisons her sister Regan, who also loves Edmund, and finally stab herself when the plot is discovered.

Gone with the Wind (1936). A historical novel by Margaret Mitchell, an American. At the time of the author's death, it had won a Pulitzer Prize and had sold more than 8,000,000 copies; a motion picture version (1939) was equally successful. The heroine of this, her only book, is Scarlett O'Hara, a fiery Southern belle, whose love for Ashley Wilkes is frustrated when he marries gentle Melanie Hamilton; after being widowed twice, Scarlett weds Rhett Butler, who proves more than a match for her. The novel also depicts, from a Southern viewpoint, the Góngora y Argote, Luis de (1561-1627). Spanish poet. A native of Córdoba, Góngora studied at Salamanca and though he probably had little vocation for the priesthood, he took minor orders, becoming prebendary of Córdoba's cathedral. In 1617 he was ordained and was named chaplain to King Philip III. After suffering an apoplectic stroke in 1626, he retired to Córdoba, where he died.

Góngora's literary career had two distinct phases. Initially, as a disciple of Fernando de Herrera, he wrote verse that was relatively simple and remarkable for its exuberance, charm, and wit. These early poems include Italianate sonnets; romances or ballads (Amarrado al duro banco, Servia en Orán al rey, Angélica y Medoro); and letrillas or songs (Aprended, flores de mi).

After 1600, however, Góngora deliberately cultivated the abstruse style to which he gave his name, Gongorism, and for which his enemies dubbed him Príncipe de las Tinieblas ("Prince of Darkness"). Written for the intellectual elite, his poems in this manner, particularly the Fábula de Polífemo y Galatea and the Soledades, caused a sensation. Though many, including Cervantes, hailed Góngora's innovations, others, notably Lope de Vega and Quevedo, bitterly attacked him.

Góngora's works were first collected by Juan López de Viciuña in 1627. A more complete collection, including the play Las firmezas de Isabela and fragments of two other dramas, was issued in 1633 by Gonzalo de Hozes y Córdoua.

Gongorism (Gongorismo). A Spanish literary style, sometimes called cultismo or culeranismo, used by Luis de Góngora and other 17th-century poets. Designed to appeal to the cultivated (los cultos), it is characterized by an emphasis on Latin terms and syntax, frequent allusions to classical mythology, and lavish use of tropes, metaphors, hyperbole, and antitheses. Gongorism can also be considered as a purely stylistic variant of the contemporaneous literary trend known as CONCEPTISM, which appeared mainly in prose. It had counterparts in the Marinism of Italy and the Euphuism of England. Although Góngora used the style to enhance the sonority and richness of his verse, in the hands of lesser poets it became mere affectation, and Gongorism later became synonymous with bad writing.

Gonne, Maud (1866-1953). Irish patriot and philanthropist. In 1903 she married Major MacBride, an Irish patriot who was executed (1916) by the British after the Easter Rebellion. She was the first diplomatic emissary (1921) of the Irish Free State to Paris. Famous for her beauty and known as an actress, painter, and linguist, she is the heroine of several poems and plays by William Butler Yeats. A Servant of the Queen, her autobiography, was published in 1940.

Gonzalez. Italian noble family of Mantua. It was famed during the Renaissance for its cultural patronage. Outstanding were:

Lodovico Gonzaga (1414-1478), the marquis who employed the painter Mantegna, the architect Alberti, the scholars Pico della Mirandola and Poliziano, and the educator Vittorino da Feltre.

Federico Gonzaga (1440-1484) continued his father's patronage, was skilled in diplomacy, and excelled as a condottiere.

Francesco Gonzaga, son of Federico (1466-1519), married the famous Isabella d'Este and was a military commander during the period.

Elisabetta Gonzaga, his sister (1471-1526), married Duke Guidobaldo of Urbino (see Montefeltro) and became the duchess of Castiglione's Cortegiano (The Courtier).

Federigo Gonzaga, (1500-1540), Francesco's son continued the family tradition by employing Giulio Romano and Pietro Aretino. He was the first duke of Mantua, having received the title from Emperor Charles V.

González Prada, Manuel (1848-1918). Peruvian essayist and poet, famed as a polemicist. A member of a distinguished Peruvian family, González Prada fought in the so-called War of the Pacific (1879-1883), in which Peru suffered a humiliating defeat at the hands of Chile. In a famous speech (1886), he uttered the phrase "old men to the tomb, young men to work," which became the battle cry of those who sought changes in the established order. Uncompromising and incorruptible, he devoted his life to exposing his country's ills in scathing but highly polished prose, hurling his most impassioned invective at the politicians and at the Roman Catholic Church. He became the intellectual mentor of several generations of Peruvian reformers and revolutionaries. Some of his best-known articles and speeches are collected in Páginas libres (1894) and Horas de lucha (1908). He also wrote several volumes of poetry, the best of which is probably Baladas peruanas (1935), which gives a realistic portrayal of Indian life.

Gonzalo. In Shakespeare's The Tempest, the kindly old councillor who peppers his words with wisdom and is mocked for his garrulity by Alonso and Antonio. His ministrations helped save Prospero's life.

Good Companions, The (1929). A novel by J. B. Priestley. Good humorized, and filled with comic characters and varied scenes from English life, it is the story of a group of oddly assorted people who run a touring music-hall company called The Good Companions.

Good Earth, The (1931). A novel by Pearl Buck. It describes the rise of Wang Lung, a Chinese peasant, from poverty to the position of a rich landowner, helped by his patient wife, O-lan. Their vigor, fortitude, persistence, and enduring love of the soil are emphasized throughout. Generally regarded as Pearl Buck's masterpiece, the book won universal acclaim for its sympathetically authentic picture of Chinese life.

Good Friday. The Friday preceding Easter Day, the anniversary of Jesus' Crucifixion. "Good" here means holy; Christmas, as well as Shrove Tuesday, used to be called "the good tide." According to old superstition, those born on Christmas Day or Good Friday have the power of seeing and commanding spirits.

Good Natur'd Man, The (1768). A comedy by Oliver Goldsmith. The story concerns Honeywood, a likeable young man prone to extravagance. His queen, in order to demonstrate that his friends will abandon him if he has no money, has Honeywood arrested for debt. Honeywood is in love with the beautiful, wealthy Miss Richland. When he is released from prison he assumes that a friend of his in the government is responsible for his freedom, though actually it is Miss Richland who is responsible. In the end Honeywood’s uncle arranges a match with Miss Richland.

Good Queen Bess. Elizabeth I of England.

Goodrich, Samuel Griswold (1793–1869). American publisher, editor, author of children’s books, and reformer. Adopting the pseudonym of Peter Parley, Goodrich published a series for children beginning with The Tales of Peter Parley About America (1827).
For about 30 years he wrote volumes of history, geography, science, and travel for children, with the help of several collaborators, including Hawthorne. His best book is considered Rec-collections of a Lifetime (1856).

The patron of many American authors, he introduced Nathaniel Hawthorne to the public in his magazine The Token (1828–1842); some of the best of the Twice-Told Tales first appeared there.
Goodrich’s Parley’s Magazine (1833–1844) also had some distinguished contributors.

Good Samaritan. See Samaritan, Good.

Good Soldier, The (1915). A novel by Ford Madox Ford. The narrator discovers that for the first time his best friend, Captain Ashburnham, the apparently honorable “Good Soldier” of the title. Conventional appearances and bitter truth are ironically juxta-posed.

Good Soldier Schweik, The (Osud Dobreho Vojáka Švejka za Světové Války, 1920–23; Eng.
The author originally planned this gargantuan satire on the military bureaucracy of Austria and on war in general as a six volume work, but lived to complete only four volumes. The novel chronicles the laughable misadventures of the kindhearted Schweik, which by their very absurdity point up the stupidity of war. The book has been variously hailed as a brilliant lampoon, as an epic defense of pacifism, and as a Czech Don Quixote.

Good Women, The Legend of. See Legend of Good Women.

Good Woman of Setzuan, The (Der gute Mensch von Setzuan; 1938–1940). A play by Bertolt Brecht. Three gods come to earth to find a “good man,” and the only person in the town of Sezuan who will give them shelter is the prostitute Shente. With the money they give her, she opens a tobacco shop, but her own natural charity soon brings her to bankruptcy. She disguises herself as a “male cousin,” Shui Tsai, and by ruthless business policies gains back the money she had benevolently given away. Basically, the play criticizes the social order in which a good person must pretend to be bad in order to survive.

Goody Blake and Harry Gill (1798). A poem by William Wordsworth. Gill is a farmer who forbids old Goody Blake to carry home a few sticks of firewood which she has picked up from his land.
She curses him for his meanness, saying that he will never from that moment cease from shivering with cold, and from that hour, a-bed or up, summer or winter, at home or abroad, his teeth “chatter, chatter, chatter still.”

Goody Two-shoes (1765). A nursery tale written for the publisher John Newbery by Oliver Goldsmith. Goody Two-shoes is a very poor child, whose delight at having a pair of shoes is so unbounded that she cannot forbear telling everyone she meets that she has “two shoes”; whence her name. In time, she acquires knowledge and becomes wealthy.

Googe, Barnabe (1540–1594). English poet and translator, best known for his volume of Elogues, Epitaphs and Sonnets (1563), regarded as containing some of the earliest examples of pastoral poetry in English. His work is considered representative of English poetry between the period of Wyatt and Surrey and that of Spenser. It is particularly marked by alliteration and the use of the fourteeners, an iambic line of seven feet.

Gookin, Daniel (1612–1687). English-born American author and colonial administrator. Known for his humanitarian interest in the Indians, in 1656
he was appointed superintendent of all the Indians who acknowledged the government of Massachusetts.
He wrote Historical Collections of the Indians in New England (1792) and An Historical Account of the Doings and Sufferings of the Christian Indians in New England (1836).

Goose, Mother. A mythical character famous as giving the name to Mother Goose’s Nursery Rhymes. This name seems to have been first used in English in Songs for the Nursery, Or Mother Goose’s Melodies for Children, published by T. Fleet in Boston, Mass., in 1719. Perrault’s Contes de ma mere Puce (Tales of my Mother Goose) had appeared in 1697.

Goose Bible. See Bible, Specially Named Editions.

goose step. A step formerly used in the Prussian army on ceremonial occasions. At each pace the thigh had to be brought to a right angle with the erect body. It was supposed to look extremely dignified when carried out by a well-drilled body of men, but it was unmercifully ridiculed by the Allies
during World War I.

Gorboduc, or Ferrex and Porrex (produced 1561, published 1565). A play by Thomas Sackville and Thomas Norton, the first Senecan tragedy in English, the first English play to be written in blank verse, and one of the first to use English historical material. The story is based on the legendary history of England of Geoffrey of Monmouth. Gorboduc, a British king, has two sons, Ferrex and Porrex. He divides his kingdom between them, but they quarrel, and Porrex kills his brother. Soon afterward, Porrex himself is murdered in his bed by his mother, who loved Ferrex better. The people, horrified, rebel and kill both the old king and queen. The nobility then kill many of the rebels. Soon, since there are no heirs to the throne, the country falls into civil war and it is laid waste.

Gorboduc. One of the kings in Geoffrey of Monmouth’s History of the Kings of Britain. He reappears in the pre-Shakespearean tragedy Gorboduc
y by Sackville and Norton.

Gordian knot. An intricate problem. Gordias, a peasant, was chosen king of Phrygia, and dedicated his wagon to Zeus. The wagon yoke was fastened to a pole so cleverly that it was said that whoever un-did the knot would reign over the empire of Asia.
Alexander cut the knot with a single stroke of his sword. "Cutting the Gordian knot" became proverbial for the decisive and bold completion of a complicated action.

Gordon, Caroline (1895— ). American novelist and short-story writer. Miss Gordon received both critical and popular acclaim for her first novel, Pen-fully (1931), the story of three generations on a Kentucky plantation. Her other books include: Greek Masons (1894); The Garden of Adonis (1936); None Shall Look Back (1937), a fictional study of the Confederate general Nathan Bedford Forrest; Green Centuries (1941); The Forest of the South (1945), a collection of 17 skillfully written short stories; The Women on the Porch (1946); The House of Fiction (1950), a textbook written with Allen Tate; The Mafelactors (1956); and Old Red and Other Stories (1963).

Gordon, Charles George. Known as Chinese Gordon and Gordon Pasha (1833—1885). English soldier. In 1860 he was attached to a British force operating with the French against China, and commanded a Chinese force, called the Ever Victorious Army, against the Taiping rebels (1863—1864). He quelled the rebellions after 33 engagements and resigning his command, was presented by the emperor with the yellow jacket and peacock's feather of a mandarin of the first class. He was governor (1874—1876) of the equatorial provinces of central Africa in the service of the khedive of Egypt and in 1877 was created pasha by the khedive. As governor-general (1877—1879) of the Sudan, Darfur, the equatorial provinces, and the Red Sea littoral, he suppressed slave trade. Sent by the British government in 1884 to the Sudan to assist the khedive in withdrawing the garrisons of the country, which could no longer hold out against the Mahdi, he was besieged by the Mahdi at Khartoum and killed in the storming of the city. There is a fine biographical sketch of Gordon in Lytton Strachey's Eminent Victorians (1918).

Gordon Riots. The riots that occurred in London in 1780, fomented by Lord George Gordon, to compel the House of Commons to repeal the bill passed in 1778 for the relief of Roman Catholics. Charles Dickens has given a very vivid description of these riots in Barnaby Rudge.

Gorgias (c. 483—375 B.C.). A Greek philosopher, Sophist, and teacher of rhetoric. He exercised a great influence on the development of classical Greek style: Plato's dialogue on rhetoric is called Gorgias. His lost work, On Nature or the Non-existent, is believed to be a refutation of Presocratic argument for a fundamental principle of unity in the universe which underlies all appearances.

Gorgons (Gorgones). Monsters of classical myth. With golden wings and claws of brass, their hair was a mass of live serpents and their aspect was so terrible that all who looked at them were turned to stone. There were three: Stetho, Euryale, and Medusa, daughters of Keto and the aged sea-god
Phorcys and sisters of the Graiae, who guarded them.
Medusa, their chief, and the only mortal one, was slain by Perseus. The Gorgon's head was a favorite subject in ancient Greek art; because they believed that its power would terrify the enemy, the Greeks carved it on shields and armor and even on city walls.
It was also used as an amulet to protect against enchantment.

Goriot, Père. See Père Goriot, L.E.
Gorki, Maksim. Pen name of Alekssei Maksimoovich Peshkov (1868—1936). Russian writer. Gorki was the first great Russian writer to emerge from the ranks of the proletariat. Born in Nizhni Novgorod (now named Gorki), he was orphaned at an early age and lived for a brief time with his grandparents.
Financial difficulties forced him to leave Europe at the age of nine to go into the world to make his own way.
He was a dishwasher on a Volga steamer, bakery-shop worker, fisherman, railroadman, and clerk, as well as a down-and-outer, before he began to write.
His hard life drove him to a suicide attempt in 1887.
His pen name, Gorki, is the Russian equivalent of "the bitter one." His first published story, Mahar Chudra (1892), appeared in a Tiflis newspaper. His stories, sketches, and articles were published in local newspapers in provincial towns, until they finally attracted the notice of the writer and journalist Vladimir Korolenko, who helped him get his first stories published in journals in St. Petersburg. The first story to appear was Chełkash (1895). This was followed by a stream of stories, and in 1898 two volumes of Gorki's stories and sketches were issued.
By then the one-time tramp was famous all over the country. Gorki's work of this period drew heavily on the kind of life he had himself experienced, which of necessity meant that most of his characters and themes were taken from the lowest level of Russian society. Gorki both depicted the wretched lives of this class of "creatures that once were men" and infused his stories with a heavy dose of protest against the society that allowed such wretchedness to exist.
His most successful story of this period was Twenty-six Men and a Girl.

Gorki's popularity and financial success allowed him to embark on a longer work: his first novel, Foma Gordeyev (1899), a study of a declining bourgeois merchant family in a Volga town. In the meantime, he had moved to St. Petersburg and founded a publishing house, Znaïïye (Knowledge), that was later to publish such well-known writers as Andreyev, Kuprin, and Bunin. He also joined the Social Democratic Party and contributed much of his literary earnings to furthering the Marxist revolutionary movement. This activity displeased the government, and, when he was elected an honorary member of the Russian Academy of Sciences in 1902, the government vetoed the choice. The authors Anton Chekhov and Vladimir Korolenko promptly resigned their memberships in protest.

Gorki's formerly romantically tinged realistic pictures of lower-class life became increasingly grim and angry. The most forceful expression of his attitude is the drama The Lower Depths, his second play, regarded as his dramatic masterpiece. Gorki's first play was The Petit-Bourgeois (Meshchane; 1901), an indictment of the philistinism of that class.

For his Bolshevik activities in the revolution of 1905, Gorki was arrested. Public indignation forced his release and he went abroad, visiting Europe and the U.S. and settling on Cape. In 1907, he issued his didactic novel about the revolutionary movement, Mother. Although artistically weak, the book's mes-

Gorky, wise men of. Fools, wiseacres. The legend is that King John, on his way to Lynn Regis, intended to pass through Gotham, in Nottingham- shire, with his army, and sent heralds to prepare his way. The men of Gotham were resolved, if possible, to prevent this expense and depredation, so they resolved to play the fool. Some raked the moon out of the pond; some made a ring to hedge in a bird; others did equally foolish things. The king then abandoned his intention, and "the wise men" of the village cunningly remarked, "We were there more fools pass through Gotham, than remain in it."

A collection of popular tales of stupidity was published in the reign of Henry VIII as Merrie Tales of the Mad Men of Gotham, gathered together by A.B. of Phisike, Doctor. Since that date many other tales have been attached to the inhabitants of Gotham. The old nursery rhyme is well known:

Three wise men of Gotham Went to sea in a bowl; If the bowl had been stronger My story had been longer.

The name Gotham was given to New York City by Washington Irving in his satirical Salmagundi Papers (1807) and has remained in current use.

Gothic novel. A type of novel characterized by horror, violence, supernatural effects, and a taste for the medieval, usually set against a background of Gothic architecture, especially a gloomy and isolated castle. The genre originated in England with Horace Walpole's Castle of Otranto. In its early forms, and even as late as The Mysteries of Udolpho by Mrs. Ann Radcliffe, the supernatural is given a naturalistic explanation, the aim being to produce a "correct," i.e. probable, medieval romance. Even so.
As a result of his excesses produced a satirical reaction as in Jane Austen's Northanger Abbey, while conversely, in William Beckford's Vathek, where Gothic terrors merge with the terrors of an Oriental despotism, the very monstrosities themselves seem to merge on parade. Matthew Lewis' The Monk marks a new departure: its horrors are frankly supernatural, but psychologically symbolic. This development culminates in Melmoth the Wanderer by Charles Robert Maturin, and, in America, in novels by Charles Brockden Brown, Nathaniel Hawthorne, and Edgar Allan Poe. A similar development took place on the Continent, especially in Germany. In the 19th century, the movement of Surrealism claimed the Gothic novel as one of its forerunners.

Göttfried Strassburg (early 13th century). German minnesinger or court poet. His handling of the Tristan and Isolde legend (c. 1210) was one of the best court epics in Germany; it was the major source for Wagner's opera Tristan und Isolde (1865).

Gottschalk, Jeremias. Pen name of Albert Bitzius (1797–1854). Swiss novelist, writing in German, known especially for his conservative, didactic piety which is, however, sometimes lightened by humor. He was a well-established Protestant pastor for more than a decade before beginning to write his many novels about peasant life, such as Der Bauernspiegel (The Peasants' Mirror, 1837), Wie Ul, der Knecht, glücklich wird (How Ul, the Servant, Becomes Happy, 1841), and Els, die seltsame Magd (Elise, the Strange Maid, 1850). His novella Die schwarze Spinne (The Black Spider, 1842) is a masterful treatment of the occult.

Göttinger Hain (Göttingen Grove). An association of German poets formed in 1772, most of whose members were students at the University of Göttingen. The name Hain (grove) was drawn from a poem by Klopstock, whom the young poets took as their model. Some members were Voss, Hölderlin, and the brothers Stolberg. Bürger was close to the group, but not a member. The tendencies of the group, which dispersed in 1774, were related to those of the Sturm und Drang movement.

Gottlieb, Max. In Sinclair Lewis' Arrowsmith, an old, disillusioned, but dedicated scientist who helps to train Arrowsmith in research methods. Gottlieb may have been modeled on Jacques Loeb (1859–1924), the great biophysicist on the staff of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research (1910–1924).

Gottsched, Johann Christoph (1700–1766). German aesthetician and dramatist of the enlightenment, under the influence of French neo-classicism. He was strongly opposed by such figures as Bodmer and Lessing, who advocated artistic directions less dependent upon foreign models. His most famous play is Der sterbende Cato (The Dying Cato, 1732).

Götz von Berlichingen (1773). A play by Johann Wolfgang von Goethe, freely adapted from the life of Götz von Berlichingen (1480–1562), a German knight. In Goethe's treatment, Götz becomes a typical Sturm und Drang hero, a powerful individual personality, unwaveringly committed to his own straightforward conception of justice, but in the end not able to escape the subtle maneuverings of his political adversaries. Formally, Goethe wished to emulate Shakespeare, in opposition to the prevailing style of neoclassicism, and the play is written in a powerful, rough-and-ready prose, with short pithy scenes and constant changes of setting between them.

Gould, Charles. A central character in Joseph Conrad's novel Nostromo, the owner of a silver mine in South America. Dona Emilia is his gentle wife.

Gounod, CharlesFrançois (1818–1893). French composer. His best-known operas are Faust (1859) and Roméo et Juliette (1867). He at first wrote sacred music; among his songs is the famous Ave Maria based on Bach's first prelude of the Well Tempered Clavier.

Gourmont, Rémy de (1858–1915). French literary critic and novelist. In his early years as a critic, Gourmont wrote perceptive, sympathetic articles on the symbolist poets, published in Le Livre des masques (1886) and Promenades littéraires (1904–1913). His novels, rather chilly in tone, emphasize the biological origins of all human behavior. They include Les Chevaux de Diomède (1897), Le Songe d'une Femme (1899), Une Nuit au Luxembourg (1906), and Un Cœur Virginal (1907). Among his essays are L'Esthétique de la Langue Française (1899), Le Problème du Style (1902), and Physique de l'Amour (1903). These are marked by irony, an interest in the sensual, and a quick, probing intelligence. Disfigured by a skin disease, Gourmont spent much of his life in seclusion.

Gower, John (1325–1408). English poet, a friend of Chaucer, well known at the courts of Richard II and Henry IV. He wrote serious poetry of the allegorical and didactic type common in his day, urging moral and social reforms. His principal works are the French Speculum Meditantis, the Latin Vox Clamantis, and the English Confessio Amantis, as well as some lighter short poems in all three languages.

Goya y Lucientes, Francisco José de (1746–1828). Spanish painter and etcher. He worked for the Royal Workshop as a designer of cartoons and became Royal Painter in 1786. After the death of Charles III he went on to serve his son, Charles IV, portraying the king, his family, and the nobility in brilliant, often cruelly truthful paintings which rank among the most discerning in the world of art. A severe disease left him deaf at 47, yet the following years mark the peak of his fame. The injustice and inhumanity of the period of the Spanish War of Independence against Napoleon's occupation (1808–1814) and of Ferdinand VII's reign (1814–1820) elicited a tortured reaction from him. He painted scenes of disasters, madness, and satanism, and executed the series of etchings entitled The Disasters of War, in which he indicted violence and murder with bitter realism and censured the moral dishonesty of those who would not rebel against human misery.

he continued to paint with unshaken confidence and originality. He left an extensive production: portraits, religious paintings, scenes of the Inquisition, of crime, of the people’s everyday work, engravings of war and the bullfight. The paintings were little known outside Spain until 1896, and The Disasters of War were not published till 1863, yet Goya exerted a profound influence on modern art. Eugène Delacroix, Honoré Daumier, and Edouard Manet were among the first to be influenced by his visionary representation of the world and by his approach to art, from which he banished all academic conceptions of composition and craftsmanship in order to give color both the roles of unifying loosely constructed paintings and of defining the forms.

Gozzano, Guido (1883–1916). Italian poet. Afflicted by poor health throughout his short life, Gozzano is best known for his lyric poetry, collected in I Primi e gli Ultimi Colloqui (1927). Although he was originally influenced by D’Annunzio, his work reveals a melancholy, passive attitude toward life that aligns him with the CREPUSCULARI poets.

Gozzi, Count Carlo (1720–1806). Italian playwright. A member of the Granellischi Society, whose purpose it was to preserve Tuscan literature from foreign influences, Gozzi ignored theoretical innovation and produced charming and witty plays, many of them dramatized versions of fairy tales. Goethe and Mme. de Staël, among others, were admirers of his work. His play Re Turandot (King Turandot, 1762) was translated into German by Schiller, and became the basis for operas by Weber, Busoni, and Puccini. Fiaba dell’amore delle tre melarancie (Fable of the Love of Three Oranges, 1761), which was derived from Basile’s Canto della Canti and presented the two rival dramatists Goldoni and Chiari under the satirical guises of a fairy and a magician, revived the stock characters of the Italian comedy of masks and enjoyed a huge popular success. Almost a century and a half later, it was used by Prokofiev as the basis for his opera The Love of Three Oranges. A portion of Gozzi’s output was modeled on Spanish plays, and his later works include tragedies in which he experimentally introduced comic elements.

Gozzoli, Benozzo, or Benozzo di Lese (1420–1497). Italian painter. One of the leading figures of the early Florentine Renaissance, he was a pupil of Fra Angelico and strongly influenced by Gentile da Fabriano. His forte was the large-scale narrative fresco, in which he combined Italian realism and Gothic fantasy in a delightful way. For his patrons, the Medici, he decorated the chapel of their palace in Florence and included portraits of the family in his masterpiece, The Journey of the Magi. He is also known for his Old Testament scenes painted at the campo santo of Pisa, especially the Story of Noah.

Grabbe, Christian Dietrich (1801–1836). German playwright, known especially for the ironic, often pessimistically cynical and disillusioned attitude that permeates his works. His style is an early example of the 19th-century turn toward realism, away from the idealism of such dramatists as Schiller. Among his works are Scherz, Satire, Ironie und tiefe Bedeutung (Joke, Satire, Irony and Deeper Significance, pub. 1827) and Don Juan und Faust (1829).

Graça Aranha, José Pereira de (1868–1931). Brazilian diplomat, novelist, and man of letters. A champion of nationalism in literature, Graça Aranha is best known for Canaan (Chanaan; 1902). A novel of ideas, it consists largely of a conversation between two Germans, newcomers to Brazil, who discuss the development of the Brazilian nation.

Gracchi. A prominent family of republican Rome. Its most famous members were Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus (133–133 B.C.) and his brother Gaius Sempronius Gracchus (d. 123 B.C.). As tribune (133), Tiberius secured the enactment, despite much opposition, of an agrarian reform law that would grant public lands to the impoverished Italian peasantry. When, in defiance of custom, he sought a second term as tribune, he and 300 of his followers were killed in an election riot.

His work was carried on by Gaius who, as tribune in 123 and 122, sought to regulate the price of grain in Rome and proposed extension of the franchise. Like his brother, he was killed at the instigation of the senate.

The mother of the Gracchi brothers was the famous Cornelia, daughter of Scipio Africanus, who was considered the ideal Roman matron. According to tradition, she was once visited by a wealthy woman who displayed her jewels and asked to see Cornelia’s. Pointing to her sons, Cornelia replied, “These are my jewels.”

Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners (1666). An autobiography by John Bunyan. Written while he was in prison, it describes his spiritual struggles and the development of his religious convictions.

Graces, the. In Roman mythology, the Gratae, goddesses who embodied beauty and charm. Called by the Greeks the Charites, they were, by some accounts, named Aglaia (Brillianz), Thalia (the Flowering), and Euphrosyne (Joy), though their names and even their number varied. Although they were probably very early spirits of vegetation, they did not in classical times have any cult of importance. They are best known from their many appearances in art.

Gracián, Baltasar (1601–1658). Spanish prose writer and Jesuit priest. The outstanding exponent of CONCEPTISM, Gracian has been variously regarded as a moral philosopher of considerable depth and as an unoriginal intellectual poseur. His best-known works are El Cautivo, an allegorical novel, and Agudeza y arte de ingenio (1642, 1648), a manual of conceptism, in which he defined the numerous varieties of literary agudeza (“fine distinction, ingenuity”). In El Héroe (1657), he drew a portrait of the ideal Christian hero. El Discreto (1646) discusses the 25 realces, or “adornments,” which make up the well-bred gentleman, while the Oráculo manual o arte de prudencia (1647) is a collection of 300 maxims that offer a distillation of worldly wisdom.

gracioso. A comic servant in Spanish drama. Although the character appeared under the name of simple or bobo in the works of earlier dramatists, such as Torres Naharro and Lope de Rueda, Lope de Vega is often regarded as its creator.

Gracq, Julien. Pen name of Louis Poirier (1910– ). French novelist and playwright. His works share a haunting mood partly Gothic, partly surrealistic, and an impressionistic, symbolic style. His novels include The Castle of Argol (1945), A Dark Stranger (Un beau ténébreux; 1945), and Balcony in the Forest (1958).

Grandasso. Oriental monarch who besieges Charlemagne at Paris in Boiardo's Orlando Innamorato; in Ariosto's Orlando Furioso, he is killed by Orlando and the other paladins in a battle to which he had challenged them.

Graeae (Graiali). Literally, the gray-haired women. In Greek myth, the sisters and guardians of the Gorgons. They owned only one eye and one tooth among them, which they shared in turn. Per- seus, robbing them of these, forced them to show him the way to the Gorgons, and to give him their winged sandals, magic wallet, and cap of invisibility. Hesiod mentions only two Graeae, Enyo and Paphredo; later legends add a third, Deino.

Graham, Stephen (1884– ). English travel-writer. He traveled mostly in Russia, writing about his experiences and the history and literature of the country in such books as Undiscovered Russia (1913) and Summing Up on Russia (1951). He tramped the American West with Vachel Lindsay and wrote Tramping with a Poet in the Rockies (1922).

Graham of Claverhouse, John. 1st Viscount Dundee. Known as Bloody Claver and Bonny Dundee (1649–1689). Scottish soldier. He was dubbed "Bloody Claver" by the Scottish Covenanters, whom he persecuted with great severity for 20 years. In 1689 he raised an army of Highlanders to fight for James II and won the battle of Killiecrankie, but was mortally wounded. To Jacobites he became known as "Bonny Dundee," a semi-legendary hero. He is a character in Scott's novel Old Mortality (1816).

Grail, Holy Grail, or Sangreal (Sangraal). A famous talisman (variously represented as a chalice, dish, stone, and cup into which a lance drips blood), the center around which a huge corpus of medieval legend, romance, and allegory revolve. The precise origin and nature of the Grail is unknown and has been the subject of countless scholarly researches; these have attempted to sort out the features of ancient fertility cults, Celtic myth, and Christianity in the Grail romances. The Grail is best known as the object of a quest on the part of the knights of the Round Table in Arthurian legend. It brings healing and food to those who touch it and can be found only by one absolutely pure.

The best-known accounts of the Grail are those that give it a Christian origin and generally run along the following lines: It is the vessel from which Christ drank at the Last Supper and that afterwards came into the possession of Joseph of Arimathea, who caught in it some of the blood that flowed from the wounds of the crucified Saviour. He carried it with him to England, and it provided him with food, drink, and spiritual sustenance for the rest of his life. It was handed down to his successor and thence from generation to generation, Galahad, in Malory's Morte d'Arthur (c. 1469), being Joseph's last descendant. In some accounts it disappears after Joseph brings it to England. In still others, it is the dish out of which Christ and his disciples ate the paschal lamb at the Last Supper. The theory of a Christian origin of the Grail, however, has been abandoned. Many now hold that the Grail was originally a female sex symbol used with the bleeding lance mentioned in Chrétien de Troyes' early account in ancient fertility rites. Jessie L. Weston's discussion of this theory in From Ritual to Romance (1920) was the source used by T. S. Eliot for his poem The Waste Land (1922), where the Grail theme occurs in this symbolic form.

The mass of literature concerning the Grail cycle, both ancient and modern, is enormous. The chief sources of the principal groups of legend are the Peredur in the Mabinogion, which is one of the most archaic forms of the story; the unfinished Perceval, ou le conte du Graal by Chrétien de Troyes, in which the Grail is a hollow dish, accompanied by a bleeding lance (see PARZIVAL); Wolfram von Eschenbach's PARZIFAL (c. 1210), the best example of the story as transformed by ecclesiastical influence; a chivalric version by Gottfried von Strassburg; the 13th-century French Perceval le Gallois (founded on earlier English and Celtic legends that had no connection with the Grail), showing Percival in his later role as an ascetic hero, translated by Dr. Sebastian Evans (1893) as The High History of the Holy Grail; and the Quête du St. Graal, which, in its English dress, is found in Malory's Morte d'Arthur. It was the French poet Robert de Boron (fl. c. 1215), who, in his Joseph d'Arimathie or Le Saint Graal, first definitely attached the history of the Grail to the Arthurian cycle and first mentioned the Grail as a chalice containing Christ's blood. The framework of Tennyson's Holy Grail in his Idylls of the King (1859–1885), is taken from Malory.

Grandgoujier (Fr., "great guller"). In Rabelais' Gargantua and Pantagruel, the king of Utopia, husband of Garganille, and father of Gargantua. Grandgoujier, a just and peace-loving patriarch who lives at the Deviniere, the house where Rabelais was born, has been identified with the latter's own father.

Grand Inquisitor, The Legend of the. In Feodor Dostoevski's The Brothers Karamazov, the parable related by Ivan to Alyosha, expressing the former's religious doubts. The tale relates how Christ returns to earth in Seville during the Inquisition, how He is recognized by the people, and immediately arrested by the Inquisition leaders. The Grand Inquisitor, a menacing old churchman, visits Christ's cell and upbraids Him for returning, saying that the Church no longer needs Him, that He has misapprehended man's nature and has burdened man with too much freedom. The Church, says the Inquisitor, understands that man does not want the burden of free choice but wants to be led. The Church's allegiance has been shifted to the Other, to the Devil, the Inquisitor claims, and Christ is now only an unwanted distraction. Henceforth, he says, man will be cared for by the few leaders of the Church who are...
Grandison, Charlotte. In Samuel Richardson's last novel, SIR CHARLES GRANDISON, the witty and inconsiderate sister of the hero, and major correspondent of Harriet Byron. Her flippant treatment of her husband Lord G., at once amusing and shocking, is in studied contrast to Harriet's serious affection for Sir Charles.

Grandissimes, The: A Story of Creole Life (1869). A novel by George W. Cable. It is set in New Orleans in the period of the Louisiana Purchase. An outside observer, Frowenfeld, learns of the family feuds, especially those between the De Grampons and the Grandissimes, the race feuds, and the struggle between the new order and the old. The book is filled with vivid characters, notably the Creole mother and daughter Nancanou, and the African king Bras Coupé, who allows himself to be tortured to death rather than be a slave.

Grand Meaulnes, Le (1913; translated as The Wanderer and The Lost Domain). The novel that won ALAIN-FOURNIER his reputation. Le Grand Meaulnes, the young hero, has a curious adventure at Christmastime. In the middle of the woods he discovers a gay party and a beautiful girl both hidden in an old house. His love for the girl, Yvonne, and his friendship with her brother, Franz, shape his life, bringing him intense joy and intense sorrow. The uniqueness of the novel lies in its delicate combination of fantasy and realism. Actuality and the dream world mingle indistinguishably in the experience of a young boy coming to manhood.

Grandonio of Volterra. In the ORLANDO FURIOSO of Ariosto, a pagan knight from Spain, noted for his rude and discourteous manner. He is defeated by the warrior maiden Bradamante.

Grand Remonstrance. In English history, the protest passed by the House of Commons on Nov. 22, 1641. It listed the unconstitutional acts of Charles I and demanded reform.

Gran Galeoto, El (The Great Galeotto, 1881). A tragedy by José Echegaray, in which spiteful gossip is the "Galeotto" of the title. The heroine is suspected by the spying public and finally by her husband, Julian, of improper relations with his young secretary, Ernest. They are innocent, but are powerless to convince Julian, who dies from a wound received in a duel for his wife's honor.

Grant, Ulysses Simpson (1822-1885). American soldier and 18th president of the U.S. (1869-1877). A graduate of West Point and a veteran of the Mexican War, Grant later engaged unsuccessfully in farming and business. He entered the Union army in 1861 and after capturing Forts Henry and Donelson in Tennessee (1862), was promoted to major general; he led the Union forces at Shiloh and captured Vicksburg (1863), splitting the Confederacy in half. Appointed commander-in-chief of the Union army in 1864, he moved against Richmond, the Confederate capital, in a slow and costly but ultimately successful campaign and accepted the surrender of General Lee at Appomattox Court House. His two presidential terms were marred by extensive graft and corruption that involved such highly placed officials as Secretary of War W. W. Belknap and O. E. Babcock, Grant's private secretary. After his retirement, Grant was led penniless through the failure of a brokerage firm, but his Personal Memoirs (1885), which he completed while dying of throat cancer, brought his family nearly $500,000.

Gran teatro del mundo, El (The Great Theater of the World). An auto sacramental by Pedro CALDERÓN DE LA BARCA. It deals with the world in terms of a theatrical allegory. The Author (God) presents a performance in which a beggar, a rich man, and other figures, including personifications of vices and virtues, play out their roles. The play demonstrates that the things of this world pass away and only God is eternal.

Granville-Barker, Harley (1877-1946). English critic, dramatist, director, and actor. Before World War I, Granville-Barker was noted both as an actor, specializing in Shavian roles, and as the author of such plays as The Voysey Inheritance and The Madras House. In 1911-1913 his staging of The Winter's Tale, A Midsummer Night's Dream, and Twelfth Night effected a radical change in Shakespeare production. Today Granville-Barker is best known for his critical works, such as his Prefaces to Shakespeare (1923-1947), which analyze the plays from a director's point of view, and A Companion to Shakespeare Studies (1934), which he edited with G. B. Harrison.

Grapes of Wrath, The (1939). A novel by John Steinbeck. Awarded the Pulitzer Prize in 1940, this moving and highly successful proletarian novel tells of the hardships of the Joad family, "Okie" farmers forced out of their home in the Oklahoma dust-bowl region by economic desperation, they drive to California in search of work as migrant fruit pickers. The grandparents die on the way; on their arrival the others are harassed by the police and participate in strike violence, during which Tom, the Joad son, kills a man. At the conclusion of the novel, throughout which descriptive and philosophical passages alternate with narrative portions, the family is defeated but still resolute.

Grau [Delgado], Jacinto (1877–1958). Spanish playwright. His output, though small, is appreciated both at home and abroad, and includes El conde Alarcos (1917), El hijo pródigo (1918), Don Juan de Carillana (1919), and El señor de Pigmálion (1930).

Graustark (1901). A romantic novel by George Barr McCutcheon. Subtitled The Story of a Love Behind the Throne, this enormously popular melodrama tells how an American named Grenfall falls in love with the Princess Yetine in the highly colorful kingdom of Graustark. McCutcheon's first novel, it was sold outright for $500 to a publisher who subsequently reaped a fortune from it. It was followed, however, by the sequels Beverly of Graustark (1904) and The Prince of Graustark (1914), which were equally and more equitably profitable.

Graves, Alfred Perceval (1846–1931). Irish man of letters and poet. The father of Robert Graves, he was a leader in the Irish literary renaissance. Among his volumes are Songs of Killarney (1872) and Irish Songs and Ballads (1879).

Graves, Morris (1910– ). American artist. Deeply influenced by the spirituality of the Far East, he is known chiefly for his somber expressionistic paintings of birds.

Graves, Robert (1895– ). English poet, novelist, and critic. His individualistic poems are polished and dryly humorous; often they make cosmic statements through quaint personal myths. Among his many collections of poetry are Fairies and FusiJera (1917), Collected Poems (1959), More Poems (1961), and New Poems (1962). Goodbye to All That (1929) is a striking autobiography covering his experiences fighting in World War I.

Graves's historical novels are scholarly and meticulous; he often interprets his characters in psychologically convincing ways that are quite different from the conventional, traditional view. I, Claudius (1934), Claudius the God, Wife to Mr. Milton (1943), The Golden Fleece (1944), King Jesus was (1946), and Homer's Daughter (1955) are novels of this kind. Among his books of literary criticism are A Survey of Modernist Poetry (1927), with Laura Riding as co-author; The White Goddess; and Oxford Addresses on Poetry (1962). The Long Week-End (1940) is a social history of the interwar years in England. The Nazarene Gospel Restored (1953), with Joshua Podro as co-author, is a bold, scholarly reinterpretation of the origins of Christianity. He translated and commented on The Greek Myths (1955). Graves was a friend of T. E. Lawrence and Laura Riding, and encouraged the young English writer Alan Sillitoe. After having lived in Majorca for many years, he returned to England in 1961 to become professor of poetry at Oxford University.

Graveyard school. A preromantic movement in English poetry of the 18th century, composed chiefly of followers and imitators of Edward Young and Robert Blair. It is so named because of the meditative, melancholy tone of the characteristic verse of the school, the scene of which was often laid in graveyards and cemeteries, and because of the moral and religious reflections inspired by their thoughts of impending death.

Gray, Thomas (1716–1771). English poet and noted letter-writer. He was one of the forerunners of the romantic movement in England. His most important correspondence was with Horace Walpole, Thomas Wharton, and William Mason. His works, largely meditative lyrics and Pindaric odes are marked by love of nature and melancholy reflection. His poetry includes Ode to Spring, Hymn to Adversity, and Ode on a Distant Prospect of Eton College (1742); Sonnet on the Death of Richard West (1775), which contains the well-known lines: "... where ignorance is bliss, 'Tis folly to be wise"; Ode on the Death of a Favorite Cat, Drowned in a Tub of Gold Fishes (1748), light verse in the neoclassic manner; Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard, his most famous work; The Progress of Poesy, on the power of music; The Bard; The Fatal Sisters and The Descent of Odin (1761), both in imitation of early Welsh and Norse verse. The biography published by his friend and correspondent William Mason, in 1775, contains many of his famous letters.

Gray expressed his poetic ideal thus: "Extreme conciseness of expression, yet pure, perspicuous, and musical, is one of the grand beauties of lyric poetry. This I have always aimed at, and never could attain." See STOKES POGES.

Grazzini, Anton Francesco (1503–1584). Florentine apothecary and author of stories and plays. He was also a founder of the Academy of the Umìdi, in which his academic name was Il Lasca (the Roach). One of his plays, La Spiritata (The Possessed), has been translated into English under the title of The Bagheera.

Great Awakening. A religious revivalist movement (1740–1750) which swept through the American colonies and was marked by violent and sensational public repentance and conversion. It began in Massachusetts under the influence of the preaching of Jonathan Edwards and of the English evangelist George Whitefield. The movement was opposed by

Pastor of the Church of Christ in Northampton.

Amos ix. 2, 3. Though they dig into Hell, there shall mine Hand take them; though they climb up to Heaven, thence will I bring them down. And though they hide themselves in the TOP of Carmel, I will search and take them out thence: and though they be hid from my SIGHT

Great Bear and Little Bear (Ursa Major and Ursa Minor). Constellations. In Greek legend, Callisto, a nymph of Artemis, had a son by Zeus. His wife Hera (or Zeus himself) changed Callisto into a bear. When she was about to be shot by her son Arcas, Zeus converted mother and son into constellations. The name given to the two constellations considered as a single group, is Arctos.

The Greek word arktos, a bear, is still kept in the names Arcturus (the bear-ward, from ouros, guardian), and Arctic. The Sanskrit name for the Great Bear is from the verb rakha, to be bright, and it has been suggested that the Greeks named it arktos as a result of confusion between the two words. Arcturus was once the name given to the Polar Star.

Encompassed within Great and Little Bear are star formations popularly known as the Big Dipper and the Little Dipper; the latter contains the North Star, which is also known as the Polar Star, Polaris.

Great Cham of Literature. A sobriquet for Dr.
Samuel Johnson first used by Smollett in a letter to Wilkes. Cham is an obsolete word, synonymous with Khan, applicable to the ruler of the Tartars, the Mongols, and the emperor of China.

Great Divide, The (1906). A drama by William Vaughn Moody. Originally entitled The Sabine Woman, the play has as its theme the conflict between Puritan New England and the American West. Ruth Jordan, from Massachusetts, is attacked by three men while alone in her brother’s cabin in Arizona;
she saves herself by agreeing to marry one of them and, eventually, after many trials, comes to love him and his Western independence.

Great Expectations (1860–1861). A novel by Charles Dickens. The novel traces the growth of Philip Pirrip, called Pip, from a boy of shallow dreams to a man of depth and character. Pip is reared by his sister and her husband Joe Gargery, a blacksmith. In his youth he is influenced by the eccentric Miss Havisham, who was jilted on her wed-ning day and who has brought up her adopted niece Estella to hate men. As a young man, Pip is informed that an unknown benefactor has provided money for his education and expects to make him his heir. Forsaking his humble friends—particularly the faithful Joe—he sets off to London with the firm intention of becoming a gentleman and realizing his “great expectations.” He soon learns that his patron is Abel Magwitch, a transported convict, whom Pip had helped years earlier; Magwitch also turns out to be Estella’s father. With this knowledge Pip’s dreams fade; he returns home after Joe saves him from imprisonment for debt, and sets himself to honest work.
He marries Estella after her husband, Bentley Drummlie, dies. Among the gallery of characters in the book are Biddy, who becomes Joe’s second wife;
the Pocket family; Uncle Pumblechook; Dolge Orlick, the murderer of Pip’s sister; and Mr. Jaggers.

The novel is regarded by many as Dickens’ greatest achievement, although the happy ending, which according to Dickens’ biographer John Forster was written on the advice of Bulwer-Lytton, detracts from the work somewhat.

Great Gatsby, The (1925). A novel by F. Scott Fitzgerald. The mysterious Jay Gatsby lives in a luxurious mansion on the wealthy Long Island shore, togethering hundreds of guests at lavish parties that have become a legend on the island. Nick Carraway, the narrator, lives next-door to Gatsby, and Nick’s cousin Daisy and her crude but wealthy husband Tom Buchanan live in the house directly across the harbor from Gatsby’s. Gatsby reveals to Nick that he and Daisy had a brief affair before the war and her marriage to Tom; born Jay Gatz of a poor midwestern family, he has accumulated enormous wealth through shady transactions solely to make himself the kind of man he thinks Daisy admires: his one dream, and the reason he bought his house and gives his parties, is to win her back. He persuades Nick to bring him and Daisy together again, but ultimately he is unable to win her from her husband. Daisy, driving Gatsby’s car, runs over and kills Tom’s mistress Myrtle, unaware of the woman’s identity. Myrtle’s husband traces the car and shoots Gatsby, who has remained silent in order to protect Daisy. Gatsby’s friends and business associates all desert him, and only Nick, Gatsby’s father, and one habitué of the parties attend the funeral. The novel’s power derives not from its violent plot, but from its sharp and antagonistic portrayal of wealthy society in America and from the exposure of the "Jazz Age," Fitzgerald's favorite subject, in all its false glamour, cultural barrenness, moral emptiness, and desperate boredom. Yet the novel transcends its own bitter view and is probably Fitzgerald's most humane work. It has enjoyed continuous popularity since its first publication, and, written in a fully-developed and easy style, it is now considered one of the chief texts of American literature of the post-World War I period.

Great God Brown, The (1926). A play by Eugene O'Neill. Masks are used to symbolize the varying personalities of the characters as they are and as they appear to other people. The "great god Brown" is a successful businessman, devoid of inner resources; he eventually takes the mask of Dion Anthony (as his name suggests, a Dionysian character), a frustrated artist who dies. With Dion's mask, Brown is accepted by Dion's wife as the real Dion, for she has known and loved only her husband's mask, not his true self.

Great Learning, The. One of the Chinese Four Books. Originally one chapter from the Book of Rites, it was elevated to importance in the Confucian educational and philosophical system during the Sung Dynasty (960-1279). It emphasizes self-cultivation.

Great Mother, the. A nature goddess of ancient Anatolia. Her names and appellations include Cybele, the mountain mother, the Idaean mother, and still others. In Greek mythology, Cybele is generally associated with Rhea.

Greco, El. Sobriquet of Kyriakos Theto-copeoulos (c. 1541-1614). Greek-born Spanish painter. Having mastered the technique of icon painting in Crete, he went to Italy where he studied the work of Titian and Tintoretto. In 1577 he settled in Toledo, Spain, where, isolated from artistic influences, he developed a highly personal style which retains the movement of baroque drawing while suppressing the very spatial depth which baroque art sought to create. He painted intense portraits, mystical saints, and deeply expressive religious scenes. His use of such effects as discordantly contrasted cool colors, elongated distortions of the human frame, bright illumination, and flashing accents was misunderstood by contemporaries, and the significance of his art was not recognized until the 19th century. His best-known works include Assumption of the Virgin (1577), Burial of the Count of Orgaz (c. 1584), Pentecost (1604-1614), and View of Toledo (1600-1610).

Greek Anthology, The. A collection of several thousand poems, songs, gravestone inscriptions, epigrams, epitaphs, and the like, by numerous Greek writers, known and anonymous, from the 5th century B.C. to the 6th century A.D. Its original form was a collection called the Garland of Melieger (c. 60 B.C.), to which continuous additions were made. A number of the poems in The Greek Anthology have become famous. The Elizabethan poetic miscellany (see Totell's Miscellany) was a spiritual descendant of The Greek Anthology.

Greek epic poetry. Greek epic, a development from oral tradition. The earliest extant examples are the Iliad and the Odyssey of Homer. The functions of the Mycenaean rhapsode (rhapsodos) or minstrel are clearly shown in the character of Demodocus, the blind bard who entertained Odysseus and other guests at the court of the Phaeacian king Alcinous in the Odyssey. It was his duty to sing of the great heroes of past and present in order to entertain and please the kings and lords who could afford such a luxury. Unlike Demodocus, most bards probably traveled from court to court. Wherever they stopped, they would find it expedient to recite events that were especially gratifying to the local lord; his own exploits or those of heroes he claimed as forebears, much as Vergil later made the myths of Aeneas a paean to the glory of Rome and of his personal patron, Augustus. To this end the bard would often fabricate a connection between his patron of the moment and some great event or hero, such as the sack of Troy or the deeds of Heracles. This custom accounts in part for the apparent ubiquity of Heracles and Theseus and, more important, for the process of gradual accretion which, over a period of centuries, culminated in such epics as the Odyssey, in which a great mass of originally unrelated myths and folk tales adhered to the story of one hero.

An itinerant bard had to be able not only to recall an enormous number of tales, but to recite them in the dactylic hexameters which, by the time of Homer, had already been the traditional language of epic for centuries. Since writing, if it was used at all for literary purposes, must have been only a kind of shorthand, a bard was called upon to perform prodigious feats of memory. At the same time, in adjusting his tales to the requirements of the immediate situation, he had to be able to improvise at length.

The structure of the great Greek epics, even in the relatively literary form in which they have been preserved, show clearly their oral origins. One of their most striking characteristics is the great number of repeated phrases (for example, epithets such as "wine-dark sea" or "shepherd of the people") which are applied more or less indiscriminately to a variety of places or people. Every bard memorized a vast repertory of these formulae, which he could then apply on the spur of the moment in an appropriate spot in a poem according to the demands of the meter. It was probably this patchwork approach to poetry that earned him the name of rhapsode: "stitcher."

The repetition of stock phrases inevitably tends to monotony, especially when those phrases must, for practical reasons, be kept general enough in tone to be largely interchangeable. It is a measure of the genius of Homer, whoever he may have been, that he was able, within these traditional limitations, to achieve considerable individuality in his characters and to overcome monotony with sheer dramatic and poetic power.

Greek music. The music of ancient Greece. Music was extensively cultivated and studied in ancient Greece, and was considered important to the state, because of its supposed control of human passions and morals. Only fragments of the actual music have survived, but many important theoretical treatises still exist, and have had an important influence on music ever since. The principal modes (or scales) in which Greek music was written are: Phrygian, brisk and spirited; Dorian, bold and grave; Lydian, full of soft paths; Mixolydian, dirgelike.

The principal instruments used in Greek music were the aulos and the kithara. Aulos is a generic name for wind instruments of the flute and oboe type; the kithara, and its close relative the lyra or lyre, was a plucked string instrument with 3 to 15 strings.

Greek Passion, The (Ho Christos Xanastauronetai; 1951). A novel by Nikos KAZANTZAKIS. Set in modern Anatolia, it is a story of the persecution of the Greek inhabitants of an impoverished village by their Turkish overlords and, worse, by each other. At the beginning, several of the villagers are chosen for roles they are to play eight months later in a local passion play. By the time Passion Week comes, the play has been forgotten in a succession of violent events—and the villagers have played out their assigned roles in real life. A powerful modern morality play, the novel reveals the darker passions in men's lives that deeply concerned Kazantzakis.

Greeley, Horace (1811–1872). American journalist and political leader. As a newspaper printer and editor in New York, Greeley advocated many reform movements including abolition. He served in Congress (1848–1849) and supported the candidacy of Lincoln for president. Averse to the Republican policy of revenge on the South following the Civil War, he ran unsuccessfully against Grant in 1872. Greeley supported the agrarian movement and worked for a liberal policy for settlers; one of his favorite sayings was “Go West, young man.” In sympathy with the laboring classes in New York City, he also favored “magnanimity in triumph;” a policy of universal amnesty and universal suffrage after the Civil War. His willingness to put up bail for Jefferson Davis brought him much abuse, but he never allowed his subscribers’ threats to modify his editorial views.

Green, Anna Katharine (1846–1935). American novelist and short-story writer. She is especially remembered for The Leavenworth Case (1878), said to be the first detective fiction written by a woman. Other works include The Hand and the Ring (1883) and The Filigree Ball (1903).

Green, Anne (1899–1948). American novelist. Shortly after her birth, her family moved to Paris where her father was in business, and Miss Green, whose brother is Julian Green, has described the household in her volume of reminiscences: With Much Love (1948). Her novels include The Selbys (1930), A Marriage of Convenience (1933), Fools Rush In (1934), The Silent Duchess (1939), Just Before Dawn (1943), and The Old Lady (1947).

Green, Frederick Lawrence (1902–1953). Irish novelist, best known for his Odd Man Out (1945), a novel about a young Irish revolutionary.

Green, Henry. Pen name of Henry Yorke (1905–1954). English novelist and manufacturer. All his novels have extremely brief titles, such as Blindness (1926); Living (1929); a compassionate proletarian novel; Party Going (1939); Lovum, his best-known novel; Back (1946), an account of a man’s return from the war; Concluding (1948), a satire on a future bureaucratic state; Nothing (1950); and Doting (1952). His novels, written almost entirely in realistic dialogue, are elegant and witty but ambiguous comedies of manners. Often two forces are brought into conflict, such as the old and the young, the past and the present, the employer and the servant. Though the novels are apparently simple, even naïve, they have mysterious symbolical overtones (see Loving). Pack My Bag (1939) is a collection of reminiscences.

Green, Julian or Julien (1900– ). French novelist of American parentage. He is the brother of Anne Green. Green is as much influenced by his Puritan heritage as by the Catholicism to which he was converted. His novels, originally written in French, reflect his obsessive sense of sin, his terrible consciousness of the violence and sadism of which men are capable, his fascination and fear of madness and death. Depicting a varied yet constant battle between good and evil, Green’s works include Avarice House (Mont-Cinère; 1926), The Closed Garden (Adrienne Mésurat; 1927), The Dark Journey (Leviathan; 1929), The Dreamer (Le Visionnaire; 1934), Then Shall the Dust Return (Varouona; 1940), Moïra, and CHAQUE HOMME DANS SA NUT. (1953), L’Ennemi (1954), and L’Ombre (1956) are plays; Personal Record 1928–1939 (1939) and Memories of Happy Days (1942) are autobiographical volumes.

Green, Paul Eliot (1894–1948). American playwright and teacher. He is best known for dramas portraying life in the South, often set in his native state of North Carolina. His most important plays are In Abraham’s Bosom (1927), a Pulitzer Prize-winning drama about a mulatto who tries to establish a school for Negroes in a North Carolina town; The Field God (1927), concerning poor whites; The House of Connelly (1931), dealing with the contrast between aristocratic Southern landowners and the tenant farmers; and a dramatization (1940) of Richard Wright’s Native Son. Green wrote scripts in Hollywood during the 30’s, eventually returning to teach at the University of North Carolina. His later plays deal with folk customs and beliefs; among them are The Lost Colony (1937), a historical pageant dealing with the first settlement on Roanoke Island; The Common Glory (1947), set at the time of the Revolution; Wilderness Road (1955); and The Stephen Foster Story (1959).

Green, Thomas Hill (1836–1882). A British philosopher, noted for his Prolegomena to Ethics (1883) and Principles of Political Obligation (1895). Against Social Darwinists such as Spencer, who argued that man was determined by natural forces such as evolution, Green followed Hegel in asserting that man was a free and rational being who acted in relation to rational moral ideals; that the highest moral ideal revealed by reason was the ideal of the perfect state, that man’s most important duties were therefore political. Freedom was not the ability to do as one liked, but the power to identify one’s self with the highest rational good, i.e., the ideal of the perfect state, and the responsibility to criticize and reform the existing social order in accordance with this ideal.

Green Bay Tree, The (1924). A novel by Louis Bromfield. It tells the story of Lily Shane who begins life in a Middle Western industrial town and goes to Paris to bear an illegitimate child. Bromfield’s first novel, it is also the first novel in the tetralogy entitled Escape.

Green Henry

a child, began writing poetry in a hospital for the tubercular. None of his poems was published during his lifetime, but, after his early death, Hart Crane found his manuscripts. Crane was deeply impressed by the strange imagery and flights of intense imagination, and some of Greenberg's phrases are recognizable in Crane's own poems. Poems: A Selection from the Manuscripts was published in 1947, with a preface by Allen Tate.

Green Carnation, The (1894). A novel by Robert S. Hichens (1864–1950). It satirizes the decadence of the period at the end of the 19th century; in particular, it is intended as a lampoon on Oscar Wilde. The “green carnation” of the title is “the arsenic flower of an exquisite life.” The hero, Lord Reginald Hastings, “too modern to be reticent,” is put in his place by a heroine who, when he complains that she is almost ordinary, replies that she is glad of it and flatly refuses to marry him.

Greene, Graham (1904– ). English novelist, short-story writer, and playwright. He is an ardent convert to Catholicism, and all his writings reflect his religious views. Greene's novels are unusual combinations of psychological studies, adventure thrillers, and essays on moral and theological dilemmas. Among the best known of his works are Brighton Rock, The Power and the Glory (first published in the U.S. as The Labyrinthine Ways), The Heart of the Matter, and A Burnt-Out Case. He also wrote a number of lighter novels in which the thriller element predominates, but which are still about problems of good and evil. Some of these “entertainments,” such as The Third Man, have made excellent movies.

Greene's settings are varied: Sweden in England Made Me (1935), wartime London in The Ministry of Fear (1943) and The End of the Affair (1951), Mexico, Africa, or an English seaside town. The place, however, is always in a state of seedy decay and the people in a state of spiritual and psychological chaos. Greene has a journalist's sense of topicality. Many of his novels were set in unusual places just before they became international crisis spots: The Quiet American (1955), about a fumbling idealist in cold-war Viet Nam; Our Man in Havana (1958), a Cuba spy-story “entertainment”; and A Burnt-Out Case (1960), set in the Congo. Greene has also written Twenty-One Stories (1954), a collection of short stories, meditative travel books such as Journey without Maps (1936), and plays such as The Living Room (1953), The Potting Shed (1956), and The Compliant Lover (1959).

Greene, Robert (1560–1592). English prose writer and dramatist. Greene traveled in Europe, took his M.A. degree from both Oxford and Cambridge, and then appeared in London, where he became known as a University Wit and a writer of rogue literature. During his brief life he was a remarkably prolific writer, having 38 publications—prose romances, pamphlets, dramas—to his credit at the time of his death. His early prose works, showing the influence of John Lxly and the Euphuistic style (see Euphuism), include Mamilla (1583); The Mourne of Modesty (the story of Susanna, 1584); Alcida, Greene's Metamorphosis (1588). Euphuism, His Censure of Philautus (1587), is a continuation of Lyly's work. Pandosto, the Triumph of Time (1588) is a prose romance which provided Shakespeare with the plot for A Winter's Tale. Menaphon (1589, reprinted as Greene's Arcadia) is a pastoral romance modeled after Sir Philip Sidney's Arcadia.

All Greene's plays were performed posthumously. They include The Comical History of Alphonsum, King of Arragon (c. 1587); Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay (c. 1589, acted 1594), a comedy that may have been inspired by Marlowe's Dr. Faustus, dealing with the legendary alchemical pursuits of Roger Bacon and Thomas Bungay; Orlando Furioso (acted 1592), a free adaptation of Ariosto; The Scottish History of James IV (c. 1591): and, with Thomas Lodge, A Looking Glass for London and England (c. 1590, acted 1592). It is possible that Greene was in part responsible for the original plays dealing with Henry VI, which Shakespeare allegedly revised and rewrote. In his last pamphlet, A Groatsworth of Wit, Greene gives the first contemporary mention of Shakespeare in a warning to his fellow-playwrights to beware the upstart actor who, with his “tiger's heart wrapped in a player's hide,” is encroaching on their territory and writing plays himself.

As one of the writers hired to reply to the Puritan pamphlets in the Martin Marprelate controversy, Greene was attacked by Richard Harvey in Plaine Percevall and the Peace-maker of England (1590). Greene answered with A Quip for an Upstart Courtier (1592), directed against Harvey and his two brothers. By the time Gabriel Harvey retaliated in Four Letters and Certaine Sonnets, Greene was dead “of a surfeit of pickled herring and Rhenish wine,” and his defense was taken up by Thomas Nashe; however, it is Gabriel Harvey who wrote an account of Greene's last days.

Greene's repentence pamphlets, while in part autobiographical, should probably not be taken entirely as documents of personal repentance and confession. They include Greene's Mourning Garment (1590); Never Too Late (1590); Farewell to Folly (1591); and A Groatsworth of Wit Bought with a Million of Repentance (1592), which contains the allusion to Shakespeare. His “cony-catching” pamphlets (1591–92) are realistic descriptions of London low-life and underworld activity; they include A Defense of Cony-Catching; Disputation between a He-Cony-Catcher and a She-Cony-Catcher; The Black Book's Messenger; and A Notable Discovery of Cozenage.

Green-eyed monster. Iago's term for jealousy in Shakespeare's Othello. A greenish complexion was formerly held to be indicative of jealousy; and as cats, lions, tigers, and all the green-eyed tribe "mock the meat they feed on," so jealousy mocks its victim by loving and loathing it at the same time.

Green Hat, The (1924). A best-selling novel by Michael Arlen. Its popularity was largely due to the way in which it captured the licentious, disillusioned spirit of the time. With a self-sacrificing heroine and a husband who kills himself, the novel is a sentimental account of sexual license among the wealthy.

Green Henry (Der grüne Heinrich; first version, 1854; second, 1879–1880). A largely autobiographical novel by Gottfried Keller in the tradition of the Bildungsroman. Heinrich Lee, the hero, called green because of his youthful naiveté, wishes to become a great painter and expends a great deal of time and energy at this pursuit before he finally discovers that he can never achieve more than moderate competence. In the course of his adventures, however, he neglects his widowed mother, and it is in this aspect of the story that the novel's two versions diverge. In the early version, Heinrich assumes all the blame for his mother's eventual death; his attacks of conscience break both his spirit and body, and he dies. In the later version, however, Heinrich's guilt is not stressed, and he successfully adjusts himself to a life of civic service as a government official.

Green Knight. See Sir Gawain and the Green Knight.

Green Mansions (1904). A romance of the South American tropics by William Henry Hudson. The hero, Mr. Abel, tells the tragic story of his love for the bird girl, Rima, an ethereal maiden whose jungle upbringing has brought her close to the powers and beauty of nature. Abel has just succeeded in awakening the human emotion of love in the half-wild girl when she is killed by a band of savages.

Green Mountain Boys, The (1839). A novel by Daniel Pierce Thompson (1795-1868), American lawyer, novelist, and historian. The book's central character is the hero Ethan Allen. Immensely popular, the novel was the most successful of Thompson's attempts to preserve romantic episodes in early Vermont history and gives a vivid picture of Revolutionary times in Vermont.

Green Pastures, The (1930). A play by Marc Connelly, based on the sketches in Roark Bradford's Of Man Adam an' His Chillin'. This famous play, which was awarded a Pulitzer Prize, presents reverent though humorous versions of Old Testament stories as they are told by an old Southern Negro preacher in terms of the lives of his congregation.

Greenwich Village or The Village. A section of New York City west of Washington Square. It was noted during the early 20th century and the years immediately preceding and following World War I as the haunt of Bohemian artists, writers, and radicals, who originally chose it as a place to live because of its cheapness. In former days it had been a quaint, small village reached from the city in lower Manhattan by stage coach.

By the time of the 1930's, Greenwich Village was chiefly a residential district for young business and professional couples, who could pay higher rents than their predecessors the Bohemians, and the artists and writers who had moved to Brooklyn or to the Connecticut suburbs. Among the well-known personalities who have lived and worked in Greenwich Village at one time or another are: Floyd Dell, Gelett Burgess, Max Eastman, Emma Goldman, William Vaughn Moody, Eugene O'Neill, Edna St. Vincent Millay, William Rose Benét, Katherine Anne Porter, E. E. Cummings, Carson McCullers, and James Baldwin; among the little magazines published there were The Little Review, The Masses, and The Seven Arts. Several novels of Floyd Dell deal with the life in Greenwich Village in its heyday.

Gregorian chant. The ritual plain song, or canon firmus, a kind of unison music in the eight church modes. A collection of these, edited by Pope Gregory I, has come down to us. It is still used in the roman Catholic Church and Greek Catholic Church.

Gregorian year. The civil year, according to the correction introduced by Pope Gregory XIII in 1582. The equinox, which occurred on March 25 in the time of Julius Caesar, fell on March 11 in the year 1582. This was because the Julian calculation of 365 1/4 days to a year was 11 min. 10 sec. too much. Gregory suppressed ten days, so as to make the equinox fall on March 21, as it did at the Council of Nice, and, by some simple arrangements prevented the recurrence in future of a similar error.

The New Style, as it was called, was adopted in England in 1752, when Wednesday, September 2, was followed by Thursday, September 14.

Gregory I. Called Gregory the Great, St. (c. 540-604). Benedictine monk elected Pope (590-604). He established the temporal power of the papacy, reformed monastic discipline, and sent Augustine with 40 monks to England. According to tradition it was he who established the liturgical music known as Gregorian chant.

Gregory VII, St. Original name, Hildebrand (c. 1020-1085). Italian pope (1073-1083). As pope he pursued a policy of establishing the papacy as the supreme office in the Church and of protecting the Church from the civil states in Europe. He issued a decree (1075) that prohibited lay investiture of the clergy, that is, clergy could no longer be appointed to office by civil authorities. He called Henry IV of Germany to Rome to answer charges of oppression of the Church and sacrilege. Henry was outraged at Gregory's play for authority and tried to depose him. Gregory responded by excommunicating Henry. Henry did penance in the snow before Gregory's palace at Canossa and gained conditional absolution (1077). In 1078, Gregory renewed the excommunication and, Henry declared war. He appointed Clement III as antipope (1080) and captured Rome in 1084. Gregory was rescued from the castle Sant' Angelo, and died in exile at Salerno the next year.

Gregory, Horace [Victor] (1898- ). American poet, critic, and translator. Much of his poetry criticizes middle-class life and presents dramatic monologues or character studies of petty racketeers and gangsters and people of the city slums. Among his books are Chelsea Rooming House (1930), No Retreat (1933), Chorus for Survival (1935), Poems: 1930-1940 (1941), The Shield of Achilles: Essays on Poetry and Beliefs (1944), Selected Poems (1951), and Medusa in Gomery Park and Other Poems (1961). In 1931 he translated the poems of Catullus; in 1958 Ovid's Metamorphoses. He also wrote Pilgrim of the Apocalypse (1933), a study of D. H. Lawrence; A History of American Poetry, 1900-1910 (1946), with his wife, Marya Zaturenska; and crit-cal biographies of Amy Lowell (1958) and James McNeil Whistler (1959).

Gregory, Lady Isabella Augusta (1852–1932). Irish dramatist. The first 40 years of Lady Gregory’s life were from a literary viewpoint extremely uneventful, with little if any thought given to the subject. With the death of her husband, Sir William Gregory, in 1892, however, she developed a strong interest in Irish literature and history, and in 1898, when she met William Butler Yeats, she was ready to lend her talent, wealth, and position to the slowly developing sense of national consciousness that was to burgeon into the Irish literary renaissance. The major focus of her energy was directed to the Irish National Theatre, which later evolved into the Abbey Theatre and which she served as a director. In 1914 she wrote a history of the movement, Our Irish Theatre.

Her own literary efforts were primarily designed to reawaken the Irish national consciousness through translations and collections of ancient Celtic legend and folklore. She is best known, however, for her one-act plays, which were originally designed as “fillers” for the Abbey program. Among these the best known are Spreading the News (1904) and The Rising of the Moon (1907).

Her beautiful estate at Coole in western Ireland is celebrated in Yeats’s lovely poem, The Wild Swans at Coole. See IRISH RENAISSANCE.

gregueria. See Ramón GÓMEZ de LA SEÑA.

Greif, Andreas. See ANDREAS GRYPHIUS.

Gremio. In Shakespeare’s Taming of the Shrew, a rich old gentleman, suitor to Bianca. He considers himself an ideal mate because of his advanced years.

Grendel. The monster in Beowulf. He is described as a giant in human shape, a descendant of Cain who lives in a murky pond with his mother among other strange and vicious sea-beasts. For 12 years mother and son come to land occasionally and devour human victims, until Beowulf comes to kill them.

Grenfell, Sir Wilfred (1865–1940). English medical missionary and writer, widely known as Grenfell of Labrador. He wrote adventure tales and books of a religious nature, including A Labrador Doctor (1919) and others.

Greville, Sir Richard (1541?–1591). English naval commander. The cousin of Sir Walter Raleigh, Grenville commanded a fleet of seven of Raleigh’s ships carrying colonists who were attempting to settle on Roanoke Island, off the coast of North Carolina (1585). When in 1591 his ship, the Revenge, was isolated by a fleet of fifteen Spanish ships off Flores, Grenville fought off the Spaniards for fifteen hours. His heroic battle is celebrated in Tennyson’s ballad The Revenge.

Gresset, Jean Baptiste Louis (1709–1777). French poet and dramatist. He is noted for his poem Vert-Vert (1734), relating the adventures of a parrot, and a successful comedy Le Méchant (1745), which satirizes contemporary salon society.

Gretchen (German diminutive for Margarete). In Part I of Goethe’s Faust, the young and simple, lower-class girl whom Faust seduces with the aid of Mephistopheles’ magic. She reappears as a penitent spirit at the end of Part II and greets Faust’s salvation with joyful song. See ETERNAL FEMININE.

Grettir the Strong. A hero of The Grettisaga, a 14th-century Icelandic tale. Concerned with a historical hero of the late 10th and early 11th century, the story is of unusual interest because of resemblances to parts of the 8th-century Old English epic Beowulf. There is a translation of it by William Morris.

Grettisaga, The. See GRETTR THE STRONG.

Greuze, Jean Baptiste (1725–1805). French painter. He was greatly admired by his contemporaries for his narrative genre scenes of morality, such as The Paralytic tended by his Children and A Father’s Curse: the Ungrateful Son. Today these overdramatic, insensitive, and sentimental paintings are found inferior to his portraits.

Greville, Sir Fulke. 1st Baron Brooke (1554–1628). English courtier and diplomat. Greville’s epitaph reads: “Servant to Queen Elizabeth—Councillor to King James—and Friend to Sir Philip Sidney.” It is in this last capacity that he is best remembered, and for his Life (1652) of Sidney. Greville had a distinguished career in government, becoming chancellor of the exchequer under James I. He was a patron of the arts and learning, and a fair poet in his own right.

Grey, Lady Jane (c. 1537–1554). The great-granddaughter of Henry VII and for nine days queen of England. At 16 she was married to Lord Guildford Dudley, whose father, the earl of Northumberland, was Protector of Edward VI. As part of a plan to change the succession of the crown from the Tudors to the Dudleys, Northumberland persuaded the dying Edward to settle the crown on Lady Jane and bypass the claims of Mary and Elizabeth. Lady Jane was proclaimed Queen on June 10, 1553, but by the 19th Mary had gathered powerful supporters, defeated the forces of Northumberland, and was proclaimed Queen by the Lord Mayor. Lady Jane and her husband were imprisoned and finally executed.

Grey, Zane (1875–1939). American writer of Westerns and articles on outdoor life. In 1904, Grey made up his mind that writing rather than dentistry was to be his career. A first-rate storyteller, he won enormous popular success with Riders of the Purple Sage (1912) and a long succession of later novels. Possibly his best books are The Last of the Plainsmen (1908) and the nonfiction collection Tales of Fishing (1925).

Grey Friars. Franciscans. Black Friars are Dominicans, and White Friars, Carmelites.

Griboedov, Aleksandr Sergeyevich (1795–1829). Russian dramatist. His satirical masterpiece, Woe from Wit, is one of the classics of Russian drama. For most of his career, Griboedov was a civil servant. His death was spectacular: serving as Russian minister to Persia, he was cut to pieces by a raging mob that sacked the Russian embassy in Tehran. Griboedov was the subject of an interesting fictionalized biography entitled The Death of Vassil-Mukhtar (Smert Vassil-Mukhtara; 1929) by the Soviet writer Yuri Nikolayevich Tynyanov (1894–1944).

Grieg, Edvard [Hagerup] (1843–1907). Norwegian composer. The rhythmic and melodic patterns of his work capture the spirit of his homeland. Grieg wrote operas, choral works, dances, songs, and concertos for various instruments; his Peer Gynt suite, written as incidental music to accompany Ibsen's play, is well known. His songs and chamber music employ subtle and delicate harmonies.

Grieg, Johan Nordahl [Brun] (1902–1943). Norwegian poet, novelist, and playwright. The vigor and the adventurous spirit that marked Grieg's life and his writings manifested itself first during his student days. A voyage as a seaman on a Norwegian merchant ship depicted the realistic account Skibet går videre (The Ship Sails On, 1924); he also traveled through Europe living with tramps. Although he wrote plays during the 1920's, it was not until Grieg's trip to Russia (1933–1935) that his work acquired real force and dramatic vitality. Study of the Russian theater strengthened his sympathy for the working classes and led him to write his plays about controversial social issues. Vår oere og vår makt (Our Honor and Our Might, 1935) treats the greed of Norwegian ship owners during World War I: Men imorgen (But Tomorrow—, 1936) presents a conflict between labor and Nazism. In Spain during the civil war as a journalist with republican sympathies, Grieg published a novel, Men ung må verden enn uore (But Young the World Must Be, 1938) based on his experiences in Spain, Russia, and Norway. He went to England with the Norwegian government in exile at the time of the German invasion, and flew missions over Germany in American bombers. Before his death, he wrote several war lyrics that express a deepened love for his country and an undaunted courage. Flagget (1945), Friheten (1945), and Habet (1946) are his posthumous collections of poetry.

Grierson, Francis. See Benjamin Henry Jesse Francis Shepard.

Grierson, Sir Herbert [John] C[liford] (1866–1960). Scottish critic, scholar, and editor who, in such books as The First Half of the 17th Century (1906), Poems of John Donne (1912), and Metaphysical Poets from Donne to Butler (1921), helped to bring about the current revival of interest in the Metaphysical poets.

griffin. A mythical monster. Also called griffon, gryphon, and similar names. It is fabled to be the offspring of the lion and eagle. Its legs and all from the shoulder to the head are like an eagle; the rest of the body is that of a lion. This creature was sacred to the sun, and kept guard over hidden treasures. The griffins were in perpetual strife with the Arimaspian, a people of Scythia, who rifled the gold mines for the adornment of their hair. The belief apparently grew out of the stylized animal commonly represented in Scythian art, originally perhaps a chicken.

Griffith, D[avid Lewelyn] W[ark] (1875–1948). American motion-picture director and producer. One of the pioneers in the early days of the film, he is especially known for his mobile and imaginative use of the camera and for having developed such techniques as the closeup, the long shot, the flashback, and the fadeout. After a period as actor and script writer, he became a director for the Biograph Company. Later he began to produce motion pictures independently, and in 1923 he was one of the founders of United Artists. Among his famous films are The Birth of a Nation (1915), Hearts of the World (1917), Broken Blossoms (1919), Way Down East (1920), and Orphans of the Storm (1921).

Grifone (Gryphon). In the Orlando poems of Bolando and Ariosto, the son of Oliviero and brother of Aquilante. He is called il bianco (the white) and his brother il nero (the black), because each of them is protected by an enchantress of that color. The white enchantress rescued him from a griffin (hence his name), which had stolen him from his mother, Ghismonda.

Grigorovitch, Dmitri Vasilyevich (1822–1899). Russian novelist and short-story writer. Grigorovitch's father died when he was a child, and he was raised by his French mother and governess. Not until he attended school in Moscow did he learn to read and write Russian. In 1836 he entered the military engineering school in St. Petersburg. One of his fellow students was the future novelist Feodor Dostoevsky. During his four years at the school, Grigorovitch developed a strong interest in literature. He made the acquaintance of such leading figures as the critic Vissarion Belinski, the poet Nikolai Nekrasov, and the novelist Ivan Turgenev. About this time the natural school in Russian literature, originating from Belinski's literary doctrines, was in the ascendency. Grigorovitch became one of the leading members of this movement. His first contribution was Peterburgskie sharmanshchiki (Petersburg Organ-grinders, 1844), a sketch realistically depicting the lives of organ-grinders in the capital. The piece appeared in Fiziologiya Peterburga (Physiology of Petersburg, 1845), an anthology devoted to an examination of life in St. Petersburg.

Grigorovitch's best works were published in the following two years. Derevensya (The Village, 1846) was one of the first literary works to deal extensively with peasant life. It was followed by another study of the peasantry: Anton-Goremyka (1847). Although they were criticized as presenting a somewhat idealized picture, both these stories did much to make peasant life acceptable material for literature.

Grigoryev, Apollon Aleksandrovich (1822–1864). Russian poet and literary critic. Grigoryev grew up in the conservative middle-class section of Moscow, Zamokvarechye, which Ostrovski often used as the setting for his dramas. After graduating from Moscow University, Grigoryev began a wandering career as literary critic for a series of journals. One of his most important associations was with the Moskvityanin (The Muscovite), where his contacts with Ostrovski and other supporters of an independent Russian culture had a great effect on his own literary theories. In 1856, Grigoryev went abroad for two years. On his return he wrote for the journal Vremya (Time), published by the novelist Feodor Dostoevski and his brother Mikhail Dostoevski. These men, together with the philosopher Nikolai Nikolayevich Strakhov (1828–1896), shared Grigoryev's views that Russian culture must be an organic growth rooted in Russian life, rather than an imitation of Western culture. Russian literature and art, they maintained, must grow from Russian soil (pochna). The ideas of the pochnenniki, as the group was known, were set forth by Grigoryev in his article Paradoxy organiceskoi kritizma (Paradoxes of Organic Criticism). At about the same time, he wrote the autobiographical work, Moi literaturnye i narav-Walter Walter of the relents; move of of as a masters, (1883-1553). LAWCATS, (1592).

Still, he continued writing, and among the dramas he left behind at his death are two of his most famous: Die Jüdin von Toledo (The Jewess of Toledo, completed 1855) and Ein Bruderzwist in Habsburg (A Fraternal Struggle in the House of Hapsburg, written c. 1855). His well-known novella Der arme Spielmann (The Poor Minstrel, written 1831) is a sentimental but carefully constructed masterpiece.

Grimald, Nicholas (1519-1562). English poet, scholar, and clergyman. Grimald is best known for his 40 poems, most of them translations from Latin, which appeared in the first edition of Tottel's Miscellany (1557). He also wrote two Latin plays and translated Cicerone's De Officiis (1553).

Grimm, Jacob Ludwig Carl (1785-1863) and his brother Wilhelm Carl (1786-1859). German scholars, considered the founders of Germanic philology as a systematic study. Among the works on which they collaborated are Deutsche Sagen (German Legends, 1816) and the famous collection of Kinder- und Hausmärchen (lit., "Children's and Household Tales," 1812 ff.) known as Grimm's Fairy-Tales (see MÄCHEN). For the latter, they got most of their material not from written documents but from peasants whom they interviewed; Wilhelm, who tended more toward literary criticism and appreciation than his brother, did most of the transcription. Jacob, more the scholar, wrote a Deutsche Grammatik (German Grammar, 1819 ff.) in which he formulated "Grimm's Law," the first attempt to explain the consonantal differences between Greek and Latin words and their cognates in the Germanic languages. It was also Jacob who did most of the work on the definitive Deutsches Wörterbuch (German Dictionary, 1852 ff.), begun by the brothers and still in progress.

Grimmelshausen, Hans Jakob Christoffel von (1610-1676). German novelist, strongly influenced by the tradition of the picaresque novel in France and Spain. Although contemporary with baroque poets such as Andreas Gryphius, Grimmelshausen used a less ornamental style, which was more accessible to the people. His most famous work is the novel SIMPLICISSIMUS.

Griselda or Grisilda (The Patient). The heroine of the final tale of Giovanni Boccaccio's The Decameron. Her husband, the marquis of Saluzzo, chooses her from among the peasantry, then decides to test her fidelity. First, he pretends their two children are dead by his hand; then he feigns boredom and pretends he has married again, using his own daughter as the supposed new love. Turned out of the house, she endures her sufferings nobly and remains constant until Saluzzo relents; she is then restored to her home and children, having won the love and admiration of her husband and his people. Basically the job story in modern dress, the tale was known to Boccaccio from a French source; it was in turn translated into Latin by Petrarch. From this Latin version rather than from the Italian source Chaucer drew the Clerk's Tale, to which he supplied his own ironic comment on the credibility of the tale: Grisilde is dead, and eek her paciencce, And both at once buried in Italie.

Groatsworth of Wit Bought with a Million of Repentance, A (1592). A pamphlet written by Robert Greene, supposedly while he was dying. It is in part a repentance tract and a warning to his fellow-playwrights to eschew evil and thus avoid his own bitter end. It contains the famous reference to Shakespeare as "an upstart crow, beautified with our feathers, that . . . supposes he is as well able to bombast out a blank verse as the best of you; and being an absolute Johnnies fac totum, is in his own conceit the only Shake-scene in a country." See illustration on page 426.

until 1928, he has been established in the U.S. since 1937. His influence in the field of education continued on this continent when he became chairman of the department of architecture at Harvard (1938-1953). His conception of architectural teamwork led to the formation of The Architects' Collaborative (TAC), designers of Harvard's Graduate Center. It has attracted commissions on the scale of a civic center for Tallahassee, Fla., and the new U.S. Embassy in Athens.

Grosseteste, Robert (c. 1175-1253). English prelate and scholar, bishop of Lincoln (after 1235).
He is known for his determined struggle to protect the English clergy against both King Henry III and Pope Innocent IV, particularly as to the right of making ecclesiastical appointments. Also important to medieval intellectual life were his voluminous writings on everything from philosophy and theology to husbandry, largely in Latin, but also including Le Château d'Amour (The Castle of Love), a French poem of religious allegory.

Grossi, Tommaso (1790-1853). Italian poet and novelist. A member of the romantic school, he is the author of novella in octaves entitled Ildegonda (1820), and a 15-canto epic poem I Lombardi alla
Prima Crociata (1826). His novel Marco Visconti (1834), which follows Manzoni's model for the historical novel, is noted for its illustration of the theme of Italian independence. Verdi based the libretto for his opera I Lombardi alla Prima Crociata (1843) on the epic poem.

Grosz, George (1899-1961). German artist. He is known for his venomous satirical drawings which he used to attack militarism, the bourgeoisie, and capitalists. Greatly affected by the first World War, he participated in the Dada movement. When he was exiled to the U.S. after Hitler came to power, his satire became less aggressive.

Grote, George (1794-1871). English historian, educator. Active in the liberal and humanitarian movements of his day, Grote was, with John Stuart Mill and Henry Brougham, a founder of the University College, London. He was an advocate of parliamentary reform and higher education for women.
He is best known for his History of Greece (1845-1856), for many years the definitive English work in its field, though now superseded by later scholarship.
He was also the author of Plato and the Other Companions of Socrates (1865) and Aristotle (1872).

Grotius, Hugo. Latinized form of Huig de Groot (1583-1645). A Dutch jurist and statesman.
His De jure Belli et Pacis (1625), written after his escape to France as leader of the Remonstrants, is regarded as the real beginning of the science of international law. His voluminous writings include a number of tragedies.

Grotto, Luigi (1541-1585). Italian dramatist and poet. Known as il Cleto d'Adria (the Blind Poet of Adria) after his infirmity and his birthplace near Venice, he was the author of lyrics, comedies, and tragedies. One of the latter, La Hadriane, retells the story of Romeo and Juliet, but far more popular and influential were his epigrams and madrigals, mainly imitations of the Greek Anthology. He was also a diplomat and, at times, an actor, as when he per-dormed the role of Tiresias in Sophocles' Oedipus Rex at the famous theatre of Vicenza built by Palladio.

ground-hog day. February 2. On that day, according to popular legend, the ground hog, or wood-chuck, emerges from the hole in which he spent the winter, but if he sees his shadow he goes back to hibernate for six weeks more, and winter lasts much longer. See CANDLEMAS DAY.

Ground We Stand On, The (1941). A collection of biographical sketches by John Dos Passos.
Dos Passos in his novels has been passionately critical of contemporary American life. In these sketches he turned to the past to affirm the American Dream as it appeared exemplified in the philosophy of men who had made or influenced our earlier era, such as Roger Williams, Sam Adams, Tom Paine, Jefferson, Joel Barlow, and Hugh Henry Brackenridge.

Group Theatre, The. A London theater and acting company. It flourished during the 1930's, performing Marxist, labor-sympathizing, and experimental plays. W. H. Auden and Christopher Isherwood wrote plays for this theater.

Groussard, Serge (1920- ). French novelist and journalist. His novels are a kind of fictionalized reporting of the contemporary scene: Pogrom (1948), about the Jews in Tripolitania, Woman With No Past (La femme sans passé; 1954), and German Officer (Un officier de tradition; 1954).

Grove, Sir George (1820-1900). English engineer and writer on music. He built the first iron lighthouse at Jamaica (1841). He is remembered chiefly as the editor of the standard Dictionary of Music and Musicians (1879-1886). He served as director of the Royal College of Music at Kensington from 1862 to 1894.

Grove, Lorna. A character in William Faulkner's Light in August. Although not central to the main action of the story, Lena Grove offers an important and implicit contrast to the violence and death present in the plot. Her confinement symbolically re-enacts the confinement of Joe Christmas' mother, and her placidity and animal unconcern make her a minor kind of Earth Mother, carrying out her natural function of reproduction in a context that seems, but for her, hostile to life and growth.

Growth of the Soil, The (Harkens Grotte; 1917). Nobel prize-winning novel by Knut Hamsun. Hamsun describes an elemental existence in the rough open country of Norway. Isak and Inger, the hero and heroine of the novel, are individuals, yet they possess a simple, hardy vitality that makes them personifications of pioneer life.

Grub Street. The former name of a London street (now Milton Street). Dr. Johnson says that it was "Much inhabited by writers of small histories, dictionaries, and temporary poems; whence any mean production is called grubstreet." The word is used allusively for needy authors, literary hacks, and their work. George Gissing wrote a novel entitled New Grub Street.

Grumio. The clownish, punning servant of Petruchio in Shakespeare's TAMING OF THE SHEER. With his good-humored playfulness, he is a perfect foil for the lusty and vigorous Petruchio.

Grundtvig, Nicolai Frederik Severin (1783-1872). Danish poet, historian, and linguist. Until the death of his father, a clergyman, in 1813, Grundtvig served as a country curate. His prolific writing career began in Copenhagen where he published poems and articles; he also made several translations into Danish, including Beowulf (1820). After a term as vicar (1821-1826) that terminated in violent theological controversy, Grundtvig spent two years in England studying Anglo-Saxon manuscripts. He returned to Copenhagen where he became a bishop in 1861. As a historian, he practiced a romantic approach, treating Scandinavian mythology in Nordens Mythologi (1808). A religious reformer and educationalist as well, Grundtvig was a figure of great influence in Denmark.

Grundy, Mrs. What will Mrs. Grundy say? What will our very proper and strait-laced neighbors say? A phrase from Tom Morton's English comedy Speed the Plough (1800). In the first scene Mrs. Ashfield shows herself very jealous of neighbor Grundy, and farmer Ashfield says to her: "Be quiet, wench ye? Always dinging, dinging Dame Grundy into my ears. What will Mrs. Grundy say? What will Mrs. Grundy think?"

Gruneichrich, Der. See GREEN HENRY.

Grinevald, Matthias (1480?-1528). German painter. He is generally regarded as the last and greatest representative of the German Gothic school. His work has great power and originality, its distortion in drawing, heavy chiaroscuro, and rich color adding to its emotional intensity. The complex, many-winged altarpiece—now in the Colmar Museum—is his masterpiece.

Grushenka. In Fedor Dostoevsky's THE BROTHERS KARAMAZOV, the beautiful young woman loved by Dmitri and pursued by his father, Fedor Pavlovich. Although her past is checkered and her reputation not the best, Grushenka is as large-hearted in her way as Dmitri himself. Often referred to in the novel as a kitten and a cat, she shows both sets of qualities, being playful and soft at times and crafty and malicious at others. Her love for Dmitri grows, regenerates her, and at the end of the novel she prepares to follow him to his Siberian imprisonment.

Gryll Grange (1860). A novel by Thomas Love Peacock. The action, such as it is, takes place during a house party in an English country mansion. There is a great deal of witty and erudite conversation, while most of the events are of a cheerfully preposterous character, such as the simultaneous marriage of nine couples that ends the book.

Grýpfius, Andreas. Pen name of Andreas Greif (1616-1664). German baroque poet and dramatist. Gryphius, like Grimsmoehausen, was deeply affected by the Thirty Years' War. His works frequently deal with the theme of the vanity of human life and of petty human ambitions, and it is characteristic that in his two most famous historical tragedies, Katharina von Georgien (Catherine of Georgia, 1657) and Carolus Siuarius (Charles Stuart, 1657), the hero dies a martyr's death. Gryphius's tragic style was strongly influenced by Seneca and by the Dutch drama of his time, but his own originality is felt in such works as Cardenio und Celinde (1657), which has been called the first "bourgeois tragedy" in German, and in his comedies, the most famous of which is Absurda Comica oder Herr Peter Squenzt (1663). In his lyrics he often combines religious subject matter and classical forms.

Gryphon. See GRIFFIN.

Guarnamara. See GUINEVERE.

Guard, Theodore de la. See Nathaniel Ward.

Guardi, Francesco (1712-1793). Venetian painter, pupil of Antonio Canaletto. Using muted tones animated by dabs of bright color and a sketchy touch to suggest details and highlights, he painted intimate, poetic scenes of Venice, its courtyards, canals, and piazzas.

Guardian Angel, The (1867). A novel by Oliver Wendell Holmes. Myrtle Hazard, an orphan brought from the tropics to live in an austere New England home, is descended from a line of ancestors of widely differing natures. Excitable and uncontrolled, she runs away; when she is returned to New England, she becomes ill and hysterical. Under the intelligent guardianship of Professor Gridley, she is restored to health and falls in love with the young sculptor, Clement Lindsay. During the Civil War, she goes with him to the front, and nurses the wounded. Proper treatment and environment overcoming heredity, her mental balance is restored.

pastoral tragicomedy in imitation of Tasso's Aminta, it was translated into English by Sir Richard Fanshawe in 1647. In John Fletcher's The Faithful Shepherdess (1610), Guarini's faithful shepherd has changed sex, and the plot has been altered, but the English play is based upon the Italian. As a critic, Guarini defended his mixture of tragedy and comedy, and generally argued for greater freedom from classical rules in literary genres.

Guarino of Verona (1374–1460). Italian educator. Teaching mainly at the Ferrara court school, he used methods, based on Greek ideals, intended to educate the pupil completely. Both he and Vittorino or Feltre exercised great influence on their pupils and on future educational theory.

Guarneri. See CREMONA.

Guazzo, Stefano (1530–1593). Italian diplomat and man of letters. His La civile conversazione (1574), is a courtesy book composed of four books of dialogues which offer a model for the would-be gentleman to follow in polite discourse. In England, the translation (1581–1586) by George Pettie and Bartholomew Young placed it beside The Courtier and the Galateo of Della Casa as indispensable reading.

Gudrun. (1) A German epic poem written about 1210 by an unknown Austrian, apparently in imitation of the Nibelungenlied. Its many sea settings are unusual among German tales. Of its three sections, the first concerns Hagen, king of Ireland, and the second describes Hettel's courtship of Hagen's daughter Hilde. In the third part, their daughter Gudrun is engaged to Herwig of Seeland, but is abducted by Hartmut of Normandy. She refuses to marry her captor, so for 13 years she is forced to do menial servant's work. At last Herwig, accompanied by Gudrun's brother, comes to her rescue; and the lovers are happily married.

(2) Sigurd's wife in the Volsunga Saga, better known as Kriemhild in the Nibelungenlied and Gutrune in Wagner's tetralogy of operas, Der Ring des Nibelungen.

(3) The heroine of the Icelandic Laxdale Saga, and daughter of Queen Grimhild. She was a selfish, independent, forceful woman, married successively to Thorwald, Thord, and Bolli, and in love with Kjartan, whose death she caused.

(4) One of the two leading women characters in D. H. Lawrence's novel Women in Love. She is believed to have been based on Katherine Mansfield.

Guebres. See GHEBERS.

Guédalla, Philip (1889–1944). English historian and biographer who wrote in the manner of Lytton Strachey. Among his biographies are Palmerston (1926) and The Duke (1931), which is about Wellington.

Guelfo (Guelph) or Carlo (Charles) of Denmark. In the GERULALDUS LIBERATA of Tasso, the Christian knight who narrates the death of Sveno in a massacre which he alone survived. He is also one of the two knights (the other, Ubaldo) sent by Goffredo the Christian general to bring back Rinaldo of Este. He and Ubaldo complete their mission with the aid of the Hermit of Ascalon, who shows them where to find Rinaldo and how to extricate him from the enchantments of Armida.

Guelphs (or Guelfs) and Ghibellines. Names of the rival political parties in 12th-century Germany, adopted by 13th- and 14th-century Italian parties. The Ghibellines were the supporters of the Holy Roman Emperor, at that time a German; the Guelphs were his opponents, usually supported by the papacy. At the time of Dante the Guelphs of Tuscany were bitterly divided into two factions; see BIANCHI AND NERL.

Guérin, Georges Maurice de (1810–1839). French poet. His prose poem Le Centaure was published posthumously by George Sand in Revue des Deux Mondes (1840). His sister Eugénie Guérin (1805–1848) is famous for her journal, a posthumously published diary.

Guermantes, de. A large family of the French aristocracy, in Marcel Proust's REMEMBRANCE OF THINGS PAST. Duc Basin, called the Prince de Laume before his father's death, is the elder brother of Baron de Charlie and of Mme de Marsantes, the mother of Robert de ST-Loup. Basin's wife, Oriane, the Duchesse de Guermantes is even more of an aristocrat in her own right, being a descendant of the eight-century Geneviève de Brabant and a cousin of many of the members of European royalty. She is represented as the most important hostess in French society, and the narrator in his youth goes through a period of worshiping her extravagantly. There are also the Prince and Princesse de Guermantes, and various other relatives by blood and marriage.

Guermantes Way, The. See REMEMBRANCE OF THINGS PAST.

Guerrazzi, Francesco Domenico (1804–1873). Italian novelist. He was a prolific author of historical novels with patriotic themes in keeping with the struggle for Italian independence. His best-known work is L'Asedio di Firenze (1836).

Guest, Lady Charlotte Elizabeth (1812–1895). Welsh writer. Her Mabinogion (1838–1849, 1877), a collection of tales translated from the Welsh, is a classic of Celtic folklore.

Guest, Edgar Albert (1818–1959). English-born American writer of verse. At the age of 20, Guest began to conduct a daily column of verse in the Detroit Free Press. His sentimental, folksy, moralistic doggerel was widely syndicated, extremely popular, and known throughout the U.S. Among his collections are A Heap o' Livin' (1916), Just Folks (1917), and Life's Highway (1933).

Guevara, Antonio de (c. 1480–1545). Spanish historian and Franciscan monk. He wrote The Dial of Princes (Libro Llamado Relo de Principes, en el Qual Va Encorporado el Muy Famoso Libro de Marco Aurelio; 1529), a didactic novel giving an imaginary life of Marcus Aurelius, and a series of Epistolai Familiare (1539–1545), often called the Golden Letters because of their supposed worth. These works, translated into English by Thomas North and Edward Hallowes, may have been the inspiration for Lyly's Euphues. See EUPHUES.

Guggenheim fellowships. Annual awards provided by the John Simon Guggenheim Memorial Foundation. Each year, 40 or 50 fellowships are given to Americans in the fields of literature, stagecraft, art, music, history, philosophy, and science. Among the writers who have received the award are John Dos Guicciardini, Francesco (1483-1540). Florentine historian and diplomat. Guicciardini's public career was spent in the service of the Medici and the papacy. Though critical of his contemporary, Machiavelli, he shares with him a realistic approach and a modern historical sense in his Storia d'Italia (History of Italy) and other writings. Passages of the Storia, translated into English by Geoffrey Fenton from a French version, appeared in the Chronicles of Holinshed, thus exerting an important influence on English writers like Raleigh and Bacon.

Guiccioli, Countess Teresa (1801-1873). Italian noblewoman, known for her long-lasting liaison with Lord Byron. She was still a very young girl, married to a much older man, when in 1819 their relationship began; a year later she left her husband and became Byron's openly acknowledged mistress. The attachment, which lasted the rest of Byron's life, is considered to have had a steadying influence on the poet and to have contributed to his increasing literary skill and facility during his years in Italy. She wrote My Recollections of Lord Byron (1868).

Guiderius. In Shakespeare's Cymbeline, the elder son of Cymbeline, king of Britain. He is abducted by Belarius as an infant and raised as his son under the name of Polydore. He and his brother Arviragus are "as gentle as zephyrs blowing below the violet... and yet as rough, their royal blood enchaf'd, as the rudest wind."

Guidici, Giovanni (1500-1541). Italian papal official. He is noted for his sonnets on Italian affairs during the crucial years 1526-1530, when the Spanish were gaining domination over Italy and the Papacy. His Rime (Verses) were published in 1557.

Guido delle Colonne (13th century). Sicilian poet. He is known for his Historia Troiana (c. 1285), a Latin work in which he embodies the Trojan story adapted from the Roman de Troie of Benoît de Sainte-Maure. Guido is considered to have been the source of Boccaccio's Il Filostrato. He visited England in the retinue of Edward I when the latter returned from the Crusades.

Guidone Selvaggio (Guido the Savage). In the Orlando Furioso of Ariosto, a younger brother of Rinaldo andkinsman of Astolfo. Having been shipwrecked on the coast of the Amazons, he is doomed to fight their ten male champions. He slays them all, but must then marry ten of the Amazons. With the help of his favorite wife, Aleria, and Astolfo, who uses his magic horn to scatter the Amazons, he escapes and joins the forces of Charlemagne against the pagan armies.

Gildenstern. See Rosencrantz and Guildenstern.

Guillaume de Lorris (early 13th century). French poet famous for having written the first part of the Romance of the Rose.

Guillaume Tell. See William Tell.

Guillén, Jorge (1893- ). Spanish poet and academician. Born in Valladolid, Guillén began a teaching career that took him from Seville to Wellesley and then to Harvard University. His cold, intellectual poetry reveals the influence of Paul Valéry; it appears in the volume Cántico (1928), which is enlarged with every new edition. Other recent volumes include Maremagnón (Clamor, 1957) and Viviendo y otros poemas (1958). Guillotine. A decapitating machine much used during the French Revolution. A similar device was already in use in the 16th century in the south of France and in Italy, where it was called mannaia and was used exclusively for beheading nobility. Joseph Ignace Guillotin (1738-1814), member of the Constitutional Assembly, proposed in 1789 that a uniform method of capital punishment be established and that a machine, surer and swifter than the headsman's hand, be devised to carry it out. Dr. Antoine Louis, then secretary of the French College of Surgeons, was the actual designer of the guillotine, and it was first called lousion or louisette. It was first used on April 25, 1792. It is still the legal method of execution in France.

Guinevere. In Arthurian legend, the wife of King Arthur. In the many versions in which she appears, her name is spelled a variety of ways. (See GANOR.) She is, for example, the Guanhuma of Geoffrey of Monmouth, the early Irish Finnabair, the Welsh Gwênhwyvar. In many of the romances, she is said to be the daughter of King Leodegrance who, when Arthur and Guinevere are married, gives to Arthur the famous Round Table.

Like her classical counterparts, Helen of Troy and Persephone, Guinevere is one of those legendary heroines who is always being abducted and whose beauty brings betrayal, war, disaster. In Geoffrey of Monmouth's History of the Kings of Britain (1137), she is seduced by Arthur's nephew (or son), Mordred, thus ultimately bringing about the death of Arthur and an end to many others. In most versions, however, it is Sir Launcelot with whom Guinevere is illicitly involved. In Lancelot (c. 1180) by Chrétien de Troyes, it is that ideal knight who must go to the rescue of Guinevere when she is kidnapped by an unknown knight.

In Malory's Morte d'Arthur (c. 1469), Sir Launcelot is not only often the rescuer of Guinevere, but also her abductor. Here also, however, it is Mordred who, in the absence of Arthur, has usurped the kingdom and wishes to seduce and marry Guinevere. Thus begins the closing tragedy that culminates in the death of Arthur and the end of the order of the Round Table. Arthur hastens back from his expedition against Leo, king of the Romans; Guinevere flees, and a desperate battle is fought in which Mordred is slain and Arthur mortally wounded. Guinevere renounces Launcelot after the death of Arthur and takes the veil at Almesbury, where later she dies. But even at the end, Launcelot must go to carry her away once more. In a vision one night, he is told that Queen Guinevere is dead. Sadly, he goes for her, carries her body to Glastonbury, and places it beside the body of King Arthur.

Tennyson, in his Idylls of the King (1859-1885), makes Guinevere guilty only in her passion for Launcelot, and not a party to Mordred's treachery.

Guinicelli or Guinizelli, Guido (c. 1240-c. 1276). Italian poet, founder of the STILNOVISTI school of poetry. Only a few of his sonnets and lyrics have survived; the most famous is the canzone called Al Cor Gentil, translated as The Gentle Heart (1861) by Dante Gabriel Rossetti.
Guinness, Sir Alec (1914- ). English stage and screen actor. He was a member of the Old Vic (1936-1939), afterward touring Europe. He appeared on the stage in New York in Eliot's The Cocktail Party (1950). He is best known in America as a film actor for his outstanding, subtle comic roles in Man in the White Suit, Kind Hearts and Coronets, The Lavender Hill Mob, and The Horse's Mouth (for which he wrote the screen play). As a dramatic actor his depiction of Pagin in Oliver Twist so aroused the ire of pressure groups that the film was banned in the U.S. for several years.

Guiraldes, Ricardo. See Don Segundo Sombra.

Guise. A French ducal house, a branch of the house of Lorraine. The Guise family acquired great political influence upon the accession (1559) of Francis II, who had married Mary, Queen of Scots, granddaughter of Claude, first duke of Guise. Henry, third duke of Guise (1550-1588), was known, like his father, as le Balafre (Fr., "the scarred") because of a battle scar on his face. He became the leader of the Roman Catholic party in French politics and organized the Holy League. The idol of the Parisian mob, Henry probably aspired to the French throne and was murdered at the instigation of Henry III. The league, subsequently under the leadership of the duke of Mayenne, brother of the third duke, was crushed before the end of the 16th century. The direct line of the house of Guise became extinct in 1675. See also Henry IV (of France).

Guiltman, Arthur (1871-1943). American poet. A light verse writer, Guiltman, who was born in Vienna of American parents, first attracted attention with his Rhymed Reviews in Life magazine. He made an adaptation of Molière's L'Ecole des Maris in rhymed verse for the Theatre Guild (1933), and wrote the libretto and lyrics for Walter Damrosch's opera, The Man Without a Country (1937). Betel Nuts (1907), The Laughing Muse (1915), Ballads of Old New York (1920), and Lyric Laughter (1939) are among the collections of his verse.

Guyot, Sacha [Alexandre Pierre Georges] (1885-1957). French actor and dramatist, son of the actor Lucien Guity (1860-1925). Extremely popular between the world wars for his light sparkling comedies, he wrote over 130 plays, such as Le Page (1902), Sleeping Partners (1916), Mariette (1928), and Where There's a Will (1934). Some, such as Debureau (1918), Pasteur (1919), and Mozart (1926), were historical biographies.

Guitoz, François Pierre Guillaume (1787-1874). French historian and statesman. A professor of history at the Sorbonne during the earlier years of his career, Guitoz published historical works that comprise a voluminous body of writing. He became involved in politics during the July Monarchy (see July Revolution) and served in various ministerial capacities under Louis Philippe (1830-1848).

Gulbeyas. The sultana in Lord Byron's Don Juan. Having purchased Juan at the slave market and introduced him into the harem in female attire, she is outraged to find that he prefers Dudu, one of the attendant beauties, to herself. She attempts to have them drowned in the Bosphorus, but they escape.

Gulistan (Pers., Rose Garden, 1285). A collection of lyrics by the Persian poet Sâ'î. Polished and accomplished, full of moral reflections, both witty and sweet, it contains sections on kings, dervishes, contentment, love, youth, old age, and social duties, together with many stories and philosophical sayings.

Gulliver's Travels (1726). Best-known title of Travels into Several Remote Nations of the World, by Lemuel Gulliver, a satiric masterpiece written in the form of a journal by Jonathan Swift. Lemuel Gulliver, a ship's physician, makes four voyages: to Lilliput, whose inhabitants are six inches tall; to Brobdingnag, a land of giants; to the flying island of Laputa, an empire of "wise men"; and to Houyhnhnmland, inhabited by Houyhnhnms and Yahoos. Swift's bitterest work, Gulliver's Travels satirizes man's abuse of human reason as reflected in his political, social, and academic institutions; at best, man is foolish; at worst, he is nothing more than an ape. A multifarious book, it is various in its appeal: it is enchantingly playful and fantastic, and is often read by children; it is a witty, allegorical depiction of the political life and values of Swift's time; it is a bitter denunciation of mankind; finally it is Swift's reflections on man's corruption of his highest attribute, reason.

Gull's Hornbook, The (1609). A prose satire by Thomas Dekker. In the form of a mock hornbook, or primer, it was for the guidance of wealthy young gallants, called gulls, who came to London for adventure and experience. It tells them how to behave at the theater, the tavern, the gambling house, and so on.

Gumiliov, Nikolai Stepanovich (1886-1921). Russian poet. Gumiliov was one of the founders of the Acmeist movement. His early travels in Africa were reflected in the exoticism of his poetry. Between 1910 and 1918, he was married to the poet Anna Akhmatova, also a member of the Acmeist group. After the revolution, Gumiliov openly expressed his opposition to the Bolsheviks, and was executed for conspiracy in 1921. See ACMEISM.

Gundolf, Friedrich. Pen name of Friedrich Gundelfinger (1880-1931). German literary historian, critic, and biographer. In his youth he was a member of the circle about Stefan George. His works include Shakespeare und der deutsche Geist (Shakespeare and the German Spirit, 1911); Shakespeare in deutscher Sprache (Shakespeare in German, 1908), a 10-volume translation done in collaboration with George; and works on the German romantics.

Gunga Din (1892). One of Rudyard Kipling's Barrack-Room Ballads, in praise of a Hindu water-carrier for a British Indian regiment.

An' for all 'is dirty 'ide
'E was white, clear white, inside....

...You're a better man than I am, Gunga Din.

Gunnar. See Gunther.

Gunnarsson, Gunnar (1889- ). Icelandic novelist, poet, and playwright. Born into a farming family and largely self-educated, Gunnarsson celebrated in his work the courage and dignity of humble people in his native land. During his extended stay

Gunpowder Plot. In English history, a conspiracy of a few Roman Catholics led by Robert Catesby to murder James I and the members of both houses of Parliament. The date selected for the attempt was Nov. 5, 1605, when James was to appear in person at the opening of Parliament. The plot was foiled when Guy Fawkes (1570–1606), who had undertaken to fire the gunpowder for the explosion, was arrested in the cellar under the House of Lords on November 4. The failure of the plot is still celebrated in England on November 5 as Guy Fawkes Day.

Gunther, Burgundian king who courts Brunhild in the Nibelungenlied and Wagner’s Ring des Nibelungen, known as Gunnar in the Völsunga Saga. He is probably partially based on Gundahar, a historical ruler overthrown by the Huns in 436.

Gunther, Johann Christian (1695–1725). German poet admired by Goethe. His style is halfway between the mannerism of the late Baroque and the more personal lyric that developed in the 18th century. His works include a tragedy, Die Eifersucht (Jealousy, 1715).

guru. (Sansk., “venerable”). In Hinduism one’s personal spiritual teacher and religious guide. Guru was the title taken by the succession of Sikh spiritual and temporal leaders from 1469 to 1708.

Gustavus II, known as Gustavus Adolphus (1594–1632). A king of Sweden, the Lion of the North, or the Snow King. Supporting the Protestant cause in the Thirty Years’ War (1630–1632), he won the battle of Lützen against Wallenstein, but was mortally wounded. One of the greatest generals of all times, he saved Protestantism in Germany. His death left Sweden under a regency with his six-year-old daughter Christina as nominal queen.

gute Mensch von Sezuan, Der. See Good Woman of Sezuan, The.

Gutenberg, Johannes (c. 1400–c. 1468). German printer, usually considered the inventor of movable metal type. Documents dating from 1439 indicate that he was involved in various secret operations employing a press and a device presumed to be a type mold. In 1455 at Mainz he entered into a partnership with Johann Fust, a moneylender. The partnership was dissolved five years later when Gutenberg defaulted on the loan and Fust seized Gutenberg’s equipment and stock and continued the operation himself with the help of Peter Schöffer. It is generally accepted that the so-called Gutenberg Bible—more properly called the Mazarin Bible from its discovery in 1760 in the library of Cardinal Mazarin in Paris (see Bible, specially named editions)—was issued from the press that Gutenberg established and Fust took over. Whether Gutenberg alone was responsible for this edition is uncertain. None of the work ascribed to him bears his name.

After he lost his press to Fust, Gutenberg came under the patronage of Conrad Humeray, a counselor of Mains, and continued to print books. The Catholicon of 1460 is a fine example of his later work.

Gutiérrez, Eduardo. See GAUCHO LITERATURE.

Gutiérrez Nájera, Manuel (1859–1895). Mexican poet and journalist. Generally considered a precursor of modernism, Gutiérrez Nájera was strongly influenced by the French Parnassians and symbolists. His verse is graceful, subjective, and elegiac, distinguished by elegance of style and perfection of form. His best-known poems, such as Trisíssima Nox, Serenata de Schubert, and Non omnis moriar, were written after 1880; his poetry remained scattered until 1896 when a collection of his Poesías appeared with a preface by Justo Sierra. Gutiérrez Nájera is also remembered as the founder of the Revista Azul, Mexico’s first modernist review.

Gutrun. See KRIEMHILD.

Gutzkow, Karl (1811–1878). German novelist and dramatist in the movement of Jung Deutschland (Young Germany). His early novel Wally, die Zweiflerin (Wally, a Doubting Girl, 1835) aroused a storm of protest because of its extensive treatment of such generally avoided subjects as atheism and free love, and he was jailed for three months as a result. His later social novel, Die Ritter vom Geiste (The Knights of the Spirit, 1850–1851), though not as sensational as Wally, is more competent as a work of art. Among his dramas, the best known is Uriel Acosta (1846), which depicts the struggle of a Jew for intellectual freedom.

Guy Mannering (1815). A novel by Sir Walter Scott, set in Scotland at the time of George III. Guy Mannering, a young Englishman traveling in Scotland, stops overnight at the home of the laird of Ellangowan. A son is born to the laird that night and Mannering, a student of astrology, predicts two crises in the boy’s life in his fifth and 21st years. He then goes on his way. Some time later, the son, Harry Bertram, disappears at the age of five. His mother dies of shock and the laird lives on only for a few years, leaving his daughter Lucy in the care of Dominie Sampson, a friend and schoolteacher, on his death. Mannering, returning from India after years of living there, invites Lucy and Dominie to live with him and his daughter, Julia. He is followed from India by a Captain Brown whom he erroneously suspects of loving his wife and with whom he has deeded. Brown is actually in love with Julia. In the climax of the book, Brown is recognized by a gypsy; he is Harry Bertram, although he did not know it, and was spirited off by the unscrupulous lawyer Glossin who got Harry’s father’s estate for himself since the heir had disappeared. All is restored to Harry and he wins the friendship of Mannering and the hand of Julia. The book is noted not so much for its plot, which brims with coincidences, as for the creation of such notable characters as Meg Mer-Rilies and Dandie Dinmont.

Guy of Warwick (c. 1300). The title of a Middle English romance and the name of its hero. The exploits and adventures of Guy of Warwick are typical of the heroes of non-Arthurian romance, such as Bevis of Hampton, Havelock, and King Horn.
To obtain Phelis (Felice) as his wife, Guy of Warwick undertook many knighthood deeds. He rescued the daughter of the emperor of Germany, and went to fight against the Saracens, slaying the doughty Coldran, Elmaye King of Tyre, and the soldier himself.
Then he returned and wedded Phelis, but in 40 days got back to the Holy Land, where he slew the giant Amaranth, and many other. Having achieved all this he became a hermit near Warwick. Daily he went in disguise to his own castle and begged bread of his wife Phelis; but on his death bed he sent her a ring, by which she recognized him, and went to close his dying eyes.

Guyon, Sir. See Faerie Queen, The.

Guzmán, Martín Luis (1887— ). Mexican essayist and novelist. During the Mexican Revolution, Guzmán was an adherent first of Venustiano Carranza, then of Pancho Villa. From 1923 to 1936 he lived in Spain, where he wrote the books that brought him immediate renown. Guzmán’s best-known work is El águila y la serpiente (The Eagle and the Serpent, 1928), an autobiographical collection of sketches describing scenes and personages of the revolution. La sombra del caudillo (1929) is a roman à clef exposing the cynicism and intrigue that characterized Mexican politics in the 1920’s. In the four-volume Memorias de Pancho Villa (1938–1940), Guzmán gives an account of the deeds and sayings of the revolutionary hero.

Guzmán de Alfarache, Vida del Pícaro (1599,
The book is supposedly the autobiography of a Sevillian rogue who composes it while in forced retirement in the galleys, where he has been sent for defrauding a rich widow. After relating each of his adventures, the narrator adds a long moral; these passages are outstanding for their superb prose and good sense.
The book also contains numerous subsidiary tales, such as the famous story of Ozmín and Daraja. Alemán’s original title for the work was Atalaya de la vida (Watch-tower of Life), but his contemporaries insisted on calling it El Pícaro.

Gwendoled or Guendolene. See Locrine.

Gwenhwyvar. See Guinevere.

Gwyn or Gwynne, Eleanor. Known as Nell Gwyn (1650–1687). English actress and mistress of Charles II. She is said to have begun her career as an orange-vendor in a London theater. As an actress, she was noted for her skill in comedy roles, and her guilty and good nature made her a great favorite with the public. She became Charles’s mistress in 1668 and bore him two sons, one of whom was later made Duke of St. Alban’s. According to tradition, the King’s dying request to his brother was “Let not poor Nelly starve.”

Gyas and Cloanthus. In Vergil’s Aeneid, two companions of Aeneas, generally mentioned together as “fortis Gyas fortisque Cloanthus.” The phrase has become proverbial for two very similar characters.

gypsy. A member of a dark-skinned nomadic race. Gypsies first appeared in England about the beginning of the 16th century, and, as they were thought to have come from Egypt, were named Egyptians, which soon became corrupted to Gypcians, and so to its present form. They call themselves Romany (from Gypsy rom, a man, husband), which is also the name of their language: a debased Hindu dialect with large additions of words from Persian, Armenian, and many European languages. It is thought that early gypsies migrated from Northern India.

The name of the largest group of European gypsies is Atmigan; this, in Turkey and Greece, became Tshingian, in the Balkans and Romania Tigan, in Hungary Cigany, in Germany Zigeuner, in Italy
Zingari, in Portugal Cigano, and in Spain Gitano.
The original name is said to mean dark man. See Bohemian.

There is a legend that the gypsies are waifs and strays on the earth because they refused to shelter
the Virgin and her child in their flight to Egypt.
Habakkuk. An Old Testament book bearing the name of its author. It is a short, cogitative book written just before the fall of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. The author questions the actions of a god who uses a wicked enemy to punish his sinful people. Habakkuk resolves his problems by foreseeing a final triumph over evil by the forces of righteousness and faith.

Habington, William (1605-1654). English poet. He was the author of the lyrical collection Castara (1634), a series of elegant poems praising the chastity of his mistress and muse.

Hachette, Louis Christophe François (1800-1864). French publisher, founder of the Paris firm of Hachette et Cie (1826). The firm is noted for its carefully annotated, classical texts, its educational books, and dictionaries.

Hacker, Louis M[orton] (1899- ). American historian and teacher. Interested in the impact of economics on American politics, public policy, and social and individual behavior, Hacker wrote A Short History of the New Deal (1934), The Triumph of American Capitalism (1949), American Capitalism (1957), and other books. He joined the faculty of Columbia University in 1934 and later became dean of the university's School of General Studies.

Hades (Haides, Aidoneus). The place of the dead. In Homer, the name of the god, also called Plouton (Pluto), who reigns over the dead. In later mythology, the name was also applied to the abode of the departed spirits, a place of gloom, but not necessarily, like the Christian Hell, a place of punishment and torture. As the state or abode of the dead it corresponds to the Hebrew Sheol, a word which the translators of the Authorized Version frequently replaced with the misleading Hell. Hence Hades is often used as a euphemism for Hell.

Habakkuk (Ara:[abic, "a saying or tradition"]). The traditions about the prophet Muhammad's sayings and doings. This compilation, made in the 10th century by the Muslim jurists Moshin and Bokhari, forms a supplement to the Koran as the Talmud does to the Jewish Scriptures. The Habakkuk was originally not allowed to be committed to writing, but the danger of the traditions being perverted or forgotten led to their being placed on record.

hadj. A pilgrim; specifically, a Muslim who has completed the required pilgrimage or hadj to Mecca. The word is often prefixed to a name as an epithet of honor. See ISLAM.

Hadith. Full Latin names Publius Aelius Hadrianus (A.D. 76-138). Roman emperor (117-138). As part of his policy of consolidation and of renouncing conquest, he established the Euphrates as the Eastern boundary of the Roman Empire. He effected the construction in Britain of Hadrian's Wall (120-123) from Solway Firth to the south of Tyne as a protection against the Picts and Scots. He profoundly admired Greek culture and did much to beautify Athens with new buildings. His tomb at Rome and his villa at Tibur are remarkable structures. Hadrian was a learned man, an amateur architect, and a writer of genuine gifts. His reign was one of the finest ages in Roman history, and it continued for many years longer through his foresight in choosing as his successors Antoninus Pius and Marcus Aurelius. Marguerite Yourcenar wrote a thoughtful fictional biography of Hadrian, which she called a "meditation on history," in Mémoires d'Hadrien (Memoirs of Hadrian; 1951).

Hadzhi Murad (1911). A novel by Count Leo Tolstoy. A short book, written in 1904, it is set during a Cossack uprising in the Caucasus. Replaced as a leader by a rival, Hadzhi deserts to the Russians. He later changes his mind and, pining for his own people, decides to go back to them, even though he knows they will kill him for his desertion. The novel is generally considered one of the most artistic works of Tolstoy's later period.

Haeckel, Ernst (1834-1919). German zoologist and philosopher who popularized the ideas of Darwin. In The Riddle of the Universe (Die Welträtsel; 1899) he applied the doctrine of evolution to philosophy and religion.

Haemon (Haimon). See ANTIGONE.

Hafiz. Pen name of Shams-ud-din Muhammad (c. 1300-1388). Persian poet. A student of both poetry and theology, Hafiz became a dervish, a professor Sufi (a mystic Islamic sect), and a professor of Koranic studies; his pen name, Hafiz, "one who remembers," was the Persian term applied to a scholar who knew the Koran by heart. The Divan of Hafiz is a large collection of odes (ghazals) written in 5 to 15 couplets (distsicks) each. The second lines of the couplets rhyme throughout and the last couplet always introduces the poet's name. An example of a final couplet is: "The laughing wine, the sweet girl's tumbled tresses, / Were more than even Hafiz could deny!" The odes are arranged alphabetically in the book according to their rhymes. The subjects of the odes include love, wine, birds, flowers, the instability of all things human, and Allah and the prophets. Beside their apparent content, the odes have religious meaning in the mystical terms of the Sufi.

Best known for his odes, Hafiz also wrote in other forms, especially the rubaiyat (rhymed quatrains).
Hagar. In the Old Testament, the Egyptian servant of Abraham's wife Sarah. When she bore Abraham a son Ishmael, she grew haughty towards her mistress, who remained childless; but after the birth of Sarah's son Isaac, Hagar and Ishmael were cast out into the wilderness. On one occasion, when they were perishing of thirst, an angel of the Lord pointed out a spring of water in the desert, thereby saving the lives of Hagar and Ishmael (Gen. 21).

Hagen or Hagan. Murderer of Siegfried in German legend. A retainer of the Burgundian kings in the Nibelungenlied, he is their half-brother (son of Alberich) in Richard Wagner's four-part opera Ring des Nibelungen.

Haggadah. The portion of the Midrash that contains rabbinical interpretations of the historical and legendary, ethical, parabolic, and speculative parts of the Hebrew scriptures. The portion devoted to law, practice, and doctrine is called the Halachah. They were begun in the 2nd century and completed by the 11th.

Haggai. A book of the Old Testament named for its author. The prophet Haggai's main concern was with the correct and speedy rebuilding of the temple in Jerusalem after the return from exile in Babylon (c. 530 B.C.). He also expresses the Messianic hope.

Haggard, Sir [Henry] Rider (1856-1925). English novelist, whose tense, mysterious stories usually occur in some exotic African setting. His most effective novels are King Solomon's Mines (1885), Allan Quartermain (1887), She (1887), and its sequel Ayesha (1905). Many of his books, notably She and King Solomon's Mines, have been dramatized and made into motion pictures.

Hagia Sophia. See SANTA SOPHIA.

Hague Tribunal. An international court of arbitration meeting at The Hague. It arose out of the Hague Congress on disarmament in 1899 and has been superseded by the Permanent Court of International Justice.

Hahn, Otto (1879-1946). German chemist. He has done highly important work in radiology and atomic fission. In 1938, with Lise Meitner and Fritz Strassman, he split the uranium atom. He won the Nobel Prize for chemistry in 1944.

Haidée. In Lord Byron's Don Juan, the beautiful Greek girl who finds Juan when he is cast ashore on one of the Cyclades. She hides him in a cave, and the two soon fall in love. When her father, Lambro, a rich Greek pirate, returns from an expedition, the romance is discovered. Juan is exiled, and Haidée goes mad and dies after a lingering illness. There is also a Haidée who figures in Dumas' Count of Monte Cristo.

Haijai. See HAIKU.

Haiku. A form of Japanese poetry, composed of seventeen syllables (in 5, 7, 5 pattern), giving a complete impression or mood. Its greatest practitioner was Matsuo Bashō, who established the rules for the content of the poems and the allusions permitted. It developed from haikai, a form of linked verse (composed by various poets) popular in the 16th and 17th centuries. Haiku is the opening verse in a series of linked verse; haikai is a separate poem of the haikai school. The three terms are frequently confused. An example of haiku by Matsuo Bashō:

This road:
no one walks along it.
Dusk in autumn.

See TANKA.

Haile Selassie (1891- ). Name assumed upon coronation by Ras Tafari, emperor of Ethiopia (1930). Called the Lion of Judah, he was driven from Ethiopia by Italian conquest in 1936-1941, but restored to his throne in 1941.

Hairy Ape, The (1922). A play by Eugene O'Neill. An expressionistic drama, it tells of a crude stoker on a transatlantic liner. Yank, who feels that he "belongs" in the depths of the ship, becomes disillusioned with his life when he and the men are inspected by a society girl. His attempt to climb the evolutionary ladder fails in New York City, where he finally goes to the zoo; realizing that the ape is his nearest kin in spirit, he releases the animal from its cage and is crushed to death by the beast.

Hajjar-al-Aswad. In the Muslim faith, a famous black stone, irregularly oval, about seven inches in breadth and surrounded with a circle of gold, which is found in the northeast corner of the Kaaba. According to legend, when Abraham wished to build the Kaaba, the stones came to him of their own accord and he commanded all the faithful to kiss this one. The stone was supposed to have been whiter than milk when it first came from Paradise, but became black through the sins of the millions that had kissed it. On the Day of the Resurrection, it is believed, the stone will have two eyes by which it will recognize all those who have kissed it, and a tongue with which it will bear witness to Allah.

The stone is probably an aerolite, and it was worshiped long before Muhammad's day. In the second century a.d. Maximus Tyrius spoke of the Arabs paying homage to it, and Persian legend states that it was an emblem of Saturn.

Hajji Khalifa. Original name Mustafa ibn-Abdallah (1600?-1658). A Turkish historian and bibliographer. He compiled a bibliographical lexicon, with memoirs of the authors, of more than 25,000 books in Arabic, Turkish, and Persian.

Hakluyt, Richard (1553-1616). English scholar and clergyman. As a boy Hakluyt became interested in maps and explorations, and devoted his life to compiling and editing accounts of English voyages of discovery. In 1582 he published his first compilation, Divers Voyages touching the Discovery of America. This was followed in 1589 by Principal Navigations, Traffics, Voyages, and Discoveries of the English Nation, which was greatly enlarged to three volumes in 1598-1600. Called "the prose epic of the modern English nation," it contains accounts of the voyages of Raleigh, of the Cabots, of Drake's circumnavigation, of Martin Frobisher's search for the Northwest Passage, and the like. His work, which reflects the great exploring spirit of the Elizabethan age, gave additional impetus to English exploration, conquest, and colonization.

Halachah. The division of the Midrash that deals with the interpretation of the law, points of doctrine, etc. See HAGGADAH.

Halbe, Max (1875-1944). German dramatist in the movement of NATURALISM. He is best known for his early works, which include Ein Emporkömmling (An Uprising, 1889), a village tragedy; and Die Jugend (Youth, 1893), a lovers' tragedy of the Romeo and Juliet type, which also treats the conflict between modern personal values and traditional religious ones.

halcyon days. A time of happiness and prosperity. Halcyon is the Greek for a kingfisher, compounded of halk, the sea, and Ayo, to brood on. The ancient Sicilians believed that the kingfisher laid its eggs and incubated them for 14 days before the winter solstice on the surface of the sea. During this time the waves of the sea were always unruffled.

Halcyone and Ceyx. A story told by Ovid and his medieval adaptations, and used by Chaucer (spelled Alcione and Seyes) as an introduction to his Book of the Duchess. Halcyone is often the daughter of Aeolus. She learns in a dream of the death of Ceyx, her husband, who has been drowned in a shipwreck. Next morning she finds his body cast up by the sea, and three days later she dies, usually by casting herself into the sea in grief.

Hale, Edward Everett (1822-1909). American clergyman and author. He is best known for his realistic story The Man Without a Country. He also wrote whimsical tales, historical romances, and scholarly works, and was the founder of Old and New (1870-1875), a magazine later absorbed by Scribner's. A New England Boyhood (1893, enlarged, 1900) and Memories of a Hundred Years (2 v., 1902) are autobiographical.

Hale, Nancy (1908- ). American novelist and short-story writer. Born in Boston, the granddaughter of Edward Everett Hale, she is the author of a number of novels, among them The Young Die Good (1932), Never Any More (1934), The Prodigal Women (1942), and The Sign of Jonah (1950). Her perceptive short stories are collected in The Earliest Dreams (1936), Between the Dark and the Daylight (1943), and The Empress' Ring (1955). A New England Girlhood (1958) is her autobiography embroidered by fancy. She also wrote The Pattern of Perfection (1960) and The Realities of Fiction: A Book About Writing (1962).

Hale, Nathan (1755-1776). American hero in the Revolutionary War. He was sentenced by the British to be hanged as a spy and went to his death with the words, "I only regret that I have but one life to lose for my country." He is the hero of a drama by Clyde Fitch entitled Nathanael Hale (1898).

Hale, Sarah Josepha. See Godey's Lady's Book.

Halévy, Ludovic (1834-1908). French dramatist and novelist. With Henri Meillac (1832-1897), Halévy wrote gay, spirited librettos for the light operas of Offenbach, including La Belle Hélène (1855), La Vie parisienne (1867), and La Grande Duchesse de Gérolstein (1867). The partners also produced the libretto for Bizet's Carmen and the two light, witty comedies Froufou (1859) and La Petite marquise (1874). Writing alone, Halévy enjoyed success as a novelist, his best-known work being the charming L'Absurde Constantin.

Half Moon. See Henry Hudson.

Haliburton, Thomas Chandler (1796-1865). Canadian humorist. In 1856, Haliburton, a lawyer and judge, retired and went to England, was welcomed into literary and political circles, and was elected to the House of Commons. A fanatic conservative, he was critical of the U.S., frequently expressed contempt for what he called "the lower orders," and became an avowed enemy of democracy.

In 1835 Haliburton began writing in the newspaper The Novascotian humorous sketches about Sam Slick, an itinerant Yankee clockmaker. This lampoon on Americans was apparently primarily intended to make Nova Scotians appreciate their own country and British institutions, but also to contrast Nova Scotian indolence with Yankee industry and shrewdness. The first sketches, with others added, were collected in The Clockmaker, or, The Sayings and Doings of Samuel Slick of Slickville (1857). This series was followed by several others, including Sam Slick's Saws and Modern Instances (1853). The books became very popular, first in Canada, then in the U.S. and England. Sam Slick became the best-known character in the field of Yankee humor and had many imitators. A shrewd, ruthless trader, ready to trick his customers at every opportunity, Sam is full of wise saws and has an unfailing supply of humorous stories. Some of his sayings gained wide currency, such as: "Politics makes a man as crooked as a pack does a peddler; not that they are so awful heavy either, but it teaches a man to stoop in the long run."

Halifax Law. A severe penalty peculiar to this English town. By this law, whoever committed theft in the precinct of Halifax was to be executed on the Halifax gibbet, a kind of guillotine. Hence the expression go to Halifax.

Hall, Donald (1928- ). American poet and editor. At one time the poetry editor of the Paris Review, Hall has done much to make the younger contemporary poets more widely known by collecting their work in several anthologies. The New Poets of England and America (1957), compiled with Robert Pack and Louis Simpson, was an excellent representative collection of poets born between 1917 and 1932; it was followed by The New Poets of England and America #2 (1962), with Robert Pack; The Poetry Sampler (1962); and Contemporary American Verse (1962). Hall's collections of his own poetry include Exiles and Marriages (1955) and The Dark Houses (1958).

Hall, James Norman (1887-1951). American novelist and short-story writer. Hall was coauthor with Charles Bernard Nordhoff of the remarkably successful trilogy: Mutiny on the Bounty, Men Against the Sea (1933), and Pitscain's Island (1934). During the First World War, Hall flew with the Lafayette Escadrille, an experience which provided him with material for subsequent books written both independently and with Nordhoff. Among the books on which they collaborated were Lafayette Flying Corps (1920), Falcons of France (1929), The Hurricane (1936), and Botany Bay (1941).

Hall, Joseph (1574-1656). English clergyman, satirist, poet, and character writer. Named successively bishop of Exeter and of Norwich, he is known for his writings such as Virgiliamirus (1597), in which he attacked contemporary institutions and individuals, and Mendas Alter (1605), directed against Roman Catholics. His Characters of Virtues and Vices (1608) is in the direct tradition of Theophrastus, except that its emphasis is on moral, rather than social, virtues and evils.

Hall, Radclyffe (1886-1943). English novelist and short-story writer. Her novel The Well of Loneliness (1928) caused a sensation because it treated with sympathetic sexual pereversion among women. It was banned in England and suspended in the U.S.

Hallam, Arthur Henry (1811-1833). English poet and essayist whose early death caused Tennyson to write In Memoriam. Hallam, who was a close friend of Tennyson's and the fiancé of his sister Emily, was touring the Continent when he suddenly died in Vienna. His death was a profound shock to Tennyson and the cause of deep conflict between doubt and faith in the poet's life.

Halleck, Fitz-Greene (1790-1867). American poet, banker, and secretary to John Jacob Astor. Literature was Halleck's avocation. With his friend, Joseph Rodman Drake, he wrote the lively Croaker Papers (1819) for New York newspapers. Halleck's Poetical Works appeared in 1847. He is best known for his elegy (1820) written at Drake's death, beginning "Green be the turf above thee," and for his popular poem, Marco Bozzaris (1825).

Hallelujah (Heb., halelu-jah, praise ye Jehovah). An exclamation used in songs of praise and thanksgiving.

Hallelujah lass. A name given, with a humorously contemptuous import, to female members of the Salvation Army in its early days.

Haller, Harry. The hero of Hesse's Steppenwolf. Part of the novel's vitality stems from the fact that Haller's experiences, like his initials, are patterned on Hesse's own.

Halley, Edmund (1656-1742). English astronomer. A friend of Newton, whose Principia (1687) he published at his own expense, Halle is best known for his study of comets. He concluded that the comets of 1531, 1607, and 1682 were in reality a single body and accurately predicted its return in 1758. The comet has since been known as Halle's Comet.

Hallowe'en. October 31, in the old Celtic calendar the last day of the year. Its night was the time when all the witches and warlocks were abroad and held their wicked revels. At the introduction of Christianity it was taken over as the eve of All Saints. It is still devoted to all sorts of games in which the old superstitions can be traced. See Samain.

Halper, Albert (1904- ). American novelist and short-story writer. He is known for his autobiographical studies of workingmen in large U.S. industries and of slum life, especially in his native Chicago. His style is naturalistic, and he is considered a writer of the proletarian school of the 1930's. Union Square (1933), though his first published work, was his fourth novel. His other works include Sons of the Fathers (1940), The Little People (1942), The Golden Watch (1953), and Atlantic Avenue (1956).

Hals, Frans (1580?-1666). Dutch portrait and genre painter. His sisters represent every class of society, from officers, burgomasters, and merchants to fishwives and itinerant entertainers. He represented them in animated and momentary attitudes, capturing a casual glimpse with quick and broad brushstrokes. His work is known for its vitality and, during his later period, for its gray and black tonal harmonies.

Ham. In the Old Testament, one of the three sons of Noah, his brothers being Shem and Japheth. According to legend, Ham was the ancestor of the Hamitic races which populated Africa; their black skins were the result of Ham's iniquity in viewing his father drunk and naked, while his brothers walked backwards, with averted eyes, to cover Noah (Gen. 19: 22-23). One of his sons was Canaan.

Hamann, Johann Georg (1730-1788). German philosopher and aesthetician. In his Des Ritters von Rosencreuz letzte Willensmeinung über den göttlichen und menschlichen Ursprung der Sprache (The Knight of Rosencreuz's Last Will, on the Divine and Human Origin of Language, 1772), he contended that language is basically irrational, and thus he opposed the rationalism of enlightenment thought. He was influenced by Pietism and was a teacher of Herder. See STURM UND DRANG.

Hamelin, Pied Piper of. See PIED PIPER OF HAMELIN.

Hamilcar Barca (270s-228 B.C.). Carthaginian general, father of Hannibal. He was appointed to the command of the Carthaginian forces in Sicily, in the 18th year of the First Punic War, in 247 B.C. After the defeat of the Carthaginians in 241, Hamilcar crossed over into Spain and, within nine years, obtained possession of a considerable portion of Spain for Carthage. He was drowned during a campaign.

Hamilton, Alexander (1757-1804). American statesman and chief author of The Federalist essays. He served as the first secretary of the treasury (1789-1795) and recommended fiscal measures, such as the creation of a national bank, that reflected his belief in a strong, centralized government. Distrusting the capacity of the common man, he advocated government by the elite. He was killed in a duel by Aaron Burr, whose political ambitions he had thwarted. He is the subject of Gertrude Atherton's "dramatized biography" The Conqueror (1902).

Hamilton, Anthony (1646-1720). Irish-born French writer. His brilliant style and humor are at their best in his short novel Les Mémoires du Chevalier de Grammont (1713), which recounts the adventures and amorous exploits of his brother-in-law and depicts scandals at the court of Charles II of England. He also wrote some short stories in imitation of The Arabian Nights, and some erotic poems.

Hamilton, Cosmo. Pen name of Cosmo Hamilton Gibbs (1872-1942). English popular novelist, dramatist, and short-story writer, eldest of the Gibbs brothers, Mrs. Skeffington (1910), a drawing-room comedy, is his best-known work.

Hamilton, Edith (1867–1963). American classical scholar. She is distinguished for her books translating for modern readers the meaning of Greek and Roman life. Her most famous works include The Greek Way (1930), The Roman Way (1932), The Prophets of Israel (1936), and The Echo of Greece (1957).

Hamilton, Lady Emma, born Lyon (1761–1815). Wife of Sir William Hamilton, mistress of Horatio Nelson. Of humble birth but of great beauty, she became the mistress of Hamilton's nephew, Charles Greville, who sold her to the elderly diplomat in exchange for payment of his debts. She attained great popularity and influence at the court of Naples, where Hamilton was envoy, and there met Nelson, becoming his mistress in 1798. The lovers were extremely open about their relationship, and the birth of Nelson's daughter, Horatia (1801), gave further cause for scandal. After Nelson's death, her extravagance caused her to be imprisoned for debt (1813); she was released a year later and died in poverty in France.

Hamilton, Patrick. See Angel Street.

Hamlet, The (1940). A novel by William Faulkner, the first book of a trilogy that also includes The Town (1957) and The Mansion (1959). Spanning almost 50 years in time, the trilogy is centered on the innumerable and vicious members of the Snopes family, the first of whom invades Yoknapatawpha County early in the 20th century. In the hamlet of Frenchman's Bend, Flem Snopes begins as a clerk in Will Varner's store; through usury, connivance, and thrift, he becomes part-owner of the store and husband of Eula Varner, Will's daughter. In Jefferson, Flem works his way into Colonel Sartoris' bank, finally becoming vice-president. In order to enrich himself still further, he drives the bank president, Manfred DeSpain, from town. In The Mansion, Flem moves into the now-vacant DeSpain mansion, one of the largest and oldest houses in Jefferson. Flem has no human feelings of any kind, caring only for money and for the outward appearance of respectability. He imports a number of cousins—Mink, I.O., Lump, Ike, Eck—who install in various positions in the community, until the local citizens feel that they are overrun with Snopeses.

The novels are loosely episodic, humorous, and ironic. The Hamlet is made up of material dealing alternately with horse-trading and love—economic life vis-à-vis emotional life. The Town continues this contrast on a more sophisticated level, centering on the hopeless and almost comic love of Gavin Stevens, first for Eula Varner Snopes and then for her daughter Linda, and on the machinations used by Flem to acquire more money. The Mansion departs from this scheme, dealing primarily with the attempts of Mink Snopes to return to Jefferson and murder Flem, and with the relationship between Gavin and Linda. Each of the novels is made up of sections narrated mainly by characters who observe the action rather than take part in it, such as V. K. Ratliff, the ubiquitous sewing-machine salesman, and Chick Mallison, the young nephew of Gavin Stevens.

Hamlet of A. MacLeish, The (1928). A poem by Archibald MacLeish. In this dramatic monologue, the poet contrasts Hamlet's situation with that of modern man, symbolized by the poet himself. He attempts to show that the sensitive man today has no knowledge of the evil he tries to fight.

Hamlet, Prince of Denmark (c. 1601). A tragedy by William Shakespeare. It is his most famous play and one of the most fascinating in world literature.

Hamlet, prince of Denmark, falls into melancholy after the death of his father, the king. Claudius, his father's brother, has assumed the throne and married Hamlet's mother, Gertrude, within two months of the king's death. His father's ghost appears to Hamlet, accuses Claudius of murdering him, and demands revenge. Hamlet then resolves to feign madness in order to disguise his intentions. His rejection by Ophelia, to whom he has shown attention, leads her father, Polonius, to the conclusion that love has driven the prince mad. Unable to bring himself to action and beset by doubts as to the truth of the ghost's words, Hamlet persuades some traveling players to re-enact the death of his father. Claudius' violent reaction to the play convinces Hamlet of his uncle's guilt. Later, in his mother's chamber, the prince kills the eavesdropping Polonius, mistaking him for Claudius. Using this murder as a pretext for disposing of the prince, Claudius sends Hamlet to England with Rosencrantz and Guildenstern, who bear secret letters to the king of England, advising him to put the prince to death. But Hamlet discovers the plot and manages to return to Denmark. Ophelia, driven mad by Hamlet's rejection and the death of her father, commits suicide. Her brother, Laertes, who has been studying in Paris, returns for her funeral, intent upon revenging himself for the deaths of his father and sister. Inciting him further, Claudius arranges for a duel between Laertes and Hamlet, in which Laertes will be provided with a poisoned sword. To insure Hamlet's death, Claudius also prepares a cup of poisoned wine. During the duel, Laertes nicks Hamlet with the poisoned sword, while the queen accidentally drinks the poisoned wine and dies. Having unwittingly seized the poisoned rapier in the scuffle, the dying Hamlet kills both Laertes and Claudius. See Fortinbras.

Although Hamlet is a play of revenge, its greatness lies in the unique and thoughtful nature of the prince, whose temper is philosophical rather than active. He does not so much pursue his revenge as he is swept to it through the events of the play. His preoccupation with the nature and consequences of man's actions has led critics to call him "the first modern man." The complexity and richness of the play have furnished critics and performers with material for hundreds of interpretations.

The earliest source of the play is a story which first appeared in Historia Danica (1514) by the Danish chronicler Saxo Grammaticus, and was later translated in Histoires Tragiques (1570) by Pierre de Belleforest. An earlier version of the play (c. 1589), now lost, is referred to as "U-Hamlet" or source Hamlet.

Hammarskjöld, Dag (1905–1961). Swedish statesman. Hammarskjöld worked first in the field of public finance, serving as undersecretary of state in the Swedish department of finance from 1936 to 1946, and subsequently as financial advisor to the Swedish government. In 1953 he was chosen secretary-general of the United Nations; the diligence, imagination, and courage with which he performed his job earned him worldwide respect and admiration. Greatly concerned with the emerging African nations, Hammarskjöld was on his way to attempt some peaceful solution for the problems of the troubled Congo when he lost his life in a plane crash over Northern Rhodesia. In 1961 the Nobel Prize for peace was awarded to him posthumously. Markings (1964) is a collection of poems and entries from his personal journal which he called "a sort of white-book concerning my negotiations with myself and God."

Hammerstein, Oscar (1895–1960). American musical comedy librettist and producer. A talented and prolific theatrical craftsman, Hammerstein wrote, in collaboration or singly, the book and lyrics for 18 musicals, including Rose Marie (1924), The Desert Song (1926), Show Boat (1927), New Moon (1928), Sweet Adeline (1929), Music in the Air (1932), May Wine (1935), Oklahoma (1943), Carmen Jones (1943), Carousel (1945), South Pacific (1949), The King and I (1951), Me and Juliet (1953), Flower Drum Song (1958), and The Sound of Music (1959). He also wrote six screen plays, and with Rodgers produced five Broadway hit shows. Hammerstein collaborated with the best light composers of his day, including Romberg, Kern, and Rodgers.

Hammett, [Samuel] Dashiell (1894–1961). American writer of detective stories and movie scripts. An excellent craftsman, Hammett was the founder of the so-called hard-boiled school of detective fiction (see HARD-BOILED FICTION). In The Maltese Falcon he first presented his famous "private eye," Sam Spade. Of his many detective books, Hammett's favorite was The Glass Key (1931). The Thin Man (1932) offered another sleuth, Nick Charles, who was to become as well known as Sam Spade. Hammett's work was highly regarded by some European critics, notably André Gide.

Hammurabi, King of Babylon, 2067–2025 B.C. One of the greatest rulers of antiquity, he is chiefly remembered for his remarkable code of laws, which no doubt accounted in part for the success with which he governed much of Mesopotamia.

Hampden, John (1594–1643). English statesman. He became a popular symbol of resistance to royal tyranny when he fought the attempts of Charles I to collect ship-money from the inland counties without the consent of Parliament. At the outbreak of the Civil War he raised a regiment for the Parliamentary army and was mortally wounded at Chalgrove Field.

Hampden [Dougherty], Walter (1879–1955). American actor. One of the most distinguished on the American stage, he appeared in a number of Shakespearean roles and in Cyrano de Bergerac, An Enemy of the People, Our Town, and many other plays, as well as many motion pictures.

Hampton Court Conference (1604). A conference held under James I at Hampton Court, a royal palace on the Thames, to settle the differences between the Puritans and the High Church party of the Church of England. Although the Puritans failed to win their objectives, it was here that the first suggestion was made for the revision of the Bible that resulted in the King James or Authorized Version of 1611.

Hamsun, Knut Pederson (1859–1952). Norwegian novelist and playwright. Born of a farming family, Hamsun spent the years of his young manhood in poverty, wandering from one incongruous job to another. Two steamer voyages to the U.S. yielded positions as street-car conductor, dairymen, and finally as fisherman off the Grand Banks of Newfoundland. In 1890 his novel Sult (Hunger, 1899) appeared, establishing Hamsun's reputation as a significant author. He focused on the inner turmoil of his young hero, abandoning the current literary concern with social problems. In style, too, the work was original and provocative: the author experimented with the possibilities of the Norwegian riksmål. In his writings, Hamsun both affirms and attacks. Such novels as Pan (1894), Victoria (1898), and En Vænder spiller med Sordin (With Must Strings, 1909) express a mystical feeling for nature. Other novels—Segelfoss By (1915) and Konerne ved Vindposten (The Women at the Pump, 1920), for example—contain angry criticism of modern life. In 1920 he received the Nobel prize for Markens Grøde (The Growth of the Soil). An influential figure in the modern literary world, Hamsun lived during the later part of his life in isolation from society, at Nyerholm near the sea which he loved.

Han. Chinese dynasty (202 B.C.–A.D. 220). The Chinese imperial age, which witnessed great develop-Handy Andy (1842). A novel by Samuel Lover. The book's Irish hero, Andy Rooney, "had the most singularly ingenious knack of doing everything the wrong way." Despite his blunders Handy Andy finally wins his cousin, Onah, and is declared heir to Lord Scatterbrain's title and wealth.

Hanging Gardens of Babylon. One of the Seven Wonders of the Ancient World. According to Diodorus Siculus, the garden was 400 ft. square, rising in a series of terraces from the river in the northern part of Babylon. It was provided with earth to a sufficient depth to accommodate trees of a great size. According to tradition, it was built by Nebuchadnezzar to gratify his wife Amytis, who was weary of the flat plains of Babylon and longed for reminders of her native Median hills.

Hanley, James (1901– ). English novelist. A merchant seaman at one time, Hanley writes most of his realistic novels about ships, sailors, and the sea. Among his works are The Furry (1934), The Closed Harbour (1952), The Welsh Sonata (1954), and Levine (1955). At Bay (1943), Crilly (1945), and A Walk in the Wilderness (1950) are collections of short stories.

Hannah. In the Old Testament, the wife of Elkanah and mother of the prophet Samuel. She made and kept a vow that if the Lord gave her a child, she would give him to the service of the temple (1 Sam. 1:2).

Hannay, James Owen. See George A. BIRMINGHAM.

Hannibal (247–183 B.C.). Carthaginian general, son of Hamilcar Barca. As a child he was taken to Spain by his father and made to swear eternal enmity to Rome, an oath he never forgot. His whole life was a struggle against the Romans. At the onset of the Second Punic War, he invaded Italy from Spain, crossing the Alps with elephants by way of the Little St. Bernard, and plunged Rome into immediate danger through his victory at Cannae (216). He was ultimately defeated by Scipio Africanus and recalled to Africa. Years later, he escaped extradition to Rome by committing suicide.

Hanno. Carthaginian navigator who led a colonizing expedition down the west coast of Africa (5th century B.C.).

Hanno the Great. Carthaginian politician of 3rd century B.C. He favored peaceful relations with Rome, in opposition to Hamilcar Barca and Hannibal.

Han of Iceland (Han d'Islande; 1823). A romance by Victor Hugo. Rich in elements of the macabre and the grotesque, it is a tale of 17th-century Norway. The title character is a bloodthirsty individ-Hansards. Official reports of Parliamentary proceedings in England, named after Luke Hansard (1752–1828), the printer of the House of Commons journals (from 1774). Hansard was also the printer for Robert Dodoley, the prominent publisher and bookseller. Thomas Curson Hansard, his eldest son, published Typographia in 1825.

Hans Brinker or The Silver Skates (1865). A well-known story for children by Mary Mapes Dood. The hero is a Dutch boy, and the book gives an interesting picture of life in Holland.

Hanseatic League. A confederacy begun in the 13th century among towns of northern Germany for mutual defense, particularly of their trade routes. During the 14th century it expanded to include most German and Dutch cities, and reached the height of its political and commercial power, making trade agreements with other countries as a unit. The need for the League declined in the 16th century, and the last meeting was held in 1669.

Hänsel and Gretel. An opera for children by Engelbert Humperdinck (1859) based on the well-known fairy tale by the brothers Jacob and Wilhelm Grimm. It portrays the adventures of Hänsel and Gretel, the broom-maker's children, with the Sand Man, the Dew Man, and the terrible Crunch Witch.

Hanuman. In the Ramayana, the monkey helpful to Rama in constructing a bridge from India to Ceylon. With his followers, he enabled Rama to rescue his wife Sita from the stronghold of Ravana, the demon-king of Ceylon. In some parts of India he is worshiped as a deity.

Hapsburg. A royal Central European family. Germanic in origin, the family derived its name from the ancient castle of Hapsburg (hawk's castle) in what is now Switzerland. Counts of Hapsburg were known as early as the 11th century, and it is their descendants who occupied the thrones of Germany, Austria, Hungary, Bohemia, Spain, etc., and for nearly 400 years were the rulers of the Holy Roman Empire. The still current phrase, "a Hapsburg lip," refers to the familial characteristic of a protruding lower lip observable in 18 generations of Hapsburgs.

Hara. Another name for Śiva, the destroying aspect of the Hindu Trimurti.

harakiri (Japanese hara abdomen, kiri cutting). More commonly called seppuku in Japan, the Sinico-Japanese reading of the same characters in reverse order. Harakiri is a method of suicide by disembowelment, which began to be used in the Kamakura period (1185–1333). Frequently a form of protest, it was also a type of death penalty imposed during the Tokugawa period (1600–1868) on criminals of high rank.

Harbaugh, Thomas Chalmers. See Nick Carter.

Harbor, The (1915). A novel by Ernest Poole. The changes of New York harbor over the years become symbolic of the changes in the hero's mind. An artist, he is divided between the viewpoint of his father-in-law, who helps to build the harbor into a great commercial center, and that of a cold-hearted friend, who presents the side of the workers. In time he chooses the latter standpoint.

hard-boiled fiction. A type of detective or crime story current in 20th-century American literature. A sense of realism is generated by laconic and often vulgar dialogue, through the depiction of cruelty and bloodshed at close range, and the use of sordid environments. The genre was closely associated with the magazine Black Mask (founded in 1919) and with its editor Joseph T. Shaw, who compiled The Hard-Boiled Omnibus: Early Stories from Black Mask (1946). Among the writers of hard-boiled fiction are Dashiell Hammett, Raymond Chandler, George Harmon Coxe, and W. R. Burnett. At first, such fiction was a serious attempt not dissimilar in aim to the work of such major writers as Ernest Hemingway and John Dos Passos; later, it tended to degenerate into the sensationalism and undisguised sadism of writers like Mickey Spillane.

Hardenberg, Friedrich Leopold Freiherr von. See NOVALIS.

Harding, Warren G (1865–1923). 29th president of the U.S. (1921–1923). Originally the editor and publisher of a newspaper in Marion, Ohio, Harding served as lieutenant governor of the state and was elected to the U.S. Senate in 1915. In 1920 he became the Republican candidate for president after his nomination had been decided upon by a handful of party leaders "in a smoke-filled room." Harding waged a front-porch campaign, promising a "return to normalcy" that appealed to war-weary Americans and won him 404 electoral votes while his Democratic opponent, James M. Cox, received only 177. His administration, one of the least distinguished in American history, is remembered largely for the corruption that flourished as Harding's cronies, especially the notorious "Ohio gang," helped themselves at the federal till. (See TEAPOT DOMES.) While returning from a trip to Alaska, Harding became fatally ill in San Francisco. Embolism was listed as the cause of death. Revelry (1926), a novel by Samuel Hopkins Adams, and The Gang's All Here (1939), a play by Jerome Lawrence and Robert E. Lee, are based on Harding's administration.

Hard Lot, A (Gorkaya sud'bina; 1859). A drama by Alexei Pisemsky. Dealing with the tragic conflicts caused by a love affair between an estate owner and the wife of one of his serfs, the play is regarded as one of the most powerful realistic tragedies in Russian drama.

Hardouin, Jean (1646–1729). French Jesuit priest and scholar. Librarian to Louis XIV, Hardouin was so religious that he questioned the truth of all received history and denied the authenticity of the Aeneid of Vergil and the Odes of Horace. He thus came to epitomize the doubting philosopher.

Hard Times (1845). A novel by Charles Dickens. Thomas Gradgrind, a fanatic of the demonstrable fact, has raised his children Tom and Louisa in an atmosphere of grimmest practicality. Louisa marries the banker Josiah Bounderby partly... to protect her brother who is in Bounderby's employ, partly because her education has resulted in an emotional atrophy that makes her indifferent to her fate. Tom, shallow and unscrupulous, robs Bounderby's bank and contrives to frame Stephen Blackpool, an honest and long-suffering mill hand. Meanwhile, Louisa's dormant emotions began to awaken, stimulated by disgust for the vulgar Bounderby and the attentions of the charming, amoral James Harthouse. When she runs away to her father and when Tom's guilt is discovered, Gradgrind realizes how his principles have blighted his children's lives. Ultimately Louisa secures a separation from Bounderby and Tom flees the country. The novel is Dickens' harshest indictment of practices and philosophical justifications of mid-19th-century industrialism in England.

Hardwick, Nan. See Tragedy of Nan, The.

Hardy, Alexandre (c. 1569–1632). French playwright. A prolific author, Hardy wrote literally hundreds of plays and published 34 of them, including the biblical tragedy Marianne, in the years 1623–1628. An innovator with a sure theatrical flair, Hardy enlivened dramatic movement by omitting the chorus, pruning soliloquies and monologues, introducing confrontations between main characters, and permitting violence on stage. Though poetically and rhetorically inferior to much of his predecessors' work, Hardy's plays achieved an enormous popularity in their time and performed the invaluable service of bridging the gap between the French drama of the Middle Ages and Renaissance and that of the 17th century.

Hardy, René (191– ). French novelist. Known for his studies of men in war, Hardy wrote such novels as The Sword of God (Le fer de Dieu; 1953), set in Indo-China, and Bitter Victory (Amère Victoire; 1955).

Hardy, Thomas (1840–1928). English novelist and poet. Hardy was born in Dorsetshire, the region that he later called Wessex in his novels. He trained as an architect and began to practice in 1867, though he soon became disillusioned and sought another medium for expression. He had been writing poems for several years, but he could find no publisher for his verse; he attempted a novel, but his first book, The Poor Man and the Lady, was rejected. Desperate Remedies (1871) was published anonymously, as was Under the Greenwood Tree (1872). In 1873 he published A Pair of Blue Eyes under his own name; the book was successful, and he began a full-time literary career. In the next 24 years, he produced 11 novels: Far From the Madding Crowd, The Hand of Ethelberta (1876), The Return of the Native, The Trumpet-Major (1879), A Laodicean (1881), Two on a Tower, The Mayor of Casterbridge, The Woodlanders (1887), Tess of the D'Urbervilles, Jude the Obscure, and The Well-Beloved (1897). Hardy's view of life, particularly as shown in his major novels, was one shaped by the prevalent materialistic and deterministic theories of 19th-century science, which saw man as subject to forces he could neither understand nor control. As a naturalist, Hardy wrote forceful studies of life in which his characters are continually defeated in their struggle against their physical and social environment, against their own impulses, and against the malevolent caprices of chance. Though his style is often awkward, it has a harsh power that contributes to the almost tragic intensity of his best work.

Hardy's first volume of verses, Wessex Poems, appeared in 1898, though it contained poetry he had written since the 1860's. Abandoning the novel, probably because of the shocked public reaction to Jude the Obscure, he continued to write poetry, publishing six more volumes of lyrical verse, which were gathered together in the Collected Poems of 1931, and one later volume, Winter Words in Various Moods and Meters (1928). Sometimes colloquial, uneven, and ragged, Hardy's verse is highly original, and has a wide variety of metrical styles and stanza forms, and a wide scope of tone and attitude, as is apparent from the ironically humorous ballad on The Ruined Maid, the pensive Darkling Thrush or the simple but moving She Hears the Storm. Hardy's most ambitious poetic work, The Dynasts (1903, 1906, 1908), is an epic drama on the Napoleonic wars.

Hare. According to tradition, it is unlucky for a hare to cross one's path, because witches transform themselves into hares. In medieval science, the hare was a most melancholy beast, and ate wild succory in the hope of curing itself. Its flesh was supposed to generate melancholy in any who partook of it.

Another superstition was that hares are sexless, or that they change their sex every year. Among the Hindus the hare is sacred to the moon because, as they affirm, the outline of a hare is distinctly visible in the full disk. The idea that a March hare is mad derives from the fact that hares are unusually shy and wild in March, their rutting season. Erasmus, however, says "Mad as a marsh hare," and adds, "hares are wilder in marshes from the absence of hedges and cover."

Hari. Another name for Vishnu, the preserving aspect of the Hindu Trimurti.

Häring, Willibald. See Willibald Alexis.

Harington or Harrington, John (1561–1612). English satirist and miscellaneous writer. A godson of Queen Elizabeth, he translated Ariosto's Orlando Furioso into English (1591) at her command. He was banished from court because of some of his ribleb satires, such as The Metamorphosis of Ajax (1596), a history of water closets. He also wrote many pamphlets and epigrams.

Harleian Library. The celebrated library of rare books, papers, and documents collected by Robert Harley and his son Edward (1689–1741). The Harleian manuscripts were acquired by the British government for the British Museum. A selection of Harleian pamphlets was published as The Harleian Miscellany (1744–1746).

Harlem. A section of New York City. It is inhabited largely by Negroes and Latin Americans. It was popular among intellectuals and society people of the 1920's because of its cabarets and speakeasies and its jazz. During the latter 1930's it also became a center of attraction for devotees of swing and boogie-woogie music. Harlem is the scene of Naked on Roller Skates, by Maxwell Bodenheim; All God's Chillin' Got Wings, by Eugene O'Neill; Nigger Heaven, by Carl Van Vechten, and The Cool World, by Warren Miller. The character of its residents is depicted in the works of such Negro writers as Countee Cullen, Langston Hughes, W. E. Du Bois, Ann Petry (author of The Street [1946]) and James Baldwin.

Harlequin or Arlequin. Originally Arlecchino, a stock character of Italian comedy (possibly from the name of a medieval demon or goblin), Harlequin became the buffoon of French and then of English pantomime. He has a shaven head, wears a mask and particolored tights, and carries a wooden sword. Often invisible to all but COLUMBINE, he is a rival of PIERROT or some other Clown for her love. His character is adapted to the opéra-comique and the comédie bourgeoise by such writers as Jean-Pierre de Florian, Pierre de Marivaux, and Alexis Piron.

Harleth, Gwendolyn. See Daniel Deronda,
Harley, Robert. 1st earl of Oxford (1661-1724). English Tory statesman and politician who was chancellor of the exchequer and leader of the Tory ministry (1710). See HARLEIAN LIBRARY.

Harley Street. A street in London known for its many specialist physicians' and surgeons' offices.

Harlowe, Clarissa. See Clarissa Harlowe.

Harmon, John, alias John Rokesmith. See Our Mutual Friend.

Harmonia's Necklace. An unlucky possession; something that brings evil to all who possess it. In classic mythology, Harmonia was the daughter of Ares and Aphrodite. In her marriage with Cadmus, she received a necklace that proved disastrous to all who possessed it after her. See ERIPHYLE; ALCAMEON.

Haroot and Maroot. Angels in medieval angelology. In consequence of their want of compassion to man, they were susceptible to human passions, and were sent upon earth to be tempted. They were kings of Babel, and teachers of magic and the black arts.

Haroun-al-Raschid or Harun-Al Rashid, Aaron the Upright (785-809). Fifth caliph of Arabia. He entertained friendly relations with Charlemagne, whom he resembled in his patronage of the arts and learning. He was idealized as the splendid caliph of the Arabian Nights' Entertainments, where everything curious, romantic, and wonderful is associated with his name and reign. See Abou Hassan; Calendar; Giafar.

Harpagon. The central character in Molière's comedy L'Avarre. Nothing in life, not even his children, is more important to him than his hoard of money. Both Harpagon and his son Cléante desire to marry Mariane; but when the former, having lost a basket of money, is asked which he prefers—the money or Mariane—he says that he prefers the money, and Cléante marries the lady. Harpagon imagines that everyone is out to rob him, and when his basket is stolen he seizes his own arm in a frenzy. He proposes to give his daughter Elise in marriage to an old man named Anselme, because no dowry will be required. When Elise's lover Valère cites reason after reason against the unnatural alliance, the miser makes but one reply: "sans dot" (without dowry). On another occasion, Harpagon solicits Jacques to tell him what people say about him; when told that he is called a miser and a skinflint, he becomes helplessly enraged and beats poor Jacques in his terrible passion.

Harpagus (Harpagos, 6th century B.C.). A Median general. According to legend, the Median king Astyages chose him to expose the infant Cyrus. He gave the task to a herdsman, who kept the infant alive. Astyages punished Harpagus by serving him at a banquet the flesh of his own son. Harpagus afterward became Cyrus' most trusted general.

Harpers Ferry. A town in West Virginia. The arsenal of Harpers Ferry was raided on Oct. 16, 1859, by the abolitionist, John Brown. Lee took it from a large Union force on Sept. 15, 1862.

Harper's Magazine. An American magazine founded in 1850 as Harper's New Monthly Magazine. It was called Harper's Monthly Magazine after 1900, and after 1925, simply Harper's Magazine. During the 19th century it was devoted to literature, and frequently published serials of popular English authors, including Dickens, Bulwer, Trollope, Thackeray, and George Eliot. The department of comment called "The Easy Chair" was conducted by a series of distinguished editors, among them W. D. Howells and G. W. Curtis. Howells also published articles on the new realistic fiction in a department called the "Editor's Study," which he began in 1885. Later contributors were Mark Twain, Booth Tarkington, Frank R. Stockton, and Woodrow Wilson. After World War I, economic, social, and political problems received more emphasis in the magazine.

Harpies (harpyai). In Greek mythology, predaeous birds with women's faces. They were...
daughters of the titaness Electra and sisters of Iris. They are most familiar from the story that they regularly snatched away the food from the blind king Phineus until they were pursued and frightened away by the Argonauts Calais and Zetes, winged sons of Boreas. They seem to have combined the primitive concepts of wind spirits and predatory ghosts with actual characteristics of carrion birds.

Homer mentions only one harpy. Hesiod gives two, and later writers three. Their names were Ocypete (rapid), Celeno (blackness), and Aello (storm).

Harpocrates (Harpokrates). The Greek form of the Egyptian Heru-P-Khart (Horus the Child). He is represented as a youth. As he has one finger pointing to his mouth, he was adopted by the Greeks as the god of silence.

Harp-Weaver and Other Poems, The (1923). A collection of poems by Edna St. Vincent Millay. The volume, which was awarded a Pulitzer Prize in poetry, was especially praised for the excellence of the 39 sonnets included, especially for the one beginning "Euclid alone has looked on Beauty bare."

Harraden, Beatrice (1864–1936). English novelist. Her greatest success was the novel Ships That Pass in the Night (1893) which sold over a million copies. Miss Harraden's other books include In Varying Moods (1894); Interplay (1908), and Rachel (1926). She was a leader in the woman's suffrage movement in England.

Harrington (1811). A novel by Maria Edgeworth. The titular hero is a Jew, and the novel was one of the first deliberate attempts to portray a Jew in fiction in a favorable light. As such it is worthy of note, but the character of Harrington is generally dismissed as wooden and oversentimentalized.

Harrington or Harrington, James (1611–1677). English political theorist. A republican, though a good friend of Charles I, he is best known for his controversial political romance, The Commonwealth of Oceana (1656). Harrington's analysis of politics was distinguished by its emphasis on the idea that the form of government possible for a country depends on the distribution of property, especially land.

Harris, Joel Chandler (1848–1908). American journalist and author. He is famous for his humorous adaptations of native Negro folk legends in the Uncle Remus stories. His tales, marked by simple humor and authentic Negro dialect, are undoubtedly the greatest in the school of Negro folk literature. He wrote many of his stories first for the Atlanta Constitution and later collected them into such works as Uncle Remus: His Songs and His Sayings, Nights with Uncle Remus (1883), and several other collections. They dealt chiefly with animals such as Brer Rabbit, and illustrated such maxims as the ability of intelligence to win out over brute force. Harris also wrote local-color stories of Southern life; these include Mingo and Other Sketches in Black and White (1884), which contrasts the aristocracy and the middle class, and the novel Gabriel Tolliver (1902), set in the Reconstruction period. On the Plantation (1892) is largely autobiographical. See Tar Baby.

Harris, John Beynon. See John Wyndham.

Harris, Roy [really Leroy] (1898– ). American composer. Many of his works have been inspired by American folk music, for example, the Symphony No. 4 (Folksong Symphony; 1940) and American Ballads (piano piece; 1942).

Harrison, William Henry. See Tippetanoe and Tyler too; Martin Van Buren.

Hart, Heinrich (1855–1906) and his brother Julius (1859–1930). German poets who were the leading theoreticians of early Naturalism. In their periodically published Kritische Waffengänge (Critical Passages-at-Arms; 1882–1884), they stated that they wanted a naturalism in literature like the "naturalness of Goethe's poems," as opposed to any classicistic artificiality. Heinrich's best-known volume of verse is Weltpflingen (Whitewasher of the World; 1872); Julius' is Horno sum (I Am a Man; 1889).

Hart, Moss (1904–1961). American playwright and librettist. Hart began his career with The Hold-Up Man (1925), but his first real success came with Once in a Lifetime (1930), the first of a long series of plays written in collaboration with George S. Kaufman. Together they wrote Merrily We Roll Along (1934), the Pulitzer Prize-winning You Can't Take It With You; I'd Rather Be Right (1937), The American Way (1939), The Man Who Came to Dinner, and George Washington Slept Here (1940). Hart wrote the libretto for Irving Berlin's Face the Music (1933) and for Kurt Weill's Lady in the Dark (1941). He also wrote Winged Victory (1943), Light Up the Sky (1948), and The Climate of Eden (1952). Hart won the Antoinette Perry Award for his direction of the musical My Fair Lady. His autobiography, Act One (1959), became a best seller.

Harte, [Francis] Bret[t] (1836–1902). American short-story writer, novelist, editor, and poet. Harte left school early and went to San Francisco, where he mined, taught school, and finally became a journalist. He began his literary career with humorous sketches, attracted some attention with his verses, and achieved great fame through his short stories.

Editing the Overland Monthly during the late 60's, he published a collection of his poetry, The Lost Galleon and Other Tales (1867), and his satirical Condensed Novels.

It was during this period that he wrote his best-remembered stories: The Luck of Roaring Camp and Outcasts of Poker Flat. His Plain Language from Truthful James, a comic verse narrative, was written in 1870.

During the 1870's, Harte was unable to continue writing at this level; he lost popularity and a contract to write for the Atlantic Monthly. Neither the novel Gabriel Conroy nor the play As Sin (1877), written with Mark Twain, helped to restore his finances. Later he became a consul in Germany and Scotland, and was a favorite in European literary circles. His last work was a second series of Condensed Novels (1902).

Harte's work is marked by sentimentality, humor, and a penchant for showing thieves, vagabonds, and miners as more admirable than conventional and law-abiding folk. He is remembered for his pioneering work in Western local color writing. See M'tiss.

Hartford Convention (1814). A secret meeting of New England Federalists who were opposed to the War of 1812 to discuss revision of the Constitution. The delegates adopted several resolutions designed to preserve the influence of New England in the federal government. The news of the peace treaty with Great Britain and of Andrew Jackson's victory at New Orleans made the delegates a target for public ridicule, and they were accused, without evidence, of sedition and treason.

Hartford Wits. The name given to a group of 18th-century American poets, including Timothy Dwight, John Trumbull, and Joel Barlow. The group was also known as the Connecticut Wits and the Yale Poets. Other members of the group, not all of them Yale men, were Lemuel Hopkins (1750-1801), David Humphries (1752-1818), Theodore Dwight, and Richard Alsop. Except for Barlow, the Wits were Federalist in politics and Calvinist in religion. See ANARCHIAH, THE.

Hartley, David (1705-1757). English philosopher. He is best known for his study of human psychology, the Observations on Man (1749). Inspired by Newton's principle of gravitation, which had bound all physical bodies in a harmonious unity, Hartley endeavored to find some principle which would similarly unite moral phenomena. Following Locke, he developed the principle of association of ideas, by which simple ideas "run into complex ones by means of Association." According to Hartley, the moral sense was not innate, but acquired through the association of pleasurable sensations with ever loftier and wider objects: the child began by loving the tree; the man, through association, learned to love its Creator. With the proper education, Hartley contended, every man might learn to associate pleasure with the right objects, and thus the perfectibility of man was conceivable.

Hartmann von Aue (c. 1170-c. 1215). German court poet. His epic romances Erec and Iwein, free adaptations of the work of Chrétien de Troyes, introduced the Arthurian legends into Germany. However, his most popular work was the much shorter Der arme Heinrich, the only one based on German legend. See HEINRICH, DER ARME.

Hartzenbusch, Juan Eugenio (1806-1880). Spanish dramatist. His best-known work, Los amantes de Teruel (The lovers of Teruel, 1837), is considered one of the major Spanish romantic dramas because of its successful fusion of intense passion, melancholy, and comic romance. The play deals with the amatory relationship between Diego Marsilla and Isabel Segura and culminates in the tragic death of both lovers. Hartzenbusch also wrote La jura de Santa Gadea (1845), dealing with the Cid, and two plays of magic, La redoma encantada (1839) and Los polvos de la madre Celestina (1841).

Harvard, John (1607-1638). An English clergyman, the son of a butcher, for whom Harvard University is named. He settled at Charlestown, Mass., and became the first benefactor of the college at New Towne, bequeathing to it his library of 300 volumes and half his estate, valued at $800. The college was renamed Harvard College in his honor in the year of his death, the third year of its existence.

Harvard Classics (1909-1910). A 50-volume set of books, containing selections from the literature of the world. It was edited by Charles W. Eliot, president emeritus of Harvard University, and published by P. F. Collier & Son. The original idea for the set can be traced to a chance remark of Eliot: "All the books needed for a real education could be set on a shelf five feet long!" From this remark and its physical make-up, the set is also known as "the Five-Foot Shelf."

Harvey (1944). A play by Mary C. Chase. Harvey is a six-foot rabbit who appears only to the amiable drunkard who is the play's protagonist. The comedy turns on the futile attempts of eminent psychiatrists to dispel Harvey forever. The play had a long success on Broadway and was awarded a Pulitzer Prize.

Harvey, Gabriel (1545-1630). English poet and satirist. A friend and possibly the tutor of Edmund Spenser, Harvey is thought to be the "Hobbinol" of Spenser's Shepheards Calender (1579). Some of the correspondence between the two men appears in The Letter-Book of Gabriel Harvey, A.D. 1573-80 (published 1884). Harvey, a literary conservative and something of a pedant, tried to introduce classical meters into English poetry and considered himself to be the "father of English hexameter." He is best known, however, for his acrimonious pamphlet-battle with Robert Greene and Thomas Nashe. In connection with the Martin Marprelate controversy, Harvey's brother Richard attacked Greene and, as a side issue, Nashe. Greene replied, and a literary feud began which ultimately narrowed down to a duel of words between Harvey and Nashe. Harvey's contributions to this dispute include Foure Letters, and Certaine Sonnets, especially touching R. Greene (1592); A New Letter of Notable Contents (1593); and The Trimming of T. Nashe (1597). Finally, in 1599, the Archbishop of Canterbury put an end to the quarrel by ordering the Harvey-Nashe tracts burned and forbidding them to be reprinted.

Harvey, William (1578-1657). English physician, physiologist, and anatomist. The discoverer of the theory of the circulation of the blood, Harvey announced his theory to the College of Physicians in 1616, but did not publish his treatise on it until 1628 (Exercitatio Anatomica de Motu Cordis et Sanguinis in Animalibus). He also studied the reproductive functions of animals, and in his Exercitationes de generatione (1561) presented his theory that both parents, not only the male, contribute to the form of the offspring.

Hašek, Jaroslav (1883-1923). A Czech novelist and short-story writer. His major work, The Good Soldier Schweik (English translation, 1930), is a satire in four volumes (planned as six), which has been compared with the creations of Rabelais and Cervantes.

Hasidism. The tenets of the Hasidim, a Jewish sect founded about 300 B.C. in protest against Hellenistic innovation. Its members, unlike most of their brethren, strictly observed the ritual of purification and separation, as commanded by Jewish law. In the middle of the 18th century, in reaction against growing Jewish secularism and intellectualism, the Polish rabbı Israel Ben Eliezer founded a Hasidic sect devoted to mysticism, a revival of the earlier Hasidim. Modern Hasidism is characterized by a wariness of secularism in religion and of intellectualism and rationalism pursued for its own sake. Its members continue the strict observance of ritual law of their predecessors and do not recognize the state of Israel, holding that Israel can be returned to the Jews only by the Messiah himself. A world-famous Yeshiva, or school for Talmudic study, has been established by the Hasidim in the Williamsburg section of Brooklyn, N.Y.

Hassan (1923). A romantic play by James Elroy Flecker. Hassan is a poetical confessioner of Baghdad. He becomes the caliph's favorite but has to leave the court when he denounces the caliph's execution of young lovers. The play was spectacularly produced with ballets by Fokine and music by Delius.

Hassgesang. See HYMN OF HATE.

Hastinapura. The ancient site of Delhi, often referred to in classical Indian writing. It was situated on the Ganges, about 30 miles east of modern Delhi.

Hastings, Battle of (1066). Battle near Senlac in Sussex, England, where Harold II died defending his claim to the English throne against the Norman William THE CONQUEROR. William was crowned shortly afterward, thus effecting the "Norman Conquest," which greatly influenced English history, language, and literature.

Hastings, Warren (1732–1818). English statesman and administrator of India. He went to Calcutta in the East India Company's service in 1759, becoming successively a member of the Calcutta council, governor of Bengal, and governor-general of India. He was impeached in 1788 for corruption and cruelty, chiefly because of his conduct in regard to the zamindar of Benares whom he deposed and the begum of Oudh whose treasures he had allegedly confiscated. Although he was prosecuted by Edmund Burke, among others, his famous trial resulted in acquittal in 1795. Hastings is the subject of a famous essay by Thomas Babington Macaulay.

Hasty Pudding, The (1796). A mock-heroic poem by Joel Barlow, describing the making and eating of the celebrated New England mush. It was one of the most popular of Barlow's works.

Hasty Pudding Club. A Harvard undergraduate organization that gave the first of its annual dramatic productions in 1844. The plays produced are burlesques. Some of the university's most eminent graduates have taken part in these performances, from George Santayana to Robert Benchley. At early meetings hasty pudding, made of corn meal, was served.

Hatchway, Lieutenant Jack. In Tobias Smollett's novel PEGGEGE PICKLE, a retired naval officer on half pay, the friend and companion of Commodore Hawser Trunnum, and an abettor of the hero's mischief.

Hathaway, Anne. The wife of William SKEAT.

Hathor. The Egyptian sky goddess, worshipped under several forms, in whom the sun was supposed to rise and set. As the personification of the sky, she was the female counterpart of Osiris and was represented as a cow with a disc and two plumes. Like Isis, she was a goddess of love, mirth, and joy, corresponding to the Greek Aphrodite. Her temple at Denderah still exists.

Hatter, The. A character in Lewis Carroll's ALICE'S ADVENTURES IN WONDERLAND. During the course of a mad tea party he puts a riddle to Alice, "Why is a raven like a writing desk?" to which there is no answer. He has a watch that tells the day but not the time, and his eccentric behavior includes pouring hot tea on the Dormouse in order to wake him. The character is a burlesque of the rather illogical expression, "Mad as a hatter."

Hauff, Wilhelm (1802–1827). German romantic poet. He is well known for ballads and for narrative in MÄRCHEN style, such as the famous PHANTASSEN IM BREMER RATSKELLER (Fantasies in the City Hall Tavern of Bremen, 1826). His novel LIECHTENSTEIN (1827), which was influenced by Walter Scott, is a closely documented work about 16th-century Germany and, along with the works of Willibald Alexis, is important in the genesis of the German historical novel. See GERMAN ROMANTICISM.

Hauptmann, Gerhart (1862–1946). German dramatist. Though he wanted at first to be a sculptor, he turned early to writing and produced a romantic epic entitled PROMETHEIDENIOS (The Lot of the Promethes, 1885). But in accordance with the literary tenor of the times, he soon turned to realism in the story BAHNWÄRTER THIEL (Trackwalker Thiel, 1887), and then, in his first play, VOR SONNENANFANG (Before Sunrise, 1889), he developed a naturalistic style. This play, dedicated to "the consistent realist Bjarne P. Holmsen" (see Arno Holz) and influenced by Ibsen, treats the dangers of alcoholism in a starkly down-to-earth manner; it aroused a storm of critical controversy at its first performance, and marked the establishment of German NATURALISM as a recognized literary movement. Hauptmann himself wrote several more plays in a similar style, such as DAS FRIEDENSFEST (The Celebration of Peace, 1890) and DIE WEAVERS; but in HANNALE'S HIMMELFAHRT (Hannele's Ascension, 1893) it became clear that his development was taking him away from naturalism. Though there are many naturalistic elements in this play, a large portion of it is taken up by an ecstatic, mystical vision of the heaven into which a dying girl is about to enter. Other plays, such as FURHMANN HENSCHEL (Coachman Henschel, 1898), ROSE BERND (1903), and UND PIPPA TANSZ (And Pippa Dances, 1906), also show this mixture of basically naturalistic style and subject matter with deeply symbolic overtones or insertions. And finally, in such plays as THE SUNKEN BEL and DER ARME HEINRICH (Poor Henry, 1902), he does away with naturalistic elements altogether.

After becoming established, Hauptmann was long regarded as the patriarch of modern German literature, but none of his later works had the same immediate appeal or aroused the same stormy controversy as his earlier ones. And yet his later period was by no means barren, and among its notable products are DER NARR IN CHRISTO Emanuel Quinl (The Fool in Christ, Emanuel Quinl, 1910) and IM WIRBEL DER BERUFUNG (In the Confusion of Vocation, 1936), both novels; DER KETZER VON SOANA (The Heretic of Soana, 1918), a story; and an epic TILL EULENSPIEGEL (1928). Among his late plays are VOR SONNENUNTERGANG (Before Sunset, 1932) and a monumental treatment of the story of the house of Atreus in his Atriden-Tetralogie (Atrides Tetralogy), which includes Iphigenie in Delphi (1941), Iphigenie in Aulis (1944), Agamemnons Tod (Agamemnon's Death, 1948) and Elektra (1948). He was awarded the Nobel Prize for literature in 1912. See Till Eulenspiegel.

Hauptmann von Köpenick, Der. See Captain of Köpenick, The.

Hauser, Kaspar (1812?–1833). German founding who appeared as a youth of about 16 in Nuremberg. He showed no signs of ever having been in contact with other humans but displayed normal intelligence. He is the subject of the novel Caspar Hauser (1908) by Jakob Wassermann.

Haushofer, Karl (1869–1946). German geographer. He used geopolitical theories to justify German expansion in Europe, and his claim that Germany needed Lebensraum ("living space") had a strong influence on Nazi ideology.

Havelok the Dane. A hero of medieval romance. The orphan son of the Danish king Birkabegn, he is exposed at sea through the treachery of his guardians. When the raft drifts to the coast of Lincolnshire, a fisherman, Grim, finds the young prince and brings him up as his own son. Believed to be a peasant, he is united with a princess who is to be degraded because she stands in the way of certain ambitious nobles. But Havelok, having learned the story of his birth, obtains the aid of an army of Danes to recover his wife's possessions, and in time becomes the king of Denmark.

Havisham, Miss. In Charles Dickens' Great Expectations, a rich, eccentric, old recluse who lives in a decaying mansion. Years before she was jilted on the eve of her wedding and has since worn a wedding dress, complete with veil, white satin shoes, and bridal flowers in her hair. She has adopted Estella with the design of using her as an instrument of vengeance on the male sex; this she does by educating Estella to hate and torture men. She repeats of her schemes just before her death caused by shock and burns when her ancient gown catches fire.

Estella Havisham. Miss Havisham's ward, later revealed to be the daughter of Abel Magwitch. She is a beautiful, self-possessed girl, convinced of her own heartlessness. Pip loves her, but she marries Bentley Drummle, knowing that they will torture each other. After Drummle's death and the misery of her marriage, she is at last ready for Pip's love.

Hawes, Stephen (d. 1523?). English poet. Hawes became a member of the household of Henry VII, to whom he dedicated The Pastime of Pleasure in 1506. Printed by Wynken de Worde in 1509, it is a long and elaborate allegorical poem, influenced by the poetry of Lydgate and anticipating some of its aspects Edmund Spenser's Faerie Queene. Hawes wrote several other pieces, among them A Joyful Meditation, written for the coronation of Henry VIII in 1509, and the allegorical poem The Example of Virtue (printed 1512).

Hawk, Sir Mulberry. See Nicholas Nickleby.

Hawkes, Jacquetta (1910– ). English archeologist and writer, wife of J. B. Priestley. A Land (1951) is a poetic account of the physical and human evolution of Britain.

Hawkins, Sir Anthony Hope. Pen name Anthony Hope (1863–1933). English novelist, author of The Prisoner of Zenda (1894), its sequel, Rupert of Hentzaun (1898), and The Dolly Dialogues (1894).

Hawkins, Jim. See Treasure Island.

Hawkins, Sir John (1532–1595). English navigator and naval commander. With the expeditions of his nephew Sir Francis Drake, Hawkins' privateering voyages to the Spanish-American coast helped bring about the break between England and Spain. As Rear Admiral, Hawkins helped defeat the Spanish Armada in 1588. He died at sea as second in command under Drake on an expedition to the West Indies.

Hawkwood, Sir John (1320–1394). A celebrated captain of mercenaries. He was knighted by Edward III for his services against the French. He organized a band of professional soldiers, called the White Company, and went to Italy. Known to the Italians as Giovanni Acuto (thus Machiavelli refers to him), he enjoyed great success as a condottiere.

Hawthorne, Nathaniel (1804–1864). American novelist and short-story writer. Born into an old New England family, Hawthorne was very much aware of his ancestors. The Hawthornes (as they spelled it) participated in the Salem witch trials in the 17th century, and later in the Quaker persecutions. The writer, reflecting on the past, always felt a sense of guilt and made this a theme in his work. The son of a sea captain, Hawthorne was educated at Bowdoin College, where he knew Franklin Pierce and Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. For 12 years, after his graduation in 1825, he lived in his mother's house in Salem; in virtual retirement, he wrote sketches and stories for annuals and newspapers. In 1828, he anonymously published a novel, FANSHAWS, based on his college life. Suddenly ashamed of his work, he withdrew most of the copies and burned them. Devoting his energies to short fiction, he explored the nature of sin. Hawthorne's first important book was a collection of short tales and sketches called TWICE-TOLD TALES.

In Boston as surveyor of the Customs House, Hawthorne renewed his acquaintance with Longfellow and the literary world. He invested his savings in the Transcendentalist experiment at Brook Farm in 1841, and married Sophia Peabody the following year. Having found communal living unattractive, Hawthorne brought his bride to the Old Manse in Concord, Mass. The Manse, owned by the Ripleys, had been the home of Ralph Waldo Emerson. Here the author enjoyed three and a half happy years, during which his first daughter, Una, was born. He published his second collection of stories, Mosses FROM AN OLD MANSE; this volume was brilliantly reviewed by Herman Melville, establishing an important friendship between the two men.

Later the Hawthornes moved to Salem, where the writer served again as surveyor in a Customs House. Removed from duty in 1849 as a result of political maneuvering (see Charles Wentworth Upham), Hawthorne began to write his masterpiece, The SCARLET LETTER. The book brought him fame and some degree of financial independence. Although collections of early short pieces appeared after 1850, the year marked the end of Hawthorne's dedication to short fiction. He turned to the composition of novels and a few books for children. Living in Lenox, Mass., near Melville, Hawthorne wrote THE HOUSE OF THE SEVEN GABLES and THE BLITHE DAME ROMANCE. He collected the tales and sketches of THE SNOW IMAGE and OTHER TWICE-TOLD TALES and wrote a campaign biography for his friend Franklin Pierce. When Pierce was elected president, he appointed Hawthorne consul at Liverpool and Manchester (1853-1857). After 1857, Hawthorne traveled through Europe for three years, completing his last published novel, THE MARBLE FAUN, in England.

On his return, Hawthorne collected a series of sketches about England called OUR OLD HOME. During the last decade of his life he wrote only sporadically. At his death, four unfinished novels were found among his notes. Among these were SEPTIMUS FELTON and THE DOLLIVER ROMANCE.

Turning to the historical past, Hawthorne found Puritan New England a congenial setting for his work. Claiming the privileges of the romanist, he deplored the lack of material for the artist in contemporary America, a land of shadowless daylight. His precise, almost classic prose style and his use of symbol and allegory made a great impression on his contemporary, Herman Melville, and on the later American writers, Henry James and William Faulkner. See TANGLEWOOD TALES.

Hay, Ian (pseudonym of Sir John Hay Beith (1876-1952), English novelist, dramatist, and soldier. His light, humorous novels are often about the life and ethos of English boys' boarding schools. The best known is A Safety Match (1911). Hay dramatized stories by his friend P. G. Wodehouse, and collaborated on a number of plays including Admiral's All (1934) and Housemaster (1936). The First Hundred Thousand (1915) was a popular account of Kitche-

Hay, John [Milton] (1838-1905), American statesman and man of letters. Hay was assistant to John G. Nicolay, President Lincoln's private secretary, and they later collaborated on the 10-volume Abraham Lincoln: A History (1890). After the Civil War, Hay held several diplomatic posts and wrote for the New York Tribune. In 1898 he became President McKinley's secretary of state, a position he continued to hold under Theodore Roosevelt, helping to effect the Open Door policy in China and the negotiations for the Panama Canal.

As a writer, Hay is best known for his Pike County Ballads (1871) in western dialect; included in the collection was Jim Bludo of the Prairie Belle, a poem about a steamboat engineer who sacrifices himself to save his passengers when his boat catches fire. Castilian Days (1871) is a travel book of observations on Spanish civilization. Hay also wrote an anonymous novel, The Breadwinners (1884), in which he defended the property classes against the "dangerous" demands of labor.

Hayakawa, S[amuell] [ichiye] (1906- ). Canadian-born American semanticist and teacher. Hayakawa taught at various universities before becoming a professor of language arts at San Francisco State College. A follower of Alfred Korzybski, he adapted and popularized Korzybski's principles of general semantics in Language in Action (1941). The book was extensively revised as Language in Thought and Action in 1949. In 1943 he became one of the founders and editors of the magazine ETC., A Review of General Semantics. He has edited Language, Meaning and Maturity (1954) and Our Language and our World (1950), both collections of articles that originally appeared in ETC.

Haydn, Franz Joseph (1732-1809). Austrian composer. He was kapellmeister of the Esterhazy family at Esterhazy (Eisenstadt) in Hungary (1761-1790), where he wrote some of his greatest music. In England (1791-1792; 1794-1795) he wrote and conducted twelve symphonies. In Vienna (from 1795), he wrote his last six masses, his finest chamber music, and the two great oratorios, The Creation and The Seasons. His total output includes 104 symphonies, concertos, about 20 operas, 12 masses, other church music, 84 string quartets, much other chamber music, 52 piano sonatas, and songs. Haydn's music shows much development during his long creative life. In the beginning he was under the influence of a rather superficial group of Viennese composers, but in the long years in the country in Hungary, as Haydn himself says: "There was no one about me to confuse and torment me, and I was compelled to become original." In later years, important influences were the young Mozart and the choral works of Handel, which he heard in England; these inspired the writing of the oratorios and left their mark on the later masses.

Haydon, Benjamin Robert (1786-1846). English painter. He is noted for his works on historical subjects. His writings include Lectures on Painting and Design (1844-1846). Wordsworth and Keats addressed sonnets to him.
Hayes, Alfred (1911– ). English-born American novelist and poet. Hayes grew up in New York City, and The Big Time (1944), his first book of poems, extensively uses the city background in its imagery. During World War II, he served in the army in Italy, an experience which provided material for his two novels All Thy Conquests (1946) and The Girl on the Via Flaminia (1949). His later work includes the novels Shadow of Heaven (1947) and In Love (1953). Welcome to the Castle (1950) is a book of poems.

Hayes, Helen (1900– ). American actress. A native of Washington, D.C., Miss Hayes gave her first public performance at the age of six. Later she scored great successes in such plays as Mary of Scotland and Victoria Regina, and in 1932 won an Academy Award for her acting in the motion picture The Sin of Madelon Claudet. In 1928 she married playwright Charles MacArthur. A Broadway theater is named in her honor.

Haymarket. The name of a street in London. It is between Pall Mall and Piccadilly Circus and is the center of London's theater district. The Haymarket Theatre is the second oldest London playhouse still in use. The original building was erected in 1720, the current one dates from 1820.

Haymarket Square riot (May 4, 1886). A riot that occurred in Chicago's Haymarket Square when the police tried to disperse a labor protest meeting, organized by anarchists, and a bomb was thrown, killing 7 policemen and wounding 70 others. The trial of eight anarchist leaders followed; seven were sentenced to death, one to 15 years in prison. When petitions protesting the verdict were circulated by William Dean Howells and other prominent persons, the sentences of two of the prisoners were commuted to life imprisonment, but four others were executed in 1887. In 1893, Governor John Peter Altgeld freed the three men still in jail. The incident was a temporary setback to the labor movement in general.

Hayne, Paul Hamilton (1830–1886). American poet. Hayne contributed to the Southern Literary Messenger and collected his Poems in 1855. Two years later, he founded Russell's Magazine, named after the bookstore in Charleston where Hayne and his friend Henry Timrod often met. Ardently patriotic, he wrote fervent poems on the Civil War; one of these is The Battle of Charleston Harbor. During Sherman's march to the sea, Hayne's mansion was destroyed. He moved to Georgia, where he supported his family entirely from his writings. Among these are Legends and Lyrics (1872), The Mountain of the Lovers (1875), and The Broken Battalions (1885). His work is chiefly distinguished for its landscapes of the South, as in Aspects of the Pines and The Cottage on the Hill. Hayne edited the poems of his friend Timrod in 1873.

Ardently patriotic, he wrote fervent poems on the Civil War; one of these is The Battle of Charleston Harbor. During Sherman's march to the sea, Hayne's mansion was destroyed. He moved to Georgia, where he supported his family entirely from his writings. Among these are Legends and Lyrics (1872), The Mountain of the Lovers (1875), and The Broken Battalions (1885). His work is chiefly distinguished for its landscapes of the South, as in Aspects of the Pines and The Cottage on the Hill. Hayne edited the poems of his friend Timrod in 1873.

Hazard of New Fortunes, A (1890). A novel by William Dean Howells. Dryfoos, a Pennsylvania German who has recently risen to great wealth, brings his family to New York. Hoping to dissuade his son, Conrad, from joining the ministry, he purchases a magazine, Every Other Week, making Conrad the publisher. Dryfoos is also the father of two girls who, with their newly acquired fortune, are striving to enter high society. Basil March, editor of the magazine, is faced with a moral problem when Dryfoos demands the dismissal of Lindau, an old German socialist, from the magazine's staff. Lindau resigns, and later, participating in a strike of streetcar drivers and conductors, he is beaten to death. Conrad, also present at the strike, attempts to defend the old man and is killed by a stray bullet. Dryfoos sells the magazine to March, and takes his daughters to Europe, so they may continue their social climbing.

Hazlitt, William (1778–1830). English essayist and literary critic. At first dedicated to a career as a painter, he realized his talent was insufficient and turned to writing. Hazlitt became known for his studies and lectures on contemporary authors and the Elizabethan playwrights. His firm political liberalism estranged him from his friends Wordsworth, Coleridge, and Southey because he felt they had betrayed the liberalism of their youth. He went to London in 1808 and became a contributor to newspapers and periodicals, notably the Edinburgh Review and the Examiner.

After Coleridge, Hazlitt is probably the most penetrating and erudite of the early romantic critics, and is still eminently readable. Among his important works are: The Characters of Shakespeare's Plays (1817); The Round Table (1817, with Leigh Hunt); A View of the English Stage (1818); Lectures on the English Poets (1818); Lectures on the English Comic Writers (1819); Lectures on the Dramatic Literature of the Age of Elizabeth (1820); Table Talk (1821–1822); Liber Amoris (1823), an account of an unhappy love affair; and The Spirit of the Age (1825). He is considered one of the greatest masters of English prose.

H.D. See Hilda Doolittle.

Headlong Hall (1816). A novel by Thomas Love Peacock. A brilliantly witty piece, it presents the mildly philosophic opinions on life exchanged by Mrs. Foster, the optimist, Mr. Escot, the pessimist, and Mr. Jenkinson, the status-quo-ite. It is a satire on the idealistic aspirations of romanticism.

Heard, [Henry Fitz] Gerald (1889– ). English writer, resident in the U.S. since 1937. He has written about mystical religion and science and was a commentator on popular science for the British Broadcasting Corporation. Many of his books prove through anthropology and psychoanalysis man's need for religion, and describe his own mystical, oriental-style faith. Among his books are The Ascent of Humanity (1929), Code of Christ (1941), Gabriel and the Creatures (1952), and Human Venture (1955). His ideas greatly influenced Aldous Huxley; Christopher Isherwood and Huxley have been associated with him in California in the study of Eastern religion. He has written detective novels under the name of H. F. Heard.

Hearn, [Patricio] Lafcadio [Tessima Carlos] (1850–1904). American journalist and author. Of Greek and English-Irish parentage, he was born in the Ionian Islands. He is noted for the poetic prose style of his exotic and fantastic tales; he dedicated himself to "the worship of the Old, the Queer, the Strange, the Exotic, the Monstrous." After some early publication, including translations of stories by Théophile Gautier (in One of Cleopatra's Nights, 1882), Hearn achieved success in works set in Louisiana and the Caribbean. Chita (1887) is a novel about a young girl who survives a tidal wave on a small island; Youma is concerned with a slave insurrection.

Hearn’s search for the exotic led him to Japan in 1890, where he spent the rest of his life teaching and writing about the Japanese scene. He married and became a Japanese citizen under the name of Koizumi Yakumo. He published several books on Japan, including Kokoro (1896), In Ghostly Japan (1899), and Japan: An Attempt at Interpretation (1904). But his best work was his first, Glimpses of Unfamiliar Japan (1894).

Heartbreak House (1920). A play by George Bernard Shaw. A complex, allegorical work in which Shaw indicts apathy, confusion, and lack of purpose as the causes of the world’s problems. The characters—all larger than life and with symbolic names—are gathered at the home of an eccentric sea captain; they each represent an evil in the modern world. Into their midst comes young Ellie Dunn, whose search for a husband Shaw treats as a new generation searching for a way of life. While the play is essentially a pessimistic one, it ends on a note of optimism: The first bombs of a war caused by the old order kill Boss Mangan, the avaricious capitalist, and Ellie selects as her spiritual husband the eccentric old owner of Heartbreak House, who represents common sense.

Heart of Darkness (1902). A long short story by Joseph Conrad. Marlow tells his friends of an experience in the (then) Belgian Congo, where he once ran a river steamer for a trading company. He describes the cruel colonial exploitation there. Fascinated by reports about the powerful white trader Kurtz, Marlow went into the jungle in search of him, expecting to find in his character a clue to the evil around him. He found Kurtz living with the natives and brought him away, dying; Kurtz’s last words were “The horror! The horror!” The “heart of darkness” is the jungle, and the primitive, subconscious heart of man.

Heart of Midlothian, The (1818). A novel by Sir Walter Scott. The title alludes to the old jail at the center of Edinburgh, where the novel opens with scenes of the Porteous riots in 1736, when the commander of the Civic Guard, Captain Porteous, was lynched by a mob of incensed citizens after he had fired on a crowd. The plot concerns Effie Deans, a farmer’s daughter, who is seduced by George Stauton, and who is tried and sentenced to death for murdering their child. Her loyal half-sister Jeanie determines to walk to London to seek a pardon from George II, and in spite of all obstacles, actually accomplishes her task. Effie marries Stauton, but shortly afterward he is shot by a gypsy boy, in reality his illegitimate son, who had not died after all. Jeannie marries Reuben Butler, a Presbyterian minister. The novel has a factual basis.

Heart of the Matter, The (1948). A novel by Graham Greene. Set in West Africa, its hero is Scobie, an English Roman Catholic who is torn between his adulterous love for a young girl and his duty to his wife and his religion.

Heathcliff. The central character of Emily Brontë’s novel Wuthering Heights. Spurned by his childhood love, Catherine, he is obsessed with a desire for revenge that not only poisons her life and his but very nearly taints their children. Heathcliff is a romantic, almost demonic figure drawn on a heroic scale.

heaven (AS, heofon). The word properly denotes the abode of the Deity and his angels; also the upper air.

In the Ptolemaic system the heavens were the successive spheres of space enclosing the central earth at different distances and revolving around it at different speeds. The first seven were those of the so-called planets, the Moon, Mercury, Venus, the Sun, Mars, Jupiter, and Saturn; the eighth was the firmament containing all the fixed stars; the ninth was the crystalline sphere, invented by Hipparchus (second century B.C.), to account for the precession of the equinoxes. These were known as The Nine Heavens; the 10th—added much later—was the primium mobile.

According to the Muslims, there are seven heavens. The first heaven is of pure silver, and here the stars, each with its angel warder, are hung out like lamps on golden chains; it is the abode of Adam and Eve. The second heaven is of pure gold, and is the domain of John the Baptist and Jesus. The third heaven is of pearl, and is allotted to Joseph. Here Azrael, the angel of death, is stationed, and is forever writing in a large book the names of those just born and blotting out those of the newly dead. The fourth heaven is of white gold, and is Enoch’s. Here dwells the Angel of Tears, whose height is “500 days’ journey,” and he sheds ceaseless tears for the sins of man. The fifth heaven is of silver, and is Aaron’s. Here dwells the Avenging Angel, who presides over elemental fire. The sixth heaven is composed of ruby and garnet, and is presided over by Moses. Here dwells the Guardian Angel of heaven and earth, half snow and half fire. The seventh heaven is formed of divine light beyond the power of tongue to describe, and is ruled by Abraham. Each inhabitant is bigger than the whole earth and has 70,000 heads, each head 70,000 mouths, each mouth 70,000 tongues, and each tongue speaks 70,000 languages, all forever employed in chanting of the Most High.

To be in the seventh heaven is to be supremely happy. The cabalists maintained that there are seven heavens, each rising in happiness above the other, the seventh being the abode of God and the highest class of angels. See Paradise.
Heaven and Hell (1956). An essay by Aldous Huxley. It describes the effects the drug mescaline has on the mind, and compares the ecstatic and depressed states it produces with mystics' accounts of heaven and hell. Huxley had described his own experiments with mescal in The Doors of Perception (1954).

Hebbel, [Christian] Friedrich (1813–1863). German dramatist, known especially for the philosophical and historical theories which, though they sometimes enhance his works, often mar the dramatic effect. Almost all his plays take place at historical turning points, in accordance with ideas that he formulated in Mein Wort über das Drama (My Word on the Drama, 1843) and in the preface to his tragedy Maria Magdalena. Among his plays are also a tragedy (1841) about the Biblical heroine Jutrid; Herodes and Mariamne (1850), which treats the Herod in whose reign Christ was born; Agnes Bernauer (1855), a tragedy of love between a prince and a commoner; Gyges und sein Ring (Gyges and His Ring, 1856), based on the story of Candaules; and Die Nibelungen (1862), a trilogy based on the story of the Niebelungenlied. In style, Hebbel's plays are considered realistic, as opposed to the idealism of the classical and romantic authors of the earlier 19th century.

Hebe. In Greek mythology, goddess of youth. She was the cupbearer of the immortals before Ganymede superseded her. She was the wife of Hercules and had the power of making the aged young again.

Hebraism and Hellenism (1869). A well-known essay by Matthew Arnold. It appeared in the collection Culture and Anarchy. It analyzes and contrasts the Hebrew and the Greek cultures, the two strongest influences on British culture. Arnold maintains that the “uppermost idea” of Hellenism is “to see things as they really are,” while that of Hebraism is “conduct and obedience.”

Hebrews, The Epistle of Paul the Apostle to the. A New Testament book. Scholars place its date of writing around A.D. 100, but have been unable to identify its author; it is generally agreed that Hebrews is not an actual Pauline epistle. One of the most eloquent books in the New Testament, it stresses the powerful role of Jesus as the highest priest of God whose personal sacrifice was made for all men.

Hecate (Hekate). One of the Titans of Greek mythology. The only one who retained her power under the rule of Zeus, she was the daughter of Perses and Asteria, and became a deity of the lower world after taking part in the search for Persephone. She taught witchcraft and sorcery, and was a goddess of the dead. As she combined the attributes of, and became identified with, Selene, Artemis, and Persephone, she was represented as a triple goddess and was sometimes described as having three heads: one of a horse, one of a dog, and one of a lion. Her offerings consisted of dogs, honey, and black lambs, which were sacrificed to her at crossroads.

In Shakespeare's Macbeth, she appears as the queen of witches. After bewitching the three “weird sisters” for having made prophecies to Macbeth without his knowledge, she joins them in completing his destruction.

Hecht, Ben (1893–1964). American journalist, playwright, and novelist. Born in New York City, Hecht began his career in Chicago, where he worked as a reporter and took part in that city's “literary renaissance.” His first novel, Erik Dorn (1921), the story of an intellectual who throws over both wife and mistress for the excitement of European revolution, was based on his experiences as Berlin reporter for the Chicago News. Count Brigas (1926) and A Few in Love (1930) are laupoons of Maxwell Bodenheimer, who had drawn an unflattering portrait of Hecht in Ninth Avenue (1926). Hecht's play Winkelberg (1938) is also about Bodenheim. A prolific writer, Hecht wrote numerous short stories during his Chicago days, many of them being included in The Collected Stories of Ben Hecht (1945).

Hecht collaborated with Charles MacArthur on two plays: The Front Page (1928), a fast-paced portrayal of newspaper life, and Twentieth Century (1933). He also wrote the scenarios for several films. Hecht attacked anti-Semitism in Guide for the Living (1944) and advocated an extreme form of Zionism at the time Israel was being formed. Perfidy (1961) is a polemical attack on some of the leaders of the Israeli government. A Child of the Century (1954) is his frank, entertaining, and unconventional autobiography.

Hector (Hektor). Eldest son of Priam, the noblest and most magnanimous of all the Trojan chieftains in Homer's Iliad. After holding out for ten years, he was slain by Achilles, who lashed him to his chariot, and dragged the dead body in triumph thrice round the walls of Troy. The Iliad concludes with the funeral obsequies of Hector and Patroclus.

In modern times his name has somewhat deteriorated, for it is used today for a swaggering bully, and “to hector” means to browbeat, bully, bluster.

Hecuba (Hekabe). In Homer's Iliad, the wife of Priam and mother of Hector. She is a tragic figure in Euripides' The Trojan Women. In his Hecuba, her grief has made her a kind of Fury. In revenge for the murder of her son Polydorus, she blinds the Thracian king Polydorus, after killing his children. According to myth (perhaps through confusion with Hecate), she was transformed into a fiery-eyed hound. In Shakespeare's Hamlet, the Player King is deeply moved by his own speech about her, and Hamlet marvels, “What's Hecuba to him, or he to Hecuba?”

Hecuba (425 B.C.). A tragedy by EURIPIDES. Hecuba, queen of Troy, has seen all of her 50 children die except her daughter Polyxena and Polyxena's youngest son, whom she sent to King Polydor in Thrace at the beginning of the war. As the play begins, she lies exhausted in front of her tent in Chalcidice, where the Greek expedition has taken her. A messenger comes to announce the decision of the Greeks in council: Polyxena must die to assuage the shade of Achilles. Polyxena goes to her death with dignity; soon after, the body of Polydorus is borne onto the stage. When Hecuba learns which of her children this is, she yearns for revenge. She lures Polydor to her tent, blinds him, and kills his sons. Polydor is reduced to an animal state as he crawls and gropes his way out of the tent. The closing scene shows Polydor and Hecuba arguing their cases before Agamemnon. When Agamemnon decides for Hecuba, Polymestor breaks into prophecy and foresees the murder of Agamemnon and the horrible death of Hecuba, who will bark like a dog.

Many critics, approaching the Hecuba as a drama of character, have found contradictions in the plot, which is divided into two parts: the death of Polyzena and the blinding of Polymestor. Hecuba is involved in both of them, and her character changes through the play, but Euripides' tragic conception concerns more than Hecuba. The theme of the play is the brutality of suffering. Though Hecuba is the principal actor, the climactic speech, the prophecy of Polymestor, which displays Polymestor and Hecuba at the same bestial level. The key to Euripides' purpose is his use of myth; the old tales of Agamemnon's murder and Hecuba's animal metamorphosis become the climax to the long series of brutalities in the play.

Hedda Gabler (1890). A play by Henrik Ibsen. Hedda, a ruthless, neurotic woman, is bored with her dull, scholarly husband, repelled by the idea of her possible pregnancy, and concerned that she may have to forgo certain luxuries if her husband fails to be appointed a professor at the university. She learns that meek Thea Elvested has helped reform the brilliant but dissipated Eilert Lövberg, who had once been in love with Hedda, and that the success of Lövberg's new book has made him her husband's rival for the professorship. Determined to show her power over Lövberg and thwart Thea's good influence, she lures him back into dissipation. She finds the missing manuscript of a second book, far more important to Lövberg than the first, but lets him believe that it is lost beyond recall. When, in despair, he threatens to end his life, she gives him a pistol and urges him to "die beautifully." He dies quite horribly, and Hedda finds herself in the power of Judge Brack, who knows that Hedda gave Lövberg the pistol and intends to use his knowledge to make her his mistress. Hedda finds this situation unbearable and "dies beautifully" by putting a bullet through her head.

Hedin, Sven Anders von (1865–1952). Swedish geographer and explorer in Central Asia, China, and India. Accounts of his journeys include Through Asia (1898), Central Asia and Tibet (1904), Overland to India (1910), and The Silk Road (1936).

Heep, Uriah. In Charles Dickens' David Copperfield, a clerk of Mr. Wickfield. One of the most famous characters in fiction, he is a detestable sneak, who is everlastingly forcing on one's attention that he is "ungenteel." Actually, Uriah is designing and malignant and he becomes a blackmailing tyrant over Mr. Wickfield. His infamy is brought to light by Mr. Micawber.

Hegel, Georg Friedrich Wilhelm (1770–1831). German philosopher. He greatly influenced the study of history and metaphysics in that he saw reality as a dynamic process, rather than as a reflection of static ideals. The process of reality, he maintained, is governed by the dialectical law: every thesis implies its own contradiction, or antithesis, and their conflict ends in a synthesis which again brings forth its antithesis. History, understood again in terms of the dialectic, is mediated by the conflicting impulses and interests of men, but at the same time shows the progressive self-realization of human reason and freedom. Great men are those whose personal aims coincide with the aim of the historical process; and in the latter years of his life, Hegel used this concept of history to justify support of the Prussian state. His concept of the dialectic was developed by many subsequent philosophers, notably Marx and Engels; but the latter discarded Hegelian idealism and applied the dialectic to a materialistic view of history. Hegel's works include The Phenomenology of the Spirit (Die Phänomenologie des Geistes; 1807) and The Philosophy of Right (Grundlinien der Philosophie des Rechts; 1821). He was a close friend of both Hölderlin and Friedrich Schelling, with whom he held many ideas in common.

Heggen, Thomas [Orlo] (1919–1949). American novelist. Heggen, who was a member of the staff of the Reader's Digest, used his wartime experiences in the navy to write Mister Roberts, an extremely successful novel, later adapted for the stage by Joshua Logan.

hegira or hijira (Arabic, "the departure"). The flight of Muhammed from Mecca to Medina when he was expelled by the magistrates, July 16, 622. In 639, the Caliph Omar decreed that the Muslim calendar would date from this event.

Heian. The second Japanese historical period (794–1185). It saw the development of an exquisitely refined culture under the Imperial Court at Kyoto (Heian). Literature and the arts were marked by an extreme elegance, strongly influenced by Buddhist and Chinese thought. The Tale of Genji and the Pillow-book of Sei Shonagon are products of this age. It was dominated by the Fujiwara family and is also known as the Fujiwara period.

Heiberg, Gunnar Edvard Rode (1857–1929). Norwegian playwright and essayist. A clever satirist, Heiberg mocked the absurd prettiness of Norwegian political life and treated other current concerns in such plays as Kong Midas (1890), Gerts have (1894), and Det storeJad (1895). In Balkonen (The Balcony, 1894) and Kjoerlighedens tragedie (The Tragedy of Love, 1904), he turns his lyric powers to an analysis of the primitive force of sexual passion.

Heidegger, Martin (1889– ). German philosopher, influenced by Kierkegaard, whose ideas form the basis of the existentialist movement. In Sein und Zeit (Being and Time, 1927), he distinguishes between two types of being: human existence (Dasein) and nonhuman presence (Vorhandensein), such as that of physical objects. Human existence is characterized by personal consciousness and accompanied by feelings of insecurity and dread (Angst). Angst is not fear of anything specific, but a general dread of nothingness.

Heidenstam [Carl Gustaf] Werner von (1859–1940). Swedish poet and novelist. An aspiring painter, Heidenstam turned to another art form with the publication of his first collection of poetry, Vallfart och vandringsår (1888). The vigorous modern rhythms and exuberant mood of the poems had a significant effect on young writers who were rebelling against naturalism. Dikter (1895) and Nya dikter (1915) revealed Heidenstam's lyrical gifts. After 1890 he became chiefly a prose writer; in 1916 he received the Nobel Prize for literature.

Heifetz, Jascha (1901– ). Russian-born American violin virtuoso. He was a child prodigy; his technique and artistry continued to amaze people as he matured. He settled in the U.S. after the Russian Revolution and became one of the most popular violinists of the century.

Heike monogatari, see Tales of the Heike, The. Heimat, Die. See MAIDA.

Heimdall. One of the gods of Scandinavian mythology, son of the nine virgin daughters of Aegir and called the White God with the Golden Teeth. As watchman of Asgard, he dwelt on the edge of heaven, guarded the rainbow bridge Bifrost, and possessed a mighty horn whose blast could be heard throughout the universe. It was said that he could see for 100 miles by day or night, that he slept less than a bird, and could hear the grass grow. When Ragnarok, the twilight of the gods, comes, he will sound his Gjallarhorn to assemble the gods and heroes. See LOKI.

Heimskringla. The most important prose collection in Old Norse literature, containing 16 sagas of Norwegian history through 1177, sketched through the medium of biography, with a compendium of ancient Scandinavian mythology and poetry. Its name comes from its opening words, Kröfta heimins, the circle of the world. The authorship is attributed to SNAORI STURLUSON.

Heine, Heinrich. Name at birth: Chaim Harry Heine (1797–1856). German poet, satirist, and journalist of Jewish origin. His ambiguous attitude toward Germany, combining a sincere sentimental love for the land and the people with biting irony about many German institutions, customs, and literary trends, appears in the early Reisebilder (Travel-Sketches, 1826 ff.), one of which is Die Harzreise (Trip in the Harz Mountains, 1826), his first major literary success. Gradually, however, he began to realize that the conflict between his liberal political views and the oppressive conservative regime in Prussia would make it impossible for him to remain in Germany. His attention was specifically drawn to Paris, where both the political ferment of the July Revolution (1830) and the growth of Saint-Simonianism attracted him; in 1831 he went there and remained for the rest of his life. In Paris, he was primarily active as a journalist and critic, writing in both German and French, and much of his work was intended to promote better understanding between his native and adopted lands: for example, Französische Zustände (The Situation in France, 1833); Zur Geschichte der Religion und Philosophie in Deutschland (On the History of Religion and Philosophy in Germany, 1834), which was also published in French; and Die romantische Schule (The Romantic School, 1833). In 1835, a Prussian edict prohibited his writings in Germany, naming him as a leader in the JUNGE DEUTSCHLAND (Young Germany) movement with which he had, however, been only peripherally associated.

In his early poems, notably the Buch der Lieder (Book of Songs, 1827 ff.), which includes his famous ballad on the LORELAI-theme, Heine stands close to GERMAN ROMANTICISM. But though romantic elements remain in his later verse, especially the collection Romanzero (1851), there is also a strong tendency toward irony about romanticism, as in the narrative poems Atta Troll (1843) about the death of a trained bear, and Deutschland, ein Winternärchen (Ger-

Heinrich, Der arme (Poor Heinrich) (early 13th century). A narrative poem by HARTMANN VON AUE, based on German legend. The nobleman Heinrich is told he will not be cured of his leprosy until a virgin is willing to die for him. As he cannot wish such a sacrifice, he gives away most of his possessions and goes to live with one of his tenant farmers. This man's daughter learns how the cure must be effected and offers herself as the victim. This is enough to cause an instant cure, and Heinrich marries her. Heinrich becomes Prince Henry of Hoheneck in H. W. Longfellow's The Golden Legend (1851), and the tale is retold in Gerhart Hauptmann's drama Der arme Heinrich (1902).

Heinrich von Ofterdingen. Legendary German minnesinger, or medieval court poet. See under WARTBURG. NOVALIS uses his name for the title and hero of an unfinished symbolic novel (pub. 1801) in which the BLUE FLOWER represents the union of the dream world and the real world for the poet. The novel treats the imaginary development of Heinrich from a completely naïve young man into an accomplished poet. Wagner makes him one of the competing minstrels in TANNHAUSER.

Heinse, Johann Jakob Wilhelm (1749–1803). German novelist. His justification of immorality on aesthetic grounds is related to the tendencies of the STURM UND DRANG. His critical works on art, especially Italian painting, are significant, and his interest in this field may also be seen in the novel Ardingello oder Die glückseligen Inseln (Ardingello or The Isles of the Blessed, 1787), which is important in the growth of the BILDUNGSROMAN (novel of education).

Hekatoncheires. See the HUNDRED-HANDED.

Hel or Hela. The daughter of LOKI in Scandinavian mythology, who was queen of the dead and goddess of the lower regions. Here she was cast by Odin to dwell beneath the roots of the sacred ash Yggdrasil. The region of Hel was also the home of the spirits of those who had died in their beds, as distinguished from Valhalla, the abode of heroes slain in battle.

Heldenbuch, Das (book of heroes). Name given to several collections of medieval German epics. The Woodcut from a German Heldenbuch (c. 1500).

The earliest extant manuscript is from 1472, the first printed version about 1477, although the poems were probably composed in the 13th century. The episodes are grouped in two cycles, one concerning Dieterich of Bern (see THEODORIC THE GREAT), the other about the brothers ORNIT and WOLFDIRCH.

Helen (Helen). In Greek mythology, the daughter of Zeus and Leda and wife of Menelaus. Her abduction by Paris led to the Trojan War. In the Iliad of Homer and The Trojan Women of Euripides, she appears as a shallow and self-centered woman, unconcerned with the havoc her infidelity has wrought. Throughout literature from Greek times to the present, she has been a symbol of womanly beauty and sexual attraction. As such she has appeared in many dramas, including Marlowe's Doctor Faustus, Goethe's Faust, and Jean Giraudoux' Tiger at the Gates. Euripides' Helen, however, tells another version of the story. The Helen at Troy was a phantom created by Hera to cause war. Menelaus' faithf ul wife, kidnapped by Hermes, remained in Egypt throughout the war, but they were finally reunited, despite the attempt of the Egyptian king Theoclymenus to marry her by force. This story of the false Helen was attributed to the poet Stesichorus, who was said by Plato to have been blinded by Helen (who was also a goddess) for maligning her in verse. He redeemed her reputation, and his own sight, by writing the story of the phantom. Gluck wrote an opera on the traditional Helen, Paride ed Elena (1770). At the imperial court in Part II of Goethe's Faust, Faust makes Helen and Paris appear in a magical vision but, forgetting that it is an illusion, falls violently in love with Helen and causes an explosion by his rash attempt to take her from Paris. In the classical Walpurgis Night, however, he finds the real Helen, and the two of them enjoy a brief idyll that symbolizes the romantic ideal (see the brothers Schlegel) of a synthesis between Nordic and classical cultures. See EUPHORIA; ETERNAL FEMININE.

Helen (Helene; 412 B.C.). A play by EURIPIDES. Following Stesichorus' version of the story of Helen of Troy, the play opens in Egypt. Hermes has brought her there after Paris has abducted from Troy not Helen but a phantom created in her likeness by Hera. She has been kindly treated by King Proteus, but he has died and his son Theoclymenus, who hates the Greeks, wants to marry her. Teucer arrives and tells of the destruction of Troy seven years before. Thousands have died because of the woman they all believe is Helen; her own mother and brothers have killed themselves in shame at her conduct; Menelaus and his ships are lost.

Menelaus arrives, however, and, recognizing his wife—the phantom having vanished—bitterly realizes that the TROJAN WAR has been fought for nothing. Pretending that Menelaus is dead, Helen borrows a ship to hold obsequies for him at sea. Together they escape from Theoclymenus and sail for home.

Helena. (1) In Shakespeare's Midsummer Night's Dream, a young Athenian lady in love with Demetrius. She pursues him despite his love for Hermia and is at last rewarded when Puck anoints him with a love potion. (2) The persistent and loving heroine of Shakespeare's ALL'S WELL THAT ENDS WELL. She loves the haughty Bertram despite his scorn for her.

Helen of Kircornell. A famous Scottish ballad. Helen is the lover of Adam Flemming. One day, while they are standing on the banks of a river, a rival suitor points his gun at Adam. Helen throws herself in front of him and is shot. The two rivals then fight, and the murderer is slain. Wordsworth embodies the same story in his poem Ellen Irwin.

Heleneus. In Vergil's Aeneid, a Trojan prince and prophet, the only son of Priam to survive the fall of Troy. He falls to the share of Pyrrhus (Neoptolemus) when the captives are awarded, and eventually marries Andromache, his brother Hector's widow. In some versions of the legend he is said to have deserted to the Greeks, and in others he is said to have been captured by Odysseus.

Helicon (Helikon). A Boeotian mountain. It was known by the Greeks as the home of the Muses. It contained the fountains of Aganippe and Hippocrene, connected by "Helicon's harmonious stream." The name is used allusively of poetic inspiration.

Heliogabalus. Full Latin name, VARIUS AVITUS Bassianus (204–222). Roman emperor (218–222). He began as a priest in the temple of the sun god Elagabalus (hence his name as emperor). He was put forward as the son of CARACALLA and proclaimed emperor by the soldiery. Giving himself up to infamous debauchery, he left affairs of state to his mother. He was killed by the Praetorian Guard.

Helios. The Greek sun god. He rode to his palace in Colchis every night in a golden boat furnished with wings. He appears principally in the myth of PHAETON, though his cattle are important in the Odyssey. His cult was important on the island of Rhodes; the famous COLOSSUS OF RHODES was a statue of Helios. See HERACLES.

heliotrope (Gr., "turn-to-sun"). The sun god loved Clynthia, but forsook her for her sister Leucothoe. On discovering this, Clynthia pined away; and the god changed her at death to a flower, which, always turning toward the sun, is called heliotrope.

The bloodstone, a greenish quartz with veins and spots of red, used to be called heliotrope, the story being that if thrown into a bucket of water it turned the rays of the sun to blood color. This stone also had the power of rendering its bearer invisible.

Helle. See GOLDEN FLEECE, THE.

Hellen. In Greek legend, a king of Pthia, eponym of the Hellenic race.

Hellenore. See FAERIE QUEENE, THE.

Hellespont. The ancient name of the Dardanelles, named for Athamas' daughter Helle (see the GOLDEN FLEECE). In the classical romance, Leander used to swim the Hellespont to visit Hero, a priestess of Sestos. Lord Byron prided himself upon duplicating this feat.

Hell-fire Club. See MEDMENHAM ABBEY.

Hellman, Lillian (1905–). American dramatist. She is noted for her plays of psychological conflict, The Children's Hour (1934) dealt with a young girl who starts the rumor that the two heads of her school are Lesbians. The Little Foxes and The Watch on the Rhine are two of Lillian Hellman's most successful dramas. Others include The Searching Wind (1944) and Toys in the Attic (1960).
Hellström, Gustaf (1882–1953). Swedish writer. A career as foreign correspondent gave a foreign flavor to his novels, which are set in such world capitals as New York, London, and Paris. Among his works are Ungkarlar (1904), Kuskar (1910), Bengt Blanks sentimental resa (1917), Snormakare Lekholm far en idé (Lacemaker Lekholm has an idea, 1927), and the autobiographical series En man utan humor (1921–1944).

Helmholtz, Hermann Ludwig Ferdinand von (1821–1894). German physicist who developed the theory of the conservation of energy, first formulated by Julius Robert Mayer.

Héloïse (1101–1164). Niece of the Canon Fulbert of Notre Dame Cathedral, famous as the beloved of Pierre Abelard. He was her tutor when he fell in love and seduced her (1118). They were secretly married after the birth of their son Astrolabe, although Héloïse tried to dissuade him, fearing the marriage would ruin his career. And in fact, when the marriage became known, Fulbert had Abelard emasculated; Héloïse became a nun and Abelard a monk. Their famous exchange of letters (see under Abelard) made their story popular as a romantic tragedy, and in 1817 their bodies were reburied in one grave.

helot. A serf of ancient Sparta. Possibly members of the earlier population of the area enslaved by their Dorian conquerors, they constituted the lowest class in the city-state. According to tradition, Spartan fathers used to ply their helot slaves with liquor on occasion so that their sons might learn by their disgusting example to detest drunkenness.

Helper, Hinton Rowan (1829–1909). American writer. Helper, who was born in North Carolina and was raised on a plantation, is best known for The Impending Crisis of the South: How to Meet It (1857), in which he argued that the South was economically and culturally far behind the North because of its slave labor. He held that slavery should be taxed out of existence and that all Negroes should be sent back to Africa. The book was an immediate success in the North, but it became illegal in most parts of the South even to own a copy.

Helvétius, Claude Adrien (1715–1771). French materialist philosopher and encyclopedist. In his most famous work, De l’Esprit (1758), he asserts that human minds at birth are uniformly blank and that general progress and well-being therefore depend upon education, institutions, and laws. Utilitarian in his thinking, he states that religion has failed in becoming the framework for morality and that the only real basis for morality and for law is the public interest, i.e., that which is good for the greatest number. For this heretical doctrine the Sorbonne, the Pope, and the Parlement had the work condemned and burned. Jeremy Bentham and James Mill acknowledge his influence.

Hemes, Felicia Dorothea, born Browne (1793–1835). English poet, best known for her lyrics, The Landing of the Pilgrim Fathers and Casabianca. Mrs. Heman’s work was much admired in its day for what was deemed nobility and pathos. She was also famous for her beauty and learning. Her Poetical Works were edited by W. M. Rossetti in 1873.

Hemingway, Ernest [Miller] (1899–1961). American novelist and short-story writer. Starting his writing career as a newspaperman and foreign correspondent, Hemingway was a meticulous literary craftsman whose terse, economic style, dramatic understatement, and superb dialogue have been extremely influential on modern prose writers. Sometimes erroneously dismissed as being sentimentally obsessed with violence, Hemingway clearly portrays in his work the sensitivity of a man hurt by the violence which he sees as a characteristic of our time.

Hemingway’s first published volume was Three Stories and Ten Poems (1923); it contained the stories Up in Michigan, Out of Season, My Old Man, and six poems which had been previously published in Poetry (January, 1923). The author’s first major work, In Our Time, was a collection of 15 stories, many of them dealing with the early biography of Nick Adams, whose boyhood was to be a prototype for those of later Hemingway heroes. His first novel, The Torrents of Spring (1926), with its burlesque of Sherwood Anderson, is significant only as a declaration of his literary independence. It was with the appearance of The Sun Also Rises that Hemingway’s reputation became widely established. Often considered his best work in this form, it depicts “the lost generation” and the disillusionment that followed World War I.

Men Without Women, a collection that includes the famous stories The Killers and Fifty Grand, continued Hemingway’s early success. For those critics who consider Hemingway at his best in the short-story form, this volume and the later Winner Take Nothing (1933) rank high indeed. Hemingway next wrote A Farewell to Arms, a romantic, vivid, and impeccably written novel whose genesis was derived from material published in the earlier volume In Our Time. Two works of nonfiction followed: Death in the Afternoon (1932), with its eulogy of ritualized bullfight, and Green Hills of Africa (1935).

In 1937, Hemingway’s early dissociation from political questions gave way to a position of greater involvement. To Have and Have Not, with its dying hero gasping, “One man alone ain’t got . . . no chance,” was the first to mark this change. That same year, deeply sympathetic with the Loyalist cause, he went to Spain as a war correspondent during the Civil war. The Fifth Column (1938), a play presenting “the nobility and dignity of the cause of the Spanish people,” continued this concern as did his novel For Whom the Bell Tolls.

During the next decade, Hemingway was almost silent. Taking part in World War II as a correspondent and waging his own irregular war at the head of a make-shift corps of his own, he did not publish another novel until 1950 when Across the River and into the Trees appeared. This novel, in which an aging hero revisits the scene of his World War I wounding, was almost unanimously rated as inferior work. But in 1952 came The Old Man and the Sea, a novella that was widely acclaimed and awarded the Pulitzer Prize. In 1954, Hemingway was given the Nobel Prize in literature. He published nothing more of significance before his self-inflicted death in 1961.

The author’s short stories were collected in The Hemlock and After (1952). A novel by Angus Wilson. The hero is a middle-aged writer who is trying to reconcile his high-minded ideas with his failures and homosexual impulses. Wilson’s attitude toward his many characters is both satirical and diagnostic.

Hémon, Louis (1880–1913). French novelist. Although Hémon spent only a short time in Canada, he is best known for Maria Chapdelaine (1916), a novel of farm life in Quebec, which became very popular after its posthumous publication.

Henchard, Michael. See Mayor of Casterbridge, The.

Henderson, Alice Corbin (1881–1949). American poet and editor. With Harriet Monroe, she founded the magazine Poetry, and served as its associate editor (1912–1916). Her own poetry was collected in The Spinning Woman of the Sky (1912), Red Earth (1920), and The Sun Turns West (1933). She also compiled with Miss Monroe, The New Poetry: An Anthology (1917).

Hengist and Horsa. Two brothers in Geoffrey of Monmouth’s History of the Kings of Britain. They were Jute invaders of England (c. 449), whose aid in war against the Picts was enlisted by the ancient British king Vortigern. Horsa is said to have been killed in battle in 455, Hengist to have ruled the kingdom of Kent, which they founded, until 488.

Henley, William Ernest (1849–1905). English poet, dramatist, and editor. As editor of the National Observer (1889–1894) and the New Review (1898–1903), Henley was a revolutionary force in English literature, publishing and defending early works of such writers as Barrie, Hardy, Kipling, Wells, Shaw, and Conrad. In his own work he was a pioneer in the use of free verse (In Hospital, 1888) and wrote a number of poems of merit and technical accomplishment. Unfortunately, aggressive jingoism mars much of such volumes as The Song of the Sword (1893) and For England’s Sake (1900) and Henley has had the ill-luck to be known, generally, as the author of a single poem, the meretricious Invictus. His collected Poems appeared in 1912. He also collaborated with his friend R. L. Stevenson on three plays, and was the author of numerous critical essays (Works, 1908).

Hennepin, Father Louis (1640–1701). Belgian-born Franciscan friar and explorer. He accompanied La Salle through the Great Lakes (1679) and joined a party that explored the Upper Mississippi Valley. While a captive of the Sioux, he discovered the Falls of St. Anthony, near present-day Minneapolis. In France he published Description de la Louisiane (1683) and other, somewhat exaggerated, accounts of his experiences. His claim that he descended to the mouth of the Mississippi has since been shown to be false.

Henriade, La (1723, republished in 1728 with revisions). An epic poem in 10 cantos by Voltaire. It recounts the struggle of Henry of Navarre (later Henry IV of France) to obtain the throne. Voltaire depicts the assassination of Henry III and the religious wars with the Holy League, and by implication condemns civil strife and religious fanaticism.

Henrietta Maria (1609–1669). Queen consort (1625–1649) of Charles I of England and mother of Charles II and James II. The daughter of Henry IV of France, she was a Roman Catholic. Forced to flee to France (1644), she returned to England after the Restoration.

Henriques, Robert (1905– ). English soldier and novelist. Among his works are No Arms, No Armour (1939), Home Fires Burning (1945), Through the Valley (1950), and A Stranger Here (1953).

Henry IV. Also known as Henry Bolingbroke and Henry of Lancaster (1367–1413). King of England (1399–1413), the 1st monarch of the house of Lancaster. The son of John of Gaunt and the grandson of Edward III, he was banished by Richard II in 1398. The following year he invaded England, overthrew Richard, and assumed the crown himself. He is a central character in Shakespeare’s Henry IV: Part I and Part II, and also appears in Richard II. The surname Bolingbroke refers to the castle in which he was born.

Henry V (1387–1422). King of England (1413–1422). The son of Henry IV, he invaded France in an attempt to reconquer England’s former possessions there, winning an important victory at Agincourt (1415). Subsequent military successes and astute diplomacy resulted in the treaty of Troyes (1420), by which Henry was to marry Catherine of Valois, daughter of Charles VI, king of France, and inherit the French crown upon Charles’s death. See Henry V, The Life of King.

Henry VII. Also known as Henry Tudor (1457–1509). King of England (1485–1509), the 1st monarch of the Tudor dynasty. As earl of Richmond and the principal representative of the Lancastrian claim to the throne of England, he defeated Richard III at Bosworth Field in 1485. His subsequent marriage to Elizabeth, daughter of Edward IV, marked the end of the Wars of the Roses. Later he successfully suppressed a rebellion by the Yorkist pretender Perkin Warbeck. He was succeeded by his son Henry VIII.

Henry VIII. Henry Tudor (1491–1547). Second of the Tudor kings, king of England (1509–1547). At the beginning of his reign Henry married Catherine of Aragon, his brother’s widow; because of some ecclesiastical protest about the validity of such a union, he was forced to acquire a Papal dispensation. When, nearly twenty years later, Catherine had not borne him a son, personal and political reasons moved him to consider divorce. The Pope was unwilling, doubly so since Rome was in the hands of the Emperor Charles V, Catherine’s nephew. Various delays occurred, and finally Henry chose the expedient of overthrowing papal jurisdiction, thus at one fell swoop making possible his divorce, channeling the revenues from monasteries and Church lands away from Rome to the Crown and, almost incidentally, and for political far more than religious reasons, initiating the English Reformation. Early in 1533, before any kind of divorce had been granted, he secretly married Anne Boleyn, and a few months later had his first marriage declared void and his second declared valid. This was followed by an Act of Succession, giving the right of succession to the throne to offspring of Anne and denying it to Mary (later Mary I), Catherine's daughter, on the grounds of her illegitimacy. To both this and the Act of Supremacy, by which Henry was made head of the Church, subjects were required to give an oath of acceptance, a thing that no devout Catholic could do, and in default of which Sir Thomas More, formerly Lord Chancellor, was executed for high treason.

Anne, like Catherine before her, bore only one child that lived, and that a daughter, the future Elizabeth I. In 1556 Anne was dispatched on a charge of adultery, and Henry married Jane Seymour, who died bearing him the much-desired son, destined to become the boy-king Edward VI. In 1540 Henry married the German princess Anne of Cleves, but disliked her and divorced her almost immediately. Catherine Howard, the next of his wives, was soon charged with adultery and beheaded. His last wife was Catherine Parr, a patroness of the arts, who survived him. Before his death Henry fixed the succession in his will, giving it to Edward, Mary, and Elizabeth (though both of his daughters had previously been declared illegitimate), who succeeded him in that order.

Henry IV. Also known as Henry of Navarre and Henry the Great (1553–1610). King of France (1589–1610), the first of the Bourbon dynasty. Raised as a Calvinist, Henry became leader of the French Huguenot party in 1569 after the death of the first prince of Condé. He succeeded to the throne of Navarre as Henry III and married Margaret of Valois, sister of Charles IX of France, in 1572. When the death of the brother of Henry III, the reigning king of France, made Henry of Navarre heir presumptive, the refusal of the Holy League to recognize his title led to the conflict known as the War of the Three Henrys (Henry III of France, Henry of Navarre, and Henry, duke of Guise). After the assassination of the king of France, Henry's victory over the league at Ivry and his conversion to Catholicism enabled him to secure the crown. One of France's ablest monarchs, Henry initiated a program to hasten recovery from the religious wars. He issued the Edict of Nantes and, in foreign affairs, followed a policy of opposition to the Hapsburgs. He was assassinated by François Ravillac, a Roman Catholic fanatic. See Gabrielle d'Estaëres; duc de Sully; and Henriade, The.

Henry IV (1050–1106). Holy Roman emperor. On the death of his father, Henry III, in 1056, he succeeded to the kingdoms of Germany, Italy, and Burgundy. In 1065 Henry was declared of age and assumed the throne. His reign was marked by the great struggle between empire and papacy over the question of lay investiture. Hitherto the emperors had filled the ecclesiastical positions within their dominions at their pleasure. But Pope Gregory VII decided to claim this power for the papacy, and in 1075 he issued a decree forbidding lay investiture. Almost immediately, Henry responded by filling several sees in Italy with bishops of his own choosing. When Gregory threatened excommunication, Henry called together the German bishops and answered: "I, Henry, king by the grace of God, together with all our bishops, say unto thee, come down from thy throne and be accursed through all the ages." Gregory forthwith deposed the bishops, excommunicated Henry, and declared the thrones of Italy and Germany vacant. Henry was then faced with a revolt in his territories, as his vassals gave him notice that a new emperor would be chosen within the year if he did not relent. Accordingly, the emperor went in 1077 to meet the pope at Canossa. There, outside the castle, Henry garbed as a penitent waited for three days in the snow before Gregory would receive him and grant conditional absolution. When Henry returned to Germany, he found that the princes had elected a new emperor in spite of his penance. Gregory remained neutral for a time, then renewed the excommunication. After Henry had defeated and killed his rival Rudolf, duke of Swabia, he marched on Rome. An attempt at compromise through the convocation of a synod failed, and in 1083 Henry deposed Gregory and installed Clement III, who promptly crowned Henry emperor. Meanwhile, the German princes had chosen a new king, Hermann of Luxemburg, and Henry was compelled to renew the struggle. By 1088 he had restored his authority throughout Germany. He survived conspiracies by his second wife and his eldest son Conrad, only to be defeated by his second son Henry, later Henry V, who declared he owed no allegiance to an excommunicated father. In 1105 a diet in Mainz forced Henry IV to abdicate. After escaping to Cologne, he began negotiations with England, France, and Denmark. He was engaged in organizing an army when he died in 1106.

Henry IV: Part I (c. 1597–1598). A historical play by William Shakespeare, depicting early years of the reign of England's Henry IV. After defeating rebellious Scottish barons, Henry Percy, the famous Hotspur, eldest son of the powerful earl of Northumberland, refuses to yield his prisoners to the king unless his kinsman Edmund Mortimer, captured by the rebellious Welshman Owen Glendower, is ransomed. Since Mortimer is pretender to the throne, Henry refuses his ransom. Angered, the Percy family joins the rebels. Meanwhile, the king's son and heir, Prince Hal, continues to annoy his father by keeping company with the band of revelers led by Sir John Falstaff. But, hearing of the uprising, Hal takes command of a part of his father's forces, helping to defeat the rebels at the battle of Shrewsbury (1403). Hal saves his father's life and kills Hotspur.

Henry IV: Part II (c. 1597–1598). A historical play by William Shakespeare, completing the description of the reign of Henry IV. Despite the death of Hotspur, the rebellion continues, under the leadership of the earl of Northumberland. Meanwhile, Hal has returned to the riotous company of Falstaff. Upon Northumberland's desertion, the rebels negotiate with the king's second son, John of Lancaster, who promises to redress their grievances if they will disband. They accept and are promptly killed by the treacherous prince. After the defeat of his enemies, Hal abdicates the throne on his deathbed. Hal is acclaimed king (Henry V) and promptly repudiates his misspent youth by banishing Falstaff from his presence. Shakespeare's source for both plays about Henry IV is Holinshed's Chronicles (1577).

Henry V, The Life of King (c. 1598–1599). A historical play by William Shakespeare. Shortly after his coronation, Henry V decides to press his claims to the French throne and leads an army into France. He defeats a vastly larger French army at Agincourt (1415), wins the hand of the French princess, Catherine of Valois, and is recognized as heir to the French throne. Against this background, Shakespeare reveals Henry's rapport with the doughty English soldiers. The death of Falstaff is also reported in the play. In Henry IV: Part I and Part II and in Henry V, Shakespeare chronicles Henry's life from his days as a profligate youth under the influence of Sir John Falstaff to his victory at Agincourt as king of England. His character is used by Shakespeare as a study in statesmanship. Although Henry steeps himself in the revels and schemes of Falstaff, part of him always remains aloof. For, as he explains:

I know you all, and will awhile uphold
The unyok'd humour of your idleesse:
Yet herein will I imitate the sun,
Who doth permit the base contagious clouds
To smother up his beauty from the world,
That when he please again to be himself,
Being wanted, he may be more wonder'd at.

Henry VI: Part I (c. 1590–1592). The 1st play of a historical trilogy by William Shakespeare, depicting the early years of Henry's reign up to his marriage with Margaret of Anjou. After the death of Henry V, the realm of the child king, Henry VI, falls under the control of his uncles, the regents John, duke of Bedford, and Humphrey, duke of Gloucester. War has broken out anew in France; under Joan La Pucelle, the French begin to drive the English out. Meanwhile, Richard Plantagenet, having successfully pressed his claims to the title of the duke of York, quarrels with the powerful Beaufort family of the house of Lancaster, setting the stage for the Wars of the Roses. After a temporary reconciliation of Yorkists and Lancastrians, a marriage is arranged between Henry and the daughter of the French earl of Armagnac in order to seal a truce between England and France. However, at the urging of the earl of Suffolk, Henry chooses Margaret of Anjou to be his queen.

Henry VI: Part II (c. 1590–1592). The 2nd play of a historical trilogy by William Shakespeare, covering the early years of the Wars of the Roses. After his marriage to Margaret, Henry is dominated by the queen and the duke of Suffolk, who plot the overthrow of the lord protector, Humphrey, the duke of Gloucester, by convincing Humphrey's wife, the duchess of Gloucester, of sorcery, and thus forcing his shameful retirement. Meanwhile, Richard Plantagenet, having convinced the earl of Salisbury and Richard Neville, earl of Warwick, of his right to the throne, waits for the opportunity to seize it. Before leaving to suppress a revolt in Ireland, he encourages Jack Cade to launch a rebellion in his absence. Subsequently, Richard returns to England and meets and defeats the king's forces at St. Albans (1455).

Henry VI: Part III (c. 1590–1592). The 3rd play of a historical trilogy by William Shakespeare, covering the downfall of Henry and the victory of the house of York in the person of Edward IV. After the defeat of his forces at St. Albans, Richard Plantagenet allows to him to reign during his lifetime. Richard agrees, but Margaret, Henry's queen, is set on destroying Richard. At Wakefield, she defeats him and puts him to death. But Richard's sons, Edward (IV) and Richard (III), triumph over Margaret at Towton, and Edward becomes king. Henry, who has fled, returns to England and is imprisoned in the Tower of London. Edward sends Warwick to France to arrange a marriage with Bona, sister of Louis XI. In his absence, Edward marries Lady Elizabeth Grey, and Warwick, annoyed, goes over to Margaret. After several reverses, Edward defeats Margaret at Tewkesbury (1471) where Henry's son, Edward, prince of Wales, is killed. Shortly thereafter, Richard (III) murders Henry in the Tower. The principal sources for the trilogy about Henry VI were Holinshed's Chronicles (1577) and Edward Hall's Union of The Noble and Illustrious Families of Lancaster and York (1547).

Henry VIII, The Famous History of the Life of King (1613). A historical play by William Shakespeare, John Fletcher (see Beaumont and Fletcher) may have written parts of the play.
The drama begins with the return of Henry VIII from the Field of the Cloth of Gold. Edward Stafford, duke of Buckingham, is about to warn the king of the growing power of Cardinal Wolsey when he is falsely accused of treason and executed. Meanwhile, Henry who has met Anne Bollen becomes concerned with the legal aspects of his marriage to Katharine of Aragon. Through Wolsey, he negotiates with the pope for a divorce. But when Wolsey discovers that the king plans to marry Anne, he tries to stop the divorce, is found out, and, while under arrest for treason, dies. Henry's marriage is annulled by Thomas Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury, and the king marries Anne. Katharine dies, commanding her daughter, Mary, to Henry's protection. The nobles, jealous of Cranmer's growing influence, try to discredit him but Henry protects the archbishop and makes him godfather of the infant Elizabeth. The principal source of the play is Holinshed's Chronicles (1577); the portions dealing with Cranmer are derived from Foxe's Book of Martyrs (1563).

Henry, Frederic. A principal character in Ernest Hemingway's novel A Farewell to Arms. An American lieutenant in the Italian ambulance service during World War I, he falls in love with an English nurse, Catherine Barkley. He deserts to be with her, but she dies in childbirth.

Henry, John. A legendary Negro hero of American ballads and folk tales. Born supposedly in the "Black River country," he was employed in the building of railroads or as a roustabout on river steamboats. John Henry is a man of prodigious strength; in one well-known tale he dies from overexertion, after winning a contest against a steam drill. The tales are apparently based on the exploits of a giant Negro who worked on the Chesapeake & Ohio Big Bend Tunnel in the early 1870's. In 1931, Guy B. Johnson made a collection of varying ballads in John Henry: Tracking Down a Negro Legend. In the same year Roark Bradford based a novel, John Henry, on several tales. Bradford's novel was later dramatized with music by Jacques Wolfe (1931).

the lives of modest people and his mastery of the surprise ending, which came to be known as the "O. Henry ending" and has been widely imitated in commercial fiction. Born in North Carolina, he later went to Texas, where he became the editor and publisher of a humorous magazine The Rolling Stone. Charged with embezzling funds from a bank, he fled to Central America, subsequently the scene of Cabbage and Kings. He later returned and, although there has been much debate over his actual guilt in the matter, served over three years in the federal penitentiary at Columbus, Ohio. While in prison, he published the first of his stories signed O. Henry—Whistling Dick's Christmas Stocking (1899)—in McClure's Magazine. The pen name is presumed to be the abbreviation for the name of a French pharmacist, Etienne-Ossian Henry, found in the U.S. Dispensatory, a reference work Porter used when he worked as prison pharmacist.

In prison O. Henry heard many stories that were the germs of his later narratives, among them the tale of Jimmy Connors, the thief who became the hero of A Retrieved Reformation. But his work is most identified with New York City, where he subsequently lived and to which he gave the name "Bagdad-on-the-Subway." In his own lifetime numerous collections of O. Henry's stories were published, including The Four Million, and others appeared after his death. Works of O. Henry (2 vols., 1953) includes all of his stories and some of his poems. In 1918, the O. Henry Memorial Awards were established. These are given to the best stories published each year in American magazines, the prize stories and the leading contenders then being published together in an annual collection. See Gift of the Mag, The; Last Leaf, The.

Henry, Patrick (1736–1799). American statesman and orator. As a member of the Virginia House of Burgesses, he offered a series of resolutions against the Stamp Act (1765). He later served in the Continental Congress and as governor of Virginia. Famous passages from his speeches include:

Caesar had his Brutus; Charles the First, his Cromwell; and George the Third—may profit by their example. If this be treason, make the most of it. (Virginia House of Burgesses, 1765)

Is life so dear, or peace so sweet, as to be purchased at the price of chains and slavery? Forbid it, Almighty God! I know not what course others may take; but as for me, give me liberty, or give me death! (Virginia Convention, 1775)

Henry Esmond, Esquire, The History of (1852). A historical novel by William Makepeace Thackeray. It is written in the first person, supposedly by Henry Esmond. He is brought up by Francis Esmond, heir to the Castlewood estate with Francis' own children, Beatrice and Frank, and grows up in the belief that he is the illegitimate son of Thomas Esmond, the deceased viscount of Castlewood. On his deathbed, Francis confesses to Henry that he is the lawful heir, but Henry keeps the information secret. He and Frank Esmond are ardent supporters of James Edward, the (Old) Pretender, who falls in love with Beatrice and ruins his chances for the throne. When Beatrice joins the prince abroad, Henry, who has been in love with her, renounces the Pretender; he marries her mother, Rachel, Lady Castlewood, instead and takes her to America. The story of their descendants is related in Thackeray's The Virginians.

Henryson, Robert (1430–1506). Scottish poet, one of the group of Scottish Chaucerians. His works include Tale of Orpheus (printed 1508); Testament of Cressid (printed 1593), a treatment of the Troilus legend, attributed to Chaucer until the 18th century; and Moral Fables of Aesop the Phrygian (printed 1621).

Henry the Minstrel, also known as Blind Harry (fl. 1470–1492). Scottish bard. His epic poem Wallace (c. 1482) celebrates the Scottish hero Sir William Wallace. The poem, which was widely popular, shows the influence of Chaucer.

Henry the Navigator (1394–1460), Portuguese prince. The younger son of John I, he planned and directed a campaign of exploration and discovery that subsequently led to Portugal's extensive conquests in the Orient and the New World. From his residence at Sagres, which became the foremost center of navigation in Europe, he dispatched several vessels each year into the uncharted seas to the south and west, meeting only failure until 1434 when Cape Bojador was rounded. On later voyages Madeira and the Azores were discovered.

Henschke, Alfred. See KLABUND.

Hephaestos (Hephaistos). In Greek mythology, the god of fire and metal-working. Later he was identified with the Roman Vulcan. Hephaestos was either the son of Zeus and Hera, or produced by Hera alone. Homer related that Hera threw her lame son out of heaven, ashamed of his deformity. In revenge, Hephaestos wrought a golden throne from which Hera could not arise. In another story, Hephaestos took the part of Hera against Zeus, who then hurled him from heaven. He fell for nine days and was finally picked up, lamed for life, on the island of Lemnos.

Married to the unfaithful Aphonite, he became known as the special patron of cuckolds. Hephaestus (or Prometheus) delivered Athene from the head of Zeus with the stroke of an ax.

Heptameron (1559). An unfinished collection of 72 tales by Margaret of Navarre. Modeled on the Decameron (1353) of Boccaccio, the work is otherwise original. All but one of the tales were probably based on her own experiences. Though weak in literary style, the work is distinguished for its psychological perception and its didactic quality.

Heptameter. In prosody, a line of verse containing seven metrical feet in any meter. It is usually identified together with the name of the meter: for example, iambic heptameter.

Hera. A Greek goddess, daughter of Cronos and Rhea, and both sister and wife of Zeus. She appears most often in myth as a jealous wife who persecutes her husband's many mistresses (Semele, Io, Leto, and others) or their children (Dionysus, Heracles). Her worship, however, antedated that of Zeus in Greece, where she had important shrines at Argos and elsewhere. The Heraean Games for women were celebrated at Olympia long before the famous Olympic Games for men. She was the patroness of the Argonauts.

Heracles (Herkles) (Lat. Hercules). A mythical Greek hero of fabulous strength. Heracles was the son of Zeus and Alcmena, who had caught Zeus' notice when her husband Amphitryon was away from Thebæ. Amphitryon, however, returned the same night that Zeus had visited her, and in good time she gave birth to twins, Heracles and Iphicles, who was merely the son of Amphitryon. Hera, who had done everything possible to prevent the birth, did not give up. She sent two snakes to attack the twins, but Heracles strangled them in his crib. Hera cares married the Theban king's daughter Megara, but, driven mad by Hera, he killed Megara and all their children. When he returned to his senses, he went into exile and bound himself to serve his cousin Eurystheus, the king of Mycenæ, for 12 years. At the end of this time he would become immortal. Although he traveled far and wide for many of the famous Labors, Heracles' own home seems to have been at Tiryns. His Labors were as follows:

1. Killing the Nemean lion. This frightful beast, sent by Hera to ravage the Nemean plain and to annoy Heracles, he killed by clubbing and strangling it, although it was supposedly invulnerable. Henceforward he wore its skin.

2. Killing the Hydra. This tremendous snake, one of the many delightful monsters spawned by Echidna, inhabited the Lernaean swamps. As soon as one of its numerous heads was lopped off, others grew in its place. Heracles persuaded his friend Iolaus to burn the stumps before the heads could grow and thus they disposed of the beast, as well as a crab sent by Hera to help it out. This crab became the constellation of Cancer.

3. Capturing the Erinanthian boar. Heracles brought this redoubtable beast back to Eurystheus and nearly scared him out of his wits.

4. Capturing the Hind of Artemis. Heracles succeeded in capturing this sacred animal after a year's search and Artemis permitted him to carry it off to Argos if he promised to let it go, which he did.

5. Killing the man-eating Stymphalian birds. Heracles chased them from their hiding in the woods by banging a bronze rattle, then shot them down one by one.

6. Cleansing the Augean stables. These stables, belonging to King Augeas of Aelus, had never been cleaned. Heracles accomplished the task in a day by redirecting a river through them.

7. Capturing the Cretan Bull. This bull, which may have been the father of the Minotaur, was taken alive and shown to Eurystheus, like the Hind, then released.

8. Capturing the horses of Diomedes, son of Cyrene and Ares. These horses were fed on human flesh by their owner, the king of the Bistonians. They suddenly became tame when Heracles fed their master to them. He then took them back to Eurystheus and dedicated them to Hera.

9. Capturing the girdle of Hippolyta. Either alone or with an army, Heracles defeated the Amazons and either killed Hippolyta or secured the girdle by holding one of her generals, Medhipe, for ransom.

10. Killing the monster Geryon. Heracles threatened Helios with his bow until the god gave him his golden cup, in which Heracles sailed the river Oceanus to the far west. There, after disposing of the herdsmen Eurytion and the ferocious dog Orthrus, he killed Geryon himself, stole his cattle, and returned with them, either in the cup or by a long and arduous route through Spain, France, and Italy.

11. Capturing Cerberus. Heracles made his way down to Hades, dragged up Cerberus, the three-headed dog that watches the gates, showed him to Eurystheus, and duly returned him to his proper place. According to one story Heracles actually fought with and wounded Hades himself.

12. Stealing the apples of the Hesperides. These apples grow on a tree guarded by a terrible dragon and belonging to the Hesperides, daughters of Night, who lived near the Atlas Mountains. There are various tales as to how Heracles plucked the apples: He either killed the snake or put it to sleep and took the apples himself, or he sent Atlas for them, holding the sky on his shoulders meanwhile.

Heracles had innumerable other adventures, either separately or incidentally to his main labors. He eventually died after donning the poisoned shirt dipped in the blood of the centaur Nessus, which his wife Deianira had given him. He built himself a funeral pyre on Mount Oeta and persuaded Poes with the gift of his bow and arrows to set it afire. After this he ascended to Olympus and married Hebe.

The last three labors of Heracles seem to indicate that he achieved immortality by his feats. A very considerable number of his adventures were added to his saga to explain the many places in which his cult flourished. Some authorities believe that the root of the Heracles saga is the adventures of an actual Mycenaean king of Tiryns who performed mighty feats at the bidding of his overlord, the high king of Mycenae. His feats were a favorite subject of art among the Greeks and in the Renaissance.

Heracles appears in two tragedies by Sophocles, The Trachinian Women (Trachinias) and Philoctetes, in two by Euripides, Alcestis and The Madness of Heracles (Herakleis Mainomenos); and in Seneca's Hercules Furens. Euripides' The Children of Heracles (Herakleidai) tells of the final defeat of Eurystheus, who had continued to persecute Heracles' family after his death.

Heracleitus (Herakleitos; fl. 500 B.C.). A Greek philosopher, belonging to one of the ruling families of Ephesus. Over a hundred fragments of his work have survived. The style is oracular, striving to indicate a truth rather than explicate it. Referred to as the dark philosopher, Heracleitus' best-known statement is "all things change." He considered the basic stuff of the universe to be fire.

Héraclius (1647). A tragedy by Pierre Corneille. It is derived from the annals of Barontus. Héraclius, son of the murdered emperor of the East, has been raised by a loyal nurse as the son of the usurper Phocas; this masquerade, which has saved Héraclius' life, has been accomplished at the sacrifice of the nurse's own son. For political reasons, Phocas wishes Pulchérie, daughter of the former emperor, to marry Héraclius, supposedly his own son, who in reality are brother and sister. When Phocas learns the truth he almost kills Héraclius, but a conspiracy ends his life, and Héraclius becomes emperor. The play is further complicated by additional characters, disguises, and misunderstandings.

Herbert, A. P.

Herbert, Sir A[lan] P[atrick] (1890— ). English humorist, poet, and member of Parliament. He is known for his work in securing a modification of the English divorce laws; divorce is the subject of his novel Holy Deadlock (1954). He also campaigned for the improvement of English canals and waterways, which provide the setting for his novel The Water Gipsies (1930). His volumes of witty and humorous essays include Light Articles Only (1921), and his collections of light verse include Less Nonsense (1944).

Herbert, Edward, 1st Baron Herbert of Cherbury (1539–1648). English soldier, diplomat, and philosopher, brother of George Herbert. His attempts, in such works as De Vertetate (1624) and De Religione Gentilium (1663), to discover a rational and universally self-evident basis for religion make him the first of the English deists. He also wrote an interesting Autobiography, which was discovered and published by Horace Walpole in 1764, and poetry in the metaphysical vein.

Herbert, George (1593–1633). English poet of the Metaphysical School. Herbert, who was a brother of Lord Herbert of Cherbury, came from a Welsh family famous for its soldiers and statesmen. For a long time he aspired to a government career, but a growing sense of religious vocation and the death of James I and other patrons led him to become an Anglican priest. In 1630 he was given the rural living of Bemerton, where he died a few years later, esteemed almost as a saint.

All of Herbert’s poetry is religious, even that written during his period of secular ambition. In fact, a major theme of his work, revealed in poems like The Collar and Affliction (I), is the conflict between his calling and his ambition, his pride in his descent and his attainments. Other poems, such as The Sacrifice, deal with every facet of religious life: the vicissitudes of a believer’s hopes and fears; the nature of God, with emphasis on His love and suffering for man; the festivals, institutions, and doctrines of the Church. Herbert often expresses deep religious anxiety, but his characteristic mood is one of sweetness and equilibrium, a trusting, intimate friendliness with God. Technically, his work is marked by simple diction, striking colloquial rhythms, and the use of symbols and images from ecclesiastical ritual, farming, the trades, science, and everyday household pursuits. He is also known for his extraordinary metrical inventiveness and his occasional “pattern poems”: poems whose lines are arranged to form a given shape like an altar or wings or a cross, such as the well-known Easter Wings.

Herbert wrote one volume of poems, The Temple; a treatise on the life and duties of a country parson, A Priest to the Temple (1652); and several collections of proverbs. His work was highly popular in its day, but attacked in the later 17th century as over-elaborate in conceit and perversely ingenious. He had some influence in the 19th century, but it was not until the 20th century, with the general revival of interest in metaphysical poetry, that his work was once more appreciated.

Herbert, Victor (1859–1924). Irish-American conductor and composer. He was the conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony, 1898–1904. He wrote some 30 operettas, including Babes in Toyland (1903); Mlle. Modiste (1905); The Red Mill (1906); Naughty Marietta (1910). He also wrote a cello concerto, other orchestral music, and two grand operas.

Herbst, Josephine [Frey] (1897— ). American novelist. Associated with the so-called proletarian novelists, she was born in Iowa and early became an advocate of radical political and social change. Three of her novels—Fifty Is Not Enough (1933), The Executioner (1934), and Rope of Gold (1939)—were designed as a trilogy to portray the decay of capitalist society. Her more recent books include Somewhere the Tempest Fell (1947), New Green World (1954), and The Watcher with the Horn (1955).

Herder, Johann Gottfried (1744–1803). German philosopher, historian, and critic. He is known as the most prominent representative of 18th-century irrationalism. His interest in the folk spirit (see Volkskund) was not confined to Germany, and his collection of Volkslieder (Folk Songs, 1778–1779), which was prompted by Percy’s Reliques of Ancient English Poetry, included Nordic, English, and Romance songs, as well as German. His ideas about the value of intuition in both creation and criticism were taken up and developed by Goethe, with whom he was closely associated, and by German romanticism. His other works include Von deutscher Art und Kunst (On German Character and Art, 1773), Auch eine Philosophie der Geschichte zur Bildung der Menschheit (Another Philosophy of History for the Education of Mankind, 1774), and Briefe zur Beförderung der Humanität (Letters for the Furtherance of Humanity, 1793–1797). See Hamann; Sturm und Drang.

Hérédia, José María de (1803–1839). Cuban poet. Exiled at 20 for revolutionary activity against the Spanish regime in Cuba, Hérédia imbued his poetry with the disillusion and frustration that was the lot of many Cuban intellectuals of his generation. After spending two unhappy years in the U.S., he settled in Mexico, where, except for a brief trip to Cuba in 1836, he remained for the rest of his life. Although Hérédia’s poetry is classical in form, he has been called the first romantic poet of Hispanic America because of the subjectivity and intensity that characterize his verse. The two poems generally considered his best are En el teocalli de Cholula (1820), in which Hérédia reflects on the impermanence of all earthly endeavor, and Niagara (1824), in which the poet describes the scene in a style as torrential as the falls itself, and then laments his solitude, so far from home.

Hérédia, José María de (1842–1905). Cuban-born French poet. A pupil of Leconte de Lisle, Hérédia was one of the first Parnassians. His finest poetry is contained in the 118 sonnets of Les Trophées (1893), which are remarkable for the richness of their imagery, the sonorosity and cadence of their language, and the evocative character of their historical impressions.

Hereward the Wake (1865). A historical novel by Charles Kingsley. The titular hero is a reckless young Saxon who for a time successfully opposes the Norman conquest. He plunders and burns the abbey of Peterborough, establishes his camp in the Isle of Ely where he is joined by Earl Morcar, is blockaded for three months by William I, but makes his escape with some of his followers.

Hergesheimer, Joseph (1880–1954). American novelist and short-story writer. A skillful popular writer, Hergesheimer won considerable acclaim with his novels The Three Black Pennys (1917), JAVA HEAD, and BILSBAND. He is also known as the author of Tol'able David, a short story about a Virginia mountain boy who triumphs over great odds, which was first published in his collection of short stories, The Happy End (1919). His other works include the novels Linda Condon (1919), Cytherea (1922), The Bright Shawl (1922), and The Party Dress (1930).

Hermann. See Arminius.

Hermann und Dorothea (1797). An idyllic epic in hexameters by Johann Wolfgang von Goethe, set during the French invasions of Germany that followed the French Revolution. Goethe explicitly avoids the heroic and concentrates on the bourgeois honesty and simplicity of the love between his two main characters, which he sees as a balance to the unrest of the times.

hermaphrodite. A plant or animal containing both male and female organs of reproduction. The word is derived from the Greek myth of Hermaphroditus, son of Hermes and Aphrodite as told in Ovid's Metamorphoses. The nymph Salmacis became enamored of him, and prayed that she might be so closely united that "the twain might become one flesh." Her prayer was answered, and the nymph and boy became one body.

Hermes. Divine herald of Greek mythology. This ancient Arcadian deity was also a god of flocks, of roads, of trading, and of thieves, the inventor of the lyre, and the guide of souls on the way to Hades. The son of Zeus and Maia, he grew miraculously in both size and cunning, on the first day inventing the lyre and stealing Apollo's flocks. He was widely worshiped in the form of the herm, a phallic pillar. The amusing story of his exploits on the day of his birth was told in the fourth Homeric hymn and in Sophocles' satyr play, Ichnieutai. The Romans identified him with Mercury (Mercurius), their god of tradesmen.

Hermes Trismegistus (Gr., the thrice-great Hermes). A name applied by the Neoplatonists to the Egyptian god Thoth. He was almost identical to the Greek god Hermes.

The name was also applied, from about the third century, to the supposed author of a body of alchemical, occult, and mystical writings. Until the 17th century he was thought to have been a contemporary of Moses, and his writings were considered Christian and almost as sacred as the Bible. Actually the Hermetic books were composed by a group of teachers who lived in Alexandria in the first two centuries B.C. or A.D.; they were a composite of Egyptian magical writings, Jewish mysticism, and Platonism. The 20th century is seeing a revival of interest in the Hermetic writings, notably in the work of the French symbolists and the occult system of William Butler Yeats.

heuvetism. A name applied to a 20th-century school of Italian poets. It was first used by the noted Italian critic Francesco Flora to characterize the difficult, "occult-meaning" verse of a group of Italian poets headed by Salvatore Quasimodo, Giuseppe Ungaretti, and Eugenio Montale.

The verse of these poets originated in the French symbolist school of "pure poetry" as practiced by Mallarmé and Valéry. Decadent poetry entered Italy through the CREPUSCOLARI poets, and it is from them that "the hermetics" have evolved.

Typical of hermetic poetry is a deliberate rarefaction of poetic language; this is the result of the poet's attempt to verbalize a personal impression that seems to transcend common experience in a language that conveys it with the maximum fidelity and immediacy. The hermetics reject rhetoric and the stylistic mechanics of formal traditional poetry. They adopt instead a vocabulary that is extremely personal, idiosyncratic, and, to the uninitiated, abstruse and often meaningless.

Hermetic writings. See Hermes Trismegistus.

Hermia. In Shakespeare's A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM, the daughter of Egeus of Athens, who escapes to the woods with Lysander rather than marry her father's choice, Demetrius.

Hermione. (1) In Greek legend, the only daughter of Menelaus and Helen. She became the wife of Neoptolemus, son of Achilles, but Orestes assassinated him and married Hermione, who had already been betrothed to him. She appears in Euripides' ANDROMACHE as the cruel persecutor of the heroine.

(2) The virtuous and uncompelling wife of Leontes, king of Sicilia, in Shakespeare's WINTER'S TALE.

Hermit, The (1765). A ballad by Oliver Goldsmith. The hero and heroine are Edwin and Angelina. Angelina is the daughter of a wealthy lord "beside the Tyne"; her hand is sought in marriage by many suitors, among whom is Edwin, "who had neither wealth nor power, but he had both wisdom and worth." Angelina loves him, but "trifles with him"; and Edwin, in despair, leaves her and retires from the world. One day, Angelina, in boy's clothes, seeks refuge at a hermit's cell; it is not long before she discovers that the hermit is Edwin, and from that hour they never part again. Goldsmith has been accused of borrowing his story from the ballad The Friar of Orders Gray.

Hermod or Hermodr. In Scandinavian mythology, the son of Odin and messenger of the gods. It was he who journeyed unsuccessfully to Hel to bring back Balder, killed by his blind brother Foder. With Bragi, Hermod received and welcomed to Valhalla all heroes who fell in battle.

Hernández, José. See Martín Fierro.

Herndon, William Henry (1818–1892). American lawyer. The son of an Illinois tavern keeper, Herndon studied law with Abraham Lincoln and became his law partner in 1844. Idealistic and well read, he is said to have influenced Lincoln's views on slavery. In the biography he wrote with Jesse Weik, Herndon's Lincoln: The True Story of a Great Life (1889), Herndon stated that Ann Rutledge had been the only woman Lincoln had ever loved; Mrs. Lincoln retaliated by labeling Herndon a drunkard and a ne'er-do-well. Regardless of the accuracy of these particular charges, the work contributed much valuable information about Lincoln's early life.
Herne, James A. Original name James Ahearn (1839-1901). American actor and dramatist. A capable actor whose daughters Julie and Crystal also attained prominence on the stage, Herne developed as a writer into an impressive realist. His best-known works include Hearts of Oak, written with David Belasco (1879), an adaptation of an English melodrama that was later revised as Sag Harbor (1899); Margaret Fleming (1890), a frank treatment of adultery that shocked contemporary audiences; Shore Acres (1892), a realistic study of Maine life; and The Reverend Griffith Davenport (1899), about a Southern Methodist circuit rider during the Civil War. Herne's Egg, The (1898). A poetic drama by William Butler Yeats. Full of the symbolism and philosophy of Yeats's own occult system, it is the story of two warring Irish kings, their theft of the eggs of the sacred Great Herne and raping of the priestess of the Great Herne, and their death under a curse.

Hero. In Shakespeare's Much Ado About Nothing, the greatly maligned daughter of Leonato, governor of Messina. She is of a quiet, serious disposition, and thus forms a contrast to the gay and witty Beatrice, her cousin.

Hero and Leander. Hero and heroine of a romantic Greek legend. Leander, who lived in Abydos, swam across the Hellespont every night to court Hero in Sestos. When he was drowned in a storm, she flung herself into the sea. They are well known from Marlowe's Hero and Leander (pub. 1598) and Byron's The Bride of Abydos (1813).

Herod Antipas. Son of Herod the Great, tetrarch of Galilee and Perea (4 B.C.-A.D. 39). He married his niece Herodias, who had been the wife of his half brother Herod Philip. This incestuous marriage was loudly denounced by John the Baptist and brought about John's beheading at the request of Herodias' daughter Salome. It was before this Herod that Pontius Pilate sent Christ; Herod "set him at nought, and mocked him, and arrayed him in a gorgeous robe, and sent him again to Pilate" (Luke 23:7-15). Herod ultimately was banished to Gaul in A.D. 39; Herodias voluntarily accompanied him.

Hérodiade (1869). A dramatic poem by Stéphane Mallarmé. The heroine soliloquizes upon the isolation of her existence. As is Le Cygne she is a symbol of the chill sterility that characterizes the aesthetic life.

Herodias. See Salome.

Herodotus (Herodotus; c. 480-c. 425 B.C.). A Greek historian, often called the Father of History. He was born at Halicarnassus, in Asia Minor, and traveled widely, living first at Samos and later at Athens. Herodotus was the first to carry on research into the events of the past and to treat them in a rational rather than a mythical manner. Although he lacked the political sense of Thucydides, his relation of incidents and anecdotes is extremely readable. His history of the Persian invasion of Greece until 479 B.C. is divided into nine books, named after the nine Muses. He is criticized for credulity, but admired for the charm of his narrative. The relation of the battles of Thermopylae, Salamis, and Platea in Books VII, VIII, and IX is vivid, and his object, to perpetuate the memory of "great and wonderful deeds," is fully realized.

Herod the Great (73 B.C.-4 B.C.). King of Judea under the Roman regime (39-4 B.C.). The birth of Jesus Christ took place in the last year of his reign (an error in chronology first assigned it to A.D. 1), and it was he who ordered the Massacre of the Innocents.

Herod had his wife Mariamne (and later their two sons) put to death because he suspected her of adultery, a suspicion which was without foundation. The story of Herod and Mariamne has been the subject of several tragedies including Voltaire's Mariamne (1724) and Friedrich Hebbel's Herodes und Mariamne (1850). The expression "to out-herod Herod" means to surpass the worst of tyrants in violence and wickedness and refers to Herod the Great's tyrannical nature. He was the father of Herod Antipas.

heroic couplet. In English prosody, a rhymed couplet written in iambic pentameters, the English heroic (or epic) line. The neoclassical rules of the 17th and 18th centuries in England required that the heroic couplet express a complete thought and allowed no enjambment between the lines; it was a "closed" couplet. These requirements, however, were a phenomenon of that period, and both before it, as in Chaucer's and Shakespeare's work, and after, from the romantics on, the construction of sentences has been allowed to carry over from line to line and couplet to couplet; such couplets are called "open" or "run-on" couplets.

Hero of Our Time, A (Geroi nashego vremeni; 1840). A novel by Mikhail Lermontov. It portrays a young aristocrat during the reign of Czar Nicholas I in the 1830's. The hero, Grigori Aleksandrovich Peschkin, faces the dilemma of all the young men of his time: to serve the state or to remain inactive. All other outlets for the talents and energies of the Russian aristocracy were closed. The willful and morbid Pechorin reacts to this situation by assuming the pose of a world-weary Byronic wanderer. His sinister air, however, is no pose. His aimless willfulness is a real threat to all who come near him. Serving as an army officer in the Caucasus, he has a love affair with a native girl which indirectly leads to her death, briefly becomes involved with a band of smugglers which almost leads to his death, and kills another young officer in a duel. Exciting as the adventures are, the most notable thing about the novel is the revelation and analysis of Pechorin's personality as rendered by his old army companion Maksim Maksimych, by a fictional narrator who makes Pechorin, and by the hero himself in his journal, which make up the last three sections of the book. The portrayal is one of the best studies of the character of the superfluous man in 19th-century Russian literature. Lermontov's novel is ranked beside the works of the later great Russian novelists, whose narrative techniques and acute psychological analysis he anticipated.

Herrera, Fernando de (1534–1597). Spanish poet. Herrera spent his uneventful life in his native Seville, disturbed only by his platonic passion for Doña Leonor, countess of Gelves, to whom he addressed elegant Petrarchan sonnets. Known to his admiring contemporaries as el Divino, he sought to enrich and elevate Spanish lyric verse by the use of lofier themes and by verbal innovations. He unfolded his esthetic doctrines in his controversial Anotaciones a las obras de Garcilaso de la Vega (1580). His finest poems were inspired by patriotic sentiment. Among these are the song celebrating the Christian victory over the Turks at Lepanto; the ode to Don Juan of Austria, on the occasion of a Moorish revolt in the Alpujarras (1571); and the elegy on the death of King Sebastian of Portugal, killed at Alcázar Kebir in 1578. His other extant works include an account of the Cyprus war and the victory at Lepanto (1572) and an elegy on the life and death of Thomas More (1529).

Herrera y Reissig, Julio (1875–1910). Uruguayan poet. A representative of the “baroque” or extravagant wing of modernism, Herrera y Reissig was the leader of a Bohemian literary group that met in the attic of his father’s home in Montevideo. His poetry, designed to appeal to the few, is characterized by experimentation in vocabulary and by unusual imagery, though his themes were often drawn from everyday life. His poems, which were not collected until after his death, include Desolación absurda and Julio.

Herrick, Robert (1591–1674). English poet, known for his pastoral and love lyrics. Herrick, though a clergyman, was a lover of London’s society of poets and wits and, at first, regarded his appointment to a rural Devonshire living as bitter exile. However, his interest in country life produced contentment and much of his best poetry. A Royalist, Herrick lost his parish during the English Civil War. He lived happily in London until the Restoration when he regained his old living and there spent the rest of his days.

Herrick was a cavalier poet, one of the sons of Ben, or poets who followed the tradition of Ben Jonson. Like his master, he was strongly influenced by the Latin poets, but his classicism is devoid of pedantry, rooted in a natural spiritual affinity to the Latin lyricists. At its best, Herrick’s poetry has an unaffected simplicity, a gracefulfulness compatible with robustness and humor, vivid pictorial fancy, and unfailing command of form and feeling. Many of his short poems make ideal song lyrics: his famous To the Virgin, To Make Much or Time became one of the most popular songs of the 17th century. Herrick writes of rustic rites and superstitions, flowers, fairies, country content, wine, the making of verse, and a number of imaginary mistresses and their clothing, as in Delight in Disorder. He also wrote some excellent religious verse in the Noble Numbers section of his collection Hesperides.

Herrick is essentially a happy poet. While such poems as To the Virgin, Corinna’s Going A-Maying, and To Daffodils deal with the inevitability of age and death, the theme is treated with a gentle Epicurean melancholy which invites one to enjoy life’s fleeting beauty. His love poems do not suggest passion’s tragic possibilities, and his religious verse does not repudiate his secular poems in any absolute way. Poems dealing with aspects of religious anxiety, such as To His Angry God, are honest and touching, but not cries from the depths. More characteristically, he expresses gratitude or simple piety.

Herrick published only one volume of verse, Hesperides, which—in spite of the popularity of some of his songs—was quickly forgotten. Only near the end of the 18th century was his work rediscovered and appreciated.

Herrick, Robert (1868–1938). American teacher and novelist. While teaching at the University of Chicago, Herrick sought to describe and analyze the problems of modern industrial society, especially the corruption of the middle-class soul by commercialism. He himself drew a distinction between those of his novels that were realistic and a limited group that were, as he said, idealistic, manifesting a kind of broadminded Puritanism. His most widely read book was The Master of the Inn (1908), the story of a physician who cures mental illness. The Common Lot (1904) depicts the fashion in which a young Chicago architect succumbs to commercialism. Other novels by Herrick include One Woman’s Life (1913), about a selfish socialist, and Chimes (1926), which gives an unfavorable picture of a large university, presumably the University of Chicago.

Herreries Chronicle, The. A series of novels by Hugh Walpole. Set chiefly in the English Lake District, Rogue Herreries (1930), Judith Paris (1931), The Fortress (1932), and Vanessa (1933) comprise the series. They form a romantic historical family saga, from the 18th century to the present day.

Herriot, Edouard (1872–1957). French statesman. Leader of the Radical Socialist party, Herriot served twice as premier in 1924–1925 and in 1932. He held numerous public offices: among them, Senator, Minister of State (1934–1935), President of the Chamber of Deputies (1925–1926; 1936–1940, under the Popular Front), and President of the National Assembly (1947).

Herrnhuter. See Moravian Brethren.

Herschel, Sir William. Originally Friedrich Wilhelm Herschel (1738–1822). English astronomer who discovered a new planet (1781) which he called Georgium Sidus in honor of King George III. It is now known as Uranus. He also discovered moons of Saturn and Uranus and was a pioneer in sidereal science. His studies were continued by his son Sir John Frederick William Herschel (1792–1871).

Hersey, John [Richard] (1914– ). American novelist and journalist. Hersey's early books of nonfiction, Men on Bataan (1942) and Into the Valley (1943), are direct reflections of his experiences as a war correspondent. His novel A Bell for Adano, which won a Pulitzer Prize, was based on Hersey's careful observation of the American occupation of Italy. In 1946, Hersey visited Hiroshima and wrote an objective and horrifying account of the impact of the atomic bomb blast on six survivors. Appearing in The New Yorker magazine in 1946, it was reprinted in book form as Hiroshima (1946). Man's inhumanity and courage are also the themes of Hersey's most ambitious novel, The Wall, the story of the extinction of the Warsaw ghetto by the Germans. Later novels include A Single Pebble (1956), The War Lover (1959), and The Child Buyer (1960). Here to Stay (1963) is a collection of biographical sketches illustrating human courage and tenacity.

Hertha. See NERTHUS.

Hertz, Heinrich Rudolf (1857–1904). German physicist, known for his experiments with electromagnetic waves. His identification of radio waves (sometimes called "herzian waves") led to the development of wireless telegraphy.

Hertzen or Herzen, Aleksandr Ivanovich (1812–1870). Russian journalist ad political thinker. The illegitimate son of a nobleman, Hertzen very early interested himself in social and political problems. At Moscow University he became the leader of a group of students also interested in politics. Such activity led in 1834 to his arrest and exile to the provinces. He was allowed to return to the capital in 1836, but was again exiled in 1840. Finally, in 1847, he obtained permission to emigrate from Russia and never returned. He witnessed the 1848 revolutions in western Europe with some disappointment and finally settled in London in 1852.

In 1857, Hertzen began to publish his famous revolutionary periodical, Kolokol (The Bell), which had a large readership in Russia even though it had to be smuggled into the country. Czar Alexander II himself was reputed to be a regular reader of the publication. In the journal Hertzen carried on a spirited criticism of the social order in Russia and a constant advocacy of the necessity for Russia to adopt Western socialism.

Hertzen's major works are S togo berega (From the Water Shore, 1850), a series of articles on socialism and revolution, and Byloe i Dunny (My Past and My Thoughts, 1852–1855), an autobiography that describes the intellectual atmosphere of the 1830s.

Hervey, John. Baron Hervey of Iokworth (1696–1743). English politician and lord privy seal (1740–1742). He is the author of Memoirs of the Court of George II. Hervey was attacked by Alexander Pope, because of his well-known effeminacy, as "Sporus" in the Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot: "that thing of silk, Sporus, that mere white curd of ass's milk."

Herwegh, Georg (1817–1875). German political poet. He is most famous for his Gedichte eines Le-characterized by a highly individualized style and a strikingly original view of man and culture which combines, among other things, ideas from psychoanalysis and Asian religion. His most famous novels are Demian, Die Geschichte einer Jugend (Demian, A Story of Youth, 1919), Steppenwolf, Die Morgenlandfahrt (Trip to the Orient, 1932) and Das Glasperlenspiel (literally, The Glass-Bead Game, 1943), translated as Magister Ludi. Hesse's style is lively and engaging, rich in human sympathy, imagination, and ironic humor. He was a Swiss citizen from 1921 to his death, and was awarded the Nobel Prize in 1946. His essays include Zarathustras Wiederkehr (1920) and Blick ins Chaos (In Sight of Chaos, 1920). His poetry was collected in Gesammelte Dichtungen (1952).

Hessian. One whose services in politics or war can be easily bought; so called from the German mercenaries, primarily from Hesse-Cassel and Hesse-Darmstadt, who fought for England in the American Revolution.

Hestia. A Greek goddess, later identified with Vesta, the Roman goddess of the hearth. Originally one of the twelve Olympians, she resided her place to Dionysus.

Hesychasts (Gr., hesychos, still, calm). A sect of mystics or quietists in the Eastern Church, who lived on Mount Athos in the 14th century. By contemplating their navel, they aimed to attain perfect serenity and supernatural insight, which would enable them to feel, diffused through them, the uncreated but communicable divine light that shone on Mount Tabor at the transfiguration of Christ.

Hetaera (hetaira). Literally, a female companion or comrade. In ancient Greece, a courtesan of the better class. Some hetaerae were freed women or even women of free birth. Laïs and Phryne are the most famous ones.

He Who Gets Slapped (To, kto poluchayet poshchichini, 1914). A drama by Leonid Andreyev. The play's central character is a disenchanted intellectual who seeks refuge as a clown in a circus. The clown, famed for the number of slaps he can endure, apparently symbolizes intellect being buffeted for the amusement of the coarse, uncomprehending mob.

Heawlett, Maurice (1861-1923). English historical novelist. His very popular books were The Forest Lovers, a romance set in the Middle Ages; Richard Yea-and-Nay (1900), about Richard Cour de Lion (King Richard I); and The Queen's Quair (1904), a romance founded on the life of Mary Queen of Scots (see Kings Quair).

Hexam, Lizzie. In Charles Dickens' Our Mutual Friend, heroine of the subplot. She is the daughter of a Thames waterman, and finally marries Eugene Wrayburn, whose life she has saved.

Hexameron. Six days taken as one continuous period; especially the six days of the Creation.

Hexameter. In prosody, a six-foot line. The word usually refers to the dactylic hexameter line which was the epic verse of classical poetry, whereas the French epic line of iambic hexameter is usually called the Alexandrine. The hexameters of the ancients have been imitated in English in Longfellow's Evangeline, Clough's Bothie, and Kingsley's Andromeda. The Authorized Version of the Bible furnishes a number of examples of "accidental" hexameters; the following are well known:

How art thou fallen from Heaven, O Lucifer son of the Morning.
Why do the heathen rage and the people imagine a vain thing?
God is gone up with a shout, the Lord with the sound of the trumpet.

Hexapla (Gr., "sixfold"). The collection of Old Testament texts collated by Origen. It contains in parallel columns the Hebrew text in Hebrew and in Greek characters, the Septuagint (with emendations), and the versions of Aquila, Theodotion, and Symmachus.

Hexateuch. The first 6 books of the Old Testament. It contains the Pentateuch plus Joshua, which relates the final settlement of the Jews in the Promised Land.

Heyer, Georgette (1902- ). English popular novelist, author of romantic swashbuckling historical novels and detective stories. The Grand Sophie (1950), The Reluctant Widow (1947), and Friday's Child (1946) are among her works.

Heym, Georg (1887-1912). German poet. Very influential in early expressionism, he himself was under the influence of Baudelaire, Rimbaud, and Stefan George. His works include Der Athener Ausfahrt (The Athenians' Sally, 1907), a tragedy, and Der ewige Tag (The Eternal Day, 1911), a collection of poems.

Heyse, Paul (1830-1914). German novelist, immensely popular in his time but not highly regarded today. His technical mastery of the novella form, however, is undisputed; the most effective among his numerous novellas is L'Arrabbiata (The Angry Girl, 1855), a love story set in Italy. He also outlined a theory of the novella in the preface to the collection Deutscher Novellenschatz (Treasury of German Novellas, 1871 ff.), which he edited. Among his novels, Kinder der Welt (Children of the World, 1873) is respected; but his plays and lyric poetry are of little value. He received the Nobel Prize in 1910.

Heyward, DuBose (1885-1940). American novelist, poet, and dramatist. He is best known for Porgy, his first novel, which became a successful play and served as the basis for George Gershwin's opera Porgy and Bess. Mamba's Daughter (1929) was another novel of Charleston Negro life, and it was also successfully dramatized (1939). Heyward's other novels include Peter Ashley (1932), a story set in the Civil War, and Star-Spangled Virgin (1939), about the Virgin Islands and the New Deal. Heyward began his career as a poet, publishing Carolina Chansons (1922) with Hervey Allen. He later published two more volumes of verse.

Heywood, John (1497? -1580). English poet, a friend of Sir Thomas More, and a court musician and entertainer under Henry VIII, Edward VI, and Queen Mary. He made popular the court interludes that later became an important part of entertainment for royalty and the nobility in Elizabethan and Jacobean times. The Foure F's is his most famous work of this type. He also wrote epigrams and proverbs included in his Works (1562) and a satirical

His other plays include A Maidenhead Well Lost (c. 1633), A Challenge for Beauty (c. 1635), King Edward IV (c. 1599), The Royal King and the Royal Subject (c. 1602), The English Traveller (c. 1624), and a series of dramatizations of classical myths: The Golden Age (c. 1610), The Silver Age (c. 1610), The Brazen Age (c. 1610), and The Iron Age: Parts I and II (1610).

Hezekiah. In the Old Testament, a king of Judah for 29 years. He was noted for his efforts to abolish idolatry, which had flourished under his father Ahaz, and to restore the worship of Jehovah. The famous destruction of the Assyrian army under Sennacherib occurred during his reign (II Kings 18).

Hiawatha (1855). A long narrative poem by Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. Hiawatha, an Ojibway Indian, is reared by his grandmother, Nokomis, daughter of the Moon. After detailing the hero's accumulation of wisdom, the poet recounts the deeds of Hiawatha in revenging his mother, Wenonah, against his father, the West Wind. Hiawatha eventually becomes the leader of his people, teaching peace with the white man. When his wife, Minnehaha, becomes ill, he goes with her to the land of the Northwest Wind. The poem has been endlessly parodied. See Henry Rowe Schoolcraft.

Hichens, Robert Smythe (1864–1950). English novelist. The Green Carnation (1894) is a novel satirizing Oscar Wilde. Among his popular successes were The Garden of Allah (1904) and Bella Donna (1909), both set in North Africa.

Hickok, Wild Bill [James Butler] (1837–1876). American soldier, scout, and U.S. Marshal. Hickok fought in many Civil War, frontier, and Indian battles. As marshal at Hays City and later in Abilene, Kan., he faced some of the toughest men on the frontier, killing only in self-defense or in the line of duty. In 1872, he toured the east with Buffalo Bill (William Cody). Four years later, he was murdered by the notorious Jack McCall, and was buried in Deadwood, S.D. He became a legend during his lifetime, and after his death, a folk hero. Hickok's friend, the poet scout Captain Jack Crawford, dedicated a ballad to him, called The Burial of Wild Bill. See PONY EXPRESS.

Hicks, Edward (1780–1849). American folk artist. A coach and sign painter, he was also a Quaker minister in Newton, Pa. He painted landscapes and allegorical scenes, notably The Peaceable Kingdom in which the lion and the calf, the wolf, the tiger, and the lamb rest together in toylie simplicity. The background opens up to reveal a historical antecedent of this hoped-for peace—William Penn signing his peace treaty with the Indians.

Hicks, Granville (1901– ). American author and literary critic. He was known during the 1930's for his Marxist interpretations of literature; works from this period are The Great Tradition (1933), John Reed (1936), I Like America (1938), and Figures of Transition (1939). In 1939, after the non-aggression pact between the U.S.S.R. and Nazi Germany, Hicks resigned from the Communist Party. He edited The Letters of Lincoln Steffens (with Ella Winter, 1938) and Proletarian Literature in the U.S. (1935). His three novels are Only One Storm (1942), Behold Trouble (1944), and There Was a Man in Our Town (1952). Hicks conducts a column of fiction criticism in the Saturday Review.

Hidalgo y Costilla, Miguel (1793–1811). Mexican priest and revolutionary leader. Banished to the village of Dolores for his unorthodox views and irregular of personal life, Hidalgo became the representative of the lower classes in Mexico's struggle for independence from Spain. On Sept. 16, 1810, in the parish church, he uttered the grito de dolores—"Long live Our Lady of Guadalupe, death to bad government, death to the Spaniards!"—which became the battle cry of the insurgents. At the head of an ill-kempt army of Indians and mestizos, Hidalgo won victories at Guanajuato and Guadalajara but, perhaps because of a lack of ammunition, failed to attack Mexico City. In March, 1811, he was captured by the Spaniards and shot. Mexicans now celebrate Sept. 16 as their Independence Day.

Hieratic. Consecrated to sacred uses, as, hieratic chants, etc. The Greeks applied the term to a cursive form of hieroglyphic writing which, though originally used for all literature, came to be reserved for religious texts when Demotic writing was adopted for secular use.

Hieronymo. The central character in Thomas Kyd's Spanish Tragedy.

Higden, Ranulf (c. 1299–c. 1364). English chronicler, a Benedictine monk. His Polychronicon, a Latin history of the world from its creation to 1327, was continued by others through 1357 and popularized in English by John de Trevizis.

Higginson, Thomas Wentworth (1823–1911). American Unitarian clergyman, soldier, editor, and writer. A New England abolitionist, Higginson led the first Negro regiment in the Civil War (1862–1864). He related his experience in Army Life in a Black Regiment (1870). A friend of many prominent writers, he told of them in Cheerful Yesterdays (1898). Emily Dickinson sent him several of her poems, and carried on a correspondence; after her death, Higginson and Mabel Loomis Todd edited her Poems (1890). A believer in women's rights, Higginson wrote a book called Common Sense About Women (1881). He published biographies of Margaret Fuller (1884), his ancestor Francis Higginson (1891), Longfellow (1902), and Whitman (1902). He also wrote essays, literary histories, a novel and some verse; his Writings were collected in seven volumes in 1900, and his Letters and Journals were published in 1921.

High Church. An unofficial division of the Church of England and the Episcopal Church in America. It is distinguished by the importance it places upon the priesthood, the sacraments, and, in general, the outward forms and ceremonies of liturgical ritual.
Hinduism

Higher Criticism. The name applied to modern textual criticism of the Bible, treating such problems as authorship, authenticity, dates of composition. By those who accept the doctrine of the literal inspiration of the Bible, the term is used in a pejorative sense. The phrase was first used in 1787 in Eichhorn's Einleitung in das Alte Testament.

Higher Pantheism, The. A poem by Alfred Tennyson, written in 1869, in which the poet urges a belief that God not only is found in the world (pantheism) but also that He transcends it. Swinburne wrote a parody of this in The Higher Pantheism in a Nutshell.

Highland Mary. The most shadowy of Robert Burns's sweethearts, but the one to whom he addressed some of his finest poetry, including My Highland Lassie, O, Highland Mary, Thou Ling'ring Star and—perhaps—Will ye go to the Indies, my Mary? She is believed to have been Mary Campbell.

High Wind in Jamaica, A (1929, first published in U.S. as The Innocent Voyage). A novel by Richard Hughes. A family of children living in Jamaica in the 19th century are sent to England after a hurricane has partly destroyed their home. Amiable pirates capture them by mistake, and the children bring about the pirates' ruin; one girl becomes a murderer. The irrationality and impenetrability of a child's amoral world and the horror of the whole situation are brilliantly conveyed.

Hiketides. See The Suppliant Women (1) and (2).

Hildebrand. (1) Hero of German legend, a follower of Theodoric the Great. In the Hildebrandslied (c. 800), a short poetic fragment, he is challenged to single combat by a young warrior. He discovers that the young man is his son Hothubrand, whom he has not seen for 30 years, and tries to stop the fight. Hildebrand, unbelieving, accuses him of a coward's evasive lie and insists on the battle, only to be slain by the older and better warrior. See the Nibelungenlied for Hildebrand's role there.

(2) The original name of Pope Gregory VII.

Hilton, James (1900–1954). English novelist. His two best-selling books were Goonsays, Mr. Chips, and Lost Horizon (1933), a novel about the mythical land of Shangri-La. He also wrote Random Harvest (1924), about a man suffering from amnesia.

him (1927). A play by E. E. Cummings. Taking hints from the German expressionists, James Joyce, and other literary pioneers, Cummings produced an extraordinary conglomeration of techniques and effects in this "phantasmagoria." It was produced by the Provincetown Players in 1928.

Himmler, Heinrich (1900–1945). High-ranking official in Nazi Germany. One of the founders of the party, he organized the S.S. (q.v.) (1929) and Gestapo (1933) and became supreme police commissioner (1936). He poisoned himself after his capture by the Allies.

Hinayana. See Buddhism.

Hind and the Panther, The (1687). A poem by John Dryden in defense of the Catholic religion. The hind is the Church of Rome, and the panther is the Church of England. James II is the lion which protects the hind from the bear (Independents), the wolf (Presbyterians), the hare (Quakers), the ape (Freethinkers), the boar (Anabaptists), and the fox (Arians). One of Dryden's most celebrated works, the poem is notable for its wit, the brilliance of its argument, and its passages of rare eloquence and power.

Hindemith, Paul (1895–1963). German-born composer and violinist. One of the most prolific and versatile composers of his day, with an individual style that is generally dissolvent and contrapuntal. Mathis der Maler (1938; text by Hindemith) is probably his best known opera; other works include Das Marienleben (1923, song cycle to poems by Rilke), Ludus Tonalis (piano pieces, 1943), and diverse chamber music. He also wrote several theory texts.

Hindenburg, Paul von (1847–1934). German general and statesman. He succeeded Falkenhayn as chief of the High Command during World War I and served as president of the Weimar Republic (1925–1934). In 1933 he was forced to make Hitler chancellor. See Eric LUDENDORFF.

Hind Horn. See Horn, King.

Hindle Wakes. See William Stanley Houghton.

Hindu Calendar. This year is divided into 12 months. An intercalary month occurs after every month in which there are two new moons, which is once in every three years. This inserted month takes the name of the month preceding it. The months, the first of which begins about April 11, are Baisakh, Jeth, Asarh, Sawan, Bhadon, Asin (Kuar), Katik, Aghan, Fus, Magh, Phagun (Phalgun), and Chait.

Hinduism. The religious and social system of India, organically interrelated by dharma. Hinduism is based on birth and conduct, and because it has no founder or creed, tends to be nondogmatic. Dharma involves belief in karma or the principle of cause as affecting a future existence. Past karma can be "burnt away" and future karma annihilated by the performance of the "pure act" (selfless, detached, dedicated action), which leads to its by-product moksha or liberation (in Buddhism called nirvana), a state of release from the painful dualities, polarities, and ambivalences of the phenomenal world. Many techniques are prescribed for the attainment for moksha: worship, pilgrimage, yoga, many ascetic practices, and respect for a spiritual teacher or guru. If any of these are performed for the satisfaction of one's ego, the act becomes "impure" or tainted by karma, and falls under the category of the good or bad deed, leading to good or bad rebirth. The ultimate goal is serenity, not ecstasy or agony. The numerous sects of Hinduism implicitly recognize these principles, and their monistic... or pantheistic philosophy is derived from the Vedas or the Upanishads, which were organized into a metaphysical framework known as Vedanta by the seventh century philosopher Shankaracharya, sometimes called the “Aquinus of India.”

Hindus, Maurice [Gershon] (1891– ). Russian-born American writer. Coming to the U.S. in 1905, Hindus has been principally concerned in his work with the land of his birth, which he has revisited many times. His numerous books on the subject include Russian Peasant and Revolution (1920), Broken Earth (1926), Humanity Uprooted (1929), Red Bread (1931), Mother Russia (1943), The Cossacks (1945), and Crisis in the Kremlin (1953). He is also the author of To Sing with the Angels (1941), a novel about the Nazi occupation of a small Czechoslovakian community, and Green Worlds (1938), an account of his youth.

Hinkson, Mrs. Katherine. See Katherine Tynan.

Hinnom, the Valley of. See Gehenna; Topkhet.

Hippalea, or Hippalec. In the ORLANDO FURIOSO of Ariosto, the maidservant of the warrior maiden Bradamante and a messenger between her mistress and the knight Ruggiero, Bradamante’s beloved.

Hippius, Zinaida Nikolayevna (1867-1945). Russian poet. One of the Russian symbolists, she was the wife of the author and critic Dmitri Merezhkovski. Her poetry, lyrical and introspective exercises, holds less interest than her reminiscences of the greater poets, such as Blok, Bryusov, and Sologub, whom she received in her St. Petersburg salon. In 1919 she and her husband emigrated to France.

Hippocampus. In Greek mythology, a fabulous sea horse; head and forequarters of a horse and tail of a dolphin. It was represented as attached to chariots of Poseidon and the tritons. Paintings of hippocampi were found in Pompeii.

Hippocrates (Hippokrates; 460?-377 b.c.). A Greek physician born on the island of Cos; known as Father of medicine. According to tradition, he devised a code of medical ethics that imposed on his disciples the oath still administered to men about to enter medical practice and known as the Hippocratic Oath. Eighty-seven treatises are attributed to him.

Hippocratic oath. An oath of allegiance to ethical professional standards. It is administered to M.D. candidates at each commencement at Columbia, Cornell, and other universities. Its original version is attributed to Hippocrates. The form now commonly used is:

I do solemnly swear by that which I hold most sacred:
That I will be loyal to the profession of medicine and just and gentle to my patients;
That I will lead my life and practice my art in uprightness and honor;
That into whatsoever house I shall enter, it shall be for the good of the sick to the utmost of my power, I holding myself aloof from wrong, from corruption, and from the temptation of others to vice;
That I will exercise my art solely for the cure of my patients, and will give no drug, perform no operation for a criminal purpose, even if solicited, far less suggest it;
That whatsoever I shall see or hear of the lives of men which is not fitting to be spoken, I will keep inviolably secret;
These things I do promise, and in proportion as I am faithful to this my oath may happiness and good repute be ever mine—the opposite if I shall be forsworn.

Hippocrates (Gr. “hippos,” horse; “krene,” fountain). The fountain of the Muses on Mount Hellenikon, produced by a stroke of the hoof of Pegasus; hence, poetic inspiration.

Hippodamia (Hippodameia). (1) The bride of Pirithous (see LAPITHS).
(2) The wife of Pelops.

Hippogriph (Gr. hippos, a horse, and gryphos, a griffin, thus a winged horse). The flying steed whose father was a griffin and mother a filly. In Ariosto’s ORLANDO FURIOSO, it carries Ruggiero away from his beloved Bradamante to the island of the enchantress Alcina. It also takes Astolfo to Ethiopia, from whence he ascends to the moon to retrieve Orlando’s lost wits. Further mention is made of the hippogriff in Milton’s Paradise Regained.

Hippolyta (Hippolyte). An Amazon queen. When Eurytheus demanded her girdle, Heracles went to fetch it. He succeeded either by killing her, or by holding her general Melanippe for ransom. This queen, or another of the same name, attacked Attica and was defeated with her Amazons by Theseus. He married her and bore him Hippolytus. Some, however, call her Antiope.

In Shakespeare’s Midsummer Night’s Dream, she is the proud and sophisticated woman who is betrothed to Theseus, duke of Athens. The play of the artisans is presented as a part of the celebration of the wedding.

Hippolyte. In Jean Racine’s tragedy Phèdre, the stepson of Phèdre and the object of her guilty passion. He rebuffs her advances, but his father, King Theseus, is convinced of his guilt and brings about his death by invoking Neptune against him.

Hippolytus (Hippolytos, 428 B.C.). A tragedy by EURIPIDES. Aphrodite, angry at Hippolytus, the illegitimate son of Theseus by the Amazon Hippolyta, because he scorns the love of women, avenges herself on him by causing Theseus’ wife Phaedra to fall in love with him. Though wasting away of her passion, Phaedra will not tell Hippolytus, but, during Theseus’ absence, her nurse gives the story away. Hippolytus is horrified, but will say nothing to Theseus. Humiliated, Phaedra hangs herself, leaving a message for Theseus claiming that Hippolytus has tried to violate her. Theseus returns and, refusing to listen to Hippolytus’ denials, lays on him one of three unfailing curses given him by his father Poseidon. Hippolytus is soon killed when a bull rising from the sea frightens his horses. Artemis, whose faithful servant Hippolytus has been, now reveals the truth to Theseus, who is grief-stricken over Hippolytus’ death and his own guilt, although Hippolytus frees him of this guilt with his dying words.

This story was also told in Racine’s masterpiece Phèdre, and in such lesser works as Seneca’s Phaedra, Robinson Jeffers’ dramatic poem The Cretan Woman (1954), and Mary Renault’s novel The Bull from the Sea (1962).

Hippomedon. See Seven Against Thebes.

Hippopotamus, The (1920). A rhyming, comic poem by T. S. Eliot. It is about the “True Church.”

Hiraoka Kimitake. See Mishima Yukio.

Hirohito (1901– ). Emperor of Japan (1926–). The name of his reign is Shōwa.

Hiroshige. See Andō Hiroshige.
Hiroshima. The Japanese city which was the target of the first atomic bomb used in warfare (August, 1945). The bomb was dropped by the U.S. at the close of World War II. Hiroshima was largely destroyed by that attack, and afterward rebuilt. Hiroshima, by John Hersey (1946), gave a factual and devastating account of the event. Since then, Hiroshima has become a symbol of the tragic division and possible reconciliation between people.

Hirschfeld, Georg (1873-1935). German playwright. As a writer, Hirschfeld is identified with the movement of naturalism. His two best-known plays, both of which deal with women under extraordinary conditions of social pressure, are Die Mütter (The Mothers, 1896) and Agnes Jordan (1898).

His Family (1917). A novel by Ernest Poole. A study of the results of immigration, depicting the contrasting ideals of two generations in New York City, this is the story of a father and his three daughters. One daughter is devoted to the welfare of her five children; another, a principal of a high school, sacrifices herself to the interests of young people; the third is a devotee of pleasure. The novel was awarded a Pulitzer Prize.

History. For many titles beginning with the words History of . . . , see the following proper names. For example, The History of Tom Jones, a Foundling will be found under Tom Jones, a Foundling, The History of.

History of New York from the Beginning of the World to the end of the Dutch Dynasty, A (1809). A satire by Washington Irving. The book is presented as the work of a fictional character called Diedrich Knickerbocker. Beginning with a chapter on the creation of the world, the format of the volume mocks the pretensions of early historians. The burlesque became more pointed as Irving included many facts about the colony. The book contains lively descriptions of Dutch manners and morals. It was frequently reprinted after Irving expurgated racier passages, which offended descendants of the Dutch.

History of the Kings of Britain, The (Historiae Regum Britanniae; 1137). A Latin prose chronicle in 12 books by Geoffrey of Monmouth. The work is of special importance in relation to the development of Arthurian legend, and also as a source book (partly by way of Holinshed's Chronicles) for Elizabethan dramatists. It purports to be a true account of events involved in the founding of the English nation, but is a mixture of fact and fantasy. It begins with the arrival in England of the mythical Brutus, or Brutus, great-grandson of the Trojan Aeneas. In subsequent pages, there are accounts of such ancients as Hengist and Horsa, Vortigern, King Lear, Ferrex and Porrex, Cymbeline, Gorboduc, many of whom turn up again in later literature, notably in the plays of Shakespeare.

The strongest influence of Geoffrey's work on other writers has been in the area of Arthurian legend. With the introduction of Merlin the magician, Úther Pendragon, and the building of Arthur into a towering national figure who conquers large chunks of Europe, the legends of Arthur achieved new impetus. Translations and adaptations of the History of the Kings of Britain soon appeared in other countries, the most notable of these being the French Roman de Brut (1155) of Wace.

Though Wace cautiously expressed doubts about the truth of Geoffrey's "history," the work was not seriously questioned by Englishmen for several centuries. Indeed, in the 16th century one claim to the throne was considerably strengthened by the popular belief that the claimant was directly descended from King Arthur. See Belinus; Brennius; L.d.

Historiamastix. An anonymous play satirizing the stage, probably written in part by John Marston in about 1599. It was answered by Ben Jonson in Every Man Out of His Humour (1599). See War of the Theaters.

Hita, arcipreste de. See Juan Ruiz.

Hitler, Adolf (1889-1945). German Nazi and Führer of the Third Reich (1933-1945), whose talents as popular orator and political tactician were the foundation of his demagogic power. Appointed chancellor (1933) by President Hindenburg and granted temporary dictatorial powers by the legislature, he was given complete executive power by a plebiscite following Hindenburg's death (1934). Hitler promised to avenge the shame suffered by Germany after World War I and to reestablish the grandeur of the Aryan race. His annexation of Austria and Czechoslovakia (1938) and invasion of Poland (1939) brought on World War II. Although Hitler was an absolute dictator, much of his strength was based on the efficient administration of subordinates such as Goebbels, Goering, Himmler, Ribbentrop, and Schacht. It is thought that Hitler committed suicide after the collapse of Germany in 1945. See Beer-Hall Putsch; Mein Kampf.

H. M. Pulham, Esq. (1941). A novel by John P. Marquand. Unlike the title character in Marquand's The Late George Apley, Pulham partially escapes from his New England background by way of World War I and falls in love with a girl in New York; but like Apley he wed the girl his family selects for him. The book goes on to explore the price of conformity for both Pulham and his wife.

Hobbema, Meindert (1638-1709). Dutch painter. After Ruisdael, with whom he studied, Hobbema is considered the finest landscapist of the Dutch school. His works are distinguished by subdued colors, careful details, and the invariable presence of a water mill.

Hobbes, John Oliver. See Pearl Mary Teresa Craigie.

Hobbes, Thomas (1588-1679). English philosopher. Hobbes spent most of his long life as tutor and companion to the Cavendish family (the earls of Devonshire), though he once tutored Charles II in mathematics. He also spent a number of years in Europe, where he became acquainted with such thinkers as Galileo and Descartes. In England, his friends included Harvey, Ben Jonson, Cowley, and Hobbit. A gnomelike creature, invented by the novelist J. R. R. Tolkien.

Hobgoblin. An impish, ugly, and mischievous sprite, particularly Puck or Robin Goodfellow. The word is a variant of Rob-Goblin, i.e., the goblin Robin, just as Hodge is the nickname of Roger.

Hobson, Laura Z[ametkin] (1900— ). American novelist. She is best known for her novel, Gentleman's Agreement (1947), which deals with anti-Semitism in the U.S. Mrs. Hobson worked for various magazines and newspapers until 1935, when she began to write short stories. Her first novel, The Trespassers (1943), deals with the problems of refugees denied entrance to the United States because of the immigrant quota system. She has also written The Celebrity (1951) and First Papers (1964).

Hoby, Sir Thomas (1530–1566). English diplomat and translator; famous for his translation of Il Cortegiano (The Courtier) by Baldassare Castiglione. The book became a manual for English courtiers, and influenced the writings of Wyatt, Surrey, Sidney, and Spenser.

Hoccleve, Thomas. See Thomas Occleve.

Hoder, Hodur, or Höthir. The Scandinavian god of darkness, called the blind old god, as opposed to his brother Balder, the god of light. According to fable, Loki urged Hoder to kill Balder with an arrow made of mistletoe. Hoder was in turn slain by Vali, the guardian of justice.

Hodgson, Ralph (1871–1962). English Georgian poet. His best-known poems, such as The Bells of Heaven and The Bull, are passionate protests against cruelty to animals.

Hoffmann, August Heinrich (1798–1874). Pen name: Hoffmann von Fallersleben. German political poet of libertarian sympathies. He wrote Deutschland, Deutschland über alles (Germany, Germany, Over All, 1841), a song that later (1912) became Germany’s national anthem. Since the Nazi era in Germany, it has become popular belief that the poet wanted Germany to conquer all other nations; but in fact, Hoffmann was simply pleading for a single unified Germany to take precedence over all the numerous states into which the land was divided at the time.

Hoffmann, E[rnst] T[heodor] A[madus] (1776–1822). German author, known especially for his fantastic and often humorous tales, two collections of which are the Fantasiestücke (Fantasy-pieces, 1814–1815) and the Nachstücke (Night-pieces, 1817). His Märchen style represents a new departure in romantic writing, for he weaves the fantastic world closely into the real world—as opposed, for example, to Novalis, whose idealistic Märchen have nothing of the real world in them. Thus, Hoffmann may be said to stand between romanticism and the realism of the later 19th century. The same mixture of fantasy and realism characterizes his two novels, Die Elixir der Teufels (The Devil’s Elixirs, 1816) and the unfinished Kater Murr (Tom-Cat Murr, 1820). The latter, which is the fictional autobiography of a cat, also includes the story of Hoffmann’s most famous character, a composer named Johannes Kreisler who is a typical example of Zerzissenheit. Hoffmann himself was a composer as well as an author, and wrote the music for the opera Undine based on a story by his friend Fouqué. See Tales of Hoffmann.

Hoffmann, Hans (1880— ). German abstract painter. Settling in the U.S. in 1932, he has exerted great influence through the schools he founded in New York and in Provincetown, Mass.

Hofmannsthal, Hugo von (1874–1929). Austrian playwright, poet, and essayist. His early writings (pre-1901) are typical of the movement of expressionism. Most of his lyric poetry, for example, was written during this period, and, like that of his friend Stefan George, it combines mysticism and exoticism in content with delicate balance in form and a style full of innuendoes that suggest more than they state. Among his most famous poems are Manche freilich . . . (Many, it is true . . . ), about the mystical unity of all human destinies, and Vorfrühlings (Pre-Spring), which suggests the feeling of the wind on a night just before spring. The short poems that he wrote during this period, including Der Tod des Tizian (Titian’s Death, 1892), Das kleine Welttheater (The Small World-Theater, 1897), and Der Tod und der Teufel, are very much like his lyrics; in them, the emphasis is not on action but on the poetic expression of a mystical mood, which permeates the situation.

The essay Brief des Lord Chandos (Letter of Lord Chandos, 1901), however, marks a clear turning point in Hofmannsthal’s career. In it, he states that he no longer finds language adequate as a means of expression; even the word apple, he says, has so many different connotations for different people that one is never certain of exactly communicating one’s meaning with it. He had become discouraged with the lyric as an expressive medium, and, in many of his post-1901 dramas, he attempts to compensate for the inadequacies of language by turning to traditional and mythical subject matter, that is, he attempts to communicate more directly with his audience by treating material that is part of everyone’s cultural heritage. Examples of this tendency in his works are Elektra (1903), an adaptation of Sophocles’ tragedy; Oedipus und die Sphinx (1906), on the story of Oedipus; Jedermann (Everyman, 1911), an adaptation of the medieval morality play; Das Salzburger grosse Welttheater (The Great World-Theater of Salzburg, 1923), based on Calderón’s El gran teatro del mundo; and Der Turm (The Tower, 1925), a free adaptation of Calderón’s Life is a Dream. Among these later plays, he makes more extensive use of dramatic action and stage arrangements for expressive purposes, rather than relying on language alone. Finally, his search for better means of communication led him to combine his art with music in the opera.
librettos he wrote for Richard Strauss, which include Der Rosenkavalier and Die Frau ohne Schatten (The Woman with No Shadow, 1919).

In his later period, Hofmannsthal became deeply interested in the structure and problems of culture, both in Austria and in Europe in general. Besides his dramatic works, he produced several essays on cultural questions, including the well known Das Schriftum als geistiger Raum der Nation (Letters as the Spiritual Environment of the Nation, 1927).

Hofmann von Hofmannswaldau, Christian (1617–1679). German poet. His style is characterized as “late baroque” or “manneristic,” because of the self-conscious richness, sometimes highly overloaded, of his imagery and language. His writing does not have the stonic, ascetic quality that is found in Gryphius’ works, but he was nonetheless a religious man, and the influence of German mysticism is felt in his verse. A characteristic poem is his sonnet Auf den Einfall der Kirchen zu St. Elisabeth (On the Collapse of the Church in St. Elizabeth), in which a rich, detailed picture of the ruined building is given, followed by a moral comparing it to the religion of the time.

Hofstätter, Richard (1916– ). American historian. A member of the faculty of Columbia University, Hofstätter won a Pulitzer Prize for The Age of Reform: From Bryan to F.D.R. (1955), an unsentimental analysis of populism and progressivism, which he viewed as the precursors of modern conservatism rather than of the New Deal. His other works include Social Darwinism in American Thought (1944); The American Political Tradition (1948), essays emphasizing the continuity in American politics; The Development of Academic Freedom in the United States (1955), in collaboration with Walter P. Metzger; and a study of the causes and manifestations of Anti-Intellectualism in the United States (1963).

Hogarth, William (1697–1764). English painter and engraver. Generally regarded as the greatest pictorial satirist of England, his reputation was established through the plates for Samuel Butler’s Hudibras (1726). He then did a series of satirical paintings, The Harlot’s Progress (1731), engravings of which he distributed the following year by subscription. They achieved a tremendous success and Hogarth went on to do other series of narrative paintings which he afterwards engraved. The Rake’s Progress was distributed in 1735, Mariage à la Mode in 1745. Hogarth’s fame rests on these satirical series, in which he expressed the hard morality of his age with sharpness and humor; however, his admirable portraits, with their strong sense of color and direct, free handling of paint, also make a claim to artistic greatness. His engravings are said to have furnished Henry Fielding with prototypes for his characters, and inspired the libretto of W. H. Auden and Chester Kallman for Stravinsky’s opera The Rake’s Progress (1951).

Hogg, James. Known as the Ettrick Shepherd (1770–1835). Scottish poet. He was so called because he was born in Ettrick and inherited the occupation of shepherd from his family. Largely self-educated, he is known for his verse celebrating Scottish rural scenes and pursuits and for his treatments of the Celtic folklore tradition. He was encouraged by Sir Walter Scott and in his later life was associated with Blackwood’s Magazine.

Hogg, Thomas Jefferson (1792–1862). English lawyer, intimate friend and biographer of Shelley. At the request of Shelley’s widow and family, Hogg undertook Shelley’s biography, the first two volumes of which appeared in 1858. Dissatisfied with the results, Shelley’s family denied him further access to the materials necessary to complete the work. Although what he did write was often more about Hogg than Shelley, the two volumes remain an accurate, valuable, and loyal account of the poet’s early years.

Holbein, Hans, the younger (1497–1543). German painter. His father (c. 1460–1524), after whom the son was named, was also a distinguished painter, noted for his altar-pieces. The younger Holbein studied and worked in Basel and was led by the artistic depression fostered by the Reformation to undertake a trip to England (1526–1528), and finally to settle there in 1530. He executed smoothly finished, carefully detailed, precisely drawn, and richly colored portraits and religious paintings. His formal portraits preserve the features of Erasmus, Sir Thomas More and his family, Thomas Cromwell, and Henry VIII, in whose services he spent his last years.

Holcroft, Thomas (1744–1800). English dramatist. His Tale of Mystery (1802) has been called “the first English melodrama.” His other plays include the sentimental drama The Road to Ruin (1792), the comedy Love’s Frailties (1794) and translations of Beaumarchais’ Le mariage de Figaro and Des-Fencing master’s advertisement engraved by Hogarth.

Hölderlin, Friedrich (1770–1843). German poet. In his predominant use of classical verse forms and syntax he was a follower of Klopstock, but his language is more compressed and powerful than the older poet’s. He was not directly affiliated with either of the two major literary movements of his time, Weimar classicism or romanticism, but his thought has elements in common with both. He shares the classicists’ love of balance and repose, but couples it with a romantic yearning for complete oneness with nature and for a religion that could combine pantheism, Greek religion, and Christianity. Schelling and Hegel, friends of his since their school days, expressed similar ideas at times.

Hölderlin’s life was never settled or happy. He lacked both money and recognition, and these strains, combined with that of his entirely platonic but socially suspect love affair with a married woman (Susette Gontard, whom he calls “Diotima” in his poems), drove him insane in 1803, so that his actual career lasted only about a decade. Neither Schiller nor Goethe recognized Hölderlin’s greatness, but his lyric poetry and his novel HYPERION oder ERMIT IN GRIECHENLAND are now counted among the greatest literary achievements in the language. Some of his finest lyrics (written 1800–1803) are Bred und Wein (Bread and Wine), an elegy celebrating both Christ and Dionysus; Der Archipelagus, an ode in which it is hoped that modern Germany will tend toward the character of ancient Greece; Heidelberg and Der Rhein, odes on the city and the river, respectively; and the patriotic ode Germanien.

Holger Danske. National folk hero of Denmark, usually identified with Oger the Dane. He supposedly still sleeps under Elsinore, waiting to arise when Denmark needs him.

Holgrave. The young daguerreotypist in Hawthorne’s The House of the Seven Gables.

Holinhed or Hollingshead, Raphael (d. c. 1580). English historian. Holinhed is famous as the author of the Chronicles of England, Scotland, and Ireland (1576). A massive history of the world had been begun by Reginald Wolfe; when Wolfe died in 1573 Holinhed took over the project and, with the assistance of Richard Stainhurst and William Harrison, completed it on a somewhat smaller scale as a history of England. The work is memorable primarily as a source of plots for Elizabethan dramatists, particularly Shakespeare.

Hollands, Josiah Gilbert (1819–1881). American editor and writer. His early writings appeared under the pseudonym of Timothy Titcomb. He was popular in his period for his sentimental didacticism. Among his novels are Arthur Bonnicke (1873), a partly autobiographical book, and Sevenoaks (1875), the story of an unscrupulous New England millonaire. Hollands also wrote poetry and was especially well known for Bitter Sweet. In 1870 he became co-founder and co-editor of Scribner’s Monthly.

Holley, Marietta. Pen name, Josiah Allen’s Wife (1836–1926). American writer of humorous stories. While relating the adventures of Josiah Allen and his wife Samantha, the author—an ardent advocate of temperance and women’s suffrage—often propagandized her own beliefs in her stories. Samantha at the Centennial (1877) and Samantha in Europe (1895) were two of her most popular books.

Hollow Men, The (1915). A poem by T. S. Eliot. Mixing nursery rhyme and liturgy, it presents his view of the spiritual emptiness and doom of the 20th century through the symbol of a scarecrow (the guy of Guy Fawkes night; see Gunpowder Plot). Its epigraph is from Joseph Conrad’s Heart of Darkness.

Holmes, Oliver Wendell, Sr. (1809–1894). American physician, professor, man of letters. By his own definition, he was a New England Brahmin, a man of cultivated family and sufficient fortune. Holmes earned local recognition as a youth with the poem Old Ironsides.

A member of the Harvard Class of ’29, Holmes frequently celebrated his classmates in topical verse. After graduation he spent two years in Paris (1833–1835) studying medicine. In 1836, a year typical of his active life, Holmes, at the age of 25, took a medical degree at Harvard, began his practice, became a member of the Massachusetts Medical Society, wrote a Dissertation on Intermittent Fever in New England, won the Boylston Prize, wrote the Phi Beta Kappa poem, and published his first volume of verse. The book contained two of his best-loved poems, “The Last Leaf,” and “The Moral Bully.” In 1847, the doctor accepted a Harvard professorship of anatomy and physiology and turned out another volume of verse. He was a witty and popular teacher, until his resignation in 1882 at the age of 73.

When The Atlantic Monthly began publishing under James Russell Lowell, Holmes gave it its name, and contributed The Autocrat of the Breakfast-Table, a series that combined fiction, essay, conversation, drama, and verse. The Autocrat, modeled on the work of Addison and Steele, made Holmes famous for wit and originality. The Chambered Nautilus, his most frequently anthologized poem, appeared there. He continued the essays in two further series: The Professor . . . (1859), and The Poet . . . (1872).

A conversationalist in the tradition of Dr. Johnson, Holmes was in great demand as a guest and speaker. He was a familiar figure at the dinners of the Saturday Club, of which Emerson, Longfellow, Whittier, Lowell, Agassiz, and Motley were members.

Holmes always rebelled against his Calvinist upbringing. As an enlightened scientist, he urged that criminals be educated rather than punished. His poem The Deacon’s Masterpiece is a satire on tightly constructed dogmas. Holmes’s “medicated” novels, Elise Venner, The Guardian Angel, and A Mortal Antipathy continue his attack on Calvinist theology.

Holmes was not only ahead of his time in social thought, but his essay on The Contagiousness of Puerperal Fever anticipated Semmelweis. In 1884, Holmes produced a biography of Emerson, and in 1888, wrote the series Over the Teacups, for the Atlantic. He was honored at Cambridge, Edinburgh, and Oxford during his 1886 trip to Europe. He was the father of the great jurist Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr.
Holmes, Oliver Wendell, Jr. (1841-1935). American jurist. Son of the celebrated physician and author of the same name, Holmes graduated from Harvard University and served in the Union army for three years during the Civil War; he was wounded three times, twice severely. He was lost to sight for a while, and the elder Holmes reported his adventures in search of him in My Hunt After "The Captain" (Atlantic Monthly, November, 1862).

Holmes began to practice law in Boston in 1867, on his return from the first of many trips to England, and began to teach at the Harvard Law School in 1870. His lectures on The Common Law (1881) became classics. In 1882 he was appointed to the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts and became chief justice in 1889. In 1902 he was appointed to the Supreme Court by President Theodore Roosevelt, and after a notable series of opinions and dissent was regarded as the leading exponent of law in Anglo-Saxon countries. He retired in 1932.

Known as "the great dissenter," he had certain fixed ideas, the chief of which was that the law was made for society, not society for the law. He held that the life of the law was not logic but experience, that law was not an absolute "but what the courts will enforce," and that "the first call of a theory of law is that it should fit the facts." It was an axiom of his that "certainty generally is an illusion, and repose is not the destiny of man." He said, "The best test of truth is the power of thought to get itself accepted in the market." His dissents often had great influence, and in time many of his views were accepted as good law, such as his pronouncements, always based on the Constitution, on the plenary power of Congress over commerce, on the taxing power of Congress, on the meaning of "police power," and on the provisions of the Bill of Rights, especially the first amendment.

In addition to The Common Law, Holmes published in his own lifetime Speeches (1891; rev. 1913) and Collected Legal Papers (1920). His correspondence with Sir Frederick Pollock and with Harold J. Laski has also been published.

Holmes, Sherlock. The most famous detective of fiction, a creation of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, who introduced him in his Study in Scarlet (1887). His adventures are continued in The Sign of the Four (1889); The Adventures of Sherlock Holmes (1891); The Memoirs of Sherlock Holmes (1893); The Hound of the Baskervilles (1902); The Return of Sherlock Holmes (1904); The Valley of Fear (1915); His Last Bow (1917); and The Case Book of Sherlock Holmes (1927). Holmes has such brilliant analytical faculties and indefatigable interest in any detective problem that he regularly puts Scotland Yard to shame. He is abrupt in manner, master of the violin and a dozen obscure sciences, and a victim of the cocaine habit. His admirable friend, Dr. Watson, usually records his adventures. Holmes's inconstant enemy is the malevolent Moriarty.

Hölty, Ludvig Heinrich Christoph (1748-1776). German poet, member of the Göttinger Haid group. Along with Bürger, he contributed much to the 18th-century revival of the German ballad. His Gedichte (Poems, 1783) were edited posthumously by Friedrich Stöber and Johann Heinrich Voss.

Holy Alliance. A league formed by Russia, Austria, and Prussia in 1815. It was designed to regulate the affairs of Europe after the fall of Napoleon "by the principles of Christian charity." This meant that every endeavor would be made to stabilize the existing dynasties and to resist all change. It lasted until 1830, and was joined by all the European sovereigns except those of England and Turkey, and the Pope.

Holy Bible. See Bible.

Holy City. That city considered by the followers of a given faith to be sanctified by its connections with that faith. Allahabad is the Holy City of the Indian Muslims; Benares, that of the Hindus; Cuzco, of the ancient Incas; Fez, of the Western Arabs; Jerusalem, of the Jews and Christians; Kairwan, near Tunis, containing the Oktar Mosque in which is the tomb of the prophet's barber, that of North African Muslims; Mecca and Medina, of all Muslims; Moscow and Kiev, of the Russians, the latter city having been the cradle of Christianity in Russia.

Holy Cross or Holy Rood Day. September 14, the day of the Feast of the Exaltation of the Cross. Called by the Anglo-Saxons "Roodmass-day," it is kept in honor of the exposition of a portion of the true Cross in the basilica erected at Jerusalem by the Empress Helen (c. 326). Another event connected with it is the recovery of the piece of the Cross which had been stolen from Jerusalem in 614 by Chosroes, king of Persia, and by Heraclius in 629.

Holy Family. The infant Jesus, Mary and Joseph. Anne, the mother of Mary, Elizabeth, and the infant John the Baptist are often also present in pictures of the Holy Family.

Holy Grail. See Grail.

Holy Land. Any land held to be holy by the devotees of a particular faith. The Christians call Israel the Holy Land, because it was the site of Christ's ministry. To Muslims, Mecca, the birthplace of Muhammad, is the Holy Land. The Chinese Buddhists regard India as holy because it was the native land of the Buddha. The Greeks considered Elis holy because it was the site of the temple of Olympian Zeus, near which the Olympic Games were held every four years.

Holy League, the. (1) Designation for an agreement arranged by Pope Julius II among the Italian and European powers. It was directed against France. The War of the Holy League (1511-1513) put an end to French plans for the domination of Italy. Another league, called the Second Holy League, was an agreement among the Papacy, France, and the Italian powers directed against Spain. The War of the Second Holy League (1526-1529), won by Spain, insured her control of Italy and the Papacy thereafter. (2) An association formed in 1576 under the auspices of Henry, duke of Guise, to defend the Roman Catholics against French Protestants and to win the French throne for the Guises. The league, which was subsidized by Philip II of Spain, was defeated by Henry IV of France at Arques and Ivy and lost its influence after his conversion to Catholicism.

Holy Living and Dying. A religious work by Jeremy Taylor. It was originally published in two parts: The Rule and Exercise of Holy Living (1650) and The Rule and Exercise of Holy Dying (1651).

Holy of Holies. The innermost quarter of the Jewish temple. In it the Ark of the Covenant was kept. Into this place only the high priest was allowed to enter, and that but once a year, on the Day of Atonement. The term, or its Latin equivalent, sanctum sanctorum, has been applied to any haven kept sacred from the world in general.

Holy Roman Empire. A loose confederation of German states ruled by various royal German houses who claimed the imperial authority of ancient Rome. The butt of generations of poking students (“it was neither Holy, Roman, nor an Empire”), the Holy Roman Empire lasted in name for over 1,000 years (800-1806). It began when Charlemagne was crowned emperor by Pope Leo III and ended when Francis II (Francis I of Austria) abdicated. While the power of the emperor and the cohesion of the empire always existed in theory more than in practice, the Holy Roman Empire did give a certain unity to the many German states.

The first German emperor was Henry the Fowler who was crowned in 919. Since the title was not hereditary, the emperor being elected by seven electors, the crown was held at various times by nearly all the royal German houses. The uninterrupted line of Hapsburg emperors began in 1438. The power and prestige of the Austrian Hapsburgs reflected on the empire as well. Under Maximilian I and Charles V the empire had its greatest strength. After Charles relinquished the crown in 1556, there began the steady decline that ended in 1806 with the empire’s extinction.

Holy Sepulcher. The rock-hewn tomb in a garden outside the walls of Jerusalem, traditionally the burial place of the body of Christ after the Crucifixion. Although the site of the tomb has never been precisely identified, rumor has fixed it in a cave under the edifice known as the Church of the Holy Sepulcher in Jerusalem, which was begun by Constantine the Great in the fourth century, destroyed and rebuilt—once during the Crusades—and re-consecrated in 1810 after extensive repairs.

Holy Trinity. See TRINITY.

Holy War. A war in which religion plays or purports to play a considerable part. The Crusades, the Thirty Years’ War, the wars against the Albigenses and many others have been so called. A holy war launched by Muslims against Christians was known as a jehad.

Holy War, The (1682). An allegory by John Bunyan, depicting the salvation of the soul of man. The city of Mansoul is captured by Diabolus, but is later liberated by the forces of Emmanuel, son of the builder of the city. Although the city falls into evil and is again assaulted by Diabolus, Emmanuel is ultimately victorious. It is thought that Bunyan’s experiences in the English Civil War may have contributed to the military and political allegory in this work.

Holz, Arno (1863-1929). German author. A few of his poems appeared in Hermann Conradt’s anthology Moderne Dichtercharaktere (Modern Figures in Poetry, 1884); in these, as well as in his own volume Das Buch der Zeit, Lieder eines Modernen (The Book of the Time, Songs of a Modern Man, 1886), he showed himself an exponent of the early, idealistic phase of German Naturalism. But during 1888-1890, when he became a friend of Johannes Schlaf, he turned strongly toward what he called consistent realism, and attempted to reproduce everyday reality in his writing. At the same time, he turned away from lyric poetry to narrative and drama, and with Schlaf, co-authored the two starkly realistic works: Papa Hamlet (1889), a collection of prose sketches which appeared under the pseudonym Bjarne P. Holmsen, advertised as a translation from the Danish, and the play Die Familie Selicke (The Selicke Family, 1890) about the troubles of a poor Berlin family. Shortly afterward, he wrote a theoretical work, Die Kunst, ihr Wesen und ihre Gesetze (Art, Its Essence and Its Laws, 1891), in which he strongly disputed the claim that art is a metaphysical absolute. The difference, he said, between a child’s crude drawing and a true work of art is entirely relative; the artist simply has more skill in reproducing his perception of nature. Holz himself, however, turned away from naturalism and back to lyric poetry in his Phantasus (1898 ff.), and in a theoretical work Revolution der Lyrik (Revolution of Lyric Poetry, 1899) he defended the use of completely free verse.

Home, Daniel Dunglas (1833-1886). A Scottish spiritualist medium who was the subject of Robert Browning’s poem, Sludge the Medium (1864). He conducted séances at courts and in public in the U.S., England, France, and Prussia and was the author of Incidents of my Life (1863).

Home, John (1722-1808). English playwright, known for his drama Douglas (1756) and for his friendship with David Hume and William Collins.

Homer. Ionian poet. To him the Iliad and the Odyssey are traditionally attributed. As early as the Hellenistic period, a few scholars insisted that the epics were the work of different authors. Orthodox opinion, however, claimed that Homer had composed both works, and numerous biographies were written of him. Eight of these are extant, but their dates and authors are unknown and they are regarded as largely invention. There was a further firm tradition that Homer was blind. A measure of the reliable information about Homer known to the ancients is the fact that seven cities claimed to have been his birthplace: Chios, Cólophon, Smyrna, Rhodes, Argos, Athens, and Salamis. The fact is that nothing whatever is known about Homer the man, including the crucial point of whether he existed.

Nevertheless, modern scholars have learned a great deal about the works that the Greeks attributed to Homer. These were not only the Iliad and the Odyssey, but also the Battle of the Frogs and the Mice and the Homeric Hymns, and certain epics from the Epic Cycle, known today only in brief fragments. It has long been accepted as certain that of these only the first two can be considered as genuinely "Homeric," although the Homeric hymns were clearly written in imitation of Homer's style. Today even most "unitarians," who believe the Iliad and the Odyssey each to be the work of a single author, do not consider them the work of the same author. The diction and language of the Odyssey show it to be a somewhat later work.

All scholars are aware that *Greek Epic Poetry of the Homeric age was the end product of a long period of gradual accretion during which historical events, legends, and folk tales were stitched together by many generations of rhapsodes or bards. In the case of the Iliad and the Odyssey, this process probably covered four centuries, from shortly after the series of events known as the Trojan War in the early 13th century B.C. to the mid-ninth century, which seems the most likely date for Homer. The "analytic school" of Homeric scholars believe that this process continued up to the sixth century B.C., when Pindar had the epics arranged for regular recitation at the Panatheniac festivals. This would mean that the epics were compiled and edited from bits and pieces rather than composed to a significant extent by a single individual.

Although analytic theories tended to dominate Homeric studies after the pioneer work of F. A. Wolf in 1795, there has been in recent years a strong resurgence of the unitarians. The most widely held position today is that, although both the Iliad and the Odyssey are made up of traditional materials, each bears the unmistakable imprint of a single artistic intelligence. This belief is supported by the remarkable structural, dramatic, and stylistic unity achieved in both epics, in spite of numerous and obvious anachronisms and other discrepancies. The Odyssey, in spite of—or perhaps in part because of—its broader scope and greater variety, evidences more clearly than the Iliad the work of a single poet. It is remarkable for its extraordinarily modern structure, which employs the techniques of the "flash-back" and parallel lines of action common in the novel.

The Iliad and the Odyssey as they are known today are based on the texts edited in the sixth century B.C. for use in Athens. A considerable amount of tampering with the Iliad was done by the Athenians in order to increase their role in its events and the texts were further edited in the second century B.C. by two distinguished scholars in Alexandria: Aristarchus of Samothrace and Aristophanes of Byzantium. The extant texts are substantially those of Aristarchus.

Homer, Winslow (1836-1910). American painter. Beginning as an illustrator, he was special correspondent during the Civil War for Harper's Weekly. About 1860 he gave up illustration for painting. A realist, he presented the shooting of rapids or scenes from hunting and fishing with great directness. He settled on the Maine coast about 1884. His themes became the everyday life of fishermen, and the power of sea and wind. Maine and the West Indies, which he subsequently visited, inspired him to do superb watercolors, striking for their breadth of handling and economical suggestion of moving sea and air.

Homeric hymns. Poems in the epic style composed by poets known as Homeriadas or sons of Homer. Modelled after the works of Homer, these hymns or Preludes were presented by the Homeriadas before their recitation of Homer at public festivals. Thirty-three poems are extant, among them hymns to Demeter, Pan, Apollo, and others.

Home, Sweet Home. A popular song with lyrics by John Howard Payne. It was written to a tune by Sir Henry Rowley Bishop (1785-1855) and first sung in his opera, Clari, or, the Maid of Milan (1823).

Homme Révolté, L'. See Rebel, The.

Homunculus (Lat., "little man"). In Part II of Goethe's Faust, a miniature man in a vial who is artificially created by Wagner in an attempt to raise man above his dependency on sex for reproduction. Homunculus leads Faust and Mephistopheles to the classical Walpurgis Night.

Honegger, Arthur [Oscar] (1892-1955). French composer, member of Les Six. His best-known works include Pacific 231 (1924; an orchestral imitation of a steam locomotive) and two cantatas: Le Roi David (King David; 1921; text by René Morax) and Jeanne d'Arc au Bûcher (Joan of Arc at the Stake; 1938; text by Paul Claudel).

Honest Whore, The: Parts I and II (1604, 1605). A comedy by Thomas Dekker. Hippolito, in love with Infelice, the daughter of the duke, believes that she is dead, and is inconsolable. Actually, she has been sent to a convent to separate her from Hippolito. Meanwhile, the constant Hippolito has been taken to the home of the courtesan Bellafont, whose advances he resists. She, however, falls madly in love with him and embarks of a life of chastity. Soon, Hippolito discovers that Infelice is alive and rushes to the convent to marry her. The duke arrives too late to prevent the match and becomes reconciled to the union. Bellafont, by order of the duke, is married to her first lover, Matheo. The subplot revolves around Candido, a linen draper, whom nothing perturbs. He is so mild and serene that his wife, in desperation, has him committed to an asylum. At the end, he is released, his brow gently furrowed with concern for his wife's sanity.

In Part II, the honest Bellafont's worthless husband Matheo is in prison, and she seeks help from Hippolito, who is struck by her beauty. When Matheo is released from prison, her sorrows only increase. Her husband stoops at nothing, even suggesting that she return to her old profession to provide money; Hippolito presses her with his unwanted attentions. Meanwhile, Orlando Friscobaldo, Bellafont's father, has disguised himself and become Matheo's servant, in order to watch over his daughter. Soon, Bellafont is falsely arrested for prostitution and Matheo is kept from her of infidelity with Hippolito. However, her father revealing himself, establishes her innocence, and Matheo is sternly warned to repent. Again the patient Candido appears, this time in the process of taming his second shrewish wife.

Honorabel Peter Stirling, The (1894). A novel by Paul Leicester Ford. Its hero, an honest and fearless politician in New York City, is said to represent the young Grover Cleveland; this was denied by the Hood, Robin. The book is valued as an accurate picture of ward politics in the urban America of the 1890's.

Hood, Robin. See Robin Hood.

Hood, Thomas (1799-1845). English poet and humorist. Hood suggested as his epitaph "Here lies one who spat more blood and made more puns than any man living." His actual epitaph reads "He sang the Song of the Shirt." Together they suggest something of the contradictory nature of his life and art: the long struggle with illness and poverty maintained with courage and gaiety, his unique standing as a poet both humorous and serious. He earned a livelihood through his light verse, which ranges from the penetrating but good natured satire of Miss Kelsman's to such pun-filled buffoonery as Faithless Nelly Grey (1834):

O Nelly Grey! O Nelly Grey!
Is this your love so warm?
The Jove that loves a scarlet coat
Should be more uniform.

Among his serious works, his poems of social protest, such as The Song of The Shirt (1843), are most famous, but he wrote a wide variety of lyrics and ballads. Some of his collections are Odes and Addresses to Great People (1825), The Midsummer Fairies (1827), Whims and Oddities (1826, 1827).

Hooker, [William] Brian (1880-1946). American librettist and poet. He wrote the librettos for two operas composed by Horatio Parker: Mona (1911) and Fairyland (1915). With W. H. Post, he wrote the libretto for The Vagabond King (1925), an operetta based on Justin H. McCarthy's If I Were King (1901), with music by Rudolph Friml. Hooker's greatest success, however, is his translation (1923) of Edmond Rostand's Cyrano de Bergerac, which was first produced on Broadway with Walter Hampden in the title role. He also published a collection of Poems (1915).

Hooker, Richard (1554-1600). English theologian. Hooker took holy orders in 1581. As a result of a controversy with a strict Calvinist, he attempted to clarify the position of the Church of England and wrote his great work, The Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity (1593-1597). The treatise treats church government from a philosophical and logical point of view, and anticipates the "common consent" grounds for government of Locke and Rousseau.

Hooper, J. J. See Captain Simon Stoes.

Hoosier Schoolmaster, The (1871). A novel by Edward Eggleston. A widely read, realistic story of frontier life in the Middle West, it deals with the life of a schoolmaster in the days before the Civil War. It was followed by The Hoosier Schoolboy (1883).

Hoover, Herbert [Clark] (1874-1964). 31st president of the U.S. (1929-1933). After a successful career as a mining engineer and businessman, Hoover won international reputation during World War I when he served as chairman of the American Relief Committee, as chairman of the Commission for Relief in Belgium, and as U.S. Food Administrator. As secretary of commerce (1921-1928), he organized his department in order to make it serve business interests more efficiently. In the 1928 presidential election he defeated Al Smith, the Democratic candidate, becoming the first Republican to crack the "Solid South." Faced by the great depression of 1929 soon after he entered the White House, Hoover, an advocate of self-help, was reluctant to use the power of the federal government to revive the economy, though he supported the Reconstruction Finance Corporation (1932) to extend loans to banks and other business enterprises. In 1932 he sought reelection but was defeated by Franklin D. Roosevelt. From 1947 to 1949 he headed a bipartisan commission to study ways of simplifying and improving the structure of the executive branch of the federal government. Hoover's books include Imperial Individualism (1922), The Challenge to Liberty (1934), Memoirs (3 vols, 1951-1952), and The Ordeal of Woodrow Wilson (1958).

Hopkins, Arthur [Melancthon] (1878-1950). American producer and playwright. His producing career started with The Poor Little Rich Girl (1913) and closed with The Magnificent Yankee (1946). He put on plays by Shakespeare, Ibsen, and O'Neill, and was the author of several plays and books.

Hopkins, Gerard Manley (1844-1889). English poet and Jesuit priest. He is known for his small number of brilliant poems on religion and nature, and for his revolutionary innovations in poetic technique. His poetry is distinguished by an intricate type of rhythm, which he called spring rhythm; by puns, internal rhymes, and intricate patterns of word-play; and by an extremely individual technique of elliptical phrasing and compound metaphor capable of great concentration of meaning. His work is thought to be indebted to Old English alliterative verse, to the METAPHYSICAL poets, especially George Herbert, and to traditional Welsh poetry.

Hopkins was a member of a large, artistically gifted family, and was himself talented in drawing and music as well as in poetry. He loved sensuous beauty; his earliest poems are lush and Keatsian, and for many years he kept diaries describing the beauties of nature. At Oxford University he was a student of Walter Pater and wrote a Platonic dialogue On the Origin of Beauty. He also came under the influence of Benjamin Jowett and Cardinal Newman. Converted to Roman Catholicism in 1866, he was inducted into the Jesuit order in 1868. He received his theological training in North Wales. Hopkins tried to compensate for his sensuous nature by entering on an extremely ascetic course of life. It was not till 1875 that, at the wish of his Rector, he broke a seven years' poetic silence and wrote The Wreck of the Deutschland, his first great poem. Subsequent poems celebrated the beauty and inscape of God-made nature, and reflected his personal experience as a priest and his concern about social conditions and industrial materialism. He became a professor of Greek in Dublin University in 1884. His last poems include his "terrible" sonnets, which express his sense of alienation from God—a state commonly experienced by mystics.

Hopkins' poems were very much in advance of his time and none were published during his lifetime. He sent them, with long letters, to the poet Robert Bridges, his friend from Oxford days; Bridges published them in 1918. Because of the originality of his poetry and the date of its publication Hopkins tends to be regarded as a leading modern poet rather than...
as a Victorian. His techniques influenced a number of 20th-century British and American poets, notably W. H. Auden and Dylan Thomas. Hopkins' letters, notebooks, and papers were published in four volumes from 1935 to 1938. These contain details of his metrical and aesthetic theories, accounts of his spiritual progress, and many descriptions of nature. Among Hopkins' best-known individual poems are The Windhover, Pied Beauty, The Caged Skylark, Fell, Randall, Spring and Fall, and The Leaden Echo and the Golden Echo.

Hopkins, Lemuel. See Hartfords Wits.

Hopkinson, Francis (1737-1791). American politician, writer, and musician. Devoted to the cause of the American colonies, he wrote A Pretty Story (1774), an allegorical satire describing the quarrel between America and England, and The Battle of the Keys, his best-known work. He was also a signor of the Declaration of Independence. His Seven Songs (1788) was the first book of music published by an American composer. See also COLUMBIAN MAGAZINE.

Hop-o'-my-thumb. A pigny or midget. The name has been given to several dwarfs, as well as being commonly used as a generic term.

Horace. Full Latin name, Quintus Horatius Flaccus (65-8 B.C.). Roman lyric poet and satirist. The son of a freed slave, Horace was born at Venusia in southern Italy. His father, a tax collector, spared no effort or expense to provide his son with the best possible education; he took Horace to Rome to study under the best Roman grammarians. To complete his education, Horace, then a young man of 20, enrolled at the University of Athens (45 B.C.). While he was there, word came that Caesar had been assassinated. Like many Roman intellectuals, Horace rallied to the cause of revolution and liberty, and, when Brutus appeared at Athens, he followed him, entering the senatorial army as a military tribune. After the defeat of Brutus at Philippi (42), Horace returned penniless to Rome and managed to get a job with the Roman civil service as a clerk.

Here he began writing his first successful poetry: a group of clever satires and a melange of iambic poems after the manner of Greek lyrics. These poems won him the admiration of Vergil who, in 38, introduced Horace to the influential patron Maecenas. Thus began a lifelong friendship between the patron and the young poet, and, in 33, Maecenas gave Horace a small estate in the Sabine Hills. There he polished his satires (The Satires) and his iambic poems (The Epodes); he published them in 30.

His great poetic work was his four-book collection of odes (The Carmina), the first three books of which appeared in 23. In them he displayed what Petronius termed a "painstaking felicity" of expression. Horace was the finished master of stanzaic meters, just as Vergil was the incomparable master of the longer and more sonorous dactylic hexameter. Horace's hexameters, as he used them in his satires and in his epistles (The Epistles), composed 22-8, were deliberately unmajestic; they employed every day diction, interspersed with occasional slang, and were written in a conversational tone in which whole passages, nevertheless, have the feeling of elegant, musical prose. Throughout his poetry, his personality, though seldom obtrusive, is always evident. His poetry is, indeed, his own most vivid biography. Here we sense the presence of a sly but never ungenerous man, a sometimes aloof lover of independence who was also the devoted friend of the emperor Augustus, of Maecenas, and of Vergil; an epicurean in good times and a stoic in adversity; an artist and a country gentleman who had learned the advantages of cultivating his own garden in poetry as well as in politics.

Among Horace's other works are the Carmen Saccelare, a liturgical hymn composed for the secular games held at Rome in 17, and the Ars Poetica (Art of Poetry) which was adapted as a handbook on style by the neoclassicists of the 16th and 17th centuries. Horace died in 8, only a few months after the death of his friend and patron Maecenas, beside whose grave he was buried. See CANDIA.

Horace (1640). A tragedy by Pierre Corneille. The material of the play is derived from Livy. Horace and his two brothers are chosen to represent Rome, Curiace and his two brothers to represent Alba, in a combat that will decide the war between the two cities. When his brothers are killed, Horace pretends to flee and thus contrives to kill each adversary separately. His sister Camille, the betrayer of Curiace, curses Rome. Infuriated, Horace kills her and is summoned before the king. Curiace's sister Sabine begs to be executed in Horace's place. His father pleads for him, and in view of his brave deed the king pardons Horace.

Horatian Ode upon Cromwell's Return from Ireland, An (1650). A poem by Andrew MARVELL. It celebrates Cromwell as a kind of famed and elemental force, but with elements of pity for Charles I and strong suggestions of uneasiness about a future with Cromwell in supreme power.

Horatii, the three. In Roman legend, three brothers of the Horatia gens, or clan. They are celebrated for their combat with the three Curatii, brothers from Alba Longa, to determine whether Rome or Alba was supreme. Two of the Horatii fell, while the Curatii, though each was severely wounded, stood their ground. The surviving Horatius, unhurt, feigned flight. The Curatii pursued him at unequal distances because of their wounds, and Horatius turned and killed them severally. He returned home in triumph bearing the bodies of the three Curatii. His sister Horatia, recognizing one of the bodies as her betrothed, began to weep. Angered by her tears in his moment of triumph, Horatius plunged his sword into her breast, exclaiming: "So perish every Roman woman who bewails a foe." Horatius was condemned to death for this murder, but was acquitted with a token punishment: a beam symbolizing a yoke was erected across the street and Horatius passed under it with covered head, thus showing submission to Roman law. The beam came to be known as "sister's gibbet."

Horatio. In Shakespeare's HAMLET, the loyal friend and confidant whom the dying Hamlet adores:
If thou didst ever hold me in thy heart,
Absent thee from felicity awhile,
And in this harsh world draw thy breath in pain,
To tell my story.

Horatius Coclès. Legendary hero of ancient Rome. When Lars Porsena attacked Rome in the 6th century B.C., Horatius and two companions defended a bridge across the Tiber against the entire Etruscan army while the bridge behind them was destroyed by the Romans. Horatius then swam the river safely. In his honor a statute was erected and he was given as much land as he could plow in a day. Another version has Horatius fighting alone and drowning in the Tiber.

Horatius’ exploits are the subject of the poem Horatius in Macaulay’s book of poems, The Lay of Ancient Rome (1842).

Horn, King. Hero of a 12th-century French metrical romance and a 13th-century English one. Son of the king of Sudenne, he is set adrift by the Saracens who kill his parents. He comes to Westernnesse, where he is brought up by the king and becomes the lover of the princess Rymenhild (or Rime). A companion betrays the affair, and Horn is banished. As a disguised adventurer he defeats a Saracen invasion in Ireland, but declines the reward of marriage to the princess and returns to Westernnesse to free Rymenhild from the threat of an unwelcome marriage, proving his identity by a magic ring she had given him. He leaves to recapture Sudenne from the Saracens, returns to release Rymenhild from a second unwelcome marriage, and finally takes her home to rule happily as king and queen of Sudenne. Horn Childe is a 14th-century English imitation with some variations. Hind Horn is a ballad describing Horn’s return to Rymenhild disguised as a Palmer.

Hornblower, Horatio. The courageous but sensitive hero of a series of popular novels by C. S. Forester. The novels, notable for their authentic historical background, follow Hornblower’s naval career from midshipman to admiral in the wars against Napoleon. The character appeared in The Happy Return (1937), Lord Hornblower (1946), Mr. Midshipman Hornblower (1950), and other books.

Horn Childe. See Horn, King.

Hornie, Auld. See Auld Hornie.

Horn of Fidelity. A horn sent by Morgan le Fay to King Arthur. No lady could drink out of it who was not “to her husband true”; all others were sure to spill the contents. The horn was carried to King Mark, and “his queene with a hundred ladies more” tried the experiment. Only four ladies present managed to “drinke cleane.” Ariosto’s enchanted cup possessed a similar spell. See Mantle of Fidelity.

Horn of Plenty. See Cornucopia.

Horns of Cuckoldry. See Cuckold.

Hornung, Ernest William (1866–1921). English novelist and short-story writer. He created Raffles, hero of The Amateur Cracksman (1889) and other books, and wrote novels about Australia. Hornung was the brother-in-law of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle.

Horsa. See Hengist.

Horse Sacrifice. In Hindu history, the Astvedha. This ritual was performed in ancient times by the absolute ruler of India in order to show his complete control over the land.

Horse’s Mouth, The (1944). A novel by Joyce Cary, the third in his first trilogy. It is the story of Gulley Jimson, passionate artist and exuberant, rakishly comic old man, whose hero is William Blake. Herself Surprised (1941) is about one of Gulley’s mistresses, the fascinating, down-to-earth Sara Monday. She is successively cook, fine lady, housekeeper, thief, and respectable middle-class wife. To Be a Pilgrim (1942) is the story of Sara’s other lover, the religious, near senile lawyer, Mr. Wilcher. The central character of each book tells his own story in his own distinctive idiom.

Hortensio. A friend to Petruchio and unsuccessful suitor to Bianca in Shakespeare’s The Taming of the Shrew. It is at Hortensio’s suggestion that Petruchio sets out to win the shrewish Katharina. Hortensio, rejected by Bianca, marries a rich but unmanageable widow.

Horus. A major god of the ancient Egyptians, the son of Osiris and Isis, sometimes referred to as the god of silence. The Greeks called him Harpocrates and portrayed “Horus the Child” as a boy with a finger in his mouth. As one of the solar deities, he was represented by a hawk, or as a hawk-headed man; his emblem was the winged sun disk.

Hosea. An Old Testament book named for its author, an 8th-century (B.C.) prophet. The book is in two distinct parts. The first, a personal history of the prophet’s home life with an errant wife, can be read as an allegory of God’s trials with a sinful Israel. The second part is a catalogue of Israel’s wickedness.

Host (Lat. hostia, an animal offered as a sacrificial victim). Bread consecrated in the Eucharist. It is so called in the Latin Church because it is considered a real victim of flesh, blood, and spirit, offered up in re-creation of Christ’s sacrifice. At the service of Benediction, or when carried in procession, it is exposed in a vessel called a monstrance. The elevation of the Host refers to that moment when the celebrant of the Mass lifts up the Host immediately after its consecration, so that it may be seen by the people.

Hostage, The (L’Ottage; 1909). A poetic drama by Paul Claudel. It is the first of the plays, which with Crusts and The Humiliation of the Father form a trilogy, about the aristocratic Courtois family during the 19th century. Sygne de Coufontaine saves the pope by marrying her former servant Toussaint Turelure, an opportunist now become the most powerful man in France. However, she cannot complete her sacrifice by ceasing to hate her husband and their new-born son; consequently, when the cousin she loves tries to shoot Turelure, she intercepts the bullet and dies. In Crusts (Le Pain Dur; 1914) the son Louis causes his father’s death and marries a Jewish woman, Sichel. The Humiliation of the Father (Le Père humilié; 1916) describes the love between their blind daughter Pensee and the brothers Orian and Orso de Homodarmes.

Hostos, Eugenio Maria de (1839–1903). Puerto Rican educator and man of letters. Hostos was educated in Spain where he wrote La peregrinación de Bayadón (1863), a political novel, and fought for the short-lived republic of 1868. His hopes that Puerto Rico might be granted autonomy with Santo Domingo and Cuba in a confederation of the Antilles were dashed by the imperialist attitude of the Spanish republics. Hostos continued, however, to work for this goal in Santo Domingo, where he lived until 1889, establishing its first normal school. After a 10-year stay in Chile, he returned to Santo Domingo in 1900, bitterly disappointed at the results of the Spanish-American War, which finally doomed his dream of Antillean federation.

Hostos is remembered, not only as a patriot, but also as an enlightened teacher, dedicated to progress and truth. His best-known work, Moral social (1889), is a guide to ethical social conduct which was designed as a school text. He also wrote a famous essay (1872) on Hamlet.

Hotel, The (1927). A novel by Elizabeth Bowen. She satirizes the empty social round of idle middle-class English people in a Riviera hotel. The heroine, Sydney Warren, passes through a period of devotion to a sophisticated older woman, a brief engagement to a clergyman, and then emerges from the hotel to freedom.

Hotel Universe (1930). A play by Philip Barry. Stephen Field's experience of life and the death of his philosophy enable the old man to act as a sort of mystic psychiatrist for a number of guests in his home in southern France.

Hotson, Leslie (1897– ). American scholar. One of the most indefatigable of 20th-century Shakespearean scholars, Hotson has established a reputation as a literary detective, largely as a result of his exhaustive research among unpublished records. His discoveries include the details of Christopher Marlowe's murder (The Death of Christopher Marlowe, 1925); the uncovering of new records related to Shakespeare's life (I, William Shakespeare, 1937; Shakespeare versus Shallow, 1931); an extraordinarily well-documented account of the first performance of Twelfth Night (The First Night of "Twelfth Night", 1954) and a highly controversial theory that Shakespeare's Globe was actually a theatre in the round (Shakespeare's Wooden O, 1959).

Houdon, Jean Antoine (1741-1828). French sculptor. He is famous for his animated, vigorously conceived yet delicately executed busts. He portrayed, among others, Voltaire, Diderot, Mirabeau, Jean Jacques Rousseau, George Washington, and Benjamin Franklin.

Hough, Emerson (1857–1923). American novelist. He is known especially for The Mississippi Bubble (1902), about the 18th-century French speculation in Louisiana. His other novels include The Covered Wagon (1922), about a train of 200 wagons moving westward in 1848, and North of Thirty-Six (1923), a story of herding on the Chisholm Trail.

Houghton, William Stanley (1881-1913). English dramatist. He became famous and made a fortune off one work, Hindle Wakes (1912). Within a year of the first performance in London, the play had been acted 2,000 times in London, Manchester, New York, and Chicago. It deals with the cotton mills districts of Lancashire. Houghton had begun his career in the business of his father, who was a cotton merchant.

Hougron, Jean (1923– ). French novelist. His first six novels, including Reap the Whirlwind (Tu récolteras la tempête: 1950) and Blaze of the Sun (Soleil au ventre; 1952), describe aspects of the hatred caused by the war in Indo-China. Later books are psychological suspense stories, such as Question of Character (Je reviendrai à Kandara; 1955).

Hound of Heaven, The (1893). The best-known poem of Francis Thompson. In startling cosmic imagery, arresting cadences, it presents the "autobiography" of a fugitive from God's redemptive love.

hours. Black-eyed damsel is said to be the reward of the faithful in the Muslim Paradise. Possessed of perpetual youth and beauty, they can renew their virginity at pleasure and are always equal in age with their husbands. According to the Koran, every believer will have 72 of these houris in Paradise and, depending on his wish, his intercourse may be fruitful or otherwise; if an offspring is desired, it will grow to full estate in an hour.

Hours, The (Horai). Greek goddesses of the seasons. In Greek, the word implied seasons, rather than hours, and these goddesses varied in number according to various concepts of the number of seasons in the year. Hesiod named them Eunomia, Dike, and Irene (Eirene).

Hours of Idleness (1807). The 1st book of poems published by Lord Byron. He was only 19 at the time, and some of the poems were written years earlier. The severe criticism in the Edinburgh Review brought forth the satire English Bards and Scotch Reviewers, Byron's first mature work.

House in Paris, The (1935). A novel by Elizabeth Bowen. A story of complex love affairs, infidelities, and tragedy is revealed largely through two children who meet by chance at a house in Paris for a day. The boy Leopold, the illegitimate issue of his mother's early love affair, is finally taken home to his mother and her new husband.

House of Fame, The (probably 1379 or 1380). An unfinished poem by Geoffrey Chaucer, of 2158 lines in octosyllabic couplets. It begins as a love-vision of the French type, but draws more on the works of Ovid, Vergil, and Dante. In the first "book" the poet introduces his dream and describes finding himself in the Temple of Venus. Here he finds engraved Vergil's story of Dido and Aeneas. In the second book he conducts a lively conversation with a great shining eagle who carries him to the House of Fame, presumably to learn more about love. But the third section shows lady Fame in her house distributing fame and slander among some of her applicants and denying any renown to others, all with arbitrary capriciousness. Then the poet is taken to the House of Rumor, inhabited by shipment, pilgrims, couriers, and other gossips, who increase the falsity of their tidings with each retelling.

House of Life, The. A sonnet sequence by Dante Gabriel Rossetti, written during the period between 1848 and 1881. Chiefly autobiographical, it was inspired by Elizabeth Siddal, the author's wife. The title refers to the house of human life in astrology.

House of Mirth, The (1905). A novel by Edith Wharton. Lily Bart, an orphan, tries to secure a wealthy husband, rejecting Lawrence Seldon, whom she loves but who lacks a fortune. Lily becomes involved with another man who tries to blackmail her, and is falsely accused of an intrigue with another woman's husband. Her fortunes become progressively worse until she becomes a milliner and eventually takes an overdose of sleeping pills. The intention of the novel was to satirize and reveal the weaknesses of New York society.

House of Pride. See Faerie Queene, The.
House of Riches. See Faerie Queen, The.

House of the Dead, The (Zapiski iz myortvogo doma; 1861–1862). An account of life in a Siberian prison by Feodor Dostoevski. The work is based on Dostoevski’s own experiences in the Omsk prison (1850–1854), to which he was sentenced for having belonged to the Petrashevski circle, a study group interested in French Utopian socialism.

House of the Seven Gables, The (1851). A novel by Nathaniel Hawthorne. Iron-willed, grasping Colonel Pyncheon obtained the desirable land on which he built the pretentious House of the Seven Gables by accusing its humble owner, one Matthew Maule, of witchcraft. Old Maule, hanged for his crime, cursed the Colonel, saying “God will give him blood to drink.” That curse, reverberating down the generations, affects the whole family.

At the time of the story, the withered old spinster, Hepzibah Pyncheon, and her brother Clifford live in the house. Desperately poor, Hepzibah must open a cent-shop in order to refuse aid from Judge Jaffrey. Hawthorne’s intellectual and moral heir of the old colonel. Clifford has just returned from an extended imprisonment for the murder of an uncle. The murder, in reality committed by Jaffrey, enabled the latter to gain control of the Pyncheon fortune. Clifford, a weak-willed aesthete, has been destroyed by the 30-year sentence.

Phoebe, a visiting Pyncheon country cousin, and Holgrave, the young daguerreotypist boarding in the house, fall in love. Holgrave, a descendant of Matthew Maule, breaks the family curse, refusing to betray Phoebe by exercising his mesmeric powers. Hawthorne, in treating the weight of past guilt, once again reveals an unpardonable sin: the violation of another’s soul.

Housman, Alfred Edward (1859–1936). English poet and Latin scholar. He is best known for his collection of poems called A Shropshire Lad (1896). These lyrics, set against a background of the English countryside and showing the influence of traditional English ballads and classical verse, are marked by their spirit of irony, and by their melancholy sense of youthful disillusionment, the transitoriness of youth and love, and the sadness of life. Their tone is ascribed to the author’s disappointment at his mediocre performance at his final examinations at Oxford and to his passionate love for a college friend, Moses Jackson. Jackson is referred to in the poems by the classical name of Terence. In later years Housman became a professor of Latin, edited Manilius’ Astronomica, and published Last Poems (1922). These poems, and those collected posthumously by his brother, Laurence Housman, in More Poems (1936), were mostly written during the same period as A Shropshire Lad. Shropshire is an English county. Two of Housman’s best-known poems are Loveliest of trees, the cherry now... and Terence, This [poetry] is Stupid Stuff... .

Housman, Laurence (1865–1959). English novelist, dramatist, and illustrator. He was the brother of A. E. Housman. His first—almost his only—popular success came by accident. He published anonymously An Englishwoman’s Love Letters (1900). They were accepted by the public as genuine. With 32 of his plays censored in one way or another, he has been called “England’s most censored playwright,” but his Victoria Regina (1934), with Helen Hayes, was an enormous success in America. His work is brilliantly versatile: he was a beautiful draughtsman, a fine poet, and a delightful writer of fantastic stories.

Houssain. The brother of Prince Ahmed in one of the Arabian Nights stories. He possesses a piece of carpet or tapestry of such wonderful power that anyone has only to sit upon it and he transported in a moment to any place he desires. See Carpet, Magic.

Houston, Sam [uel] (1793–1863). American soldier and statesman. Settling in Texas in 1833, Houston became a champion of Texan independence from Mexico. As commander-in-chief of the Texan army, he decisively defeated General Santa Anna at San Jacinto (1836) and served as president of the new republic (1836–1838, 1841–1844). After Texas was admitted to the Union in 1845, he became one of the first two senators from the state. He was elected governor in 1859 but was deposed when he refused to approve the entrance of Texas into the Confederacy.

Houyhnhnms (pronounced whinnimland). The country of Gulliver’s fourth voyage in Jonathan Swift’s Gulliver’s Travels, inhabited by Houyhnhnms, a race of horses. The Houyhnhnms, an embodiment of all that is good in mankind, are endowed with virtue and reason and live an idyllic existence. They hold in subjection the Yahoos, an inferior race whom Gulliver closely resembles. The Houyhnhnms consider Gulliver inferior, but he learns from them—so much so that, when he returns finally to his own country, he finds his fellow man so repellent that he becomes a confirmed misanthrope.

Hovey, Richard (1864–1900). American poet and dramatist. Hovey studied painting; became a candidate for priest’s orders (never completed), and finally turned to newspaper work. Known for his exaggerated behavior, he adopted the costume of Oscar Wilde. He was impressed by Mallarmé and Maeterlinck, translating several of the latter’s plays into English. In 1892, he and his friend Bliss Carman went to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick; the two then published Songs from Vagabondia (1894). Hovey’s best-known poems include Men of Dartmouth, Eleazar Wheelock, and Stein Song.

Howard, Leslie (1893–1943). English actor. He was popular in the U.S. as both a stage and screen performer, appearing in Berkeley Square, Hamlet and The Petrified Forest. He died in an airplane accident in World War II (his plane was probably shot down).

Howard, Sidney [Goe] (1891–1939). American dramatist. Howard early did adaptations from foreign plays and collaborated with Edward Sheldon on Bewitched (1924). His first original play to attract attention was the Pulitzer Prize-winning They Knew What They Wanted. Best known of his later plays are The Silver Cord and Yellow Jacket (1954), a documentary dealing with the conquest of yellow fever, written with Paul de Kruif. Howard also wrote Lucky Sam McCarver (1925); Ned McCobb’s Daughter (1926); Salvation (1928), with Charles MacArthur; Late Song (1930), with Will Irwin, and Dodsworth (1934), with Sinclair Lewis.

Howards End (1910). A novel by E. M. Forster. It deals with an English country house called Howards End and its influence on the lives of the materialistic Wilcoxes, the cultured and idealistic Schlegel sisters, and the poor bank clerk Leonard Bast. The Schlegels try to befriend Bast. Mr. Wilcox, whom Margaret Schlegel later marries, gives him financial advice which ruins him. Helen Schlegel becomes his mistress for a short time and bears his son; thereafter Charles Wilcox thwarts and accidentally kills him. The house passes from intuitive, half-mystical Mrs. Wilcox to her husband's second wife, Margaret Schlegel, to Margaret's nephew, Leonard Bast's son. Illustrating Forster's motto "Only connect," the house brings together three important elements in English society: money and successful business in the Wilcoxes, culture in the Schlegels, and the lower classes in Leonard Bast.

Howe, Anna. In Samuel Richardson's novel Clarissa Harlowe, the friend and correspondent of Clarissa. She treats Clarissa with loyalty and affection, but more in the spirit of worldly prudence than with understanding. She is unable to save Clarissa, despite her sound and practical common sense.

Howe, E[dgar] W[atson] (1853–1937). American editor and novelist. He is known for his first novel, The Story of a Country Town (1883), one of the early examples of realism in American fiction. Howe wrote other novels of less importance and several collections of editorials and aphorisms, including Lay Sermons (1911), Ventures in Common Sense (1919), and The Indignations of E. W. Howe (1933).

Howe, Julia Ward (1819–1910). American poet and reformer. In 1843 she married Samuel Gridley Howe, the noted humanitarian and teacher of the blind, and soon came to know many of New England's distinguished men and women. After her husband's death she continued his work and lectured on woman suffrage, prison reform, and international peace. Although she is remembered chiefly for The Battle Hymn of the Republic, she wrote several collections of verse, including Passion Flowers (1854) and Later Lyrics (1866), and is the author of Sex and Education (1874), Modern Society (1881), and Reminiscences (1899).

Howe, M[ark] A[ntony] DeWolfe (1864–1960). American biographer and editor. Howe was associated with several magazines, especially the Atlantic Monthly. Although his books have a wide range, he was preeminent in the field of biography. He wrote biographies of Phillips Brooks (1899), Charles Eliot Norton (1913), Barrett Wendell (1924), for which he was awarded a Pulitzer Prize, John Jay Chapman (1937), and several others. He also edited the series Beacon Biographies (31 vols., 1899–1910) and wrote several volumes of verse. A Venture in Remembrance (1941) is his autobiography.

Howe, Samuel Gridley (1801–1876). American physician, teacher, and humanitarian. After receiving a medical degree from Harvard in 1824, he sailed to Greece, where he spent six years aiding the Greeks in their struggle for independence from Turkey. In 1831 he was named director of the school for the blind in Boston that later became the Perkins Institute; his best-known patient was the blind deaf-mute Laura Bridgman (1829–1889), whom he trained by means of a raised type that he had devised and by other methods that later proved successful with Helen Keller. He was also interested in helping other hand-capped persons. Active in the antislavery clause, he founded, with his wife, Julia Ward Howe, an abolitionist newspaper, The Commonwealth. He subsequently returned to Europe to help the Cretans in their revolt against the Turks. His best-known work is Historical Sketches of the Greek Revolution (1828). Mrs. Howe wrote a Memoir (1876) of her husband's life.

Howell, James (1594–1666). Welsh-born English author. He is best known for his Epistolae Hoeliæae: Familiar Letters (1645–1659), most of which were written while he was imprisoned as a Royalist sympathizer during the Civil War. He also compiled a Lexicon Tetrataglottorun (1660), a polyglot dictionary of English, French, Italian, and Spanish.

Howells, William Dean (1837–1920). American novelist, editor, critic, and poet. Born and raised in Ohio, he had little schooling, but regularly contributed poems and tales to newspapers. Howells wrote of his boyhood and youth in the autobiographical A Boy's Town (1890) and Years of my Youth (1916). By the time he was 23, he had published a book of poems, Poems of Two Friends (1860), and a campaign life of Abraham Lincoln. In 1860, he made a literary pilgrimage to Boston, where he was received by Lowell, Holmes, and Fields.

The reward for his campaign biography was the consulship in Venice, where Howells spent the war years. On his return, he published Venetian Life (1866), a series of travel letters and impressions. He worked for several magazines, finally becoming the editor of The Atlantic Monthly in 1871. A firm friend of Mark Twain, he also encouraged another admirer, the young Henry James.

Howells' most important contribution to literary criticism is his theory of realistic fiction. He shared with George Eliot a literary interest in the commonplace, and defined realism as "nothing more or less than the truthful treatment of material." Howells' bias is revealed, however, when he chooses Jane Austen as the most truthful of writers. Among his own books, Their Wedding Journey, A Modern Instance, and The Rise of Silas Lapham illustrate his theory best.

Leaving the Atlantic, Howells wrote a column for Harper's; influenced by Tolstoy and the American socialist Laurence Gronlund, he supplemented his realism with liberal views. A Hazard of New Fortunes and A Traveller from Altruria are studies of American social institutions. Later in life, his militant liberalism subsiding, Howells continued to write realistic novels. Among them, The Landlord at Lion's Head (1887) and The Kentons (1902) approach his best earlier work in quality. He issued a number of reviews and articles collected from magazines, the most important of which is My Mark Twain (1910).

Howells' reputation continued to grow; known as the dean of American letters, he was president of the American Academy of Arts and Letters. Although he praised the posthumously published poems of Emily Dickinson, and encouraged Stephen Crane and Frank Norris, he was regarded as a genteel sentimentalist by Sinclair Lewis, H. L. Mencken, and Theodore Dreiser. Modern evaluation, restoring his reputation, grants him unquestioned historical importance in the development of American literature. Howelglass or Owlglass, Tyll. See Eulen-Spiegel.

How They Brought the Good News from Ghent to Aix (1845). A ballad by Robert Browning. Noted for its onomatopoeic effects, it describes a purely imaginary incident.

How to Write Short Stories (1924). A collection of 10 stories by Ring Lardner. The sardonic preface discloses that the purpose of the volume is to discuss the art of short-story writing, the stories that follow being "samples." Among them are such classic Lardner tales as Alibi Ike and Champion.

Hrosvitha or Hrotsvitha. See Roswitha.

Hrothgar. See Beowulf.

Hsi Yu Chi (Journey to the West). Chinese novel of the Ming Dynasty (1368-1644) by Wu Ch'eng-en (c. 1500-1580). Describes the adventures of the priest Hsüan-tsang during his pilgrimage to India in search of the scriptures, accompanied by Monkey and other creatures. Humorous, satirical, and absurd, it has enjoyed continued popularity. Partially translated by Arthur Waley, Monkey (1943).

Hsün Tzu. Chinese Confucian work attributed to Hsin Ch'ing (c. 300 B.C.). It exerted considerable influence during the Han period (202 B.C.-A.D. 220). The first Confucian text in expository form, it contradicts the Mercius by saying that man is by nature evil, and attacks superstition, extolling rationalism in its stead. It places great emphasis on the need for education.

Huang Ti. A legendary emperor of China (c. 2600 B.C.). He is credited with the invention of bricks, musical instruments, etc. His name means yellow emperor.

Hubbard, Elbert (1856-1915). American businessman, printer, and writer. At the age of 36, Hubbard stopped selling soap and toured Europe. Highly impressed by the Kelmscott Press of William Morris, he returned to East Aurora, New York, and founded the Roycroft Press. He issued many "arty" books and magazines, and produced such household objects as pottery, metal and leather work, and furniture. He wrote a series of 170 Little Journeys to the homes of notable men and women, and published two magazines, The Philistine (1895-1915) and The Fra (1908-1917), largely filled with his own writings. Himself a self-conscious aesthete, Hubbard was known as "Fra Elbertus" or "the Fra." His most successful publication was A Message to Garcia, an exhortation to fidelity and enterprise that became enormously popular among businessmen; they distributed copies to their employees to provide "inspiration." Hubbard appeared on the vaudeville stage, and attracted many people of East Aurora. He died when the S. S. Lusitania was sunk in the Irish Sea by a German submarine.

Huch, Ricarda (1864-1947). German novelist, poet, and essayist. She was especially noted for her historical sense as expressed, for example, in the novels of her Garibaldi cycle: Die Verteidigung Rom (The Defense of Rome, 1906), Der Kampf um Rome (The Struggle for Rome, 1907) and Das Leben des Grafen Frederigo Conjaloneri (Life of Count Frederigo Conjaloneri, 1910). Her essays on German romanticism are also well known.

Huckleberry Finn, The Adventures of (1884). A novel by Mark Twain. Huck escapes from the lonely cabin in which his drunken, brutal father had imprisoned him; on Jackson's island he meets Jim, a runaway slave. Together they float down the Mississippi River on a raft, occasionally stopping at the banks. In these brief episodes Huck participates in the lives of others, witnessing corruption, moral decay, and intellectual impoverishment. He learns from Jim of the dignity and worth of a human being. Life on the river comes to an end when Jim is captured; Huck, reunited with Tom Sawyer, helps him to escape, subordinating society's morality to his own sense of justice and honor. When Tom's Aunt Sally says she wants to adopt Huck, he decides to head westward to avoid being "civilized."

Hudibras (1663, 1664, 1678). A long satirical poem in three parts by Samuel Butler, directed against the hypocrisy and intolerance of the Puritans. Its hero Hudibras, modeled after various Presbyterian worthies of the Commonwealth, is a country justice who sets out with his squire Ralpho, an Independent, to reform abuses and enforce the laws for the suppression of popular amusements. Like Don Quixote, Hudibras is of comical appearance, humpbacked and pottibelled, with an untidy yellow-red beard. He, too, rides a broken-down nag and receives much punishment in the performance of his exploits. The poem, written in jingling, doggerel couplets, gave rise to the adjective hudibrastic, meaning mock-heroic or in the style of Hudibras.

Hudson, Henry (died after 1611). English navigator and explorer. Engaged by the Dutch East India Co. to find a Northwest Passage to the Orient, he sailed to America on the Half Moon and explored the river that now bears his name, reaching as far as Albany (1609). On a later voyage he was set adrift by his own men.

Hudson, Sir Jeffrey (1619-1682). English dwarf, at one time page to Queen Henrietta Maria. When he was 30 years old, he was under two feet high, but later reached a height of about three feet nine inches. He was a cavalry captain in the Royalist army during the Civil War. Afterwards he was captured by pirates and sold as a slave in Barbary, but managed to escape. He is a character in Scott's Peveril of the Peak (1823). See William Evans.

Hudson, Stephen. Pen name, Sidney Schiff (1869-1944). English novelist and translator. Most of his novels are about a single group of persons and include Tony (1924), Richard, Myrtle, and I (1926), and A True Story (1930). Hudson completed Scott Moncrieff's translation of Proust's Remembrance of Things Past.

Hudson, William Henry (1841-1922). English naturalist and novelist, born in Argentina of American parentage. He became a naturalized British subject in 1900. He is best known for his writings on nature subjects, especially those with an Argentine background. His books include The Purple Land (1885), Argentine Ornithology (1888-1889), Nature in Downland (1900), El Ombú (1902), Little Boy Lost (1905), and A Shepherd's Life (1910). He is best remembered for Green Mansions and his autobiographical Far Away and Long Ago (1918).
Hughes River School. The name given to a group of 19th century U.S. artists who painted rural scenes, especially in the Catskills, after 1830. Realistic, poetic, or fantastic interpretations were given to these landscapes, which were popularized by Thomas Cole (1801-1848) and Asher B. Durant (1796-1886). Cole, the leader of the movement, painted both visionary and more factual views, while Durant represented large scenes with patiently accurate draftsmanship.

Hudson's Bay Company. A joint stock company chartered in 1670 by Charles II for the purpose of purchasing furs from the Indians. Its territory, the Hudson's Bay Territory or Rupert's Land, included all the streams flowing into Hudson Bay. It was sold to the British government (1869) and incorporated with the Dominion of Canada (1870).

Hueffer, Ford Madox. See Ford Madox Ford.
Huerta, Vicente Garcia de la. See Vicente
García de la Huerta.

Hughes, Charles Evans (1862-1948). American jurist and public official. Hughes's distinguished legal career led to his being elected governor of New York in 1906 and 1908. In 1910 he was appointed to the Supreme Court by President Taft, but resigned to run against Woodrow Wilson for the presidency in 1916. Defeated by a narrow margin, he returned to law practice, but served as secretary of state from 1921 to 1926 when he became a member of the courts of international arbitration and justice at the Hague.
In 1930 President Hoover appointed him chief justice of the Supreme Court; he served until 1941. Moder-erately conservative in his views, he supported many of the measures proposed by President Roosevelt, although he fought the president's court reorganization plan and opposed government agencies that usurped the functions of courts.

Hughes, Hatcher (1881-1945). American dramatist and teacher at Columbia University. He is best known for the Pulitzer Prize-winning Hell-Bent for Heaven (1923), a play about a religious fanatic among the North Carolina mountaineers. With Elmer Rice he wrote Wake Up, Jonathan (1921), and alone he wrote several other successful plays.

Hughes, [James] Langston (1902- ). American poet. Marked by the use of the rhythms of the blues and the ballad, often documentary in tone, his poems deal with the trials and joys of the American Negro. He has published volumes of verse from Weary Blues (1926) and The Dream Keeper (1932) to Ask Your Mama (1961). From his own poem, Cross, he made the play Mulatto (1935); this in turn was produced in a musical version called The Barrier (1950). He is also known for his humorous sketches, written originally for a Negro newspaper, which are collected in Simple Speaks His Mind (1930) and The Best of Simple (1961). His other works include the novel Not Without Laughter (1930) and The Ways of White Folks (1934), a short-story collection.

Hughes, Richard (1900- ). English novelist and dramatist. The novel A High Wind in Jamaica is generally considered to be his greatest achievement.

"Hudibras Catechized." An engraving by Hogarth for Samuel Butler's Hudibras. (1726).
Hughes, Thomas

Hazard (1938) is a sea story. The Fox in the Attic (1961) is the first part of a long historical novel to be entitled The Human Predicament. Described by its author as a study of his own times, the novel opens in 1923 and is to close with the Second World War.

Hughes, Thomas (1822-1896). English jurist, reformer, and author. He wrote Tom Brown's School Days and its sequel, Tom Brown at Oxford (1861). He was associated with Christian Socialism, and worked ardently to improve the conditions of the poor.

Hugh of Lincoln, St. (c. 1246-1255). English boy said to have been tortured and murdered by the Jews of Lincoln, a number of whom were hanged in consequence. Legends of miracles gathered around his name, such as the story that he spoke to his mother, though dead, and identified his murderer. His tragedy appears in Chaucer's Prioress's Tale, Alphonius of Lincoln (1459), Marlowe's The Jew of Malta (1589), and a number of ballads such as Sir Hugh, Hugh of Lincoln, The Jew's Daughter.

Hugh Selwyn Mauberley (1920). A poem in several sections by Ezra Pound. Although there has been much discussion on the exact relationship between Pound and his persona Mauberley, the poem represents Pound's farewell to London and is a vehement denunciation of a civilization marked by war, the commercialization of the arts, and a general and sexual sterility. The artist either prostitutes his art as did Arnold Bennett ("Mr. Nixon") or he manages to barely exist in a solitary and destitute state as did Ford Madox Ford (the "stylist"). Mauberley himself is finally capable of only a refined and delicate art in such a corrupt civilization. It has been suggested that Mauberley represents the poet Pound would have become had he remained the simple imigrant, unconcerned by the cultural and economic problems that from this point on were to occupy him.

Hugin and Munin. In Scandinavian mythology, the two ravens, typifying Thought and Memory, which sat on Odin's shoulders and brought him news from earth.

Hugo, Victor [Marie] (1802-1885). French poet, novelist, dramatist, and leader of the romantic movement in France. Like Chateaubriand, the literary figure he so admired, Hugo played an active part in political life. Serving first as a peer under the monarchy of Louis Philippe, he transferred his loyalties to the republicans in 1848 and was elected to the popular assembly. Deeply disturbed by the restoration of the Second Empire, in 1851 Hugo fled France, living in exile for 18 years in the Channel Islands. His last public office was held under the Third Republic, in which he served as a senator. His love of liberty and his hopes for mankind were regarded, however, as a poet's dream, and Hugo had little real political influence during this period. If he lacked political influence, Hugo's influence upon French literature of the 19th century was unrivaled. In each genre he revealed himself as a romantic par excellence (see ROMANTICISM). The voice of his poetry is always musical, often highly personal, reflective, and sometimes characterized by gentle melancholy. Often considered France's greatest lyric poet, Hugo experimented with language and with rhythm, displaying a fine sensitivity to the sound and color of words. Les Feuilles d'Automne (1831) and Contemplations (1856), both describe the moods and emotions of the poet in richly sonorous verse. In other volumes, however, such as Les Châtiments (1853) which attacked Napoleon III or Les Chants du Crépuscule (1835), Hugo conceived of the poet's role as public and prophetic. The poet should lead and guide the people, rather than express his own responses to nature's beauty or personal sorrow. This same strain appears again in Hugo's long novels which reveal a humanitarian interest in the problems and suffering of the common man. Stylistically the novels are marked by violent melodrama, panoramic sweep, and the colorful use of language. These novels, best known of Hugo's work to the English audience, include HAN OF ICELAND, THE HUNCHBACK OF NOTRE DAME, LES MISÉRABLES, TOILERS OF THE SEA, THE MAN WHO LAUGHS, and NINETY-THREE. In the drama his preface to Cromwell (1827) became a manifesto adopted by the romantic dramatists. Hugo asserted the playwright's independence from the rigid rules of classicism. He suggested such innovations as a mixture of the comic and the tragic, colloquial dialogue, new freedom in meter and from the traditional unities of time and place. His own plays, historical melodramas filled with rather wooden typically romantic personages, include Hernani (1830), Ruy Blas (1838) and Les Burgraves (1843). Some of these are better known today as sources for operatic libretto, notably Hernani and Le Roi S'amuse (1832; Rigoletto), both set to music by Verdi, and Angelo (1835), which became Ponchielli's La Gioconda.

Huguenots. A term applied to French Protestants during the religious wars of the 16th and 17th centuries. The name was first applied to citizens of medieval Geneva who resisted the claims of the dukes of Savoy over the city; it is probably an adaptation of Eidgenossen (Ger., "confederates"). See NANTES, EDICT OF.

Huis Clos. See No Exit.

Hulda. Old German goddess of marriage and fecundity who sent bridegrooms to maidsens and children to the married. The name means "the Benignant," and is an euphemistic appellation.

Hull, Edith Maude. See SHEIK, THE.

Hull, Isaac. See CONSTITUTION.

Hull, Hell, and Halifax. An old beggars' and vagabonds' "prayer." As quoted by Taylor, the Water Poet (early 17th century), it was:

From Hull, Hell, and Halifax,
Good Lord, deliver us.

Hell was probably the least feared as being farthest from them; Hull was to be avoided because it was so well governed that beggars had little chance of getting anything without doing hard labor for it; and Halifax, because anyone caught stealing in that town was beheaded without intermediate proceedings.

Hulme, Thomas Ernest (1883-1917). English critic and philosopher. He is noted for Speculations (1924) and Notes on Language and Style (1929). He was killed in World War I, but his ideas were later widely popularized by T. S. Eliot and Ezra Pound. Hulme distinguished classicism, which he considered true and "realistic," from humanism and romanticism, both of which he judged false and "unrealistic." Humanism, he claimed, erroneously described man as "naturally" good and capable of perfection; classicism, on the contrary, truthfully depicted man as "intrinsically bad or limited, but disciplined by order and tradition to something fairly decent." Humanistic (and romantical) art, likewise, was undiscovered and precise, he concluded, while classic art was "clean, clear-cut, and mechanical." See IMAGISM.

huma. A fabulous Oriental bird always on the wing. It is said that every head over which its shadow passes will wear a crown.

Human Age, The. A satirical prose epic by Wyndham Lewis. It consists of The Childermans (1928), and Monstre Gai and Malign Fiesta (1955). The subject is a surrealistic journey to a nightmare heaven. The description is macabre and imaginative; the language is obscure—full of allusion, word-play, and parody.

Human Comedy, The. See COMÉDIE HUMAINE, LA.

Humanism. An attitude of the mind that accom-ppanied the flowering of the Renaissance. The term refers to several varied literary and scholarly activities inspired by the study of antiquity but differing in aim and scope. Humanism in the Renaissance took its name from the studia humanitatis, those studies (grammar, rhetoric, poetry, history, and moral philosophy) that were thought to possess human value: the ability to make man a fully realized human creature, elevated and distinct from the lower animals. The ancient writers of Greece and Rome were particularly revered, as it was felt that they had excelled in such studies and would thus be of value in teaching the modern Christian how to attain the perfections of life. This aspect of Humanism, sometimes called the REVIVAL OF ANTIQUITY, includes the study of the classics; editorial and philological work on ancient texts; the search of enthusiasts for unknown but extant manuscripts, statues, medals, and coins; the writing of modern works in classical Latin; and the teaching of the classics in universities and to the children of the nobility.

Our English term humanists, used to designate the participants in the above-mentioned activities, is de-erived from the Italian word umanista, which was first used in the late 16th century to describe a university teacher of the humanities. Renaissance humanists include scholars and poets such as Petrarch, often called the first humanist; instigators of "the revival" such as the Greek scholar Chrysoloras; the philologists Valla and Erasmus; archaeologists and antiquarians such as Poggio and Circus; the educators Vittorino of Feltre and Guarino of Verona; philosophers, historians, and men of letters such as Pius II and Leonardo Bruni; and a host of secretaries, chancellors, legates, and other royal advisors who, having imbibed the spirit of the period, used their mastery of eloquence in practical labors. Outstanding English humanists during the Renaissance were More, Colet, Elyot, and Ascham.

The origins of Humanism have been found to lie in the introduction of Greek studies into Italy by refugee and other visiting scholars from the Byzantine world; and in the economic flowering of the Italian city-states, which provided the necessary wealth and leisure for cultural activities. From Italy, Humanism spread north to France, England, the Netherlands, and Germany as well as Spain. By the time of its arrival in the northern countries, however, the purely cultural aims gave way to the needs of the Reformation; theological disputation and educational theory assumed greater importance than the study and imitation of pagan authors and text. In succeeding centuries, the influence of Humanism persisted mainly in the school curricula.

Modern Humanism (see NEO-HUMANISM) only vaguely resembles the Renaissance brand, and is primarily a secular philosophy devoted to the propagation of a self-sufficient system of human values.

Humbaba. A one-eyed monster in the Epic of Gilgamesh. This gorgan-faced giant, whose eye can strike men dead, who breathes fire and plague, and who speaks in a whirlwind, is the guardian of the forest of the gods. He is killed by Gilgamesh and Enkidu, with the help of the sun-god, who blinds him with searing winds.

Humboldt, Baron Alexander von (1769-1859). German naturalist. With Aimé Bonpland, a French botanist, he traveled throughout Latin America (1799-1804), studying physical geography and metroology; in the Andes, he determined the relationship between altitude and temperature, and he also discovered the cool Peruvian current that now bears his name. The volumes in his Voyage aux régions équi-noxiales du Nouveau Continent (1807 ff.) greatly influenced later explorers and give an excellent picture of political and economic conditions in Latin America on the eve of independence. His main work is Kosmos (1845-1862), a description of the physical universe. He was the brother of Wilhelm von Humboldt.

Humboldt, Wilhelm von (1767-1835). German philologist, statesman, and educator. The brother of Alexander von Humboldt, he was a friend of both Goethe and Schiller. His most important work is Über die Kausprache auf der Insel Java (On the Kawi Language of the Island of Java, 1836-1840). See WEIMAR CLASSICISM.

Hume, David (1711-1776). Scottish philosopher and historian. His empirical outlook is clearly seen in his Natural History of Religion (1757), Dialogues concerning Natural Religion (1779), in which anthropomorphism is assailed, and in his essay On Miracles where he asserts that "no testimony for any kind of miracle has ever amounted to a probability, much less a proof." His philosophical skepticism, often referred to as Humanism, restricts human knowledge to the experience of ideas and impressions, and has been of extraordinary importance in the history of modern metaphysical thinking. Hume was the author of many treaties and essays, and of a history of England during the reigns of James I and Charles I. His best-known work is Philosophical Essays Concerning Human Understanding (1748), later issued as An Enquiry Concerning Human Understanding.

Humiliation of the Father, The. See HOSTAGE, THE.

Humor. An obsolete medical term for the supposed four principal humors or liquids of the body. In medieval times, these were supposed to be blood, phlegm, yellow bile, and black bile. They were thought to correspond to the four principal temperaments: the sanguine, the phlegmatic, the choleric, the melancholic. This idea was still popular in Elizabethan days. Ben Jonson's comedy, Every Man in His Humour, makes his characters stereotyped with one ruling temperament for each. Albrecht Dürer is said to have thought of the four temperaments and humors in connection with his paintings of the four evangelists.

Humperdinck, Engelbert (1854–1921). German composer. A friend of Richard Wagner, he is best known for his fairy-tale opera Hänself und Gretel (1893). He also composed incidental music for Shakespeare and for Maeterlinck's play The Blue Bird.

Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester and earl of Pembroke (1391–1447). English noble. The youngest son of Henry IV, he was known as a patron of learning and donated his library to Balliol College, Oxford. Upon the death of his brother Henry V, he served as protector for the young Henry VI. His first marriage having been annulled in 1428, he married his mistress, Eleanor Cobham, whose doblings in sorcery contributed to his downfall in 1447. He appears in Shakespeare's Henry IV: Part I, Henry V, and Henry VI: Part I and Part II.

Humphrey Clinker. The Expedition of (1771). An epistolary novel by Tobias Smollett. The letters are written by Matthew Bramble, his sister Tabitha, their niece, their nephew, and their maid Winifred Jenkins. Each correspondent has a highly individual style and caricatures himself unhappily. The titular hero of this comic masterpiece, who plays a lesser role than the Brambles, is a workhouse lad who enters into their service by chance and who later becomes a Methodist preacher. He falls in love with Winifred, and is eventually found to be the natural son of Mr. Bramble. The "experiment" of the title is a family tour through England and Scotland, during which the correspondents express surprisingly varied reactions to the same events. Of particular note is the picture of Hot Wells (a sobriquet for the city of Bath), a fashionable watering place. See Captain Limmahgo.

Humphries, David. See Hartford Wits.

Hunchback of Notre Dame, The (Notre Dame de Paris) (1831). A romance of medieval times by Victor Hugo centering about the life of the great Parisian cathedral. The principal characters are Esmeralda, the gypsy dancer in love with Captain Phoebus, Claude Frollo, the hypocritical archdeacon, whose evil passion for Esmeralda causes him to denounce her as a witch, and Quasimodo, the "Hunchback of Notre Dame," a deformed bellringer, whose devotion saves Esmeralda for a time when she seeks protection from the mob in the belfry of the Cathedral. Esmeralda is finally executed, and Quasimodo throws the bell from the towers of Notre Dame.

Hundred Days. The days between March 20 and June 28, 1815. On March 20, Napoleon reoccupied the Tuileries after his escape from Elba; June 28 was the date of the second restoration of Louis XVIII. Napoleon left Elba February 26; landed near Cannes, March 1; entered Paris, March 20; and signed his abdication June 22, three days after the fatal battle at Waterloo.

Hundred-Handed, The (Hekatoncheires). In Greek mythology, three hundred-armed giants, offspring of Ouranus and Ge. They assisted Zeus in his war against the Titans. Their names were Cottus (Kottos), Briareus (also called Aegaeon), and Gyes.

Hundred Years' War (1337–1453). The long series of wars between France and England, beginning in the reign of Edward III and ending in that of Henry VI.

The first battle was a naval action off Sluys, and the last the fight at Castillon. The war originated in English claims to the French crown, and resulted in the English being expelled from the whole of France, except Calais.

Huneker, James Gibbons (1860–1921). American critic and man of letters. Although Huneker's greatest area of concentration was music, he is known for his impressionistic criticism in all fields of art. Iconoclasts (1905) called attention to many European playwrights up to that time little known in the U.S. Other collections of critical and biographical pieces were Mezzotints in Modern Music (1899), Chopin (1900), Overtones (1904), Egoists (1909), and New Cosmopolis (1915). He also published two collections of short stories, Melomanics (1902) and Visionaries (1905), and one novel, Painted Veils: Steeplejack (2 vols., 1919), his autobiography, contains many of his views on art.

Hungerford, Margaret Wolfe. Born Hamilton (18557–1897). Irish novelist. She wrote more than 30 novels, of which the best-known is Molly Bawn (1878). Most of her books were signed "The Duchess."

Hunger strike. The refusal of a prisoner or a prominent person to take any food until he has been released or secures some desired concession. The practice seems to have originated in Russia, but was widely employed by suffragette prisoners in England during the early years of the 20th century and later by Irish political prisoners. The hunger strike was used to particular effect by Bhikhu Patanjali Gandhi, the Indian nationalist, in his struggle with the British.

Hung Lou Meng. Chinese novel by Tso Huie-chin of the Ch'ing Dynasty (1644–1912). Auto-biographical in nature, it tells the decline in fortune of the Chia family, giving a vivid picture of the social life of the times. Written in the colloquial, it has had an enduring popularity. See Chi-chen Wang, Dream of the Red Chamber (1958).

Hunt, Henry. Called Orator Hunt (1773–1835). A persuasive orator who presided over the meeting in St. Peter's Field, Manchester, at the time of the Peterloo Massacre (1819). Yeomen and soldiers charged upon the reform meeting, and the news of this outrage so aroused the poet Shelley in Italy that he wrote The Masque of Anarchy. Orator Hunt was sentenced to two years' imprisonment. Later he became a member of Parliament (1830–1833), and published his memoirs in 1820.

Hunt, [William] Holman (1827–1910). English painter. With John Everett Millais and Dante Gabriel Rossetti, Holman Hunt founded the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood. In 1905 he published his two-volume Pre-Raphaelitism and the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood; in the same year he was awarded the Order of Merit.

Hunt, [James Henry] Leigh (1784–1859). English journalist, essayist, poet, and political radical. For years, in the face of poverty, vilification, and official persecution, Hunt edited a series of one-man journals.
From 1813 to 1815 he was imprisoned for attacking the future George IV in his Examiner, becoming a hero of the radicals. He is most important as an essayist and critic, early champion of Shelley and Keats. Byron was briefly Hunt's patron, but the two were unable to get along; Hunt's Lord Byron and Some of His Contemporaries (1828) reflects some bitterness. Though much of his prose is perspicacious and graceful, his poetry tends to be slight and sentimental. A few shorter poems, such as Abou Ben Adhem (1834) and Jenny Kissed Me (1844), and parts of The Story of Kimmie (1816), are still of interest. Among his other works are: Critical Essays (1807); The Round Table (1817, with William Hazlitt); The Months (1821); Men, Women and Books (1847); Autobiography (1850).

Hunt, Violet (1866–1942). English biographer and novelist. She was daughter of the Pre-Raphaelite painter Alfred William Hunt and for some years mistress of Ford Madox Ford. Her autobiography I Have This to Say (1926) and her biography The Wife of Rossetti (1932) are valuable because she knew so many of the literary people of her day. Miss Hunt wrote garish novels, such as White Rose of Weary Leaf (1908), and macabre stories, such as Tales of the Uncanny (1910).

Hunt, Mr. and Mrs. Leo. In Charles Dickens' Pickwick Papers, a celebrity-hungry couple who invite Pickwick and his friends to their house. Mrs. Hunter is the author of "Ode to an Expiring Frog," generally considered a masterpiece.

Huon de Bordeaux (early 13th century). French charanson de geste, popularized through a prose version (1454) and the English translation by Lord Berners, Huon of Burdewae (c. 1540). Huon kills Charlot in self-defense, ignorant that his attacker is Charlemagne's son. His death sentence is suspended on condition that he go to the court of the Emir of Babylon, kill his most important knight, and kiss his daughter Esclarmonde three times. Oseron, king of the fairies, meets and befriends Huon, helping him to succeed in all his adventures and marry Esclarmonde. The tale was used by Christoph Martin Wieland in his epic poem Oberon (1780), and from there adapted by Weber for his opera Oberon (1826).

Hurd, Richard (1770–1808). English bishop, and author. His Letters on Chivalry and Romance (1762) set forth a historical approach to the study of the medieval romance in which the Gothic is contrasted with the classical art of Greece. Hurd's enthusiasm for the medieval and Gothic forms added greatly to the vogue of medievalism demonstrated in the poetry of James Macpherson, Thomas Chatterton, Thomas Percy, and others. Other works include an edition of the works of Horace (1749) and Moral and Political Dialogues (1759), which represents Joseph Addison and John Arbuthnot discussing feudalism amidst the ruins of Kenilworth.

Hurst, Fannie (1899– ). American novelist and playwright. She began her long and successful career with such works as Humoresque (1919), a collection of stories about Jewish life in New York City. The title story tells of a poor boy who became a great violinist. Lummox (1923), the story of a servant girl whose greatness of soul shines amid her sordid surroundings, is one of her best-known novels. Her other books include Star-Dust (1921), Back Street (1931), Imitation of Life (1933), and God Must Be Sad (1961). Anatomy of Me (1958) is her autobiography.

Hurtwood, George. A leading character in Dreiser's novel Sister Carrie. A wealthy man at the beginning of the novel, he helps Carrie in her rise to success but is himself destroyed in the process.

Hurtado de Mendoza, Diego (1503–1575). Spanish historian and poet. A member of one of Spain's noblest families, Hurtado was a humanist who read Greek, Hebrew, and Arabic as well as a distinguished diplomat who represented the king in Venice, Rome, and at the Council of Trent. A quarrel with another noble in 1568 led to his exile from Madrid. He retired to Granada, where he wrote his masterpiece, the Guerra de Granada (1627), a vivid history of the Morisco uprising of 1568–1571 which was modeled on the works of Tacitus and Sallust. His poetry is of two types: his sonnets and the Fíbula de Adonis, Hipómenes y Atalanta reveal the influence of classical and Italian verse, but he was more successful with Spanish forms, as is shown by his witty, sometimes cynical, redondillas. The authorship of Lazarello de Tormes has also been attributed to him. At his death he left all his books and manuscripts to the library of the Escorial.

Huss, John or Jan Hus (1369–1415). A Bohemian religious reformer. Rector of the University of Prague, he was condemned and burned at the stake for propagating a reform doctrine influenced by Wyck. His followers, the Hussites, organized a religious and political party and waged a fierce civil war (1419–1434). Their radical wing, the Taborites, became merged with the Bohemian Brethren. The conservatives or Calixtines later turned Lutheran or Roman Catholic.

Husserl, Edmund (1859–1938). German philosopher. He was a leader in the development of phenomenology as the basis for a new philosophical method. His work has had much influence on the existentialists, especially Jean Paul Sartre, who studied under him from 1933 to 1934. His works include Logical Inquiries (Logische Untersuchungen; 1900–1901) and Thoughts toward a Pure Phenomenology and Phenomenological Philosophy (Ideen zu einer reinen Phänomenologie und phänomenologischen Philosophie; 1922).

Hussonet. A character in Gustave Flaubert's novel L'Education Sentimentale. A friend of the hero Frédéric Moreau, Hussonet is an opportunistic journalist and editor. He voices firm support of the principles of 1848, but after Louis Napoleon's successful coup d'état he rapidly became an ardent supporter of the empire.

Hutchinson, Anne (1591–1643). English-born American religious teacher. Her assertion that salvation could come only through personal intuition of God's grace, and not through good works, conflicted with the beliefs of many clergymen in the Massachusetts Bay Colony and produced a bitter controversy that divided the entire settlement. In 1637 she was tried and banished from the colony "for trad-ducing the ministers and their ministry." She and her family moved to Rhode Island, then to New York, where they were killed by Indians.

Hutchinson, Arthur Stuart Menteth (1876–1958). Popular English novelist. He is author of If Winter Comes. Later works include The Uncertain Trumpet (1929), He Looked for a City (1940), and Bring Back the Days (1958).

Hutchinson, John. See Lucy Hutchinson.

Hutchinson, Lucy (1620–1675). English prose writer. She is known for her biography of her husband, Colonel John Hutchinson (1615–1664), an outstanding Puritan leader and soldier during the English Civil War. The work, entitled Memoirs of the Life of Colonel Hutchinson, was written after 1664 and published in 1806. It is considered noteworthy because of its character analysis of its subject, its defense of the Puritan character in general, and its picture of a 17th-century English Puritan household.

Hutchinson, Ray Croyton (1907– ). English novelist. He has written many serious, sensitive books, including The Answering Glory (1932), Recollection of a Journey (1952), and The Stepmother (1959).

Hutten, Ulrich von (1488–1523). German humanist writer. Luther's most vigorous defender among the nobility, he was a progressive in religion and politics and wished to see Germany freed from the yoke of Rome, as is clearly expressed in his Lucindine dialogue Insipientes (The Onlookers, c. 1521). In matters of social change, however, he was conservative and opposed the rise of the cities.
He has been suspected of writing the second half of the Epistolae Obscurorum Virorum, but this is not certain.

Huxley, Aldous (1894–1963). English novelist, essayist, and satirist. He was the grandson of Thomas Huxley, great-nephew of Matthew Arnold, brother of Julian Huxley, and half-brother of Andrew Huxley (winner of the 1963 Nobel prize for physiology).
Huxley's early work differs sharply from that of his later years, the break reflecting his conversion to mysticism. His early novels are witty, despairing evocations of society in the 1920's, satirizing the intellectual pretensions and poses of the era. Among the novels of this period are Crome Yellow, Antic Hay (1923), Those Barren Leaves (1925), and Point Counter Point. Huxley's early short stories were collected in Mortal Coils (1922). In the 1930's Hux-ley's work began to reflect his growing preoccupation with occult studies. Among his later novels are Eye-less in Gaza, After Many a Summer Dies the Swan, Time Must Have a Stop (1944), and Island (1962). Huxley is noted for his interest in science; his forty-fifth and last book, Literature and Science (1963) is an essay on both. Brave New World, one of his best-known books, expresses his concern over the dangers of scientific progress; Ape and Essence (1948) is a satire about the world after an atomic war. His most important essays are Music at Night (1931), Beyond the Mexique Bay (1934), The Peren-Philosophy (1946), The Doors of Perception (1954), Heaven and Hell, and Brave New World
Revisited (1958).

Huxley studied medicine, but was prevented from practicing by a disease of the eyes that temporarily blinded him. He was associated with J. Middleton Murry and Katherine Mansfield in editing the Atheu. A friend and admirer of D. H. Lawrence, Huxley edited his letters in 1932. It was Lawrence who encouraged him to begin to search for spiritual values when he was in despair. In 1947 he settled in California, where he became associated with the Ra-makrishna Mission in Hollywood and pursued various occult studies.

Huxley, Julian [Sorell] (1887– ). English biologist and writer, brother of Aldous Huxley. He is the author of Essays of a Biologist (1923), The Science of Life (with H. G. and G. P. Wells, 1929), What Dare I Think? (1931), The Captive Shrew and Other Poems (1932), Evolution: the Modern Synthesis (1942), New Bottles for New Wine (1957),
The Humanist Frame, 1961.

Huxley, Thomas Henry (1825–1895). English biologist and teacher. He is known for his defense of the theory of evolution held by Darwin, and for his lectures and writings popularizing science. His books include Man's Place in Nature (1863), The Physical Basis of Life (1868), Lay Sermons, Addresses, and Reviews (1870), Science and Morals (1886), Essays upon Some Controversed Questions (1892), and Ethics and Evolution (1893). Huxley was called "Darwin's Bulldog" and engaged in a controversy with the English statesman Gladstone on the question of scientific evolutionary theories as opposed to biblical lore. He was the grandfather of Aldous and Julian Huxley.

Huysmans, Joris Karl (1848–1907). French novelist. Of Dutch ancestry, Huysmans was born, lived, and died in Paris, where after a prolonged spiritual struggle, he became a convert to Roman Catholicism. His neurasthenia and perverse tastes mark Huysmans as a typical décadent. Stylistically, his work is characterized by vivid and concrete figures, fantastic description, and a gift for portraying the grotesque. Among his novels are Marthe, Histoire d'une Fille (1876), a naturalistic account of a young prostitute's life; Against the Grain; La-Bas (1891), part of a spiritual autobiography; and La Cathédrale (1898).

Hyacinth (Hyakinthos). In Greek mythology,a beautiful youth loved by Apollo. Zephyr, the jealous west wind, spoiled Apollo's aim when he was throwing the discus; it struck Hyacinth and he died.
From his blood sprang the hyacinth (not the modern flower), bearing on its petals the cry of grief, Al.
Hyakinthos was, in fact, a pre-Hellenic local deity for honey, annecting Apollo's appearance in Greece.

Hyde, Douglas (1860–1949). Irish poet, scholar, and statesman. The first president of Eire (1938– 1945), he wrote much of his work in Canada and dedicated himself to the restoration of Irish culture.
He was one of the founders of the Abbey Theatre and wrote many books on Irish history, literature, and folklore. His _Love Songs of Connaught_ (1894) is a classic compilation. His other works include _Answer to Communism_ (1949), and _I Believed_ (1950), an autobiographical account of how he came to join the Communist party, grew disillusioned with it, and became a convert to Catholicism.

Hye, Edward. See earl of CLARENDON.

Hye, Mr. See _Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde_, THE.

Hyde Park (1). A large park in west-central London. It has become a symbol of freedom of speech, for the many speakers who hold impromptu meetings there are traditionally allowed to say anything they please, however critical it may be of the government.

(2) A village in New York State, overlooking the Hudson and famous as the residence of Franklin D. Roosevelt and his family. It now contains a museum devoted to mementoes of Roosevelt’s presidency.

Hydra. A monstrous serpent of Greek mythology. It was born of Typhon and Echidna. Living in the swamps of the river Lerna, it had many heads; when one was cut off, another grew in its place. Heracles finally killed it by having his friend Iolaus burn the stumps with torches as soon as the heads were removed. Heracles poisoned his arrows with its blood. See CANCER.

Hydriotaphia, or Urn Burial (1658). An essay by Sir Thomas Browne. In part a scientific report on some Roman burial urns that had recently been unearthed in Norfolk, the essay becomes a moving meditation on mortality and oblivion. The famous last chapter on death is considered an example of nearly flawless English prose.

Hymettus. A mountain E. and SE. of Athens, famous for its honey and for a marble used in building ancient Athens.

Hymir. In Scandinavian mythology, a giant with a frosty beard who personified the inhospitable sea. He owned the kettle in which the gods brewed their ale, and it was he who took Thor in his boat and robbed him of his prey when the latter god sought to kill the Midgard serpent.

Hymn of Hate (Hassgesang). A German poem popular during World War I by Ernst Lissauer (1882–1937). Its refrain “Gott strafe England” (“God punish England”) was the source of the English verb “to strafe.”

Hypatia (c. 370–415). Member of the Neoplatonic School of philosophy at Alexandria, in the 5th century A.D. A daughter of Theon, the mathematician, Hypatia was murdered by the Alexandrine mob. Her story is told in the historical novel _Hypatia_ (1853), by Charles Kingsley. She is also known as the _Divine Pagan._

Hypatia (1853). A historical novel by Charles Kingsley, a romance of 5th-century Alexandria. The hero, a young monk named Philammon, leaves his monastery for a more active struggle with the brilliant pagan life of the great city. He is strongly drawn to Hypatia, a lecturer on Greek philosophy and a woman of rare spiritual charm, and is much moved by her discussions. But the fanatical Christians of the city cannot tolerate her teachings, and she is torn to pieces by an angry mob. Philammon then recedes into the desert to meditate upon tolerance.

hyperbole. In rhetoric, a figure of speech consisting of exaggeration or extravagance of statement. It is used deliberately for effect and not meant to be taken literally, as in “the waves were mountains high,” or “I was fainting from hunger.”

Hyperboreans. A happy people of early Greek legend. They were supposed to dwell on the other side of the spot where the North Wind had its birth, and therefore to enjoy perpetual warmth and sunshine. They were said to be the oldest of the human race, the most virtuous, and the most happy, dwelling for some thousand years under a cloudless sky, in fields yielding double harvests, and in the enjoyment of perpetual spring.

Later fable held that they had not an atmosphere like our own, but one consisting wholly of feathers. Both Herodotus and Pliny mention this fiction, which they say was suggested by the quality of snow observed to fall in those regions.

Hyperion. In Greek mythology, one of the Titans, son of Uranus and Ge, and father of Helios, Selene, and Eos (the Sun, Moon, and Dawn). The name is sometimes given by poets to the sun itself. One of the best-known works of John Keats is his “poetical fragment” of this name (1820).

Hyperion (1839). A romance by Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. Paul Fleming travels in Europe, falling in love with Mary Ashburton. She scorns him, and he continues his search for the mythical blue rose of German legend, the symbol of the unattainable. Often called Longfellow’s _Wilhelm Meister_, the book is studded with old legends.

Hyperion oder Der Eremit in Griechenland (_Hyperion or the Hermit in Greece_, 1797–1799). An epistolary novel by Friedrich Hölderlin. It is set in modern Greece, but expresses an elegiac longing for the human and artistic perfection of ancient Greece.

Hypermnestra. In Greek legend, the wife of Lynceus and the only one of the fifty daughters of Danaus who did not murder her husband on their bridal night. See _Danaides._

Hypnos. In Greek mythology, the god of sleep.

Hypocrite, The. See _Tartuffe_, L.E.

Hypsipyle. In Greek legend, a queen of Lemnos. When the women of her island killed their husbands to a man for infidelity, she saved her father Thoas, who escaped in a boat. When the _Argonauts_ arrived on their way to find the Golden Fleece, she and her women were so hospitable that they repopulated the island. Later, however, Hypsipyle was sold into slavery for having saved Thoas, and was the nursemaid who permitted the child _Orpheltes_ to be fatally bitten by a snake.
Iacehus (Iakchos). An obscure Greek deity. A young man associated with the worship of Demeter and Persephone in the Eleusinian Mysteries, he was later identified with Dionysus.

Iachimo. In Shakespeare's Cymbeline, a Roman courtier who wagers with Posthumus Leonatus that he can seduce the latter's wife Imogen. A worldly and affected libertine, he has no redeeming qualities.

Iago. In Shakespeare's Othello, the "ancient," or ensign, who is driven by bitterness against his master for having chosen Cassio as his lieutenant. Though outwardly the epitome of "honesty and trust," he causes the downfall and near-death of Cassio and weaves the Machiavellian plot that plants in Othello's mind the false suspicion of his wife's infidelity with Cassio.

Ironically, one of Shakespeare's most famous speeches on honor is delivered by Iago:

Good name in man and woman, dear my lord, Is the immediate jewel of their souls: Who steals my purse steals trash; 'tis something, nothing; But he that filches from me my good name Robs me of that which not enriches him And makes me poor indeed.

His also is the famous phrase:

O, beware, my lord, of jealousy; It is the green-eyed monster, which doth mock The meat it feeds on.

Iamb (or iambus). In English prosody, a metrical foot consisting of two syllables, the first unaccented, the second accented. The word "betray" is an iamb. The meter made up of such units is called iambic meter, and the following lines are a good example:

As night/drew on,/and, from/ the crest
Of wood/ed knoll/that ridged/th the west,
The sun,/ a snow/-blown travel/er, rank
From sight/ beneath/ the smooth/ering rank.
Whittier, Snow-Bound

Iambic meter is the most common English measure; insofar as one can generalize, it is the prevailing meter of natural English speech.

Ianthe. A poetical name much in use in the 19th century. The Ianthe to whom Byron dedicated his Childe Harold was Lady Charlotte Harley, only 11 years old at the time. He borrowed it from Walter Savage Landor, who had thus etherealized the middle name of his early sweetheart, Sophia Jane Swift. Landor wrote many poems in her praise. Shelley gave the name to the maiden to whom the fairy queen appears in Queen Mab.

Iapetus. In classical mythology, a Titan son of Uranus and Ge, father of Atlas, Prometheus, Epimetheus, and Menoetius, and ancestor of the human race.

Iasion. According to a Greek myth, a mortal who was united with Demeter and made her the mother of Plutus. He was killed for his presumption by Zeus' lightning. The myth probably symbolizes the fertilization of the fields.

Ibarbourou, Juana de (1895— ). Uruguayan poet, often known as "Juana de América." Married at 18, she led a quiet life as a wife and mother. She is best known for the poems in Las lenguas de diamante (1918) and Raiz salvaJ (1922); simple, sensuous, and earthy, they are characterized by a subjectivity that has been described as narcissistic.

Iberia. Spain; the country of the Iberus, the ancient name of the river Ebro.

Iberville, Sieur d'. Pierre le Moyne (1661-1706). French-Canadian commander and explorer. Born in Montreal, Iberville served in the French navy and took part in successful engagements with the English in the Hudson Bay area. In 1699 he organized and led an expedition which located the mouth of the Mississippi. In 1702 he established colonies at Biloxi and Mobile.

Ibis. A sacred bird of the ancient Egyptians. It was especially associated with the god Thoth who, in the guise of an ibis, escaped the pursuit of Typhon. Its white plumage symbolized the light of the sun, its black neck the shadow of the moon, its body a heart, and its legs a triangle. It was said to drink only the purest of water and to be so fond of Egypt that it would pine to death if transported elsewhere. The ibis was encouraged to make its nest in temples and was often mummmified.

Ibrahim. The Abraham of the Koran.

Ibsen, Henrik [Johan] (1828-1906). Norwegian poet and playwright. The son of a middle-class family that suffered severe financial reverses when he was a boy, Ibsen was apprenticed to a druggist in his teens, began to study medicine, but soon found his way into the theater. In 1851 he was appointed manager and official playwright of the new National Theater at Bergen, for which he wrote four plays based on Norwegian folklore and history, notably Lady Inger of Östrå (1855), dealing with the liberation of medieval Norway. He left the Bergen theater for the post of manager of the Norwegian Theater at Christiania (now Oslo), remaining there until the theater failed in 1864. To this period belong The Vikings of Heligoland (1858) and The Pretenders (1864), historical dramas; and Love's Comedy (1862), a satire. With the aid of a traveling scholarship, Ibsen began a period of self-imposed exile from his homeland, living until 1891 in various cities on the Continent, primarily Rome, Munich, and Dresden. In 1891 he settled in Christiania, where he lived until his death in 1906.

Ibsen's first two major plays, both in verse, were the symbolic tragedy Brand and the mock-heroic fantasy Peer Gynt. The League of Youth (1869), a political satire, was his first modern prose drama. It was followed by Emperor and Galilean (1873), a historical play in two parts on Julian the Apostate. Pillars of Society (1877) deals with the shady acts of a wealthy and hypocritical businessman. A Doll's House, a social drama on marriage, was alternately vilified and praised for its sympathy with woman's rights and the questions raised when Nora Helmer slammed the door on her doll's house and her duties and went out in the world to learn how to be a human being. Ghosts touched on the forbidden subject of "social disease" and attacked social conventions and duty as destroyers of life and happiness. In An Enemy of the People (1882), Ibsen contrasted the enlightened and persecuted minority with the ignorant, powerful majority; Dr. Stockman is voted an "enemy of the people" because he insists that the town's famous and prosperous baths are dangerously polluted and must be shut down for expensive repairs. The play was followed by the poetic and symbolic drama The Wild Duck; Rosmersholm, another play on the problems of idealism; The Lady from the Sea (1888), a play with supernatural overtones and a happy ending. Hedda Gabler, one of Ibsen's greatest plays, is a striking study of a modern neurotic woman. The Master Builder deals symbolically with the plight of the artist. Little Eyolf (1894) concerns parental responsibility. Ibsen's last two works, the realistic John Gabriel Borkman and the highly symbolic When We Dead Awaken, both deal with men who are dead spiritually because they have sacrificed love.

Called the father of modern drama, Ibsen discarded the Socratic formula for the well-made play that had ruled the 19th-century theater. He brought the problems and the ideas of the day onto his stage, emphasized character rather than ingenious plots, and created realistic plays of psychological conflict. Throughout all his works, the social dramas as well as the symbolic plays, run the twin themes that the individual, not the group, is of paramount importance, and that the denial of love is the one unforgivable sin, tantamount to a denial of life.

Ibycus (Ibykos, 6th century B.C.). A Greek lyric poet. According to legend, he was murdered with only a passing flock of cranes as witnesses. In the presence of a large crowd one of the murderers betrayed himself, when he saw a flock of cranes pass overhead, by exclaiming: "The cranes of Ibycus!" This phrase signifies hence "unsuspected witnesses to a crime."

Icarus (Ikarios). In Greek legend an Athenian who was taught the cultivation of the vine by Dionysus. He was slain by some peasants who had become intoxicated with wine he had given them, and who thought they had been poisoned. They buried the body under a tree; his daughter Erigone, searching for her father, was directed to the spot by the howling of his dog Maera, and when she discovered the body she hanged herself for grief. Icarus became the constellation Boötes, Ergone the constellation Virgo, and Maera the star Procyon, which rises in July, a little before the dog star.

Icarus (Ikarus). In Greek mythology, son of Daedalus. He flew with his father from Crete; but the sun melted the wax with which his wings were fastened on, and he fell into the sea, hence called the Icarian.

Iceland Fisherman, An. See Pécheur d'Islande.

I-Ching. See Book of Changes.

Ichthys (Gr., "fish"). An early symbol of Christ. The word is an anagram of the phrase Iesous Christos, Theou Yios, Soter, "Jesus Christ, Son of God, Saviour." This word, and the ichthys symbol, two facing curved lines which overlap at one end, are found on many early Christian seals, rings, urns, and tombs.

Icon. In the Eastern Church, an image or representation of Christ, a saint, or an angel. Icons are sacred and honored with relative worship (kissing, incense, light) but not with supreme worship, which is due to God alone. They range from elaborate works of art in the church buildings to humble enamel and niello objects carried by the peasantry.

Iconoclasts (Gr., "image breakers"). Reformers who rose in the Eastern Church in the seventh and eighth centuries, beginning under Emperor Leo III, the Isaurian. They destroyed sacred images or icons in the churches because they feared such visual representation would lead to pagan idol worship. The iconoclasts' crusade continued for 120 years under Constantine Copronymus, Leo the Armenian, Theophilos, and other Byzantine emperors, known as the Iconoclast emperors. Eventually, images were used in the Western Church, but in the Eastern Church sculptures are still excluded, though pictures are allowed.

A person who criticizes or seriously questions ideas and attitudes previously accepted as correct, just, and valuable by convention and tradition, rather than by independent examination and judgment, is also called an iconoclast.

Milton attacked the royal image of Charles II in his prose pamphlet Eikonoklastes (1649).

Idaean Mother. Cybele, who had a temple on Mount Ida, in Asia Minor.
Idalian. Pertaining to Idalium, an ancient town in Cyprus, or to Aphrodite, to whom the place was consecrated.

Idas. In Greek legend, the son of Arene by Poseidon and brother of Lynceus. See Argonauts.

Idea of a Patriot King (1749). A pamphlet by Henry St. John. It expressed the doctrine that the ideal government is without party and thus anticipated the actual political program of George III and strongly influenced the 19th-century Tory political ideology.

ïdéologues. A group of materialistic and pragmatic philosophers and psychologists of the late 18th century. They included disciples of Condillac, Conducet, Pierre Jean Georges Cabanis, and Antoine Louis Claude Destutt de Tracy. Liberal and antireligious, they believed that ideas originate in physical sensation and that morality is therefore physical in origin; they proclaimed the self-sufficiency of man. Their literary influence is found in the works of Benjamin Constant and Stendhal, and in the literary criticism of Talma and Renan.

Ides. In the Roman calendar, the 15th of March, May, July, and October, and the 13th of all the other months. The ides always fell eight days after the nones.

According to Plutarch, Julius Caesar ignored a soothsayer's warning to beware the ides of March, the day on which he was slain.

Idiot, The (1868). A novel by Feodor Dostoevski. It is concerned with the effect of the saintly Prince Myshkin on worldly society in St. Petersburg. Myshkin's gentle, childlike nature and his refusal to take offense at anything have earned him the nickname of "the idiot." He himself admits to having been virtually an idiot for several years while under medical care in Switzerland. On the death of his benefactor, he returns to Russia to find himself heir to a large fortune. Almost immediately the trustful Myshkin is entangled in the affairs of the corrupt world of society. On the trip back to Russia he has already met the seductive Natasha Rostov, who is obsessed by the beautiful Natasha Filipovna, the victim in her youth of an older man who brought her up as his mistress. The shame Natasha feels has driven the proud girl to degrade herself even more. Only when she meets Myshkin does she feel she has encountered a sympathetic being. This feeling eventually drives her to greater self-torment, when she realizes that Myshkin's apparent love is, in fact, pity.

Myshkin becomes involved with another woman, young Aglaya Epanchin, to whom he also cannot give the normal passionate love she wants, although he does ask her to marry him. His pity for Natasha, however, overcomes whatever love it is he feels for Aglaya, and he goes off to try again to redeem her. His vacillations manage only to hurt both women and, finally, to enrage the jealous Rogozhin to the point of murder. The latter tries unsuccessfully to kill Myshkin and, at the end of the novel he murders Natasha. Confronted with the scene, Myshkin relapses into idiocy.

Dostoevski's announced intention with the character of Myshkin was to portray a truly good man. The attempt has been viewed by critics as only partially successful, not only because Myshkin wreaks havoc with most of the characters he influences, but also because of the abstract, bloodless quality of the characterization itself. A more successful effort of this type is Alexei Karamazov, in whose portrayal Dostoevski managed to blend harmoniously both human and Christlike attributes.

Dostoevski acknowledged that The Idiot was not completely successful, but insisted that the book was nevertheless his personal favorite among his works. Besides the figure of Myshkin, the author included in the novel many of his ideas on the superiority of Orthodoxy to Western religion and on the connections between Roman Catholicism and socialism.

Idiot's Delight (1935). A play by Robert E. Sherwood. Several travelers are detained at an Alpine resort hotel just before the outbreak of a second world war. They include a honeymooning English couple, a German scientist, a French munitions manufacturer, and a troupe of American actors. Harry Van, promoter of the troupe, recognizes Irene, the Russian mistress of the munitions manufacturer, as a woman he once knew slightly in Omaha. The outbreak of the war is announced, and "the little people" in and around the hotel become patriotic and join the army; they all leave but Irene, who has renounced her arms manufacturer and consequently lost her passport. Harry decides to remain with her; they are trapped in the hotel during an air raid. The play was awarded a Pulitzer Prize.

Idle Lake. See FAERIE QUEENE, THE.

Idler, The (1758-1760). A series of essays by Samuel Johnson. Published in the Universal Chronicle, or Weekly Gazette, they are lighter in tone than the Rambler and incline to the satiric portrait and Oriental tale.

Idomeneus. King of ancient Crete, an ally of the Greeks at Troy. His adventures are related in the Iliad. After the city was burned he made a vow to sacrifice whatever he first encountered, if the gods granted him a safe return to his kingdom. It was his own son that he first met. He offered him up to fulfill his vow, but a plague followed, and the king was banished from Crete as a murderer. See also JEPHTHA; ISAAC.

Idraote (Idratoes). In the GERUSALEMME LIBRATA of Tasso, a wizard commissioned by Satan to prevent the Christian capture of Jerusalem. He sends his niece, Armida, to the Christian camp to use her seductive charms in sowing confusion there; she succeeds admirably.

Iduna, Idun, or Ithunn. In Scandinavian mythology, the goddess who kept in Asgard the golden apples eaten by the gods to preserve their eternal youth. The daughter of the dwarf Svaldi and wife of Bragi, she personified the year between March and September, when the sun was north of the equator. When the sun descended below the equator, Loki was said to carry her off to Giant-Land and steal her apples. When the sun rose again above the equator in March, Iduna made her escape in the form of a sparrow.

Idyll. (1) A pastoral poem, usually brief, describing the picturesque in country life and conveying a mood of peace and contentment. The most celebrated idylls of antiquity are those of Theocritus and Vergil. Idylls may also be narrative poems, sometimes of epic stature, as in Tennyson's Idylls of the King.
(2) Any bucolic, peaceful, romantic episode or period in life or literature which might be a suitable subject for an idyll.

(3) In music, a romantic pastoral composition.

Idylls of the King (1859–1885). A series of poems in 10 books by Alfred Tennyson. Based on Arthurian Legend, they comprise The Coming of Arthur, Gareth and Lynette, Geraint and Enid, Meredith and Vivien, Lancelot and Elaine, The Holy Grail, Pelleas and Etienne, The Last Tournament, Guinevere, and The Passing of Arthur. In interpreting the Arthurian legend, Tennyson focuses on the introduction of evil into the hitherto unblemished Camelot through Lancelot's sin of adulterous love for Guinevere. Because of this approach, some commentators have found Tennyson's conception of Arthur lacking in substance.

If It Die . . . (Si le grain ne meurt; 1926). An autobiographical work by André Gide. Written in 1920, it records Gide's experiences during his trips to North Africa in 1893 and 1894–1895. In a partial confession of homosexuality, the book was intended to force public discussion of an issue then normally avoided.

If Winter Comes (1920). A once popular novel by A. S. M. Hutchinson. Bearing a thematic resemblance to the work of Warwick Deeping, it tells the story of Mark Sabre, unhappily married, who befriends a pregnant girl and is suspected of being the father of her illegitimate child. Sabre discovers that the real culprit is the idolized son of his business associate. When the boy's death at the front is reported, he knows that he will never be able to clear himself of the charges. Despite such misfortunes, the novel ends happily with Sabre's divorce and his remarriage to a woman he has always loved. The title is taken from the last line of Shelley's Ode to the West Wind: "If Winter comes, can Spring be far behind?"

Ignatius of Loyola, St. See St. Ignatius of Loyola.

Igraine, Igerne, or Ygerne, Queen. In Arthurian literature the mother of King Arthur. In many versions, she is the virtuous wife of Gorlois, duke of Tintagel, and she is innocently seduced by King Uther Pendragon when the magic of Merlin gives him the appearance of her husband. In other versions, Uther and Gorlois fight, and the latter is slain. Uther then besieges Tintagel Castle, takes it, and compels Igraine to become his wife. Nine months afterwards, Uther dies, and on the same day Arthur is born.

Ihara Saikaku (1642–1693). Japanese novelist. He wrote erotic stories and tales of merchant class life. His writings reflect the new bourgeois culture centering in Osaka. His works enjoyed immense popularity and are still widely read. See The Life of an Amorous Woman (1662) by Ivan Morris.

I.H.S. The first three letters of the Greek form of Jesus, and a widely used Christian symbol. In time, the long "e" (H) was mistaken by people of Latin culture for a capital H, and various phrases arose that used these letters as initials, such as Jesus Hominum Salvator (Jesus, Savior of men) and In hac salut (safety in this, i.e., the Cross).

Ikebana. Japanese flower arrangement. It was developed as an art during the Muromachi period (1333–1600), where it was used in conjunction with the tea ceremony. In the Tokugawa period (1600–1868) it became highly formalized, and a large number of schools arose, each with its own specialized techniques, most of which are still extant.

Ishkvaku. In Hindu legend, the first king of the solar dynasty. He is known as Raghu.

Ilf and Petrov, Pen names of the Soviet humorists Ilya Arnoldovich Ilf (1897–1937) and Yegevni Petrovich Katayev (1902–1942). Their two comic novels, Twelve Chairs and The Little Golden Calf (Zolotoi teiokon, 1931), recount the hilarious machinations of the master con-man, Ostap Bender. The two writers also collaborated on a satirical account of their visit to the U.S., One-Story America (Odnoezhnanny Amerika; 1936). Ilf died of tuberculosis in 1937; Petrov was killed during the war in 1942.

Iliad. Greek epic poem (8th century B.C.) attributed to Homer. In 24 books of dactylic hexameter verse, it details the events of the few days near the end of the Trojan War, focusing on the withdrawal of Achilles from the contest and the disastrous effects of this act on the Greek campaign. The plot is as follows:

Book I. Agamemnon, commander-in-chief of the Greek forces, refuses to return his captive Chryseis to her father Chryses, a priest of Apollo. An ensuing pestilence is divined to be the result of this unseemly act, and the Greeks insist that Agamemnon relinquish Chryseis. He grudgingly does so, but takes Achille's captive Briseis in her place. Furious, Achilles refuses to fight with the Greeks. His mother, Thetis, persuades Zeus to turn the tide of battle so that the Greeks will see how much they need Achilles.

Book II. A false dream sent by Zeus leads Agamemnon to plan a battle. He tests his men by suggesting that they return home. To his dismay, they start to rush for the ships, and are only restrained when Odysseus beats their leader Thersites. The "Catalogue of Ships" lists the contingents and their forces.

Book III. Paris, whose abduction of Helen from Sparta was the cause of the war, now engages in single combat with her husband, Menelaus. About to be killed, Paris is spirited away by Aphrodite.

Book IV. Athena, who favors the Greeks, causes the Trojan Pandarus to break the truce by treacherously shooting Menelaus, and the battle is joined.

Book V. Diomedes is the hero of the day, killing Pandarus and many others and even wounding Aphrodite and (with Athena's help) Ares, who are helping the Trojans.

Book VI. Hector, the Trojan leader, returns to Troy, bids the women pray to Athena, and bids farewell to Andromache, his wife, and his infant son in a touching scene. On the battlefield, Diomedes and Glauco, finding that their godfathers were friends, refrain from fighting and exchange armor, Glauco accepting bronze for gold.

Book VII. After an indecisive battle between the Trojan leader Hector and Great Ajax, there is a pause. Under pressure from the Trojans, Paris, though refusing to give up Helen, promises to make handsome restitution. The Greeks refuse his offer and build a wall to protect their ships.
Book VIII. Zeus orders the other gods not to interfere in the war. Hera and Athena at first defy him, but are chastened. The war turns in the Trojans' favor.

Book IX. Desperate, Agamemnon offers to return Briseis to Achilles and make further restitution. Odysseus, Ajax, and Phoenix, Achilles' old tutor, bear the ofter to Achilles, but he indignantly refuses it and vows to start for home the next day.

Book X. Odysseus and Diomedes spy on the Trojans, and kill Dolon and the Thracian king, Rhesus.

Book XI. Agamemnon worries the Greeks, but he, Odysseus, Diomedes, and others are wounded.
Achilles sends Patroclus to inquire about the course of the fighting. Nestor urges him to beg Achilles to fight or to send Patroclus with Achilles' Myrmdons.

Book XII. The Trojans under Hector break through gate in the Greek walls.

Book XIII. In spite of Zeus' commands Poseidon rallies the Greeks under Idomeneus and the Ajaxes.

Book XIV. Hera amorously deceives Zeus and puts him to sleep, while Poseidon helps the Greeks. The Trojans are driven back and Hector is wounded.

Book XV. When Zeus awakens, Poseidon is forced to cease aiding the Greeks and AApollo rouses Hector to lead the Trojans as far as the Greek ships, where he tries to burn them. Patroclus meanwhile begs Achilles to fight.

Book XVI. Achilles gives Patroclus his armor and tells him to repel the Trojan advance, but no more.
Patroclus drives the Trojans to the walls of Troy, knowing Sarpedon and Hector's charioteer; but there Hector kills him, with the aid of Apollo.

Book XVII. Hector takes Achilles' armor, but, in a violent fight, Menelaus and the Greeks recover Patroclus' body.

Book XVIII. In spite of Thetis' warnings that he is fated to die, Achilles determines to avenge Patrocrus in battle. Hephastus makes him a new shield, richly engraved with many scenes.

Book XIX. Achilles announces that he will fight.
Agamemnon makes amends. Achilles' immortal horses, Xanthus and Balilius, warn him that this is the last time they will bear him safely from the field.
Knowing that he is soon to die, Achilles goes into battle.

Book XX. Since Zeus' promise to Thetis now is fulfilled, the other gods are free to join in the war.
Aligned with the Greeks are Athena, Hera, Poseidon, Hephaestus, and Hermes; with the Trojans, Apollo, Ares, Artemis, Aphrodite, and Leto. Aeneas fights with Achilles, but is rescued by Poseidon; similarly Hector is saved by Apollo.

Book XXI. Achilles routs the Trojans, killing many in the river Xanthus, which fights against him. Only Apollo saves the Trojans from destruction.

Book XXII. Hector waits alone outside the walls of Troy to meet Achilles. At first he flees from him tree times about the city but then turns to fight.
Abandoned by Apollo he is tricked by Athena and killed by Achilles, who drags his body behind his chariot to the ships, while his family and all Troy lament on the city walls.

Book XXIII. Achilles holds a great funeral for Patroclus, burning 12 Trojan youths with his body.
Games are held in his honor.

Book XXIV. For days Achilles continues to heap indignities on the corpse of Hector, until Zeus warns him through Thetis that the gods will be angered. The Trojan king, Priam, begs the body from Achilles, who recognizes in him a fellow-sufferer, and consents. A funeral is held for Hector.

The Trojan war is now known, thanks to the discoveries of Schillmann and his successors, to have been a historical event of the 13th century B.C., though hardly the glorious contest described in the Iliad.
About that event there grew up a vast number of legends, which, during the succeeding centuries, were told and retold by the bards in accordance with the traditions of Greek Epic Poetry until a resulting amount of order was imposed on the many varied strands. It was probably about four centuries after the war that a particular group of these myths were modeled into the dramatic and stylistic unit that became known as the Iliad. This work was attributed to an Ionian poet called Homer.

Controversy still rages on whether Homer was a single poet or many, but there is little question of the essential unity of concept that makes the Iliad a great poem. In spite of the monotonous similarity between one hand-to-hand combat and the next and in spite of the epithets and other barded formulas that can apply as well to one hero as to another, the Iliad is far more than a vast, highly formalized panorama of battle. Many of the principal figures are considerably individualized; Achilles, Agamemnon, Nestor, Paris, Hector, Thersites, Dolon. These are amusing contacts: the ignominious flight of the Greeks when Agamemnon tests their loyalty, Glauces giving his gold armor in an access of hospitality; there are moving scenes: Hector's infant son frightened by the plume on his father's helmet, Achilles going into battle in spite of his horse's warning, Priam and Achilles weeping together over their mutual loss. All these scenes give the story a human significance that deeply involves the reader in its events. One of the most impressive qualities of the poem is the dramatic impact that the poet achieved by concentrating his attention not on the siege of Troy, but on the tragic results of one man's anger. In spite of Achilles' implacable and (to modern readers) childish resentment of a slight on his honor, he is a genuinely noble figure who knowingly embraces certain death rather than live a long life without glory.

The Iliad is written in the poetic line regularly associated with Greek epic, the dactylic hexameter.
The dialect of the poem is primarily Ionic, with a strong subsoil of Achaic, which had been the language of the earlier inhabitants of the part of Ionia from which Homer traditionally came. However, the language of the Iliad, or of epic in general, was more a traditional poetic diction than an actual speech.

The world of the Trojan War was very imperfectly remembered in the Homeric poem, written centuries later. Some of the traditional material, inherited and faithfully passed on by Homer, must have been incomprehensible to him: for example, the use of the Mycenaeans' full-length rectangular shield, which had long been obsolete. As a result, the soldiers in the Iliad are sometimes described as bearing the round bronze shield of the poet's day, whereas elsewhere
they carry the ancient long shield. Such discrepancies as these have aided scholars in sorting out old and new material in the work. Other anachronisms are the result of deliberate tampering, in order to increase the role of Athens in the war and to diminish that of her enemies. This process may well have taken place in the days of Pisistratus, when the recitation of Homer became a regular part of the Panathenaic festival. The fact that certain barbarous customs, such as human sacrifice, torture, and mutilation, scarcely appear in the Iliad is probably also due to later expurgation.

I'll Take My Stand: The South and the Agrarian Tradition by Twelve Southerners. See Agrarians.

Ilmarinen. A smith in the Kalevala, inventor of the Slampo. He created one of his wives out of gold and silver and brought her to life, but she was so cold that whatever came near her would probably freeze.

IlSan the Monk. A boisterous friar in the 13th-century German epic the Rosengarten (The Rose Garden at Worms). He brings home 52 garlands from an expedition against the garden, and presses their thorns into the flesh of his fellow friars until they consent to pray for the forgiveness of his sins.

illuminism. A pseudoscientific movement of mystics and visionaries in the 18th century which influenced literature in the 19th century. A wave of mysticism, whose origins date from the Middle Ages, came from Germany, Switzerland, and Sweden, and reached France, forming a freemasonry of illuminists or mystics. At first inspired by Christian doctrines, they sought to live according to the Gospel and to regenerate their souls by direct contact with the divine. They also, however, believed in spirituality, magnetism, alchemy, and magic and professed to invoke the invisible and the arcane. Among the more famous illuminists were Swedenborg, who conversed with the dead; Lavater, a believer in black magic, who thought to contact God by magnetism; Claude de Saint-Martin ("the unknown philosopher"), who sought to hasten the coming of Christ by meditation and prayer; Mesmer; the Comte de Saint-Germain, who pretended to be several hundred years old and to possess the elixir of eternal life; Gall; and the famous Cagliostro, who evoked spirits. An almost instinctive reaction against 18th-century rational philosophies, illuminism under many names (e.g., millenarism, syncretism, neopaganism, pythagorism, theosophy, etc.) influenced some writers of the romantic period. It revived a sense of religious exaltation and mystery and created, or re-created, a need for the infinite, a belief in man's inner nature and a feeling for the mysteries of nature and of love. Among the writers who were influenced in the 19th century were Joseph de Maistre, in his Soirées de St. Petersbourg; Charles Fourier; the Christian philosopher Pierre-Simon Ballanche; Charles Nodier, in his fantastic tales; Balzac; and Gérard Nerval.

illusionists, The (Le Rempart des béguières; 1950). A novel by Françoise Mallet-Joris about a girl of fifteen who becomes the Lesbian lover of her father's mistress.

Imaginary Cuckold, The. See Sganarelle.

Imaginary Invalid, The. See Malade imaginaire, Lé.

imagination. In romantic aesthetic theory, the creative function of the intellect by which separate elements of experience are synthesized in a new whole differing from and transcending any of its original parts. S. T. Coleridge set forth the distinction between it and fancy in his Biographia Literaria. He said that imagination was the "shaping and modifying" power while fancy was the "aggregative and associative" power; imagination "struggles to idealize and unify" while fancy is merely "a mode of Memory emancipated from the order of time and space."

Imagism. A theory of poetry adopted about 1910 by a number of English and American poets who followed the leadership of T. E. Hulme and Ezra Pound. The movement confessed to several predecessors—e.g., medieval philosophy, the aesthetics of Henri Bergson, and Japanese poetry—but it was primarily a reaction against the stylized form and diction of Georgian verse. It demanded absolute precision in the presentation of the individual image; in metrics it proposed the cadence of "the musical phrase," by which was meant a controlled free verse. Generally speaking, imagist poems were short, pointed observations, often no more than four or five lines in length and usually balanced on a single radically original metaphor.

Pound and Hulme were joined by a number of other poets, notably Hilda Doolittle, Richard Aldington, William Carlos Williams, and later, Amy Lowell. They called themselves Imagistes. In 1912 Pound edited the first imagist anthology, Some Imagiste Poets. Meanwhile, he and the others propagated vigorously for their beliefs, and Pound, who had become foreign editor of Harriet Monroe's Poetry magazine, published therein a number of manifestoes as well as his own and his friends' poems. Pound later abandoned the movement and with Wyndham Lewis went on to vorticism; though Amy Lowell carried on for a few years, by 1917 or 1918 the movement, as an institutional device, had expired. It had, however, exerted an enormous influence on the development of modern poetry and had provided the break with the immediate past which was necessary before a new literature could appear. Some of imagism's most enduring monuments have been translations such as those made by the English poet Arthur Waley from Chinese poetry and by Francis Denman from American Indian poetry.

Imbolc. February 1, one of the 4 great feast days of the ancient Celtic year. See Samain; Beltine; Lugnasad.

Imhotep. In the mythology of ancient Egypt, the god of learning in general, and a physician later deified as god of medicine. He corresponds to the Greek Aesculapius.

Imitation of Christ (De Imitatione Christi; 1429). A religious treatise commonly ascribed to Thomas à Kempis. It has been said that this book has had more influence on Christianity than any other book except the Bible. It is mystical in tone as it explores the inner life and the value of contemplation, yet remarkably clear in its simplicity. Other candidates for the authorship of this work are the brilliant chancellor of the University of Paris, Jean Gerson, and a Jean Gersen, who is only identified as the abbot of Vercelli.
Imlac. In Samuel Johnson's novel Rasselas, the son of a rich merchant of Gozama, a city near the mouth of the Nile, Imlac is a great traveler, philosopher and poet, who accompanies Rasselas on his journey and returns with him to the Happy Valley. Imlac, the moralistic spokesman for Johnson himself, teaches that man should make the most of what order and reason he can find, but that it is folly to stake one's hopes on a facile discovery of divine order in the world.

Immaculate Conception. The belief that the Virgin Mary, from the moment of her conception, was free from the stain of Original Sin. The belief has been widespread among Christians as a pious opinion, but has also had many opponents, especially St. Thomas Aquinas in the 12th century. In 1854, in the bull Ineffabilis Deus, Pope Pius IX proclaimed it a dogma, making the belief binding for Roman Catholics. The feast is observed on December 8.

Immermann, Karl Lebrecht (1796-1840). German novelist and playwright. His Die Epigenen (The Late-Comers, 1836) is one of the earliest German social novels. It is set in the Germany of the 1830's when, partly because of the stiflingly political conservatism of Austria and Prussia, there was a widespread feeling of having been born too late for the great and exciting ages of humanity. His later novel Münchhausen (1838-1839) is quite a daring experiment in form. It consists of two main stories developed in alternating episodes; though connected, they are independent enough to be separated, and one, entitled Der Oberhof (The Upper Manor), is often read alone. Der Oberhof is a rustic village story reflecting the Biedermeier tendency, whereas the remainder of the novel, a variation on the adventures of Baron Munchhausen, is an urbane document of social criticism. Immermann's best-known drama Merlin (1832) is more romantic than either of the novels.

Immoralist, The (L'Immoraliste; 1902). A tale by André Gide. Michel takes his bride Marceline to North Africa, where he develops tuberculosis and becomes hyperconscious of physical sensations, particularly of his attraction to young Arab boys. Back on his French estate after being cured, he is encouraged by his friend Ménalque to rise above conventional good and evil and give free rein to all his passions. When Marceline falls ill with the tuberculosis she caught while nursing him, he takes her south. He neglects her demands on him more and more, however, in order to keep himself free, since his new doctrine demands that the weak be suppressed if necessary for the preservation of the strong. She dies, and he, guilt-ridden and debilitated by his excesses, tries to justify his conduct to a group of friends.

Imogene. In Shakespeare's Cymbeline, the daughter of Cymbeline and the tender, faithful wife of Posthumus Leonatus. Attempting to find her husband, who erroneously believes that she has betrayed him, she disguises herself as a page and assumes the name of Fidele.

Importance of Being Earnest, The (1895). A comedy by Oscar Wilde. It is noted for its witty lines, its clever situations, and its satire on the British nobility and clergy. It deals with the aspirations of Jack Worthing to the hand of Gwendolen Fairfax, daughter of Lady Bracknell. Lady Bracknell objects to the marriage because of the obscurity of Worthing's background; he was found in a handbag in Victoria Station and has no information as to who his parents were. Eventually matters are straightened out by the revelation that Worthing is actually the son of Lady Bracknell's sister and was left in the handbag as an infant through the absentmindedness of a governess. His name is actually Ernest John Moncrieff and he is the brother of his friend Algernon Moncrieff. Worthing is particularly happy that his name turns out to be Ernest since he has created an imaginary younger brother of that name for the benefit of his ward Cecily Cardew (who eventually marries Algernon); this "Ernest," a purportedly rakish fellow whom Worthing had constantly to get out of scrapes, was Worthing's excuse for absenting himself from his country estate, where Cecily lived under the tutelage of Miss Prism, to go to London to see Gwendolen.

Impresa. The Italian word for heraldic device or personal motto. Its literal meaning of enterprise suggests its key idea: an expression of the soul of an individual, his goal or chief characteristic. Impresa, very popular during the Renaissance and baroque eras in Europe, could be a single pungent phrase or a few lines, accompanied by illustration or used alone. The fact that many were collected and commented upon relates them to the emblema or embleem books, which are, however, a somewhat different device. In English literature, an example is Spenser's Shepherd's Calendar, in which each of the eclogues is prefaced by a motto appropriate to the character involved, as in Colin's "Anchora speme" (Still I hope), inaccurately termed an emblem by Spenser.

Impressionism. A term applied originally to the work of a group of 19th-century French painters in Paris. Associated with naturalism, rebelling equally against the academic and romantic schools, the impressionists attempted to convey in painting the impression gained from the direct observation of nature. Concerned principally with the study of light and its refractions, they used only the colors of the spectrum, and did much of their work out of doors, thus continuing the tradition of their forerunners, the Barbizon school. Claude Monet, Renoir, and Alfred Sisley are the most typical representatives of impressionism in its purest form, other important members of the group being Manet, Degas, Pissarro, and Cézanne. In 1874, when the work of several of these artists was rejected by the Salon, they organized their own separate exhibition, but for an entire generation their work was generally ignored or decried. Gradually the group began to disintegrate, each artist developing in his own manner, yet a vast spiritual unity continued to mark their work.

Impressionism had an enormous effect on the subsequent history and development of painting both in and outside of France. Among American-born painters its influence can be seen in the works of James McNeill Whistler, John Singer Sargent, Mary Cassatt, and Maurice Prendergast.

In German literature of the late 19th and early 20th centuries, impressionism denotes the style of writing characterized by extreme precision in language and emphasis on accurately rendering, in all their vagueness and complexity, subjective impressions of unique, individual experiences. Impressionism is therefore most commonly found in lyric poetry, especially that of Lillencron, Dehmel, the early George, Hofmannsthal, and the early Rilke; but it is also clearly an element in Thomas Mann’s early prose style, especially in Buddenbrooks, and in the dramatic writing of Arthur Schnitzler. The subjectivity of impressionism constitutes a reaction against both the materialism of mid-19th-century philosophy and the programmatic objectivity of naturalism; but naturalism and impressionism still had much in common, particularly the wish to make words more precise and the tendency to concentrate on specific human situations, so that several major writers, including Hauptmann, Holz and Schlaf, were active in both movements. See Expressionism.

In music, impressionism stresses sonorous effects for their own sake, i.e., the use of harmonies and instrumental timbres as musical “colors” that blend and change without clear direction or purpose other than the evocation of a general mood. Most impressionistic pieces have literary or pictorial titles; the programmatic implications are generally more important than form or structure. Claude Debussy, Maurice Ravel, Ottorino Respighi (1879–1936), and Charles Tomlinson Griffes (1884–1920) are among those composers associated with impressionism.

Inanna or Isinmi. A Sumerian goddess of erotic love and of war. She was a prototype of the goddess Ishtar who, under various names but with remarkably consistent nature, was the chief female goddess of the Near East for 3,000 years. Many of her attributes caused her to be later identified with Artemis, Aphrodite, and other Greek goddesses. The most important of the many myths in which she figures is that of her descent into the underworld, whose queen is her dire sister Ereshkigal. Parallel myths of Ishtar make it likely that this dangerous journey was undertaken to rescue her lover Dumuzi or Tammuz. Inanna first orders her herald Ninshubur, if she does not return in three days, to notify the assembled gods. She then goes down into the underworld. As she approaches the queen’s palace, her robes and ornaments are removed one by one until she is finally led naked before Ereshkigal. As Inanna had expected, she is killed by glances of death from the queen and the Anunnaki, judges of the underworld, and her body is hung up from a stake.

On his mistress’s instructions, Ninshubur begs the gods for aid, but only Enki is willing to help. He sends two creatures to the underworld bearing the food and water of life, which they sprinkle on Inanna’s body. Reviving, she returns to earth; but the dead swarm up out of the underworld and accompany her wherever she goes. The remainder of the myth has not been discovered.

In Camera. See No Exit.

Inca. A Quechua-speaking people who dominated pre-Columbian Peru. The name Inca was also given to their kings, absolute monarchs who were worshiped as descendants of the sun. From their capital at Cuzco, they gradually conquered neighboring regions, especially after 1438 when Pachacuti and his son, Topa Inca, extended Inca rule as far north as Quito and as far south as northern Chile. See Atahualpa; Francisco Pizarro; Garcilaso de la Vega.

Incunabula (Lat., “a cradle”). Works of art or industry of the infant stages in the development of a given field. In the history of bookmarking, books printed before 1500. They are sometimes called cradle books or fifteeners. In this sense the singular “incunabulum” can be used.

Independents. In the English Civil War, the radical wing of the Parliamentary party. It consisted of Puritans and other independent dissenters who were opposed to the Presbyterian faction. They came to power with the Rump Parliament and were the dominant party during the rule of Oliver Cromwell.

Index, The. Official list of books that Roman Catholics are not allowed to read. The Roman Index includes both the Index Librorum Prohibitorum and the Index Expurgatorius. The former contains a list of such books as are absolutely forbidden to be read by faithful Catholics. The latter contains such books as are forbidden till certain parts are omitted or amended. The lists are made out by a board of cardinals called the Congregation of the Index.

Indiana (1832). A novel by George Sand. In this violently romantic work, which served as a springboard to establish George Sand’s literary reputation, the events bear a provocative resemblance to those in the author’s own life. Its heroine, a Creole named Indiana, abandons her old husband for a fascinating young lover.

Indian Summer (1886). A novel by William Dean Howells. Theodore Colville, a journalist of 40, meets a childhood acquaintance, the widow Mrs. Lina Bowen, in Florence. He becomes engaged to her young ward, Imogene Graham. When Imogene admits that she is in love with a younger man, Colville finally recognizes the more mature love he feels for Mrs. Bowen.

Indra. Also called Mahendra (from Sans., maha, great). The chief god in the Hindu pantheon of lower deities. In Hindu myth, he is also the god of heaven and ruler over thunder, lightning, and storm. He molested Ahalya and was cursed by her husband, the sage Gautama. See AH; AIRAVATA; MATAI.

In Dubious Battle (1936). A novel by John Steinbeck. It deals with the problem of labor organization among the migrant fruit-pickers in California. Mac, the leading character, is a veteran organizer for the Communist Party who allows nothing to interfere with his service to the cause, not even the murder of his friend Jim Nolan. Another important character is Doc Burton, an uncommitted sympathizer who helps the striking workers.

Industrial Workers of the World. Called the IWW, A federation of industrial unions established at Chicago in 1905. Dedicated to the overthrow of capitalism by direct means, it called general strikes and resorted to sabotage. Many "wobblies," as members were called, refused to fight in World War I, claiming that it was a struggle between capitalists. The IWW became increasingly unpopular during the war, when ultra-patriotic feeling swept the U.S. In 1918 the U.S. government arrested, tried, and convicted its leaders, and by 1925 its influence had ended.

Inez, Donna. In Byron's poem Don Juan, the mother of Juan. After worrying her husband, Don José, to death by her prudery and want of sympathy, Donna Inez endeavors to raise Juan by the strictest rules of propriety and make him a model of all the virtues. Unfortunately, he is seduced by her best friend, the equally proper and intellectual Donna Julia infantes de Lara, Cantar de los siete. See LARA, CANTAR DE LOS SIETE INFANTES DE.

Infant Phenomenon, The. The stage name of the allegedly 10-year-old Ninetta Crummlies in Charles Dickens' NICHOLAS NICKLEBY. Actually, she is at least 15 and her low stature results from being kept up late every night and "an unlimited allowance of gin and water."

Infernal Machine, The (La Machine infernale; 1934). A tragedy by Jean Cocteau. It uses the story of Oedipus as an example of a cosmic joke, "one of the most perfect machines constructed by the infernal gods for the mathematical annihilation of a mortal." Oedipus, who possesses the intuitive, imaginative qualities of Cocteau's ideal poet figure, is brutally crushed by a hostile external world.

Inferno (Hell), Part I of the Divine Comedy by DANTE. Vergil conducts Dante through the region of damnation, where the souls suffer eternal punishments appropriate to their sins. In the anteroom are those who did nothing in life, neither good nor evil. Then follow nine levels of Hell, descending cyclically into the earth. The first is Limbo, where are the blameless but unbaptized spirits, including the great men of pagan antiquity. The circles of the sins of incontinence, least terribly punished, include the carnal sinners (see PAOLO AND FRANCESCA), the gluttons, the misers and the spendthrifts, the wrathful and the sullen. With the sixth circle, that of the heretics, begin the horrible torments of the City of Dis, generally fiery. The seventh circle contains the violent against others (murderers), against self (suicides), and against God and Nature (blasphemers, perverts, and the like). The eighth level includes 10 categories of the fraudulent (seducers, sorcerers, thieves, hypocrites, and various kinds of liars and evil counselors). The most odious of the fraudulent, the traitors, are frozen in the ice of the ninth circle: the betrayers of their own relatives or country (see UOOLFINO) and, at the very center of the earth, Lucifer with three heads gnawing on Brutus and Cassius, the betrayers of Julius Caesar, and Judas Iscariot, the betrayer of Jesus Christ. Turning around at Lucifer's waist, Dante and Vergil emerge through a tunnel into the opposite hemisphere, which is covered with water, to approach the island of the mountain of Purgatory.

Informant, The (1925). A novel by Liam O'PLAHERTY. It is a psychological melodrama describing the last day of Gypo Nolan, a destitute Irish revolutionary who turned a conlude in to the police for 20 pounds.

Inge, William (1913- ). American playwright. He is known for his dramas dealing with average people of the Midwest. His first play, Farther Off from Heaven (1947), was produced by Margo Jones in her Dallas theater. Come Back Little Sheba (1950) won the George Jean Nathan and the Theatre Time awards; Picnic (1953) won the Pulitzer Prize and was later made into a movie. Bus Stop (1955) was a successful play and was also later made into a movie, as was The Dark at the Top of the Stairs (1957). A Loss of Roses was produced in 1960. Inge is also the author of a successful screenplay, Splendor in the Grass (1956).

Ingemann, Bernard Severin (1789-1862). Danish poet and novelist. Ingemann was the author of a series of popular historical novels set in the Danish middle ages. A schoolteacher in the old town of Sorø, he acquired a lively sense of the past and a love for the ancient chivalric values. Among his novels are Waldemar Seier (Waldemar, surnamed Seir, or the Victorious, 1826), Erik Menvuds Barndom (The Childhood of King Eric Mened, 1828) and Kong Erik og de Fredeløse (King Eric and the Outlaws, 1833). Morgenænge for Børn (1837) and Morgen og Aften sange (1839) are collections of simple delicate lyrics that express a naïve vision of the world.

Ingénù, L' (1767). A satiric romance by Voltaire. The hero, L'Ingénû, returns to France after having been brought up by the primitive Huron Indians in Canada. His simple, frank, and naturally good qualities are violently contrasted by Voltaire with the conventional mores and religious convictions of the civilized world. The story is a criticism of highly-placed officials during Louis XV's time, a protest of the abuse of power, and a satire of the absurdities of society's conventions. See NOBLE SAVAGES.

Ingersoll, Robert G[reen] (1833-1899). American lawyer, public official, and orator. He was known as "the Great Agnostic" for his defense of free-thinking in religious matters. An active Republican, he became a sought-after orator when he eloquently nominated James G. Blaine for the presidency (1876). Influenced by Voltaire and Paine, Ingersoll is known for such aphorisms as these: "Many people think they have religion when they are merely troubled with dyspepsia”; “With soap, baptism is a good thing”; and “An honest God is the noblest work of man.” Among Ingersoll’s books are The Gods (1872), Some Mistakes of Moses (1879), and Why I Am an Agnostic (1886). After his death appeared The Works of Robert G. Ingersoll (12 v., 1900). See BEN-HUR.

Ingmar, the. A Swedish family whose struggles and adventures are narrated in the short stories that comprise Selma Lagerlöf’s Jerusalem.

Ingres, Jean Auguste Dominique (1780-1867). French painter. The acknowledged leader of the classical school, he painted many religious, historical, and mythological subjects. These are less appreciated today than his portraits, but he is noted for the strong, refined purity of his drawing and the abstract grace of his form and line.

Iniquity, the. See Vice, the.

In Memoriam (Lat., “in memory of”). A long poem written between the years 1833 and 1850 by Alfred Tennyson, in memory of his friend Arthur Hallam, who died in 1833. It is considered one of the great English elegies and, on the whole, the poet’s most impressive longer work. The poem not only deals with Hallam’s death and Tennyson’s enduring sense of loss, but also attempts to grapple with many of the intellectual and religious problems of the mid-19th century: the decline of faith, the rise of skepticism and scientific materialism.

inner light. Spiritual illumination. Specifically, in Quaker doctrine, the term designates a divine presence in the soul of every man, the light of Christ that gives moral guidance and religious and spiritual assurance to all who are willing to receive it.

Inner Temple and Middle Temple. See INNS OF COURT.

Innes, Hammond. Pen name of Ralph Hammond-Innes (1913- ). English novelist, writer of thrillers with backgrounds marked by unusual accuracy of detail. Among his works are The White South (1949), Naked Land (1954), Land God Gave to Cain (1958), Doomed Oasis (1960), and Harvest of Journeys (1960), an autobiography.

Innes, Michael. The pen name under which J. I. M. Stewart writes his detective stories.

Inness, George (1825-1894). American landscape painter. The English landscapists and the Barbizon school influenced his portrayal of familiar landscapes in their varying moods. In his last years he allowed an increasing poetic vagueness to blur the delicately toned landscapes he created from memory.

Innocents, Massacre of the. The slaughter of the male children of Bethlehem “from two years old and under,” when Jesus was born (Matt. 2:16). This was done at the command of Herod the Great in order to cut off “the babe” who was destined to become “King of the Jews.” The Feast of the Holy Innocents commemorating this event is December 28. In modern English parlance, the word “innocent” has the same meaning as “innocent.” In modern parlance, the word “innocent” has the same meaning as “innocent.”

Innocents Abroad, The, or, The New Pilgrim’s Progress (1869). A travel book by Mark Twain. It is based on a series of letters he wrote from Europe as a roving correspondent. The book burlesques the sentimental travel book popular in the mid-19th century. Admiring the leisure of Europeans, Clemens criticized some American manners.

Innocent Voyage, The. See High Wind in Jamaica.

Innommable, l’. See UNNAMABLE, THE.

Inns of Court. The four legal societies that have the exclusive right of calling candidates to the English bar, and maintain instruction and examination for that purpose. They are all in London, and are the Inner Temple, the Middle Temple, Lincoln’s Inn, and Gray’s Inn. Each consists of a legal faculty governed by a board of “benchers.”

Ino. In Greek mythology, a daughter of Cadmus and consort of Athamas, by whom she had two sons, Leachus and Melicertes. Ino’s jealousy drove the children of Athamas’ first wife Nephele to the sacrificial altar, but they were saved by the Golden Fleece. Because Ino and Athamas helped Zeus to save the infant Dionysus from Hera’s wrath, Hera revenged herself by driving them mad. Athamas killed Leachus, mistaking him for a stag; Ino escaped with Melicertes and flung herself into the sea, but Zeus, grateful because she had protected Dionysus, transformed her into the sea goddess Leucothoe. He transformed Melicertes into the sea god Palaemon, and, under those names, both watch over storm-tossed sailors.

In Our Time (1924). A collection of short stories by Ernest Hemingway. First published in France and the following year in the U.S., many of the stories deal with the development of young Nick Adams, who bears some resemblance to the author himself. In Indian Camp, Nick is introduced to the violence of life when he accompanies his doctor father; Big Two-Hearted River shows his mental state after he has been wounded in World War I. The stories alternate with imagistic “chapters” that give glimpses of the war and of bullfighting. See Killers, THE.

In Praise of Johnny Appleseed (1921). A poem by Vachel Lindsay. It follows the career of John Chapman over the Appalachians, his wanderings among the Indians and in the wilderness, and his vigorous old age.

Inquisition. A court commonly called the Holy Office. It was instituted to inquire into offenses against the Roman Catholic religion, and fully established by Gregory IX in 1235. Torture, as a means of extracting recantations or evidence, was first authorized by Pope Innocent IV in 1252, and those found guilty were hanged over the secular arm to be dealt with according to the secular laws of the land. This was followed by the founding of the Congregation of the Inquisition in Rome, 1542. The Inquisition was only once introduced into England (viz., at the trials of the Templars, who were suppressed in 1308); it was most active in southern Europe, particularly in Spain, where it flourished from 1237 to 1820. In the Provençal region of France, where the Inquisition fostered the rise of militant monastic orders designed to stamp out mass heretic movements, the Dominican order played a crucial role in the Albigensian Crusade; the Inquisition was suppressed in France in 1772.

Inquisition, Spanish. A tribunal for suppressing heresy in Spain, established by Pope Sixtus IV in 1478 at the request of Ferdinand and Isabella. The first Inquisitor-General was Tomás de Torquemada (c. 1420–1498), a Dominican monk whose name has become a byword for cruelty and severity.

Though nominally under papal control, the Inquisition was actually an agency of the crown, which often used it for political purposes. The principal victims of the Inquisition in Spain were the converted Muslims and Jews, known respectively as Moriscos and Marranos. It also investigated crimes against morality, such as polygamy and rape. Its procedures were secret, and suspects were not told the identity of their accusers; torture was sometimes used. Penalties, which were announced at solemn public gatherings called autos de fé, ranged from reprimand and warning to "relaxation," i.e., being delivered to the secular authorities to be burned at the stake. The Inquisition was suppressed in 1808 and its successor, the Tribunal of the Faith, was abolished in 1834.

Insarov. The hero of Ivan Turgenev's novel, On the Eve. A Bulgarian revolutionary who lives only to free his country from Turkish oppression, the dedicated Insarov inspires love in the young Russian Elena Stakhova.

Inscape. A term coined by the poet Gerard Manley Hopkins. Usually applied to an object or scene in nature, it means essential, intrinsic quality and oneness that is composed of a number of separate characteristics. Insreis is the force that creates and maintains inscape.

Inscription for the Entrance to a Wood (1817). A poem by William Cullen Bryant. The poet finds solace in the woods for the guilt and misery of the world.

Inspector General, The (Revisor; 1836). A comic drama by Nikolai Gogol. It is regarded as one of the best plays in Russian dramaturgy. The action revolves about a case of mistaken identity. The central character Khlestakov, a run-of-the-mill civil servant from St. Petersburg, is stranded in a small provincial town. The corrupt officials of the town, hearing that a government inspector is on the way there, convince themselves that Khlestakov is the man. Khlestakov quickly catches on and goes along with the error, bragging of his high connections in the capital, taking bribes, and wooing the mayor's daughter and wife. He is unmasked when a glowing letter he has written to a friend in St. Petersburg is read by the inquisitive postmaster, but before he is found out, Khlestakov has prudently left town. While the town officials are fuming about the ruse, the real inspector general arrives.

The play was taken as a social satire at the time of its production and that view has remained the standard one in Russian criticism. There are, however, many fantastic aspects to the comedy, particularly in Khlestakov's inane chattering.

Instauratio Magna (Lat., "great renewal"). A projected work by Francis Bacon, designed to be a comprehensive survey of the principles, methods, and accomplishments of the "new philosophy," or experimental science. Only two of six parts were completed: The Advancement of Learning and Novum Organum.

Institute of France (Institut de France). A national French society, established in 1795 by the Republican Convention "to advance the sciences and arts of research ... and to prosecute those scientific and literary labors which shall have for their end general utility and the glory of the republic." The organization includes five academies: L'Académie Française, L'Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres, L'Académie des Sciences, L'Académie des Beaux Arts, and L'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques.

Institutes of the Christian Religion (Institution de la religion chrétienne; 1536). The principal work of John Calvin. It first appeared in Latin in 1536, and a French translation, made by Calvin himself, was published in 1541. Designed as a reply to attacks on Protestantism and as a guide to Scripture, the work states, with passionate conviction, the essential doctrines of the new religion.

Insulted and Injured, The (Unizhennye i oskorblyonnye; 1861). A novel by Fedor Dostoevski. The first of his full-length novels, it is also the first of his works clearly to express Dostoevski's characteristic ideas about the purifying function of suffering. The book has a conventional, melodramatic plot, with Ivan Petrovich (Vanyu), who is in love with Natasha Ikhmeneva, trying to aid her in her wooing of Alyosha Valkovsky. Ivan, a young writer who bears some resemblance to the young Dostoevski, engages in philosophical duels with the cynical Prince Valkovsky, Alyosha's father, an early sketch of the "predatory type" more fully developed in Svidrigailov in Crime and Punishment and Stavrogin in The Possessed.

The sentimental atmosphere of the novel is heightened by the presence of a young girl, Nelly. Taken obviously from Dickens, she undergoes harrowing experiences at the hands of the prince before she is rescued.

_interior monologue. See stream of consciousness._

interlude. A form of dramatic entertainment, originating during the reign of Henry VIII of England and popular at the Tudor court. The exact nature of the interlude is not known, but it is believed to have originated as a brief skit between the courses of a banquet. Court interludes, of which John Heywood was the outstanding author, were usually lively and realistic and devoted chiefly to entertainment. Heywood's The Four P's is a typical example. There were also educational interludes, didactically teaching an edifying moral; these were usually written in Latin, using type characters and situations, and were performed at public schools, such as Eton. The interlude is considered a transitional form between the miracle plays and morality plays of the Middle Ages and fully developed Elizabethan drama.

International. The name of 3 successive international associations, or congresses, designed to unite the working classes of all nations and promote Marxist socialism.

First International. The International Working Men's Association was founded in London in 1864 under the leadership of Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels. It had some success for the next five years, lending its support to aggrieved workers in England and in Europe, but, when the Russian anarchist Bakunin joined in 1869, a rift opened up between his followers and the less radical Marxists. Bakunin's group was expelled in 1872, but the organization lost the support of the nationalistic trade unions being formed at this time, and the last congress was held in Philadelphia in 1876.

Second International. Formed in 1889, the Second International followed the same Marxist theories as the First. After repeated attempts to avoid war, the movement lost most of its force when the First World War broke out and most of the members supported the war as national subjects, instead of opposing it as internationalists.

Third International. Also called the Communist International or Comintern. Established in Russia in 1919 as a result of the revolution, this International was formed to help spread Communist revolution throughout the world. The hostility of the Communists to the more moderate Socialists in the rest of Europe led to a revival of the Second International in the 1930's to provide a united Socialist front. The Third International was dissolved in 1943 by Stalin.

A so-called Second-and-a-half International was formed in Vienna in 1919, its attempt to reconcile the Socialists and Communists ended in total failure in 1922. Trotsky formed a Fourth, or Anti-Comintern, International in 1937 from his exile in Mexico, but it had little influence.

In the American Grain (1925). A volume of essays by William Carlos Williams. Attempting to discover the essential qualities of the American character, it includes sketches of such figures as Columbus, Poe, and Franklin, but it stresses minor figures of a less heroic nature. The book shares Van Wyck Brooks's search for a "usable past," and was used by Hart Crane in his attempt to create the myth of America in The Bridge.

In the Midst of Life (1891). A collection of 26 stories by Ambrose Bierce. In these tales of horror, Bierce implies that life is subject to accident and coincidence. The stories have twin endings rarely surpassed in literature. Ten of the tales deal with soldiers, and in every case, the young men die. Bierce's characters are generally abstractions, interesting not for their individuality but for their tragic fate. The mood of horror, established by realistic detail, is further exaggerated by the author's sardonic humor. Among the most famous of the stories are An Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge, A Horseman in the Sky, The Man and the Snake, and The Eyes of the Panther.

In the Ravine (V ovrage; 1900). A long story by Anton Chekhov. A study of the brutal lives of the peasantry in a small provincial town, this work has long been considered one of Chekhov's best prose pieces. On its publication, it was unanimously acclaimed one of the outstanding works of Russian literature. The story's central characters are the shopkeeper Tzybukin, his two sons, and their wives, Aksinya and Lipa. Aksinya is a rapacious creature who eventually takes over the household and shop, drives out the old man, and causes the death of Lipa's small son.

Intruder in the Dust (1948). A novel by William Faulkner. Lucas Beauchamp, an aging Negro who has long netted the townfolk of Jefferson by his refusal to adopt the Negro's traditionally servile attitude, is wrongfully accused of murdering a white man and is threatened with violent death at the hands of a mob. Through the efforts of 16-year-old Chick Mallison, Aleck Sander, Chick's Negro friend, and 70-year-old Miss Eunice Habersham, Lucas' innocence is proved and the real murderer captured. Because of his relationship with Lucas, Chick comes into manhood able to recognize other human beings as individuals, regardless of their color.

Invictus (Lat., unconquered). The title of a well-known poem (usually deplored by critics) written in a tuberculosis hospital, by William Ernest Henley. Its last lines read:

It matters not how strait the gate
How charged with punishment the scroll,
I am the master of my fate,
I am the captain of my soul.

Invincibles, the Irish. An Irish secret society. It was founded in Dublin in 1881 with the object of doing away with the English tyranny. Members of this society were responsible for the Phoenix Park murders in 1882.

Invisible Man (1952). A novel by Ralph Ellison. This unusual first novel is the record of a Negro boy's progression from youthful affirmation to a sense of total rejection; his final invisibility—that is, his loss of social identity—gives him a point of view often compared with that of the hero of Dostoevski's Notes from the Underground. Ellison's unnamed protagonist at first has a rather unrealistic trust in the motives of others. He is dismissed from a Negro college for showing one of the founders how Negroes actually live in the South. In New York City he plays a political role for the Communists, until he realizes that they are merely using him as a symbol of the Negro; as he person he is as invisible to them as to everyone else. During a surrealistic Harlem riot, he comes to the realization that to affirm his identity he would have to contend with both white people and the leaders of his own race.

Io. In Greek mythology, a priestess of Hera. Zeus seduced her, then transformed her into a cow to save her from Hera's wrath. Hera, however, sent a gadfly which drove Io over Greece and much of Asia. In Egypt she finally regained human form and gave birth to twins, Belus and Agenor, who fathered many dynasties of Greece, Crete, and Asia Minor. She appears in Aeschylus' Prometheus Bound.

Iolanthe; or, The Peer and the Peri (1882). An opera by Gilbert and Sullivan. Iolanthe is a fairy banished because she married a mortal. Her son, Strephon, is a fairy down to the waist, but his legs are mortal. This leads to complications when he wishes to marry Phyllis, a shepherdess. The opera satirizes the House of Lords and the Courts of Chancery.

Iolcus or Iolkos (Iolkos). A city in Thessaly, the modern Volo, point of embarkation of the Argonauts.

Ion (418 B.C.). A drama by Euripides. It treats the legend of Ion, son of Creusa and Apollo. He ultimately became king of Athens and ancestor of the Ionian race. It is one of Euripides' most dramatic plays. It has been interpreted by some as a skeptical drama that questioned the sanctity of Apollo and the honesty of his Delphic oracle.

Ionesco, Eugène (1912– ). Romanian-born French dramatist of the absurdist school. His earlier works are characterized by deliberate non sequitur, the logic of nightmares, and strange metamorphoses. The stage is cluttered with inanimate or rotting things that proliferate until any remnant of the human is pathetically stifled. Nevertheless, these grimly grotesque farces remain basically comic, because Ionesco is essentially sympathetic to the human attempt, however pitifully inadequate, at communication and love.

The Bald Soprano, The Lesson (1950), Jack, or the Submission (1950), The Chairs, Victims of Duty (1952), and Amedée (1953) are all tragicomic in tone. Although the compassionate satire and the atmosphere of the fantastic remain, with The Killer (Two Greek Gags; 1958), Ionesco's plays begin to employ a more explicit symbolic technique and a more straightforward plot line. The Rhinoceros is almost a conventional allegory.

Iphiclis (Iphiklos). See Melampous.

Iphigenia (Iphigeneia). In Greek mythology, the eldest child of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra. She was sacrificed by her father in order to gain favorable winds for the Greek fleet on its way to Troy (see Iphigenia in Aulis). Her mother used this act as an excuse for murdering Agamemnon on his return. Their son Orestes, driven mad after killing Clytemnestra, went to the savage land of Tauris and there found his sister, whom Artemis had spirited away from her funeral pyre. Iphigenia saved Orestes and his friend, Pylades, and sailed away with them (see Iphigenia in Tauris).

Iphigenia in Aulis (Iphigeneia he en Aulidí; c. 405 B.C.). A tragedy by Euripides. The seer Calchas has predicted that only the sacrifice of Iphigenia will save the Greeks from remaining trapped in the harbor at Aulis by unfavorable winds. Agamemnon has already sent for his daughter, pretending that she is to marry Achilles. He regrets his decision, but is dissuaded from altering it by the scorn of Menelaus. When Iphigenia arrives, with her mother Clytemnestra and her brother Orestes, even Menelaus relents, but Agamemnon orders the sacrifice, sure that Odysseus will force his hand in any case. Clytemnestra begs her husband to free his daughter, and Achilles, who has known nothing of the plot, offers to save her, but Iphigenia agrees to sacrifice herself for the Greeks.

The play was finished by Euripides' son after the playwright's death. An ending in which Iphigenia is saved when Artemis carries her off and substitutes a deer on the altar is thought to be a later interpolation. An altered version of this story was made into an opera by Gluck, Iphigénie en Aulide (1772).

Iphigenia in Tauris (Iphigeneia he en Taurois; c. 414–412 B.C.). A tragedy by Euripides. After murdering his mother Clytemnestra (see Orestes), Orestes has been pursued by the Furies and Apollo has said he will be cured of madness only if he rescues the statue of Artemis from the savage inhabitants of Tauris (the Taurians), who kill all Greeks they find in their country. With his faithful friend Pylades, Orestes arrives in Tauris. The two are promptly captured and are brought to the high priestess to be ritually prepared for their sacrifice. The priestess is Iphigenia, who had been transported to Tauris by Artemis (see Iphigenia in Aulis). In a moving scene, she and Orestes recognize each other. After each of the friends has offered to die for the other, she manages by a ruse to save both and escape with them in a boat. They are driven back by the wind, but saved when Athena appears and orders Thoas, the Taurian king, to let them leave. A version of this story was made into an opera by Gluck, Iphigénie en Tauride (1779).

Iphigenia in Tauris (Iphigenia auf Tauris; prose version, 1779; final version in verse, 1787). A play by Johann Wolfgang von Goethe after Euripides' play of the same title. Iphigenia, whom her father Agamemnon had wished to sacrifice in order to get good weather for the Greeks' voyage to Troy, has been snatched away by Artemis and left in Tauris as a priestess. Her brother Orestes, tormented by the Furies, then comes unwittingly to Tauris, is joyfully reunited with his sister, and both sail home. Goethe, however, does away with Euripides' deus ex machina and makes the play's resolution arise from what he later called mere humanity, the inner core of emotional sympathy that unites men, transcends all boundaries of nationality or religion, and ultimately assuages all guilt. See Weimar Classicism; Charlotte von Stein.

Iphigénie en Aulide (1679). A tragedy by Jean Racine. Its material is freely drawn from the play by Euripides. An oracle declares that only the sacrifice of Iphigénie can release the Greek fleet from Aulis, where unfavorable winds have stranded it. Priests force Agamemnon to send his daughter word that Achilles, her betrothed, desires her at Aulis for an immediate marriage. Achilles is incensed to learn of the ruse, but Iphigénie obediently awaits her fate. Remorseful, Agamemnon arranges for his daughter to escape, but the slave-girl Eríphille (a character invented by Racine), who loves Achilles, reveals the plan. The priest Calchas declares Eríphille the victim of the gods, who, for her name at birth was Iphigénie. Eríphille kills herself on the altar, and Iphigénie is spared.

I.R.A. See Irish Republican Army.

Iras. In Shakespeare's Antony and Cleopatra, the second lady-in-waiting to Cleopatra. She dies shortly before her mistress.

Ireland, William Henry (1777–1835). English forger of Shakespearean manuscripts and documents. His own blank verse play, Vortigern and Rowena, which he attributed to Shakespeare, was a complete failure on the stage (1796) and led to the exposure of the forgeries, and shortly thereafter Ireland wrote An Authentic Account of the Shaksperean MSS. He also published several ballads, poems, novels, memoirs, and translations.

I Remember Mama (1945). A play by John Van Druten. A dramatization of Kathryn Forbes' Mama's Bank Account (1943), it is the amusing and tender story of a Norwegian mother and father raising their children in America in the early days of the 20th century. The situation later became the basis of a successful television serial starring Peggy Wood.

Irena. See Faerie Queene, The.
Irene. In John Galsworthy's Forsyte Saga, the sensitive, passionate heroine. Wife of Soames Forsyte, she falls in love with Philip Bosinney, is divorced, and marries Young Jolyon Forsyte.

Ireton, Henry (1611–1651). English general and statesman. The husband of Oliver Cromwell's daughter Bridget, he was a cavalry commander at the battle of Naseby. He became a member of Parliament in 1645 and was one of the judges at the trial of Charles I.

Iriarte, Tomás de (1750–1791). Spanish fabulist and poet. His best-known work is the collection of fables, 76 in all, entitled Fábulas literarias (1782), which satirizes contemporary literature in a series of apologues including El burro flautista and El oso y el mono. Iriarte also completed a verse translation of Horace.

Iris. The Greek goddess of the rainbow, or the rainbow itself. In classic mythology, she is called the messenger of the gods when they intended discord, and the rainbow is the bridge or road let down from heaven for her accommodation. When the gods meant peace they sent Hermes.

Irish Renaissance. A term used to describe the outburst of creative activity at the turn of the last century, which grew out of the attempt to awaken the Irish people to the wealth and value of their native culture. The movement, which had been developing very slowly in the latter half of the 19th century, achieved its major impetus from the political martyrdom of the Irish leader Charles Stewart Parnell, an event which caused many thoughtful Irishmen to abandon the attempt to achieve a national identity within an English framework. The Gaelic culture with which the movement identified itself had been, prior to the English invasion in the 12th century, among the richest and most advanced in Europe, particularly distinguished by the enormous prestige with which it invested the tribal bard or storyteller.

The movement itself had two major developments: the activities of the Gaelic League, an organization founded in 1893 by Douglas Hyde to restore Gaelic as the official language of Ireland; and the formation of the Irish National Theatre Society in 1901, out of which grew the famous Abbey Theatre Company. The leading figures of this latter movement were William Butler Yeats, Edward Martyn (1859–1927), George Moore, Lady Gregory, and the actors William (1872–1947) and Frank (1870–1931) Fay. The Abbey Theatre soon became (and remained for the next 30 years) a storm center, the result of the brilliant but, at the time, controversial plays of Yeats, John M. Synge and Sean O'Casey. Riots and vigorous protestations greeted the productions of Synge's Playboy of the Western World, Yeat's Countess Cathleen and O'Casey's The Plough and the Stars (1926) and Juno and the Paycock. Despite the protests at home, the Abbey soon developed an international reputation, and the players, featuring such performers as Sarah Allgood (1883–1950) and Barry Fitzgerald (1888–1961) enjoyed their greatest success, ironically enough, on tour in England. Other significant Abbey dramatists were Padraic Colum, Lennox Robinson, and Paul Vincent Carroll. Although the Abbey's greatest days are now past, its impact on the modern theatre is still felt and its legacy may be seen in the work of two recent Irish dramatists of note, Brendan Behan and Samuel Beckett.

In nondramatic literature, the revival was sparked by the poetry of Yeats and A.E., the fanciful and charming re-creations of Irish legends in the novels and poems of James Stephens, the more realistic treatment of contemporary life in the novels and short stories of Liam O'Flaherty, Sean O'Faolain and Frank O'Connor. The irony that marks so much of the Irish Renaissance—its great achievement lies, not in the restoration of Irish culture, but in the immeasurable enrichment of English literature—is nowhere so pronounced as in one of its greatest products: James Joyce, who so steadfastly refused to be associated with the revival and yet whose work is saturated with Irish life.

Irish Republican Army (I.R.A.). A secret organization founded to work for Irish independence from England. It continued to exist even after the Irish Free State was established in 1936.

Iroldo. A character in Boiardo's Orlando Innamorato whose friend Prasildo falls in love with his wife Tisiba. He generously gives her up and leaves, but later Prasildo rescues him and they fight together.

Iron, Ralph. See Olive Schreiner.

Iron crown of Lombard. The crown of the ancient Longobardic kings. It was used at the coronation of Agilulph, king of Lombardy, in 591, and among others who have since been crowned with it are Charlemagne, as king of Italy (774); Henry of Luxemburg (the emperor Henry VII), as king of Lombardy (1311); Frederick IV (1452); and Charles V (1530). In 1805, Napoleon put it on his head by his own hand.

In 1866, at the conclusion of peace, the iron crown was given up by Austria to Italy and was replaced in the cathedral at Monza, where Charlemagne had been crowned, and whence it had been taken in 1859. It is so called from the fact that there is within it a narrow band of iron, said to have been beaten out of one of the nails used at the Crucifixion. According to tradition, the nail was given to Constantine by his mother, St. Helena, who discovered the true cross. The outer circle of it is of beaten gold, and set with precious stones.

Iron Heel, The (1907). A novel by Jack London. Prophetically, it describes events from 1912 to 1918 when a fascist organization, the Iron Heel, seizes power in the U.S. The hero is Ernest Everhard, a socialist who fights the Iron Heel.

Iron Mask, Man in the. See Man in the Iron Mask.

Ironsides. A name given to the cavalry troops that fought under Oliver Cromwell in the English Civil War, especially after the battle of Marston Moor (1644). Earlier, the name was applied only to a famous cavalry regiment led by Cromwell.

Irony. In rhetoric, a deliberate dissembling for effect or to intensify meaning. An example is subtle sarcasm or language meant to be understood only by the initiated. Irony often takes the form of pretended ignorance as a device to lead on and eventually to confound an opponent, as in Socratic irony. Dramatic irony is the theatrical device of making a speaker utter words which have a hidden meaning intelligible to the audience but of which he himself is unconscious, as when Oedipus, in Sophocles' Oedipus Tyrannus, calls down curses upon the slayer of Laius, not knowing that they will fall upon his own head. In life, an occurrence or series of occurrences are said to be ironical that are quite the reverse of what might have been expected, as if fate had intended to be ironical in the rhetorical sense; "the irony of fate" expresses this meaning more explicitly.

Irony, romantic. A literary technique first specifically defined by Friedrich Schlegel. Romantic irony is basically the introduction of paradox into a literary work, as, for example, when the hero of a novel suddenly announces that the author of the novel has died and that he, the hero, will carry on the work, a situation that occurs in Brentano's Gadwii (1800-1801). Another common ironic technique is for statements about a literary work to be included within the work. Examples of this are Tieck's play Puss in Boots (Der gestiefelte Kater, pub. 1797), in which a fictitious audience is put on the stage to criticize the play, and Schlegel's own novel Lucinde (1799), which embodies a theory of the novel.

Iroquois League. A confederation of Iroquoian-speaking Indian tribes organized about 1570 in what is now western New York. The members of the league, who called themselves "People of the Long House" because they dwelt together in harmony, were the Mohawks, Oneidas, Onondagas, Cayugas, Senecas (and later the Tuscaroras). During the 17th century they warfare against the French and other Indian tribes. Most of the Iroquois supported England in the American Revolution, and many settled in Canada after peace was concluded. Hiawatha, the Mohawk chief whose name was immortalized in Longfellow's Song Of Hiawatha (1855), played an important part in creating the League.

Irus (Iros). In Greek legend, the beggar of Ithaca. He ran errands for Penelope's suitors. When Odysseus returned home dressed as a beggar, Irus challenged him, and Odysseus broke his jaw with a blow. (See Odyssey.)

Irving, Sir Henry (1838-1905). English actor. He played successfully various roles and in 1874, with his performance of Hamlet, won real distinction. He took over the management of the Lyceum Theatre in 1878 and made many tours to the U.S. with his company, which included Ellen Terry. He was the first actor to be knighted (1895), and was buried in Westminster Abbey.

Irving, Washington (1783-1859). American essayist, biographer, and historian. Although he prepared to be a lawyer, Irving was physically delicate, and his indulgent family allowed him to lead the life of a man of letters. His first published writing was a series of newspaper sketches appearing under the pseudonym of Jonathan Oldstyle, Gent. In 1807, in collaboration with his brother William, and James Kirk Paulding, Irving wrote the Salmagundi papers; their humorous and satirical pieces modeled on Addison brought him local renown in New York. His first book, A History of New York from the Beginning of the World to the End of the Dutch Dynasty, supposedly by Diedrich Knickerbocker, created the character of the phlegmatic Dutchman. A quaint and humorous figure, Knickerbocker is a familiar byword, particularly in New York.

After the death of his fiancée, Irving sailed for Europe, where he remained for 17 years. His best-known book, The Sketch Book of Geoffrey Crayon, Gent., was published there in 1820, followed by Bracebridge Hall and Tales of Traveller. For financial reasons, Irving accepted a position in the U.S. embassy in Madrid. Fascinated by Spain, he enthusiastically wrote four works: History of the Life and Voyages of Columbus, The Conquest of Granada (1829), Companions of Columbus (1831), and The Legends of the Alhambra. He returned home and journeyed across the prairies, recording his three years later in A Tour on the Prairies. He contracted with John Jacob Astor to write the history of Astoria and produced a sequel, The Adventures of Captain Bonneville. From 1842 to 1846 Irving served as U.S. minister to Spain. He then retired to Sunnyside, his home in Tarrytown, N.Y. As an old man, he wrote biographies of Goldsmith and Hamilton, and completed a five-volume biography of George Washington (1855-1859) shortly before his death.

Irving took as his models Scott, Addison, and Goldsmith, never attempting to develop an original idiom. Though he rarely manifests moral or intellectual awareness, the charm, delicacy, and pictorial quality of his writing give it lasting value. Irving proved to skeptics at home and abroad that the world would read an American book. Further, among the delightful tales and sketches are a few that have become part of American folklore. See WOLPERRY'S ROOST.

Irwin, Wallace [Admah] (1875-1959). American newspaperman, writer of humorous verse and fiction. Irwin won national fame with The Love Sonnets of a Hoodlum (1902), a remarkable collection of Petrarchan verses in the American vernacular. He is also known for creating the character of Hashimura Togo, a Japanese schoolboy, under whose name he wrote episodical stories for at least 20 years. The first collection of these was Letters of a Japanese Schoolboy (1909). He also wrote Mr. Togo, Maid of All Work (1913); The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam Jr. (1902); Seed of the Sun (1921), a serious novel about the problems of the Japanese living in California; and Yankee Doctor in Paradise (1941), in collaboration with Dr. Sylvester Lambert.

Is. See Ys.

Isaac. In the Old Testament, the only son of ABRAHAM and Sarah, the husband of Rebekah, and the father of Jacob and Esau. He was nearly offered as a sacrifice to prove his father's faith, but at the last moment God intervened and told Abraham to slay a ram instead (Gen. 22-18).

Isaías, Jorge. See MARIA.

Isabella. In the Orlando Furioso of Ariosto, the Saracen princess, daughter of the king of Galicia and beloved of the Christian knight Zerbino. After the latter is killed by Mandricardo, she lets herself be slain by Rodomonte, who in grief builds a shrine to commemorate the unfortunate lovers.

Isabella. The beautiful and intensely virtuous religious novice who is the heroine of Shakespeare's Measure for Measure. She is finally united with the incorruptible philosophical Vincentio, duke of Vienna.

Isabella I. Known as la Católica ("the Catholic") (1451-1504). Queen of Castile. The daughter of John II of Castile, she married FERDINAND II of Aragon in 1469. Her accession to the throne of Castile upon the death of her brother Henry IV in 1474 led to the permanent union of the two great kingdoms of Spain.

Isabella, or The Pot of Basil (1820). A poem by John Keats, adapted from a tale by Boccaccio. Set in Florence, it tells of Isabella's love for Lorenzo. Her brothers, discovering this love, revenge themselves by murdering Lorenzo in a forest. The ghost of Lorenzo appears to Isabella and tells her of the crime; she goes to the forest, digs up his head, and plants it in a pot of basil, keeping it by her and watering it with her tears. Her brothers discover her grotesque secret and steal the pot, leaving Isabella to die of grief.

Isaiah. A prophetic book of the Old Testament. In its present form it is the work of at least three distinct authors in three successive stages of Jewish history from c. 750 to c. 450 B.C. The first part is strongly political, the author having been a counselor of the Judaeans kings. Urging peace with Israel's enemies, he can still foresee the coming tragedy of the Babylonian Exile. The middle chapters of Isaiah (40-55) were written after 586, when Jerusalem fell. They call on Israel not to lose faith in his god and prophesy the return of his loving care. The last part reflects the period of Nehemiah's return to Jerusalem and the rebuilding of the city and temple (c. 450). It is nationalistic and stresses the ritualistic side of Judaism.

All three parts of Isaiah are filled with Messianic hope. The life of the Messiah is told in Isaiah.

Ischia, battle of (1464). The Neapolitan fleet of the Aragonese monarchs defeated the French navies in this battle, thus ending the efforts of the Angevin to regain the throne of Naples, lost to Alfonso of Aragon in 1442.

Isenbras or Isuimbras, Sir (14th century). Hero of a Middle English verse romance. Strong and prosperous but arrogant, he is offered the choice of suffering either in youth or in old age. Choosing the former, he is beset by great misfortunes, which humble him. After performing many deeds of generosity and bravery for 21 years, he is restored in happiness to all he had lost.

Isengrim. See Reynard the Fox.

Isoult. The name of the heroine in the medieval cycle Tristan and Isoult. There are many other versions and parallels of this cycle, beginning with early Irish tales (see The Pursuit of Diarmaid and Grainne) and appearing in the modern world in such forms as the music drama of Richard Wagner; Isoult's name appears in various forms: Isolda, Isolt, Ysolt, etc. In general, Isoult the Fair is an Irish princess, wooed and won by Tristan for his uncle, King Mark of Cornwall. But in the process of journeying to the court of King Mark, both Isoult and Tristan drink a magic potion that causes them to fall in love with one another, a love which is completely binding, even in the face of death. The major part of this cycle is concerned with the adventures of the pair, after the marriage of Isoult to King Mark, in the name of their great love. Ultimately Tristan is banished and goes to Brittany where he marries another, Isoult of the White Hands. When he is about to die, he sends for his love, Isoult the Fair, but she arrives too late. Lying beside the body of Tristan, she too dies. When the two lovers are buried next to one another, a briar grows up from the grave of Tristan and curves over to take root on the grave of Isoult.

Three times it is cut down and three times it grows again, until King Mark commands that it be left alone. Isuul is depicted as very beautiful, gifted (among other things, she has great skill in healing wounds), shrewd, and something of a sorceress. In James Joyce's Finnegans Wake (1939), the wife and daughter of Earwicker represent the two Isoulets of Tristan.

Isherwood, Christopher [William Bradshaw] (1904- ). English novelist, short-story writer, and playwright. He was a member of the talented group of left-wing young writers of the 1930's that included W. H. Auden, C. Day-Lewis, and Stephen Spender. Living in Germany during Hitler's rise to power, Isherwood brilliantly described the social corruption and disintegration in his Berlin Stories: Mr. Norris Changes Trains, Sally Bowles (1937), and Goodbye to Berlin (1939). He collaborated with W. H. Auden on the verse plays The Dog Beneath the Skin, The Ascent of F6, and On the Frontier (1938), a political melodrama. He traveled to China with Auden and collaborated on Journey to a War (1939), about the war between Japan and China. At the outbreak of the European war he, like Auden, emigrated to the U.S. Auden abandoned Marxism for earnest Christianity; Isherwood abandoned it to become a disciple of Aldous Huxley in the study of Eastern religions and yogi. Among Isherwood's other publications are the novels All the Conspirators (1928), The Memorial (1932), Prater Violet (1945), The World in the Evening (1954), Down There on a Visit (1962), and A Single Man (1964). He has also translated Baudelaire's Intimate Journals.

Ishmael. In the Old Testament, the son of Abraham and Hagar. In general, the name refers to any outcast from society because of the prophecy: "And he will be a wild man; his hand will be against every man, and every man's hand against him" (Gen. 16:12). After the birth of Isaac, Ishmael was cast out of Abraham's household, married, and settled at Paran; the Arab people were descended from his 12 sons.

Ishtar. The Babylonian goddess of love and war. Known to the Canaanites as Ashtarte, to the Israelites as Ashthoreth, to the Arabs as the god Athtar, she developed from the Sumerian goddess Isinna, and was the most widely worshiped of all the deities of the Near and Middle East. According to one version of the myth, she was the daughter of Sin (the moon) and sister of Shamash (the sun); according to another, the daughter of Anu, the lord of heaven; in both, she was identified with the planet Venus. Though the goddess of erotic love, she was often warlike and, at best, had a remarkably irritable disposition. Her worship involved ritual prostitution, which was severely condemned by the Hebrew prophets. She may have been "the queen of heaven" mentioned by Jeremiah; Solomon built a temple to her.

Of the many myths in which she figured, the most famous tells of her love for Tammuz, a young fertility god. In some unexplained way, her love caused his death. She mourned him extravagantly—her lamentations were ritually commemorated yearly when the summer sun dried up the vegetation—and finally descended into the underworld to bring back her lover. At each of the seven gates through which she passed, she was divested of one of her ornaments or pieces of clothing, until she stood naked before her terrible sister Ereshkigal, goddess of the underworld. She was imprisoned there, and the gods were powerless to help her, until Ea fashioned a hermaphroditic creature called Asushu-Namir and sent it armed with magic spells against Ereshkigal. These were successful, and, after Asushu-Namir had poured over her “the water of life,” Ishtar returned to earth, taking Tammuz with her. Ishtar’s love for Tammuz and her struggle for him with the goddess of the underworld obviously influenced the myth of Aphrodite’s rivalry with Persephone over Adonis.

As Tammuz discovered, the love of Ishtar was a mixed blessing. In the Epic of Gilgamesh, the hero resists her advances and, employing many unflattering epithets, reminds her that her other lovers have regretted their good fortune, many being turned (literally or figuratively) into beasts. In her fury at this rude treatment, Ishtar induces her father Anu to send the bull of heaven against Gilgamesh, but he and Enkidu kill it. It is for this crime that Enkidu dies.

Isis. The principal goddess of ancient Egypt, forming with her husband-brother Osiris and son Horus the major triad of deities. As the patron saint of mariners in Alexandria, she was often identified with the moon; the cow was sacred to her, its horns representing the crescent moon which, in Egypt, appears lying on its back. Her chief temples were at Amydos, Busiris, and Philae. She is represented as a queen, her head being surmounted by horns and the solar disk or by the double crown.

The later Greeks and Romans also identified her with the goddess of nature and Apeius, in the Golden Ais (second century A.D.), describes her as “the universal mother nature.” Representations of Isis suckling Horus were possible prototypes of the Madonna and Child.

Milton, in Paradise Lost (1667) places Isis among the fallen angels. In the Faerie Queene (1596), Spenser used the legend of Isis and Osiris to symbolize English equity and justice.

to lift the veil of Isis. To pierce to the heart of a great mystery. Proclus mentions a statue of Isis, which bore the inscription, “I am that which is, has been, and shall be. My veil no one has lifted. The fruit I bore was the Sun.”

Islam. The religion of Muhammad, whose adherents are called Muslims, Moslems, Musulmans, Mohammedans. The word means resignation or submission to the will of God. Muslims believe every child is born in Islam and would continue in the true faith if not led astray.

Islam emphasizes five duties: (1) bearing witness that there is but one God and one prophet, Muhammad; (2) reciting daily prayers; (3) giving appointed and legal alms; (4) observing the Ramadan, a month’s fast; (5) making a pilgrimage to Mecca at least once in a lifetime. See HADJ; KORAN.

Island of the Seven Cities. A kind of mythical Utopia. There seven bishops, who quitted Spain during the dominion of the Moors, founded seven cities. The legend says that many have visited the island, but no one has ever left it.

Islands of the Blessed. A mythical abode of dead heroes, called by the Greeks Happy Islands, and by the Romans Fortunate Islands. They are imaginary islands somewhere in the West, where the favorites of the gods are conveyed at death, and dwell in everlasting joy.

Isla y Rojo, José Francisco de (1703–1781). Spanish Jesuit and satirist. His best-known work is the Historia del famoso predicador fray Gerundio de Campas, alias Zotes (1758), a satire aimed at bombastic and pedantic religious oratory. It was banned in Spain by the Inquisition, and the second part did not appear until after the expulsion of the Jesuits from Spain in 1767. Isla also wrote Triunfo del amor y de la lealtad, o Dia grande de Navarra (1746), a satirical treatment of a celebration in Pamplona upon the accession of Ferdinand VI.

Isle of Dogs, The (1597). A lost play by Thomas Nashe and Ben Jonson. It was so scornfully satiric that it resulted in the imprisonment of Jonson and in the temporary closing of the theatres.

Isle Sonante, L’ (Fr., “Ringing Island”). The title of the first edition (1562) of 16 chapters of what is now known as Book V of Rabelais’s Gargantua and Pantagruel. Ringing Island, which is the first of several islands visited by Pantagruel and his friends, is inhabited by variously colored birds named cardin-jays, priestjays, etc., and one popejay, “unique in his species.” Birds of passage who had migrated to the island from Nobreadland and Alltoomany, they pass their time in sumptuous living, warbling to the ringing of bells. The episode of these lucky folk who enjoy paradise “both in this world and the next” is a transparent satire on the luxurious living of the Roman Catholic clergy, who thus lured into their ranks many social outcasts and poverty-stricken people.

Ismene. In Greek legend, daughter of Oedipus and Jocasta. Antigone was buried alive by the order of King Creon, for burying her brother Polynices, slain in combat by his brother Eteocles. Although she had actually been too timid to do so, Ismene declared that she had aided her sister, and requested to be allowed to share the same punishment. The episode occurs in Sophocles’ Antigone.

Ismeno. In the Gerusalemme Liberata of Tasso, an enchanter who advises and aids the infidel forces against the Crusaders attacking Jerusalem. At one point, he brings the Arab chieftain Solimano to the battle by transporting him in a cloud. Later he enchants a forest near the Christian camp so that the Crusaders cannot build any more war machines. This spell is broken by Rinaldo.

Isocrates (Isokrates) (436–338 B.C.). An Attic orator, a pupil of Socrates. He founded a school and taught some of the greatest future statesmen, orators, and philosophers. When Philip of Macedon conquered Greece, he committed suicide. Of his orations, 21 have been preserved.

Isid. See ISKULT.

Isolt. See ISKULT.

Israel (Heb., “contender with God”). In the Old Testament, it is the name given to Jacob after he wrestled with the angel of the Lord (Gen. 32:28). Thus, it is also the name given to the Jewish nation descended from him, frequently referred to as the Children of Israel.
Israel Potter: or, Fifty Years of Exile (1855). A novel by Herman Melville. The book is based on Henry Trumbull's biography, Life and Remarkable Adventures of Israel Potter (1824). In search of freedom and adventure, Israel becomes involved in the battle of Bunker Hill. He meets three Americans: Benjamin Franklin, who robs him while masquerading as a friend; John Paul Jones, who genuinely befriends him; and Ethan Allen, who possesses America's most admirable characteristics. Israel's personality is a mixture of the virtues and faults of all three men. An archetypal American, he is taken prisoner by the English, exiled for 50 years, and returns home to die. Melville suggests, at the end of this satirical novel, that the best hope for America is in her pioneering West.

Izrafil, Izrael, or Uriel. The Muslim angel of music, possessed of the most melodious voice of all God's creatures. It is he who, on Judgment Day, is to sound the last trump of resurrection. Along with Gabriel and Michael, he was one of the three angels, according to the Koran, who warned Abraham of Sodom's destruction. Izrael is the title of one of Edgar Allan Poe's poems (1831), and also of Hervey Allen's biography of Poe.

Isha. See Kobayashi Isha.

Istar. See Ishtar.

Isthmian games. Games consisting of chariot races, running, wrestling, boxing, and other sports. They were held by the ancient Greeks in the Isthmus of Corinth every alternate spring, the first and third of each Olympiad. They were instituted, according to the myth, in honor of Melicertes.

Isumbras, Sir. See Sir Izenbras.

Italic. A style of type. Italic type or italics (the type in which the letters, instead of being erect, as in roman, slope upward from left to right, thus) was first used by Aldo Manuzio in printing the Aldine classics. It was called by him cursive, a running hand (from Lat. curvo, I run). Vergil was the first author printed in this type (1501).

It Can't Happen Here (1935). A novel by Sinclair Lewis. It presents a fancied fascist dictatorship in the U.S., set up by Berzelius Windrip, a New England demagogue who is elected to the presidency. Doremus Jessup, a Vermont editor, fights Windrip, is arrested, escapes, and joins an underground movement in Canada headed by Walt Trowbridge, Windrip's opponent in the election.

Ithuriel. In Milton's Paradise Lost, an angel who, with Zephon, is commissioned by Gabriel to search for Satan after the latter has effected his entrance into Paradise. He is armed with a spear, the slightest touch of which exposes deceit.

It Is Never Too Late to Mend (1853). A novel by Charles Reade. This fictional study of the discovery of gold in Australia and the British convict system is notable for the character of Isaac Levi, one of the first serious attempts to portray the Jew favorably in fiction.

Iturbide, Agustin de (1783–1824). Mexican soldier and emperor. After fighting against Hidalgo and Morelos in the Spanish army, Iturbide joined the rebel forces and contributed to the final victory over Spain in 1821. Exploiting the confusion that followed the separation from Spain, Iturbide, the self-styled father of Mexican independence, seized power and had himself proclaimed emperor in 1822. During his brief reign as Agustin I, he was harassed by financial difficulties, by disgruntled generals, and by republican critics. He was deposed in 1823, and when he attempted to return to power the following year, he was captured and shot.

Iudushka. Nickname of Porfir Golyovlyov in Mikhail Saltykov's novel The Golyovlyov Family. His nickname means "Little Judas" and he is referred to as a bloodsucker. He lives up to his reputation as he takes over the family estates from his despotic mother and weakening brothers. He is regarded as a supreme portrayal of unctuous heartlessness.

Iulus. See ASCANIUS.

Ivan IV or Ivan the Terrible (1530–1584). Czar of Russia (1533–1584). Ivan engaged in a power struggle throughout his reign with the nobility (the boyars). During this time he consolidated the Muscovite state, the core of the future Russian empire, and gained an undying reputation for ferocious cruelty toward his enemies—a predilection was alternated with bouts of sensuality and piety. His squabbles with the boyars induced him to set up his own private state within the Muscovite state. Ivan's realm, called the Oprichnina, had its own courts, administration, and army. The rest of the country, called the Zemshchina, was ostensibly ruled by a prince appointed by Ivan, although the puppet ruler's power was slight.

Ivan's stormy career has provided the basis for many literary and dramatic works by Russian authors, as well as a two-part film by Sergei Eisenstein. Ivan's own literary remains consist of several letters in an acrimonious correspondence with Prince Andrey Mikhailovich Kurbski, who fled to Lithuania when the Czar began his reign of terror in Russia.

Ivanhoe (1819). A novel by Sir Walter Scott. The action occurs in the period following the Norman Conquest. The titular hero is Wilfred, knight of Ivanhoe, the son of Cedric the Saxon, in love with his father's ward Rowena. Cedric, however, wishes her to marry Athelstane, who is descended from the Saxon royal line and may restore the Saxon supremacy. The real heroine is Rebecca the Jewess, daughter of the wealthy Isaac of York, and a person of much more character and charm than the mild Rowena. Yet Ivanhoe finally rejects her in favor of Rowena. Richard the Lion-heart in the guise of the Black Knight and Robin Hood as Locksley play prominent roles, and the novel is further emblazoned with a colorful entourage of chivalric knights and fair ladies. The frenzied variety of the action, with the pageantry of a tournament and a great flame-engulfed castle, makes this the most enthralling of Scott's works. See Brian de Bois-Guilbert; Reginald Front de Bouc; and Ulrica.

Ivanov, Vsevolod Vyacheslavovich (1895– ). Russian novelist and short-story writer. Ivanov ran away from home while in his teens and worked at a variety of jobs, including that of a circus clown and as a fakir and dervish. His first story was printed in a Siberian newspaper and attracted the attention of Maxim Gorky, who helped and encouraged the young writer. After the civil war, in which he fought first for the Whites and then for the Reds, Ivanov went to Petersburg and joined the SERAPION BROTHERS. His novels, Colored Winds (Tsvetnye

Ivanov, Vyacheslav Ivanovich (1866–1949). Russian poet. A classical scholar, Ivanov was the leader of the St. Petersburg branch of symbolists from 1905 to 1911, when he moved to Moscow. His earlier poetry was a compound of classical references and archaic Slavic diction, with an admixture of nietzschean philosophy. His later roman sonnets (rimskyiye sonety), written just before World War II, dispense with ornateness and archaism, achieving powerful effects in simple, direct lines. Ivanov's study of Dostoevski (1932) examines the novelist's work as creations of myth. Ivanov emigrated in 1924 and settled in Italy. He died in Rome, after becoming a Roman Catholic convert.

Ives, Charles [Edward] (1874–1954). American composer and businessman. The income from his insurance firm, Ives & Myrick, supported his musical experiments. In his works, which include symphonies, and choral and chamber music, he anticipated modern techniques of later composers. His Sonata No. 2 (subtitled Concord, Mass., 1840–1860) has four movements, labeled: Emerson, Hawthorne, The Alcotts, Thoreau. The inspiration of these transcendentalists he explains in Essays Before a Sonata (1920). Ives' work has only recently received public attention.

Ives, James Merritt. See Currier and Ives.

Ivy Day in the Committee Room. A short story in James Joyce's Dubliners (1914). It is an account of a conversation between a group of party political workers on the anniversary of the birth of Charles Stewart Parnell. The disunity, corruption, and pettiness of these small politicians is contrasted with the idealism of Parnell, whom these characters hypocritically idolize.

Ixion. In Greek mythology, a Lapith king. He tried to seduce Hera, but Zeus shaped a cloud in her likeness and he lay with it. Zeus bound him to a fiery wheel that perpetually rolls through the sky. The phantom, later called Nephele, bore Centaurus, ancestor of the centaurs.

Iyangar, Venkatesa (1891– ). Kannada novelist, short-story writer and essayist, known affectionately in India as “Masti.” Eleven volumes of his stories have been collected under the title Sonna Kathegalu: they show charm, humor, wit, compassion, and great narrative fluency.

Iyengar, K. R. Srinivasa (1908– ). Indian critic writing in English; head of the department of English in Andhra University. His major work has been the assessment and publicizing of Indian creative writing in English. His main study is Indian Writing in English (1962).
Jabberwocky. A well-known mock-heroic ballad by Lewis Carroll, found in THROUGH THE LOOKING-GLASS. It contains a number of words coined by the author himself, including PORTMANTEAU words such as slithy, a compound of lithe and slime, mimsy, a compound of flimsy and miserable, etc. The Jabberwock is a species of dragon.

J'accuse (I accuse). The title of Emile Zola's famous open letter addressed to President Faure of France (first appearing in the newspaper Aurore, January 13, 1898), in denunciation of the Dreyfus affair. Zola used the phrase "J'accuse" several times in the letter, addressing himself to the injustices perpetrated by the war department. After a year of exile in England, Zola returned to France, a hero for the part he had played in this national crisis. See Alfred Dreyfus.

Jack and Jill. A well-known nursery rhyme. It is said to be a relic of a Norse myth, accounting for the dark patches in the moon. The two children are supposed to have been kidnapped by the moon while drawing water, and they are still to be seen with the bucket hanging from a pole resting on their shoulders.

Jack and the Beanstalk. A nursery tale. It is found among a wide variety of races from Icelanders to Zulus. Jack is a very poor lad, sent by his mother to sell a cow, which he parts with to a butcher for a few beans. His mother, in her rage, throws the beans away, but one of them grows during the night as high as the heavens. Jack climbs the stalk, and, by the direction of a fairy, comes to a giant's castle, where he begs food and rest. This he does thrice, and in his three visits steals the giant's red hen, which lays golden eggs, his money bags, and his harp. As he runs off with the last treasure, the harp cries out, "Master! master!" which wakes the giant, who runs after Jack. But the nimble lad cuts the beanstalk with an axe, and the giant is killed in his fall. As we know it, this story is of Teutonic origin. According to a frequently advanced theory, the "beanstalk" is the ash, Yggdrasil, of the Eddas, the giant is All-Father, whose three treasures are the wind, the rain, and the red hen which lays golden eggs (the sun). Jack typifies Man, who avails himself of these treasures and becomes rich.

Jack Ketch. See John Ketch.

Jacks, Lawrence Pearsall (1860-1955). English philosopher and Unitarian minister. He wrote books about Smokeover, an imaginary industrial city, and such works as The Revolt Against Mechanism (1934).

Jackson, Andrew (1767-1845). 7th president of the U.S. (1829-1837), sometimes known as "Old Hickory." Jackson fought in the American Revolution at the age of 13, was imprisoned by the British, and later became a backwoods lawyer in what is now Tennessee. In 1791 he married Mrs. Rachel Robards in the erroneous belief that she had obtained a divorce from her husband. Although they were remarried immediately after the divorce was granted in 1793, Jackson's enemies used the scandal as a political weapon until Mrs. Jackson's death in 1828. From 1798 to 1804 he was a judge of the Tennessee supreme court. Commissioned a major general in the U.S. army during the War of 1812, Jackson defeated the British at New Orleans (1814), an exploit that won him a national reputation. In 1818, as leader of an expedition to quell Indian depredations near the Georgia border, he entered Spanish-held East Florida and executed two British subjects. Although there were diplomatic repercussions, Jackson was not punished.

He was narrowly defeated for the presidency by John Quincy Adams in 1824 but was elected in 1828 after a campaign that portrayed Jackson as a symbol of the common man. During his first term he introduced the "spoils system" on a large scale and relied heavily on a KITCHEN CABINET of unofficial advisers. At a Jefferson's Day dinner in 1830, he chagrined supporters of states rights by proposing a toast to "Our Union: It must be preserved," to which Vice President John Calhoun replied, "The Union, next to our liberty, most dear." Jackson broke definitively with Calhoun the following year, partly as a result of a quarrel over the social status of Margaret Eaton, wife of the secretary of war. (See NULLIFICATION.) Jackson's opposition to the 2d Bank of the U.S., which he attacked as an organ of monopoly and privilege, was the main issue of the 1832 campaign. After his re-election, Jackson had federal funds withdrawn from the bank and deposited in state institutions that were known as pet banks. This policy contributed to the growing financial disorder which culminated in the Panic of 1837. By that time Jackson's successor, Martin Van Buren, had been inaugurated, and the ex-president had retired to The Hermitage, his estate near Nashville. Perhaps the most significant aspect of Jackson's administration was his expansion of presidential power.

Jackson, Charles (Reginald) (1903--). American novelist and short-story writer. Jackson is best known for The Lost Weekend, his first novel, a vivid report on the life of an alcoholic. His subsequent novels showed a continued preoccupation with pathological states of mind: The Fall of Valor (1946) has a homosexual theme, and The Outer Edges (1948) tells of the murder of two children by a sexual degenerate. The Sunnier Side (1950) and
Jackson, Helen

Earthly Creatures (1953) are collections of short stories.

Jackson, Helen [Maria Fiske] Hunt (1830–1885). American poet, novelist, and essayist. She is best known for her novel Ramona. Her sympathetic attitude toward the Indians in the novel had earlier manifested itself in the tract, A Century of Dishonor (1881). Mercy Philbrick's Choice (1876) is a novel supposedly dealing with the life of Emily Dickinson, who was a friend of the author.

Jackson, Holbrook (1874–1948). English literary scholar and editor. He is best known for his study of The Eighteen Nineties (1913).

Jackson, Shirley (1919– ). American novelist and short-story writer. Her most famous tale, The Lottery deals with a ritualized lottery in a small American town. It is not until the final lines of the story that death by stoning is revealed as the prize of the lottery. In a similar way, many of her stories and all her novels deal with the fantastic and the terrifying. Hangman (1951) shows a sensitive girl's flight into fantasy while attending a progressive girl's school. By way of contrast, Life Among the Savages (1953) and Raising Demons (1957) are autobiographical books describing with much humor the life of a middle-class intellectual family in a small New England town. Miss Jackson's other novels include The Bird's Nest (1954), The Sundial (1958), The Haunting of Hill House (1959), and We Have Always Lived in the Castle (1962).

Jackson, Thomas Jonathan. Known as "Stone-wall" Jackson (1824–1863). American general. Considered one of the ablest Confederate generals in the Civil War, Jackson played an important role in both of the battles at Bull Run and conducted a brilliant campaign in the Shenandoah Valley (1862), defeating the Union forces at Front Royal and Winchester. He died a few days after being accidentally wounded by his own men at Chancellorsville. The words he supposedly said as he lay dying, "Let us cross the river and rest in the shade of trees," have inspired several poems and suggested the title of Ernest Hemingway's Across the River and into the Trees (1950). John Greenleaf Whittier paid tribute to Jackson after his death in Barbara Frietchie, based on an apocryphal incident.

Jack the Ripper. Popular name of an unknown London criminal to whom were attributed a number of gruesome murders (1888–1889).

Jacob. A biblical patriarch of the book of Genesis, whose 12 sons were the founders of the 12 tribes of Israel. As a young man, he purchased the birthright of his brother Esau for a mess of pottage and, by impersonating him, secured from his blind father Isaac the blessing intended for Esau (see Rebekah). To win Rachel's hand, he served her father Laban for seven years, but was then given her less attractive sister Leah instead; whereupon he served another seven years, which "seemed to him but a short while so great was the love he bore her." Jacob is famed for the shrewdness with which he accumulated wealth while in Laban's service (Gen. 24:34). For his later life, see Benjamin; Joseph.

Jacob's ladder. The ladder seen by Jacob in a vision (Gen. 28:12). Jacob is a slang name for a ladder; and steep and high flights of steps going up cliffs are often so called.

Jacob, Max (1876–1944). French poet, prose writer, painter. A friend of Guillaume Apollinaire and his circle, he was writing poetry concerned with "nocturnal nightmares" and "day hallucinations" before the official beginning of Surrealism. Most famous are his early poems in prose, Le Cornet à Dés (1917), and verse, Le Laboratoire Central (1921). Other works include La Defense de Tartuffe (1919), reflecting his conversion to Catholicism; Les Périments en maillot rose (1925); and Derniers Poèmes (1945).

Jacobean. Pertaining to the reign of James I of England (James VI of Scotland), 1603–1625. With the accession of James I, a national spirit that had begun to make itself felt as early as 1600 (see Elizabethan) became more pronounced. The dour and pedantic Scot who acceded to the throne had none of the symbolic value of his predecessor, "Good Queen Bess." The nation grew increasingly factsious, particularly on the religious question. In 1603 the Gunpowder Plot, an attempt by a group of Roman Catholics to blow up Parliament, increased the animosity. On the intellectual plane the new discoveries in science and astronomy made it increasingly clear that the large world of which man was the microcosm, was a pleasant fiction that would have to be traded in for the more realistic but less comforting world of Copernicus. Skepticism and doubt, together with an acute self-consciousness, became the dominant note, which Shakespeare—who strode both Elizabethan and Jacobean ages like a Colossus—sounded in Hamlet (1601) and in Measure for Measure (1604–1605).

In prose the new mood was reflected in the reaction against the rhetorical, elaborate Ciceronianism of the Elizabethans. The new prose style, modeled after Seneca and Tacitus, was a more concise and flexible instrument, better suited to the new prose form, the essay. The essay, which had been developed by Montaigne, was imported and perfected by Francis Bacon, whose aphoristic style established the dominant tone of that form. But the prevailing mood was better represented by Robert Burton's massive Anatomy of Melancholy, a detailed treatment of the affliction that characterized the age. Independently of these currents the Jacobean age also witnessed one of the greatest achievements of English prose: the King James or Authorized Version of the Bible.

The poetry of the Jacobean age can be characterized in terms of the two poets who dominated it, Ben Jonson and John Donne. The poetry of Jonson and his followers was generally derived from classical models and attempted to bring to English poetry the classical virtues of restraint, form, lucidity, and decorum. The cavalier poets later in the century looked to Jonson's poetry as their chief English model. From John Donne, however, derives the more important strain of metaphysical poetry. In metaphysical poetry the Jacobean reaction against the Elizabethan qualities of generous, rich profusion and abounding optimism is most clearly focused. In drama, "Jacobean melancholy" invaded both comedy and tragedy. In the comic area it produced vivid, scathing satire of human incapacity in such plays as Ben Jonson's Volpone and The Alchemist and in John Marston's The Malcontent. In tragedy it resulted in some of the most memorable studies of evil in the history of drama. Webster's The White Devil and The Duchess of Malfi, Tournier's The Revenger's Tragedy, Ford's 'Tis Pity She's a Whore, Middleton and Rowley's The Changeling focus with an almost savage intensity on human, specifically sexual, corruption. Jacobean dramatists, heavily patronized by the pleasure-loving court, were called upon to create elaborate masques in the splendid settings of Inigo Jones as well as the courtly pastoral drama associated with Beaumont and Fletcher. Finally, it was in the Jacobean age that Shakespeare's greatest work was produced. The Jacobean element in Shakespeare is reflected in his refusal after 1600 to return to the charming simplicity of the early comedies or to the patriotic fervor of the histories. His mature work, whether the tragedies or the later "romances," never loses sight of the existence of evil as an operative force in life.

Jacob, Friedrich Heinrich (1743-1819). German novelist and popular philosopher who stressed intuition and faith as opposed to rationalism. His thought is related to that of Hamann and Herder, and in his early career is close to the Sturm und Drang movement. The concept of nihilism is his invention, but not his creed. His best-known novel is Aus Edward Allwills Papiere (From the Papers of Edward Allwill, last version 1792).

Jacobins. (1) Name given the Dominican friars in France because in Paris they first established themselves (1219) in the Rue St. Jacques.

(2) A political club, originally called the Club Breton, formed by liberal members of the National Assembly at Versailles (1789). On their removal to Paris, they met in the hall of an ex-convent of the Jacobins (hence their name). Although only moderately democratic in the beginning, they became increasingly radical and were a prime force in the Revolution. Many of their more moderate members broke off and formed their own clubs, notably the Feuillants. Among the best-known Jacobins are Mirabeau, Robespierre, Danton, and Marat. The term "Jacobin" has come to denote a violent radical.

Jacobites. The partisans of James II and, after William III superseded him, the partisans of James's heirs. They maintained the indefeasible right of the house of Stuart to the throne and engaged in two fruitless rebellions: first to enthrone James's son ("the Old Pretender"), and later, his grandson (Bonnie Prince Charlie, or "the Young Pretender"). The Jacobites remained a powerful and disturbing political influence for generations. See the Fifteen; the Forty-five; Warming-pans.

Jacobowsky and the Colonel (Jacobowsky und der Oberst, 1944). A satirical comedy by Franz Werfel in which an anti-Semitic Polish colonel is led from behind the Nazi lines by a clever Jew.

Jacobs, William Wymark (1863-1943). English story writer. His comic tales about sailors and rustics were collected in Snug Harbor (1931). The Monkey's Paw is a powerful horror story.

Jacobsen, Jens Peter (1847-1885). Danish poet and novelist. Jacobsen began his career as a student of botany and zoology; he introduced the scientific theory of Darwin to Denmark. His body of creative work is small and was all produced after he retired to his native Thisted as a tubercular patient in 1873. Naturalistic in his subject matter, Jacobsen writes in a careful, precise style. The novel Frue Marie Grubbe (1876) is a psychological study; Niels Lyhne (1880) portrays an atheist in the modern world. His stories, noted for their skillful use of language, were published as Mogens og andre Noveller (Mogens and Other Stories, 1882).

Jacob's Room (1922). A novel by Virginia Woolf, her first original and distinguished work. The life story, character, and friends of Jacob Flanders are presented in a series of separate scenes and moments. There are numerous little descriptions of scenes and people that do not enter into his life at all—such as an old woman selling matches and an irrelevant conversation in another room—but help to provide a complete, rounded world. The story of this sensitive, promising young man carries him from his childhood, through college at Cambridge, love affairs in London, and travels in Greece, to his death in the war. At the end, instead of describing his death, Virginia Woolf describes his empty room.

Jacopo della Quercia (1367-1438). Italian sculptor. One of the first of the great Renaissance sculptors, Jacopo is noted for his luxuriant style, revealed in the reliefs surrounding the doors of the Church of S. Petronio at Bologna, and for the expressive power of his other efforts in low relief. He influenced such painters as Masaccio and several sculptors as Michelangelo.

Jacopone da Todi (c. 1230-1306). Italian poet. After 10 years of penance following his wife's death in 1268, he became a Franciscan monk. His hymns reveal a fervent mysticism, and he is possibly the author of the Stabat Mater Dolorosa.

Jaccard, Joseph Marie (1752-1834). French inventor. Jaccard produced a loom (1801) that revolutionized the technique of inwoven designs. He was later awarded a pension and elected to the Legion of Honor (1819).

Jacquerie, La (1358). An unsuccessful insurrection of the French peasants of Ile-de-France, provoked by their oppression under the noble class while King Jean II was in captivity in England. Acts of great violence and cruelty were committed first by the peasantry, who had sworn to kill every nobleman in France, and then by Charles the Bad of Navarre and his nobles in their suppression of the revolt and their reprisals. The name Jacquerie came from the 14th-century use of jacques as a generic name for the peasant, connoting the humiliation of serfdom.

Jacques, Pauvre. See Pauvre Jacques.

Jacques le fataliste (1796). A novel by Denis Diderot. It was possibly Laurence Sterne's remark, "Digressions, incontestably, are the sunshine; they are the life, the soul of reading," that inspired Diderot to write this, his last important work and longest novel. The story, intentionally disorderly in structure, is a burlesque recitation of Jacques' love affairs, as told to his master, but this framework in itself is of practically no importance since it is interrupted constantly by digressions and stories within stories; in which the characters comment on their own tales, and even the reader is constantly brought into the narrative. Some of the interpolated stories are well known, for example, the tale of Mme. de la Pommeraye who exacts vengeance from her faithless lover, or the tale of the immoral Father Hudson, in which evil tri-in complex work, Diderot is concerned with the problems of the novel as a literary medium to depict reality, with the philosophic problem of determinism versus fatalism, and with defining a mature attitude toward life.

Jade Emperor. The chief god of the triad of popular Taoism.

Jael. See SISERA.

Jagannath. See JUGERNAUT.

Jaggers, Mr. In Charles Dickens' Great Expectations, the lawyer who is Pip's legal guardian and Miss Havisham's man of business.

Jahannam or Jehennam. The name of the Muslim Hell, or the first of its seven divisions. The word is the same as the Hebrew Gehenna.

Jalna. See MAZO DE LA ROCHE.

Jaloux, Edmond (1878-1949). French novelist and critic. His novels are delicately realistic accounts of the inner life of restless souls, such as La Reste est silence (1909), L'Incertaine (1918), and La Chute d'Icare (1936).

James I (1566-1625). Stuart king of England (1603-1625). The son of Mary Queen of Scots and Lord Darnley, he ruled effectively in Scotland as James VI for 20 years before the death of Elizabeth when he succeeded to the throne of England. There his awkwardness, pedantry, and Scottish accent were against him; his insistence on divine right and attempts to keep peace with Spain created a popular resentment which helped bring on the English Civil War. James was called "the English Solomon" and "the Wisest Fool in Christendom" on account of his impractical learning and literary ambitions. His most famous work was Daemonologie (1599), a treatise denouncing witches, but it was his Essays of a Prentice in the Divine Art of Poetry (1584), a critical treatise, and Poetical Exercises at Vacant Hours (1591) which led English poets to hope that he might become their patron; however, he is known to have assisted only Ben Jonson. He also wrote a well-known Counterblaste to Tobacco (1604), refuting the alleged virtues of the plant.

James II (1633-1701). Stuart king of England (1685-1688). The son of Charles I, he became a Roman Catholic, and succeeded to the throne after the death of his brother Charles II. Convinced that James planned to rule as absolute monarch and to restore Catholicism to England, seven representatives of the property-owning classes offered the throne to William of Orange, the king’s Protestant son-in-law. After William had landed at Torbay in Devon (1688), James, finding himself without military and popular support, fled to France, where he was cordially received by Louis XIV. In an attempt to recover his throne, he landed in Ireland (1689), but was decisively defeated at the battle of the Boyne (1690). See GLORIOUS REVOLUTION.

James, Henry. [Jr.] (1843-1916). American novelist, short-story writer, and man of letters. A major figure in the history of the novel, James is celebrated as a master craftsman who brought his great art and impeccable technique to bear in the development of abiding moral themes: the relationship between innocence and experience, especially as exemplified in the confrontation of American and European civilizations; the dilemma of the artist in an alien society; the achievement of self-knowledge through psychological and moral perception. With an approach to the art of fiction that resembled the research of the careful historian, James admitted into his stories and novels only that which could be represented as the perception or experience of his characters. With this approach to the problem of “point of view” in the novel, James achieved reality and unity, and it is perhaps in this respect that he had the strongest effect on subsequent writers.

James came from a distinguished family; his grandfather was one of the first millionaires in America; his father, the Swedishborn Henry James, Sr., was a writer and lecturer in the fields of philosophy and theology; his brother was the psychologist William James. Thus, the novelist grew up in an atmosphere that encouraged his becoming what he thought all novelists should be: “one on whom nothing is lost.”

James entered Harvard Law School in 1862, but withdrew at the end of a year. Always a scribbler, he wanted to write seriously, and in 1864 his first story, A Tragedy of Error, appeared in the North American Review; he soon caught the attention of William Dean Howells who, as editor of the Atlantic Monthly, helped and encouraged James; in 1871 James’s first novel, Watch and Ward, was published serially in the Atlantic. Between 1864 and 1871 he wrote a number of stories and astute reviews for both the Atlantic and the Nation. It was during this period, too, that he made his first independent trip to Europe. (He had spent much of his youth in Europe, as had his three brothers and sister, traveling there with his family and attending various schools.) The trip marked the beginning of his fascination with the theme of the American in Europe. During his second European trip (1872-1874) he wrote his best story to date: A Madonna of the Future, the story of an artist who never manages to paint the perfect Madonna.

In 1875, after much thought, James decided to make his home abroad, settling first in Paris—where he knew Maupassant, Flaubert, and Turgenev—and finally in England (1876) where he spent the rest of his life. The 1870’s, in England, saw the first real blossoming of James’s talent. The Passionate Pilgrim and Other Stories appeared in 1875, followed in rapid succession by RODERICK HUDSON, The American, The Europeans, Daisy Miller, and Confidence (1879). The major theme running throughout this work—the international confrontation of European and American civilizations—is posed clearly and unambiguously at this early stage: Christopher Newman in The American is basically innocent and naive as he comes into contact with sophisticated and evil De Bellegrardes. In his later work, James was to see his theme in a more complex light: the innocently unaware may themselves be the cause of evil in others.

In 1879, James published Hawthorne, a book in which James pays tribute to Hawthorne as a writer who accomplished much despite the cultural aridity of his surroundings. WASHINGTON SQUARE, set in the New York of James’s childhood, was published a year later. The climax of this early period is The Portrait of a Lady, considered by many to be not only James’s finest but one of the finest novels in English. The 1880’s also saw the publication of The Bostonians, The Princess Casamassima, and The Aspern Papers.

The publication of The Tragic Muse, for many, marks the beginning of the more complex prose style generally associated with James. An interesting study of an actress, it preludes James's excursus into playwriting during the 1890's. The plays were all more or less unsuccessful, and few would claim much for them, but the effect of them on his fiction was marked. His stories and novels of the late 90's show a radical concern with experiment and with the adaptation of dramatic technique to fiction; this was the beginning of James's later style of involved sentences in which every thought and image is qualified, and the sentence is itself presented as a work of art. What Maisie Knew, The Turn of the Screw, The Awkward Age, and The Sacred Fount are all products of these experiments.

With the turn of the century, James entered into his last and perhaps his greatest period, publishing in rapid succession three long and complex novels: The Wings of the Dove, The Ambassadors, The Golden Bowl. Difficult as many have found them, the novels mark the pinnacle of James's art. This period also saw the publication of such famous short stories as The Beast in the Jungle (1903), a story of a man who waits for a special fate only to find that his fate was to be the man "to whom nothing was to have happened"; The Birthday (1903), the story of a couple who become caretakers at a Shakespeare-like birthplace; and The Jolly Corner (1908), a complicated tale of a man who meets his alter ego as a ghost.

In 1904, James came to the U.S. and toured the country, producing on his return to England The American Scene. The major effort of these years, however, went into the task of writing the critical prefaces and making, where needed, the revisions for the reissue of his works in the New York edition (1907-1909), a venture that ultimately ran to 26 volumes. The prefaces, important comments on his work and craft, were later republished as The Art of the Novel (1934), edited by R. P. Blackmur. After his brother William's death in 1910, James turned to another major undertaking, the writing of three autobiographical volumes: A Small Boy and Others (1913), Notes of a Son and Brother (1914), and the unfinished The Middle Years (1917). Two novels were left incomplete at his death in 1916: The Sense of the Past and The Ivory Tower, both published in 1917. James became a British subject in 1915 as a measure of support for the British cause in World War I. See Spoils of Poynton, The.

James, Jesse [Woodson] (1847-1882). American bandit. After riding with Quantrill's guerrillas during the Civil War, Jesse and his brother Frank committed daring railroad and bank robberies in the Middle West during the 1870's, becoming popular heroes. When a large reward was offered for their capture, Robert Ford, a member of the James gang, earned it by shooting Jesse in the back. His murder was narrated in an anonymous ballad, Jesse James.

James, The General Epistle of a New Testament book. It is a letter to the entire Christian Church. The date and authorship of this letter are not known. Traditionally it has been ascribed to James, the first bishop of Jerusalem and the brother of Jesus; this would date the work before A.D. 62 when James was martyred. Others feel that the epistle was written about the year 90 by an unknown church father. The writer reminds his readers of their moral obligations as Christians and calls for not only a faith in Christ but for Christian action in life as well.

James, William (1842-1910). American philosopher, physiologist, psychologist, and teacher. The son of Henry James, Sr., and the brother of Henry James, he began to teach at Harvard in 1872. A gifted writer, he produced works on theology, psychology, ethics, and metaphysics, coining such phrases as "the bitch goddess success." He was distinctly American in the concepts he advanced, and his approach to metaphysics was frankly common-sensical. He objected to the pure and highly "logical" but unreal systems of Idealist metaphysicians. Emphasizing the role of the nature of the knower in the character and validity of knowledge, he insisted that any view of the world is a compromise between the objectively given and the personally desired. He gave a series of lectures on Pragmatism at the Lowell Institute and later at Columbia University that was published as Pragmatism (1907) and The Meaning of Truth (1909). Turning away from abstractions, verbal solutions, fixed principles, and pretended absolutes, he looked for concreteness and facts, action and power. He argued that "the ultimate test for us of what a truth means is the conduct it dictates or inspires." The same attitude characterizes The Varieties of Religious Experience (1902), which contends that any article of religious faith is "true" when it provides emotional satisfaction. The Principles of Psychology (1890, 1892) shows James as a keen observer of sense data; one chapter, devoted to "The Stream of Thought," advances the concept of the stream of consciousness, later an important and revolutionary fictional technique. In other books, James discusses The Will to Believe (1897), Human Immortality (1898), The Sentiment of Rationality (1905), and A Pluralistic Universe (1919). See Charles Sanders Peirce.

Jameson, [Margaret] Storm (1897- ). English novelist who often sets her stories in Yorkshire. The Lovely Ship, The Voyage Home, and A Richer Dust (1927-1931) comprise a trilogy about a shipbuilding family. Her other books include The Hidden River (1955), A Cup of Tea for Mr. Thorgill (1957), and The Road from the Monument (1962).

Jameson Raid (1895-1896). A raid on Johannesburg, South Africa. It was led by the Englishman Sir Leander Starr Jameson (1853-1917). It was an attempt to overthrow the Boer government during the troubles between the Boers and English in the gold mines. Jameson was captured and handed over to the British for trial, but was released shortly and later became prime minister of Cape Colony (1904-1908). See Boer War.

James the Greater, St. One of the 12 apostles of Jesus and the patron saint of Spain. He was the brother of John and a son of Zebedee. Legend states that, after his missionary journey to Spain and his subsequent death in Palestine, his body was placed in a boat with sails set, and that next day it reached the Spanish coast; at Padron, near Compostela, they used to show a huge stone as the veritable boat. According to another legend, it was the relics of St. James that were miraculously conveyed to Spain in a ship of marble from Jerusalem. A knight saw the ship... sailing into port, his horse took fright, and plunged with its rider into the sea. The knight saved himself by “boarding the marble vessel,” but his clothes were found to be entirely covered with scallop shells. The saint’s body was discovered in 840 by divine revelation to Bishop Theodomirus, and a church was built at Compostela as a shrine for the relics. St. James is commemorated on July 25, and is represented in art sometimes with the sword by which he was beheaded and sometimes attired as a pilgrim, with his cloak covered with shells. He is also known as Santiago, a variation of St. James (Span., San Diego).

James the Less, St. One of the 12 apostles of Jesus. His attribute as a saint is a fuller’s club, in allusion to the instrument by which he was put to death after having been thrown from the summit of the temple at Jerusalem in A.D. 62.

Jamestown. The first permanent English settlement in the New World, founded (1607) on the site of the abandoned Spanish settlement of San Miguel, and named for King James I. It was the capital of Virginia until 1698. The first settlers suffered great hardships, especially during the starving years of 1609–1610, which also brought forth the leadership of John Smith. Jamestown was burned down during Bacon’s Rebellion (1676). Before its restoration in modern times, the only surviving relics were the tower of the church and a number of tombs.

Jammes, Francis (1868–1938). French poet and novelist. His pastoral elegies describe his native region of the Pyrenees with sensuous and sentimental simplicity. The poems of De l’angelus de laude à l’angelus du soir (1897) were written during the time of his friendship with André Gide, as were Le Triomphe de la vie (1902) and the novel Le Roman du lierre (1903). Then he drew closer to Paul Claudel and was converted to Catholicism in 1905, after which his poems were more religiously inspired, such as Clairières dans le ciel (1906) and Les Géorgiques chrétiennes (3 vols., 1911–1912). Among his novels are M. le curé d’Oseron (1918); Le Poète rustique (1920), modeled on himself; and Cloches pour deux mariages (1924).

Janaka. In Hindu legend, the foster father of Sita. He was the king of Mithila and discovered Sita when he was ploughing the land; he is praised in the Ramayana for his extraordinary performances of charity and penance.

Jane Eyre (1847). A novel by Charlotte Brontë. In both heroine and hero the author introduced types new to English fiction. Jane Eyre is a shy, intense little orphan, never for a moment, neither in her unhappy school days nor her subsequent career as a governess, displaying those qualities of superficial beauty and charm that had marked the conventional heroine. Jane’s lover, Edward Rochester, to whose ward she is governess, is St. John’s cousin, a man whose conventional courtesy, a law unto himself. Rochester’s moodiness derives from the fact that he is married to an insane wife, whose existence, long kept secret, is revealed on the very day of his projected marriage to Jane. Years afterward the lovers are reunited.

Jane Seymour (1509–1537). Third wife of Henry VIII of England, mother of Edward VI. A lady in waiting to Catherine of Aragon and then to Anne Boleyn, Jane caught the fancy of the king in 1535. The following year Anne Boleyn was executed, and less than two weeks after her death Henry and Jane were privately married. She gave birth to Henry’s first son in 1537, an event that was met with great public rejoicing, but she died 12 days later.

Jane Shore. See Jane Shore.

Janice Meredith (1899). An historical novel by Paul Leicester Ford. It takes place during the American Revolution, and is the story of a Tory’s patriotic daughter, who falls in love with a bond-servant named Charles Fowles. He is later revealed to be John Breereton, a colonel in the Continental army.

Janissaries or Janizaries (Turk., yenitscheri, new corps). A celebrated militia of the Ottoman empire, raised by Orchan in 1326, originally, and for some centuries, compulsorily recruited from the Christian subjects of the Sultan. It was blessed by Hadji Bektash, a saint, who cut off a sleeve of his fur mantle and gave it to the captain. The captain put the sleeve on his head, and from this circumstance arose the fur cap worn by these foot guards. In 1826, having become too formidable a threat to the state, they were abolished after a massacre in which many thousands of the Janissaries perished.

Jannings, Emil (1887–1950). Swiss-born actor of German-American parentage. He began his stage career with Max Reinhardt at the Deutsches Theater in Berlin, and made his screen debut in 1916 in Lubitsch films. From 1926 to 1929 he enjoyed enormous success in Hollywood, and in 1932 he returned to the stage. He is especially remembered for his portrayals in the German films The Last Laugh and The Blue Angel, with Marlene Dietrich.

Jansen, Cornelius. See Jansenism.

Jansenism. The doctrines of the sect of Roman Catholics known as Jansenists, derived from the teachings of Cornelius Jansen (1585–1638), professor of exegesis at Louvain and later the bishop of Ypres. An opponent of the Jesuits, Jansen advocated reforms based, he claimed, upon the teachings of Augustine. Posthumously published in Augustinus (1640), his tenets included irresistible grace, original sin, and “the utter helplessness of natural man to turn to God.” The Jansenists’ declaration of man’s personal relationship with God resembled Calvinist doctrine.
and influenced the thinking of both Racine and Pascal. Louis XIV opposed the movement, whose influence was felt at court, in society, and in French letters (see Port-Royal), and the Jansenists were finally put down by Pope Clement XI in his bull Unigenitus (1713).

Januarius, St. (Ital., San Gennaro; 272–305). Patron saint of Naples. A bishop of Benevento, martyred during the Diocletian persecution, he is commemorated on September 19. His head and two vials of his blood are preserved in the cathedral at Naples, where the congealed blood is said to bubble and liquefy three times a year: on the Saturday before the first Sunday in May, on September 19, and on December 16. It is also said that this occurs whenever the head is brought near to the vials.

January and May. See Merchant's Tale.

Janus. One of the most ancient of Roman deities. Originally the god of light who opened the sky at daybreak and closed it at sunset, in time he came to preside over all beginnings and endings, all entrances and exits. He is often represented as having two faces, one in front and one behind, one to see into the future and one to see into the past. Doors (januae) were under his protection. The first month after the winter solstice, January, was sacred to him, and since 153 B.C. the first day of January's month has marked the beginning of the year. His principal temple was near the Roman forum. The doors of this temple were kept open in time of war and locked in time of peace. From the time of the earliest kings to the time of Augustus, these doors were closed only four times, twice during the latter's reign.

Japanese literature. The first literary productions date to the Nara period (710–794), which was marked by the wholesale importation of Chinese cultural elements. Native Japanese poetry is represented by the Man'yoshū, a collection of pre-Nara and Nara poems, many of which reflect indigenous Japanese concepts. In this period the first histories, based on the Chinese model, were composed and much emphasis was laid on the study of Buddhist scriptures. The Heian period (794–1185) saw a great literary flowering, marked by the novels and diaries of women writers. Although Chinese literature, particularly poetry, continued to exert considerable influence, new, purely Japanese tendencies came to the fore. The Tale of Genji by Murasaki Shikibu, a celebrated court lady, is regarded as the greatest single piece of Japanese literature; it has continued to influence the writers of Japan even to the present century. Diaries, some of them amusingly irreverent accounts of court life (Pillow-Book of Sei Shonagon), feature the writings of this age. The succeeding Kamakura period (1185–1333) was a time of warfare and natural disaster. Its literature is colored by a pessimistic resignation, partly Buddhist inspired, to the uncertain and transitory nature of life during this era (Account of My Hour). Tales of military valor, originally the transmitted stories of ballad singers, were written down and became a permanent part of the literature (Tales of The Heike). Military unrest and natural calamities continued during the Muromachi period (1333–1600), although the country was unified for the first time. It was in this age that no drama evolved, under the sponsorship of the great warlords. The Tokugawa period (1600–1868), which saw Japan at peace after centuries of almost constant warfare, was an age of many new literary departures. The Tokugawa family, imposing a rigid feudal hierarchy based on Neo-Confucian thought and ethics, set a firm and inflexible code of behavior for its subjects. Studies of the Chinese classics were encouraged and Buddhism, although the official religion, was severely regulated. Nevertheless, the merchant class, which was formally placed at the lowest of social levels, was responsible for a great new literary flowering. The merchants, because of inherent weaknesses in the feudal system, gained great wealth and power, which was reflected in the writings of the time. A new society developed, known as the floating world (ukiyo), which centered around the entertainment districts, the gay quarters, and the theaters. With it came this new literature: the stories of Ihara Saikaku, detailing the life of shopkeepers, courtiers, and humble people, and the puppet plays (joruri) and kabuki of Chikamatsu Monzaemon, which attained great popularity and are still performed. In art the ukiyoe wood-block prints portray graphically the life depicted in the literature. Poetry saw the rise of Haisiku under the direction of Matsumo Bashō, reflecting a more sensitive approach to life and nature. With the arrival of the Americans and Europeans in the mid-19th century the Tokugawa regime began to collapse, and in 1868 the Imperial Court was returned to prominence with the Meiji Restoration. A great wave of Western influences swept Japan: imitation of the Occident influenced all phases of life; the literary scene was no exception. Vast numbers of Western works were translated and imitated, various European literary and artistic movements had their vogue. Nevertheless works representative of the Japanese tradition continued to appear, especially in the pre-World War II period, when nationalistic sentiments encouraged such a trend. In the postwar period American influence has been strong and much Western material in all fields has appeared in Japanese. Throughout the 20th century there have been many novelists of exceptional talent and originality; a number of their works have appeared in English translation. Japan is a country of great literary productivity which accounts for its being the second greatest (after Russia) publisher of books in the world.

Japhet or Japheth. A name for Iapetus, introduced by Milton in Paradise Lost. He was also one of the sons of Noah and, according to legend, the father of Histon from whom descended the French, Italian, German, and British peoples.

Jaquenetta. A blowsy peasant wench who is wooed in histrionic style by Don Adriano de Armado in Shakespeare's Love's Labour's Lost.

Jaques. In Shakespeare's As You Like It, a lord, attendant on the banished duke in the forest of Arden. A philosophical idler, cynical, melancholy, and contemplative, he has little to do with the plot, but his musings furnish some of Shakespeare's most frequently quoted lines, notably from the speech on "the Seven Ages of Man":

All the world's a stage,
And all the men and women merely players:
They have their exits and their entrances;
And one man in his time plays many parts,
His acts being seven ages.
Jacques-Dalcroze, Emile (1855–1950). Swiss composer and inventor of eurhythmics. Eurhythmics coordinates bodily movement with music systematically to develop the physical experience of music, especially rhythm. This system has influenced modern dance. Jacques-Dalcroze founded the Institut Jacques-Dalcroze in Geneva, wrote folklike compositions and several expository and pedagogical works, among them Rhythms, Music and Education (1922).

Jardin des Plantes. Familiar name for what was originally the Jardin du Roi (1635), and is now the Museum d'Histoire Naturelle (1794) in Paris. At first the site served as the royal garden for medicinal herbs; today the Jardins des Plantes, equipped with classrooms, laboratories, and museums, is a center of experimental scientific study.

Jarley, Mrs. In Charles Dickens' Old Curiosity Shop, a kindhearted woman, mistress of a travelling wax-work exhibition. She is kind to Little Nell and employs her as a decoy duck to "Jarley's unrivalled collection."

Jarndyce, Mr. See Bleak House.

Jarnès [Millán], Benjamín (1888–1949). Spanish novelist. The elaborate style of his work, which often strays to the borders of poetry, is apparent in his best-known novels: Mosén Pedro (1924); Vida de San Atejo (Saint Alexis, 1928), an interesting biography; and Castellar, hombre del Sinaí (1935).

Jarrell, Randall (1914–1965). American poet, novelist, and critic. Jarrell served in the Air Force during the Second World War, and a considerable portion of his poetry deals with the war. Among his collections of verse are Blood for a Stranger (1942), Little Friend, Little Friend (1945), Losses (1948), The Seven-League Crutches (1951), and Selected Poems (1955). Some of his critical essays have been collected in Poetry and the Age (1952) and A Sad Heart at the Supermarket (1962). Pictures from an Institution (1954) is a novel satirizing life at a women's college.

Jarry, Alfred [-Henry] (1873–1907). French dramatist and novelist. Jarry is most famous for his epic burlesque Usu Rot (1896) and its sequels, and for the novel Le Surrâle (1902). Both works are considered major precursors of surrealism. Although the coarseness of his language was deliberately shocking, Jarry's humor was often metaphysical in nature. He would, for example, give a logical demonstration in lucid style of an absurd proposition.

Jason (Jason). In Greek mythology, the son (christened Diomedes) of Aeson. He led the Argonauts to recover the Golden Fleece. Saved by his mother from Aeson's brother Pelias, who had seized the throne of Iolcus, he was reared by Omphale. When he returned to claim the throne, he was sent to capture the Fleece. Thanks to the aid of Medea, he succeeded, killed Pelias, and became king of Ephrye (Corinth). Later, when he divorced Medea to marry Glaucus, she killed her two children by Jason and escaped to Athens. Jason lost favor with the gods and wandered as an outcast until his old age, when the prow of his old vessel, the Argo, fell on him and killed him.

Jaspers, Karl (1883–1969). German philosopher. In 1913 he became an unsalaried lecturer on psychology at Heidelberg; he was made a full professor of philosophy in 1921. The Nazi regime secured his dismissal in 1937, but he was reinstated in 1945. Since 1949 he has lectured at the University of Basel. Jaspers is one of the founders of existentialism. From the beginning his interest in psychiatry has provided the particulars for his search for a "perennial philosophy." His concern in this direction distinguishes him from his fellow-existentialists. He is less iconoclastic than other modern philosophers, such as Sartre. Although his system is rigorously logical, it acknowledges a transcendental power with which man seeks to communicate. Among his works are Psychology of World Conceptions (Psychologie der Weltanschauungen; 1919), Man in the Modern Age (1933), On Truth (Von der Wahrheit; 1947), The Question of German Guilt (1947), The Perennial Scope of Philosophy (1949), and Tragedy Is Not Enough (1953).

Jatayu. In Hindu legend, the eagle-king of birds. In the Ramayana he dies trying to save Sita from the clutches of Ravana. He is a symbol of unswerving loyalty and self-sacrifice.

Jaurès, Jean Léon (1859–1914). French socialist leader. Jaurès defended Captain Dreyfus in his newspaper La Petite République. With Briand, he founded (1904) and edited the daily L'Humanité. Jaurès was elected several times to membership in the Chamber of Deputies; in that capacity he expounded his socialist convictions eloquently. Histoire socialiste collective (1879–1900), a history of France from the Socialist perspective, was written under his direction. In 1914, at the outbreak of World War I, Jaurès was assassinated by a French chauvinist.

Java Head (1919). A novel by Joseph Heresheimer. In his examination of the American past, Heresheimer turned to the China trade that helped make New England rich. Gerrit Ammidon, the son of a famous Salem shipowner and retired captain, whose home is called Java Head, brings back from the Orient a Chinese wife, Tao Yuen, of aristocratic family. But she is received with kindness only by the wife of her husband's brother, and in addition arouses passion in a dissolute neighbor. Lured into a room she commits suicide by taking opium in order to escape him. In the end, the bereaved husband marries a girl he had once been fond of and sails back to the Orient.

Javert. In Victor Hugo's Les Misérables, the relentless pursuer of Jean Valjean. An officer of the police, Javert is the personification of the law's inexorability. He pursues the ex-convict Jean Valjean relentlessly, but finally commits suicide rather than arrest his prey.

Jay, John (1745–1829). American diplomat, jurist, and public official. After serving in the Continental Congress and as joint commissioner in making peace with Great Britain, he was secretary of foreign affairs under the Confederation. Upon the adoption of the Constitution, which he defended as one of the authors of The Federalist papers, he became chief justice of the Supreme Court. In 1794 he was made special envoy to Great Britain to settle differences that had arisen over British failure to comply with the Treaty of 1784. The resulting treaty, known in the U.S. as Jay's Treaty, provided for British evacuation of the Northwest Territory and set up machinery for settling other grievances, though it was silent about British violations of American neutral rights during the Anglo-French war. As Jay had foreseen, the treaty was extremely unpopular; he was denounced in the press and burned in effigy.

Jazz. Syncopated music of American Negro and possibly African origin that, in the 20th century, grew out of the dance and folk music of the American Negro and out of elements derived from Protestant hymns and march tunes. Among the predecessors of jazz are work songs, spirituals, ragtime, and blues (which has continued to be the main vocal form of jazz). Different jazz styles are identified with the successive decades of this century: hot jazz, or Dixieland, in the twenties; swing in the thirties; bebop in the forties; cool and progressive jazz in the fifties.

The extraordinary vitality of jazz, particularly in its rhythms, has extended its popularity throughout the world. It has influenced literature and other arts both implicitly and explicitly, for jazz also often connotes certain attitudes on the part of its listeners and performers; e.g., a freedom of behavior and feeling of exclusiveness that have interested writers since the twenties. Among the earliest of these writers were F. Scott Fitzgerald, John Dos Passos, and James T. Farrell. A resurgence of interest in the people associated with jazz has accompanied the rise of beat writing.

Some poets, both beat and otherwise, have imitated the rhythms of jazz, especially blues. Among them are Langston Hughes, Vachel Lindsay, Gregory Corso, Allen Ginsberg, and Gary Snyder. See George Gershwin; Aaron Copland.

Jazz Age. A term used to designate the period of the 1920's in the U.S. At that time the apparent emotional abandonment of jazz seemed best to express the spirit of determined unconventionality, gaiety, and dissipation of the American boom era that followed World War I. Such dances as the "Black Bottom" and "Charleston" went hand in hand with "speakeasies," "petting parties," and the bobbed hair, short skirts, and new freedom of behavior of the "flapper." F. Scott Fitzgerald was one of the first to use this term by titling one of his works Tales from the Jazz Age (1922). Other writers of this period include John Dos Passos and James T. Farrell.

J.B. (1958). A verse drama by Archibald MacLeish. Based on the biblical story of Job, it is noted for its circus-tent setting and play-within-a-play structure. In contrast with Job, J.B. shows modern man in a universe whose laws he cannot understand; while the Voice from the Whirlwind offers an answer which is irrelevant to the human problem of how to live, the play simply affirms man's capacity to "endure and Love."

Jean Barois (1913). A long novel, written almost entirely in dialogue, by Roger Martin du Gard. Its hero decides that conscience compels him to leave the church, and though he finds few answers to problems of morality and conscience in agnosticism, he remains a free-thinker until his old age, when he returns to the church, more through fear of death than out of conviction. The novel deals in part with the Dreyfus affair and with its shattering effect upon French intellectual life.

Jean Christophe (1904-1912, 10 vols.). A novel series by Romain Rolland. The hero, Jean Christophe Kraft, is a German-born musician who travels through France and Germany, observing and criticizing contemporary civilization. A satire on modern society, the massive work is also a sensitive analysis of the artist's isolated position in his world. Rolland, speaking through his musician hero, proposes that the purpose of art is to express moral truth and thus to combat the disintegration of values.

Jean de Meun [g], Pen name of Jean Coteline (c. 1250-c. 1305). French poet and scholar. His continuation of the Romance of the Rose satirizes most existing institutions of his day and makes Nature the standard for all moral and social judgments in a series of lucidly reasoned arguments.

Jean des Entommeures, Frère. See Friar John.

Jean Jacques. The given name of Jean Jacques Rousseau, by which he is often called.

Jeanne d'Arc. See Joan of Arc.

Jeanmeret, Charles Edouard. See Le Corbusier.

Jean Paul. See Jean Paul Friedrich Richter.

Jean Santeuil (1952). An unfinished novel, written 1895-1899, by Marcel Proust. It is largely an adapted version of his own life until 1895. Many of the characters and incidents are prototypes of those in his major work, Remembrance of Things Past (1913-1927), though none of the names are the same.

Jedermann. See Everyman.

Jeffers, Robinson (1887-1962). American poet. He is known for his concern with the introversion of modern culture; his belief in extreme individualism, tending toward a Nietzschean adulation of the hero; his attraction to strong, primitive types; and his quasi-mystical preoccupation with sexual abnormality. The son of a minister, educated in the classics from early childhood, Jeffers based many of his narrative poems on biblical and classical sources. After two romantic volumes, Flags and Apples (1912) and Californians (1916), he wrote Tamar, and Other Poems. This volume, which caused the recognition of his unusual dramatic power, included among its contents The Tower Beyond Tragedy. The title poem of Roan Stallion, Tamar, and Other Poems, his next collection, was based on a Monterey incident in which a man was killed by his own horse. Jeffers used the incident to contrast the primitive sexuality of the stallion with the degenerative lusts of man.

The Women at Point Sur (1927) deals with a minister who tries to found a new religion but is driven mad by his conflicting desires. The title poem of Cawdor, and Other Poems is based on Greek mythology; Dear Judas, and Other Poems is biblical. Descent to the Dead (1931) contains At the Fall of an Age, a dramatic poem dealing with the execution of Helen by Polyxen 20 years after the fall of Troy. Thubron's Landing reveals, perhaps more than any other of Jeffers' poems, his abhorrence of modern civilization. His many other volumes include Give Your Heart to the Hawks and Other Poems (1933), reiterating his idea that man must go beyond humanity if he is to survive; Solstice and Other Poems (1935), containing an early use of the Medea story, to which Jeffers returned in Medea (1946); Such Counsel You Gave to Me and Other Poems (1937), Selected Poetry (1938); Be Angry at the Sun (1941); The Double Axe (1948); and Hungerfield, and Other Poems (1954).
Jefferson, Thomas (1743-1826). Third president of the U.S. (1801-1809). A graduate of the College of William and Mary, Jefferson was admitted to the bar in 1767 and sat in the Virginia House of Burgesses from 1769 to 1775. As a delegate to the Continental Congress (1775-1776), he drafted the Declaration of Independece. While he was a member of the Virginia House of Delegates (1776-1779), he supported the abolition of primogeniture and entail, the establishment of religious freedom, and the separation of church and state. After serving as wartime governor of Virginia and as a member of congress, he succeeded Franklin as minister to France, where he published his Notes on Virginia (1784-1785), still considered a valuable source of information about the natural history of Virginia as well as about 18th-century political and social life. He was named secretary of state under Washington, but resigned in 1793 as a result of long-standing political and personal differences with Alexander Hamilton and his supporters. Jefferson's championship of states' rights and agrarian interests distinguished him and his followers from the Hamiltonians and resulted in the emergence of the Democratic-Republican Party, of which Jefferson was the leader. He was the presidential candidate of the new party in 1796, but ran second to John Adams, the Federalist nominee, and, in accordance with the practice then followed, became vice president. In 1798, Jefferson and James Madison prepared the Virginia and Kentucky Resolutions in reply to the Federalists' Alien and Sedition Acts.

In the election of 1800, Jefferson tied with Aaron Burr in electoral votes and was chosen president by the House of Representatives with the support of Hamilton, who considered Jefferson the lesser of two evils. Important events of his administration were the Tripolitan War, the Louisiana Purchase, and the short-lived Embargo Act, designed to preserve American neutrality rights.

After 40 years of public service, Jefferson retired permanently to his home at Monticello in 1809, devoting much of his time to the creation of a university for Virginia. He was reconciled with his old political opponent, John Adams, and the two men, from 1811 to their deaths, carried on a voluminous correspondence, which is one of the most interesting in American letters. Perhaps the most versatile of the founding fathers, he is remembered for his faith in the capacity of the people to govern themselves through representative institutions. On his tombstone at Monticello is the inscription he ordered: "Author of the Declaration of American Independence, of the Statute of Virginia for religious freedom, and Father of the University of Virginia." His other writings include A Summary View of the Rights of British America (1774), A Manual of Parliamentary Practice (1801), and Life of Captain [Meriwether] Lewis (1817).

Jeffreys, George. 1st Baron Jeffreys of Wem (1649-1689). Welsh-born English jurist. As chief justice and lord chancellor of England, he supported the efforts of James II to rule as an absolute monarch. His conduct at the trials known as the Bloody Assizes, over which he presided, made his name a byword for injustice and brutality. When James was overthrown, Jeffreys was imprisoned and died in the Tower of London.
nursed by Jennie. When he dies she steals in to his funeral, afraid to speak to his family. Jennie's daughter dies, and she is left to face life alone, but with the characteristic acceptance she has shown all along.

Jennifer Lorn (1925). A novel by Elinor Wylie. Her first novel, it deals with 18th-century England and India at the time of Warren Hastings. It is a satiric study of a pompous aristocrat, seen through the eyes of his wife. The title is a pun: Jenny forlorn.

Jenseits von Gut und Böse. See Beyond Good and Evil.

Jensen, Johannes Vilhelm (1873-1950). Danish novelist, poet, and essayist. Jensen attained literary prominence with the publication of Himmerlandes-folk (Himmerland Tales, 1898), stories of his native Jutland. Kongens Fald (The Fall of the King, 3 vols., 1900-1901), his first successful novel, paints a vivid and appreciative although sometimes critical portrait of Denmark and her people. Philosophically committed to Darwinism, Jensen published Den Lange Reise (The Long Journey, 6 vols., 1908-1922), an evolutionary study of the Cimbrians, i.e., the Teutonic race, which moves from the baboon stage of the pre-glacial age to the time of Christopher Columbus. In his novels and even in his lyric verse, Jensen expressed his Darwinist convictions. From 1906 to 1940 eight volumes of Myster (Myths) appeared, containing poetic and subtle stories and essays. He was awarded the Nobel prize for literature in 1944.

Jensen, Thit Marie Kirstine (1876-1957). Danish novelist, sister of Johannes Jensen. Her early novels, among them Martyrium (1905), Hemskoen (1911), Gerd (1918), Den erotiske Hamsta (1919), and Af Blod er du kommen (1928), portray peasant life and express vigorous feminist convictions. Later she turned from present reform to Denmark's past, producing such fine historical novels as Valdemar Atterdag (2 vols., 1940), Droffen (2 vols., 1943), and Rigets Arving (2 vols., 1946).

Jephthah's daughter. The only daughter of Jephthah, judge of Israel. She went to greet him on his return home from victory over the Ammonites, unaware that he had vowed to offer up to Jehovah the first thing that met him. Her story is told in Judges.

Jeremiah. An Old Testament book. The prophet Jeremiah, who gave his name to the book, lived in Jerusalem during the time of the fall of this city to the Babylonians. With the destruction of the city and the temple, the emphasis in Jeremiah turns from the nation to the individual. The root of the prophet's religion is in his own heart, rather than a temple building. Matthew reports that Jesus was thought to be the returned Jeremiah.

Jeremy (1919). A semi-autobiographical novel by Hugh Walpole about the daily life of a small boy. Jeremy and Hamlet (1923) and Jeremy at Crake (1927) are sequels.

Jericho. One of the oldest inhabited sites in Palestine, perhaps the oldest in the world. Mesolithic flints associated with fortifications are traceable to the ninth millennium B.C., a "Proto-Neolithic" culture predates the eighth. Jericho was the first city conquered by the Israelites under Joshua after they crossed the Jordan into their Promised Land.

Jeroboam. In the Old Testament, the son of Nebat who "made Israel to sin" (1 Kings 15:34). Under his leadership, 10 tribes revolted against Rehoboam, the son of Solomon, and set up a separate northern state with Jeroboam as king. Because of the idol worship he initiated, his name has become a byword for wickedness. A very large wine bottle or flask is called a jeroboam, in allusion to his power and strength.

Jerome, St. (full Latin name, Sophronius Eusebius Hieronymus; c. 340-420). One of the fathers of the Western Church and translator of the Latin version of the Bible known as the Vulgata. He is generally represented as an aged man in a cardinal's dress, writing or studying, with a lion seated beside him. Legend has it that while St. Jerome was living one day, a lion entered the schoolroom and lifted up one of its paws. All the disciples fled, but Jerome, seeing that the paw was injured, drew a thorn from it and dressed the wound. The lion, out of gratitude, showed a wish to stay with its benefactor.

Jerome, Jerome Klapka (1859-1927). English novelist and playwright, best known as a humorist. His works include Three Men in a Boat (1889), a novel, and The Passing of the Third Floor Back (1908), a modern morality play set in a boarding house.

Jerusalem. A city in Palestine. It is a holy city for Christians, Jews, and Muslims. A Canaanite city long before the arrival of the Israelites, Jerusalem was captured by David (c. 1,000 B.C.) who made it his capital city. David's son Solomon built his famous temple in Jerusalem, but after his death the city began to decline in importance. Under Solomon's son, Rehoboam, the city was sacked by the Egyptians (920 B.C.). A weak city, it remained fairly secure for two centuries until the Assyrians began to invade Judah in the middle of the eighth century. Most of the kingdom was lost in ransom, but the city itself was spared until 586 B.C., when it fell to the Babylonians, who destroyed it almost completely.

More than a century later (c. 420) Jerusalem was rebuilt under Nehemiah. The city was captured again by Alexander the Great in 332 B.C. After a period of domination by the Seleucid kings of Antioch, the revolt of the Maccabees restored rule of the city to the Jews.

Jerusalem became a Roman city in 46 B.C. under Herod who rebuilt it on a grand scale. Revolts in A.D. 66-70 and 132-135 saw the city leveled again. Under Byzantine control for five centuries, it fell to the Muslims in 638.

Modern Jerusalem is a city divided between the Jews and Arabs who fought bitterly for it when the state of Israel was created in 1948.

Jerusalem. A long, mystical poem (1804) by William Blake in which he presents his theory that the world of imagination is a world of eternity after death.

Jerusalem (1901-1902). A collection of stories by Selma Lagerlöf, dealing with an old peasant family, the Ingmars of Ingemarson, and their devotion to the family farm in Sweden. The title refers to a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, for which the land is finally sold at auction by one member of the family. Another Ingmar, however, renounces his fiancée and marries a rich woman in order to save the farm.

Jerusalem Conquistada (1609). A historical epic by Lope de Vega. Although the theme is the unsuccessful attempt of Richard the Lion-Hearted to capture Jerusalem from the Saracens, it contains much legendary and nonhistorical material, such as the participation of Alfonso VIII of Spain in this crusade.

Jerusalem Delivered. See Gerasalemmes Liberata.

Jesse. In the Old Testament, the father of David. A Jesse tree is a genealogical tree, usually represented as a vine or as a large brass candlestick with many branches, tracing the lineage of the house of David from Jesse to Jesus, it having been prophesied that the Messiah would be a "rod out of the stem of Jesse." (Isa. 11:1.) Jesse is himself sometimes represented in a recumbent position with the vine rising out of his joints. A stained-glass window showing Jesse and the tree tracing ancestry from him to Jesus is called a Jesse window.

Jesse, F[rinywyd] Tennyson (187-1958). English novelist, dramatist, journalist, and criminologist. Her best novel was The Lacquer Lady (1929). She described a number of cases for the Notable British Trials series.

Jessel, Miss. See Turn of the Screw.

Jesica. The rebellious daughter of Shylock in Shakespeare's MERCHANT OF VENICE. "Wise, fair, and true," she elopes with Lorenzo, but is practical enough to take with her a portion of her father's treasure.

jester. See fool.

Jesuit Martyrs of North America. Eight French missionaries whom the Indians martyred in the 17th century in New York and Canada: the priests Isaac Jogues, Jean de Brébeuf, Noël Chabanel, Anthony Daniel, Charles Garnier, Gabriel Lalemant, and the laymen René Goupil and John Lalande. All eight were canonized by Pope Pius XI in 1930 and celebrated in an epic poem, Brébeuf and his Brethren, by the Canadian poet Edwin John Pratt (1883-).

Jesuits. A name applied to members of the Society or Company of Jesus, founded in 1534 by St. Ignatius of Loyola. From the first six disciples made by Ignatius, four of whom were Spaniards, the order had grown to over 1000 at the time of his death in 1556. Jesuits were particularly active in three fields: education, missionary endeavor in non-Catholic lands, and the development of deeper spiritual life.

The order was founded to combat the Reformation and to propagate the Roman Catholic faith among the heathen, but through its discipline, organization, and methods of secrecy it soon acquired such political power that it came into conflict with both the civil and religious authorities. It was driven from England in 1579; from France in 1594, from Venice in 1607, from Spain in 1676, from Naples in 1768; in 1773 it was suppressed by Pope Clement XIV, but was revived in 1814.

Owing to the casuistical principles maintained by many of the leaders of the older organization and attributed to the order as a whole, the name Jesuit acquired a very opprobrious signification both in Protestant and Roman Catholic countries. A Jesuit or Jesuitical person came to connote a deceiver or prevaricator.

Jesus or Jesus Christ (Heb. "the Messiah"), or Christ Jesus. Known also as Jesus of Nazareth. Born between 4 and 6 B.C. and crucified about A.D. 28.

One of the world's major religious figures, he is regarded by his followers as the Messiah predicted by the Old Testament prophets (Isa. 9:2-6). The events of his life are recorded in the four Gospels of the New Testament. His genealogy is traced through David to Abraham.

Miraculous events occurred at his birth, but little is known of his youth and young manhood. He was born and lived in a time of distress and oppression. After his baptism by John the Baptist, he gathered 12 disciples (see Apostles) and began to teach his message of God's redeeming love for all mankind, the necessity of repentance, and the duty of the individual to God and to other men. Through his doctrine of salvation for mankind and his extraordinary healing powers, he had a large following among the common people. He became suspect with the authorities, both Roman and Jewish, because of his popularity and his attacks on the hypocrisy of the privileged. He foretold the advent of a new Kingdom of God, which the priests regarded as blasphemy and the Romans as sedition.

After his ministry in Galilee, he went to Jerusalem for the observation of Passover. There, after the Last Supper, Judas Iscariot, one of the disciples, betrayed him to the authorities. He was arrested by the Roman soldiery, tried, and crucified. His followers believe that after three days he rose from the dead and later ascended to heaven to assume his rightful place with God.

The Christian Church was founded by the followers of Jesus, after his death. He is viewed as the word of God made flesh (John 1:14), the divine Incarnation that became fully human to redeem mankind. Through a series of Church councils, the nature of Jesus' exact relation to the Godhead was defined in the concept of the Trinity, the three-person union of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.

Jeune Alcidiane, La. See Marin le Roy Gomberville.

Jeune fille Violaine, La. See Tidings Brought to Mary.

Jeune Parque, La (The Youngest of the Fates), 1917. A long poem by Paul Valéry. Written in a free-flowing version of classical rhymed Alexandrine couplets, it takes the form of a dramatic monologue. The young speaker is a maiden; she is simultaneously fearful of and fascinated by the desire awakening within her, for the violation of her self that will mark the beginning of her participation in the life process and her responsibility for new life.

Jevons, William Stanley (1835-1882). English economist and logician. He was a pioneer in the application of statistics to economics. Among his numerous books are Pure Logic (1864), Theory of Political Economy (1878), and The State in Relation to Labour (1882).

Jewett, Sarah Orne (1849-1909). American novelist and short-story writer. Her familiarity with her native Maine countryside enabled her to become one of the most successful of the local-color writers. Miss Jewett's pictures of New England life were described as "poetic realism" by Edward Garnett. Deephaven (1877), a collection of sketches of life in rural Maine, was her first successful book. Her masterpiece, The Country of the Pointed Firs, a series of episodes taking place in a Maine seaport town, is considered a minor classic.

Jew, the Wandering. See Wandering Jew, the.

Jew of Malta, The (probably performed in 1589; quartio of 1633, first extant edition). A romantic tragedy by Christopher Marlowe. The Jew of Malta is essentially a dramatic portrait of one man, Barabas. At first the Jewish merchant, counting his "infinite riches in a little room," shares the longing for some extraordinary power and the ability to express his desire in stirring poetry that characterize other Marlovian heroes. He is a man of some dignity, unjustly persecuted by hypocritical Christians. But during the course of the play he degenerates from a human being who commands sympathy into a caricature of the grasping, greedy Jew dominated by his desire for gold. Barabas murders his daughter and an entire nunery with poisoned porridge, performs other atrocities, and dies in an absurdly grotesque manner by falling into a bubbling caldron.

Jezebel. In the Old Testament, the wife of Ahab, who married him before he became king of Israel. After establishing the Phoenician worship of Baal at her husband's court, she was put to death at the order of Jehu.

A painted jezebel refers to a flaunting woman of bold spirit but loose morals (see II Kings 19:30).

John Masefield's poetic drama King's Daughter (1923) is based on the story of Jezebel and Jehu.

Jibanananda Das (1899–1954). Bengali poet. He was born in East Pakistan. Considered to be the finest exponent of "pure poetry" in India, he taught English literature in a college in Calcutta. Of his published volumes, the finest is Banalata Sen, translated into English in 1962.

Jiménez, Juan Ramón (1881–1958). Spanish poet. His work, which has had the greatest impact upon contemporary Spanish poetry, brought Jiménez the Nobel Prize for literature in 1956. Educated at Seville, the poet resided in Madrid for some years before the civil war sent him into exile. His earlier volumes are lyrical, full of delicate metaphors, and stress folk motifs; these include Ninfas (1900), Baladas de primavera (1910), and the more traditional, spiritual work, Sonetos espirituales (1917). The last-mentioned year also marks the publication of Diario de un poeta recién casado (1917), the poet's first venture into the field of "pure poetry." It is characterized, as is his later work, by a striving for simplicity, free verse, intense concentration, and condensation of form. Perhaps his best-known work is the prose poem Platero y yo (1917), which relates the wanderings of the poet and his poetical donkey through Andalusia. Jiménez's poetry may be surveyed in the anthology of his own selection, Tercera antología poética (1942).

Jimson, Gulley. The passionate, comic artist hero of Joyce Cary's novel The Horse's Mouth.

Jingle, Alfred. In Charles Dickens' Pickwick Papers, a strolling actor who imposes for a time on the members of the Pickwick Club. He is discovered to be a scoundrel and an imposter.

Jingo. A word from the meaningless jargon of the 17th century conjurers. Probably it was substituted for God, in the same way as are gosh, golly, and the like. In Motteux' translation of Rabelais (1694), where the original reads par Dieu (Bk. iv. lvi), the English rendering is "By jingo." There is a possibility that the word is Basque jinko or Jainko, God, and was introduced by sailors.

The later meaning of the word, a blustering so-called patriot who is itching to go to war on the slightest provocation, or a chauvinist, is taken from a music-hall song by G. W. Hunt, which was popular in 1878 when the country was supposed to be on the verge of intervening in the Russo-Turkish War on behalf of the Turks:

We don't want to fight; but, by Jingo, if we do,
We've got the ships, we've got the men, and got the money too.

The Russophobes became known as the Jingoists, and such policy has been labeled jingoism ever since.

jimm or genii (singular, jinne). Demons of Muslim legend thought to have been created from fire 2000 years before Adam was made of clay. Fable holds that they were governed by a race of kings named Suleyman, one of whom built the pyramids. Living chiefly in Mount Kaf, they assume the forms of serpents, dogs, cats, monsters, or even human beings and become invisible at will. Evil jinn are hideously ugly, while the good are exquisitely beautiful. See AFRID; ELIS; GIEN BEN GIAN.

Jimistan. The Arabian fairyland.

Jo. In Charles Dickens' Bleak House, a poor little outcast living in one of London's decaying tenements. The child wanders about from place to place until he finally dies of want and neglect. He is one of Dickens' most poignant characters.

Joad family. The central characters in John Steinbeck's novel The Grapes of Wrath. Escaping from the dust bowl of Oklahoma during the depths of the depression, they migrate to California as fruit pickers.

Joan, Pope. A mythical female pope, fabled in the Middle Ages to have succeeded Leo IV (855). The vulgar tale is that Joan conceived a violent passion for the monk Folda and in order to get admission to him assumed the monastic habit. Being clever and popular, she was elected pope, but was discovered through giving birth to a child during the enthronement.

Joan La Pucelle. Shakespeare's name for Joan of Arc, whom he depicts in Henry VI: Part I as a "vile fiend and shameless courtezan."

Joanna or Joan the Mad. Also known as Juana la Loca (1497–1555). Spanish queen. The daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella, she married (1496) Philip the Fair of Flanders, whose infidelities probably aggravated her mental disorder. By him she bore the future Charles V. Although she inherited the crown of Castile upon the death of Isabella in 1504, the death of Philip (1506) increased her derangement, and Ferdinand sent her to live in seclusion in Tor-desillas, while he became regent of Castile. At the time it was widely rumored that she was sane and was merely the victim of her family's machinations.
Joan of Arc. Fr. Jeanne d'Arc or Dare. Later known as the Maid of Orleans, Fr. La Pucelle (1412–1431). French heroine. A deeply religious peasant girl of the village of Domrémy, she began at 13 to have visions in which she identified the voices of St. Michael, St. Catherine, and St. Margaret. Henry VI of England had been crowned king of France in 1422, and when the English began their siege of Orleans in 1428, Joan became convinced that the saints had chosen her to repulse the English and conduct the French Dauphin to be crowned at the Reims cathedral. She finally convinced the Dauphin of her mission and, in male attire, led the French troops to victory at Orleans and elsewhere (May and June, 1429) and stood beside Charles VII at his coronation in July. But then she was not given sufficient troops, and her military campaign began to fail; she was taken prisoner in May, 1430, by the Burgundians, who sold her to their English allies six months later.

They did not want the English to execute her, however, until they could defame her in the eyes of the French peasants and troops, who regarded her as a saint. So she was turned over to the French ecclesiastical courts, the weak Charles not daring to interfere, and was tried on 12 charges of sorcery, wantonness in cutting her hair and wearing men's clothes, and blasphemous pride in regarding herself as responsible directly to God rather than to the Church. Worn out by the examination and condemned to the stake, she finally signed a recantation of her alleged sins; her sentence was commuted to life imprisonment. But in the next few days she resumed male attire and repudiated her recantation, so she was handed over to a secular English court and burned at the stake (May 30, 1431). After confused legal proceedings to shift the blame for her death, Joan was officially declared innocent in 1456; she was canonized as a saint in 1920.

The official records of her trial give the best account of the historical Joan. In literature she is treated variously as a witch, as in Shakespeare's Henry VI, reflecting contemporary English sentiment; with skepticism toward the mystic aura surrounding her belief in her voices, as in Voltaire's La Pucelle (1738, pub. 1755); or with complete acceptance of the supernatural element, making her a romantic heroine, as in Schiller's tragedy Die Jungfrau von Orleans (1801). Famous accounts of her life include the one in Michelet's History of France (1838–1867), Mark Twain's Personal Recollections of Joan of Arc (1896), and Anatole France's Life of Joan of Arc (1908). More recent plays about her include G. B. Shaw's Saint Joan (1922) and Jean Anouilh's L'Alouette (1949; translated by Christopher Fry as The Lark, 1956).

Job. An Old Testament book. The greatest poetic drama in the Old Testament, it is one of the most philosophically involved books in the Bible. The unknown, undated author deals with the problem of undeserved suffering and God's justice in the framework of an antique folk legend. Job and his friends discuss the question of whether suffering is always the punishment for sin and conversely whether sin is always punished.

The Lord, confident of Job's faith, permitted Satan to test him; thereupon, his wealth vanished, his children died and he was smitten with boils. Yet, despite his wife's advice to "curse God and die," he remained steadfast, and his faith was rewarded. (See Eliph.)

In the Koran, Job's wife is said to have been either Rahmeh, daughter of Ephram, son of Joseph, or Makhr, daughter of Manasses; and the tradition is recorded that Job, at the command of God, struck the earth with his foot from the dunghill where he lay, and instantly there welled up a spring of water with which his wife washed his sores and they were miraculously healed.

Job's comforter. One who intends to sympathize with you in your grief, but says that you brought it on yourself, thus in reality adding weight to your sorrow.

Job's post. A bringer of bad news.

Jocasta (Iokaste). See Oedipus.

Jocelyn (1836). A narrative poem by Alphonse Lamartine. The hero is a priest. As a lad he finds refuge from war in an Alpine cave, where he lives with another boy, who turns out to be a girl named Laurence. Although he loves her, he remains true to his priestly vows and leaves her for a life of self-denying devotion.

Jochumson, Matthiás (1835–1920). Icelandic poet and playwright. Although he founded modern drama in Iceland, he is most famous as a fine lyric poet. Elegaic, religious, and nature poems appear in the collections Ljôomelit (1884) and Grettisflóði (1897).

Jödo Buddhism. See AMIDISM.

Joel. An Old Testament book named for its author. A very approximate date of 350 B.C. has been assigned to the writing. The central event is a devastating plague of locusts, described in terms of an apocalyptic vision. Te return of God's love is foretold and with it the wealth of the land.

Joe Miller's Jests. A book of jokes compiled by John Mottley in 1739. He named it for Joseph Miller (1684–1728), a popular comedian of the day who could neither read nor write. The term Joe Miller has become synonymous with a stale joke.

John (1167–1216). King of England (1199–1216). The youngest son of Henry II and Eleanor of Aquitaine, he was nicknamed "Lackland," because he had not shared in the division of Henry's territory; he was probably Henry's favorite son, however, and his subsequent rebellion against his father broke the old king's heart. John succeeded to the throne upon the death of his childless brother Richard I, successfully thwarting the claim of his nephew Arthur of Brittany. As a result of John's famous quarrel with Pope Innocent III over the selection of Stephen Langton as archbishop of Canterbury, England was laid under an interdict and the king was declared deposed; in 1213, however, John submitted to the pope, going so far as to make England a fief of the papacy. The following year John invaded France in an attempt to regain the provinces of Normandy, Anjou, and Touraine, which he had previously lost, but he was decisively defeated by Philip II of France at the battle of Bouvines. Meanwhile, John's arbitrary practices had aroused the ire of the English nobles, who compelled him to sign the Magna Carta in 1215. He is the subject of King John, a play by Shakespeare, and is a character in Scott's Ivanhoe (1820).

John, St., also St. John the Evangelist or the Divine. One of the twelve, frequently called "the beloved disciple,” since he is referred to as “that disciple whom Jesus loved” in the narrative of the Gospel of St. John. He was one of the sons of Zebedee and brother of St. James the Great. His day is December 27, and he is usually represented bearing a chalice from which a serpent issues, in allusion to his driving the poison from a cup presented him to drink. Tradition says that he took the Virgin Mary to Ephesus after the Crucifixion, but there is no evidence to support this. Most scholars now agree that while John was an influential leader of the early church, he was not the author of the fourth Gospel, the Epistles of John, or The Revelation of St. John. All of these works date after A.D. 80; Papias, a second century Christian writer, reports that John was killed in Palestine before A.D. 70.

John, Don. In Shakespeare’s Much Ado About Nothing, the jealous and vindictive bastard brother of Don Pedro, prince of Arraygan. His plot against Claudio and Hero nearly succeeds, but he is finally undone and punished.

John, The Epistles of. Three short books of the New Testament. They are letters addressed to all Christians. The first two warn against the false teachings that had been filtering into the Church, with a special condemnation of Gnostic ideas. The third shows concern for an ambitious, arrogant young church official with whom the writer intends to deal personally. All three are held to be the work of one man, an elder of the church in Ephesus, named John (not to be confused with the apostle). Stylistic similarities plus an agreement in outlook indicate that this man was also the author of the fourth Gospel.

John, The Gospel According to St. The 4th book of the New Testament. The most spiritual of the accounts of Jesus’ life, its emphasis is more on interpreting the meaning of his life and death than in recording the events. See John, The Epistles of.

John Brown’s Body (1928). A epic poem by Stephen Vincent Benét. A narrative of the Civil War, it opens with a prelude on the introduction of slavery, which is followed by a description of John Brown and his raid on Harpers Ferry. The poem, which considers both sides of the conflict with sympathy, includes sketches of famous participants, battles, the hardships of those on the home front, etc.

John Bull. The English nation personified, or the typical Englishman. Represented as a bluff, kind-hearted, bull-headed farmer, the character originated in John Arbuthnot’s political satire The History of John Bull, which was first published in 1712 as Law is a Bottomless Pit. In Arbuthnot’s work “John Bull” is the Englishman, the Frenchman is termed “Lewis Baboon,” and the Dutchman “Nicholas Fros.” See Lord Strutt. In the early years of the 19th century there was a scurrilous journal of this name, and in 1906 the name was adopted for a British weekly edited by Horatio Bottomley.

John Bull’s Other Island (1904). A play by George Bernard Shaw. It was written at the request of William Butler Yeats for the Irish Literary Theatre, the group that later became the Abbey Theatre, Dublin. As might be expected the play deals with the conflict between the Irish and the English over home rule. The preface, written after the play, is strictly political, but the drama is subtle, having neither hero nor villain. The Irishman, Larry Doyle, is sensitive, imaginative, and more mature than his English friend Tom Broadbent. Broadbent’s life is more straightforward, simpler than Doyle’s; he is practical, adaptable, less bothered by thinking or feeling.

The conflict between the two men is in their characteristics, not their personalities. By the end of the play Tom has assumed all of Larry’s ties with his birthplace in Ireland: his girl, his Parliamentary candor, even control of his property. This happens, not through conniving—Tom is too honest—but through Larry’s reticence and Tom’s blunt ambition.

John Dory. A popular ballad of the 14th century, often referred to in later literature. John Dory was a French pirate who was taken prisoner by the English.

John Gabriel Borkman (1896). A play by Henrik Ibsen. The story of a man who sacrificed love for ambition, John Gabriel Borkman expresses Ibsen’s belief that the only unforgivable sin is “to murder the love-life in a human soul.” As a young man, Borkman dreamed of power and broke his engagement to Ella Rentheim because Hinkel, the man whose help he needed to succeed, wanted to marry her. Borkman then married Ella’s sister, but Ella persistently refused Hinkel’s proposals. Finally Hinkel exposed Borkman’s misappropriation of the bank’s money, and Borkman was sent to jail. The action of the play concerns the meeting, after many years, of Ella and Borkman, and the attempts of Ella, Borkman, and Mrs. Borkman to influence young Erhart Borkman to choose his duty to his relatives, rather than his right to live for his own happiness.

John Gilpin (1782). A humorous ballad by William Cowper; its full title is The Diverting History of John Gilpin, Showing How He Went further than He Intended and Came Safe Home Again. Gilpin’s wife says to him, “Though we have been married twenty years, we have taken no holiday”; and at her advice the well-to-do linen draper agrees to make a family party, and dine at the Bell, at Edmondston. Mrs. Gilpin, her sister, and four children go in the chaise, and Gilpin promises to follow on horseback. The horse begins to trot, and then to gallop, and John, a bad rider, flies through Edmondston, and never stops till he reaches Ware. Here he heads his horse back towards Edmondston, but is unable to stop until he reaches his original starting place in London. The model for John Gilpin was a Mr. Beyer, of Paternoster Row, who died in 1791.

John Halifax, Gentleman (1856). A novel by Dinah Maria Mulock Craik. It is a moralistic tale concerning an orphan who by perseverance and fortitude establishes himself in life and marries the heroine, Ursula March.

John Hancock. See John Hancock.

John Marr and Other Sailors (1888). A collection of 25 poems by Herman Melville. Marr and other sailors invoke the spirits of their long-dead shipmates. The poems are chiefly nostalgic in mood.

Johnny Appleseed. See Johnny Appleseed.

John of Gaunt. Duke of Lancaster (1340-1399). English noble. The fourth son of Edward III and the father of Henry Bolingbroke (later Henry IV), he was the founder of the house of Lancaster and, during his lifetime, one of the most powerful figures in England. In Shakespeare’s Richard II, he is an English nationalist who, upon his deathbed, utters one of literature’s most moving expressions of patriotism:

This royal throne of kings, this scepter’d isle,
This earth of majesty, this seat of Mars,
This other Eden, demi-paradise,
This fortress built by Nature for herself
Against infection and the hand of war,
This happy breed of men, this little world,
This precious stone set in the silver sea,
Which serves it in the office of a wall,
Or as a most defensive to a house,
Against the envy of less happier lands;
This blessed plot, this earth, this realm,
This England . . .

John of the Cross, St. Also known as San Juan de la Cruz. Religious name of Juan de Yepes y Alvarez (1542-1591). Spanish mystic and poet. Known as the “ecstatic Doctor,” he became a Carmelite in 1563 and took an active part in Saint Teresa’s efforts to reform the order. He was canonized in 1726.

In his verse he blended his religious ardor and his gift for rich poetic imagery to produce what has been called “the supreme expression of Spanish mysticism.” His best-known poems include Noche oscura del alma, Llama de amor viva, and the canciones of La subida al Monte Carmelo.

John o’Groat’s House. Popularly considered the most northerly point in Great Britain. Originally, a building is said to have occupied this site, which is on the coast of Caithness, in Northern Scotland, near Duncairn Head; it had an eight-sided tower with a door in each side and an octagonal table within. The story is that it was built by John o’Groat (or Jan Groot) who came from Holland with his two brothers in the reign of James IV of Scotland. They purchased lands, and in time the o’Grotos increased, so that there came to be eight families of that name. They met regularly once a year in the house built by the founder, but on one occasion a question of precedence arose, and John o’Groat promised them the next time they came he would contrive to satisfy them all. Accordingly he built his eight-sided room, and the building became so noted that ever after the place has borne the name, John o’Groat’s House.

Johns, Orrick (1887-1946). American poet and editor. Johns was a radical in politics and in poetry; Second Avenue, which won the Lyric Year poetry prize (1912), had a deliberate social concern. His poetry was collected in Asphalt (1917), Black Branches (1920), and Wild Plum (1926). He also wrote Time of Our Lives: The Story of My Father and Myself (1937).

Johnson, Andrew (1808-1875). 17th president of the U.S. (1865-1869). A self-educated ex-tailor, Johnson served as governor of Tennessee and as a member of the House of Representatives. Elected to the U.S. Senate in 1856, he was the only senator from any of the 11 seceded states who remained loyal to the Union when the Civil War broke out. He was Abraham Lincoln’s running mate in 1864 and succeeded to the presidency after Lincoln’s assassination. When Johnson attempted to carry out Lincoln’s conciliatory policies toward the defeated South, he clashed with radical Republicans who demanded a harsher Reconstruction program under Congressional supervision. In 1868 he dismissed Secretary of War Edwin Stanton in defiance of the Tenure of Office Act (1867), which forbade the removal, without Senate approval, of officials whose appointments had been confirmed by the Senate. As a result, Johnson was impeached by the House of Representatives, but in the Senate trial was acquitted by a single vote, a two-thirds majority being needed for conviction.

Johnson, Esther (1681-1728). Lifelong friend of Jonathan Swift, immortalized by him as “Stella” in Journal to Stella. Their friendship began in 1689 in the home of Swift’s patron, Sir William Temple (she may have been Temple’s natural daughter), when Swift became her tutor, and they remained close friends until her death. There is no convincing evidence that they were secretly married in 1716.

Johnson, James Weldon (1871-1938). American poet and lawyer. The first Negro admitted to the Florida bar since Reconstruction days, Johnson was a vigorous spokesman for his race. He edited The
Johnson Over Jordan

Book of Negro Poetry (1922) and several collections of spirituals. He is also known for God's Trombones (1927), a collection of seven sermons in free verse. Among his other books are The Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man, a novel (1912); Fifty Years and Other Poems (1917); Black Manhattan (1930); Along This Way (1935), his autobiography; and Selected Poems (1936).

Johnston, Lyndon Baines (1908– ). 36th president of the U.S. (1963– ). After graduating from Southwest State Teachers College in San Marcos, Texas, in 1930, Johnston taught in the Houston public schools before going to Washington as secretary to a member of Congress. There he attracted the attention of President Roosevelt, who named him Texas state director of the National Youth Administration in 1935. Johnston was himself elected to the House in 1937 and served until 1948 when he won a seat in the U.S. Senate, defeating his rival by only 84 votes. As leader of the Democratic majority in the Senate from 1955 to 1961, Johnson became known as a superb legislative strategist who often won Democratic support for the policies of a Republican administration. After an unsuccessful bid for the Democratic presidential nomination in 1960, Johnston accepted the vice-presidential nomination on the ticket headed by John F. Kennedy and succeeded to the presidency after Kennedy's assassination in 1963.

Johnston, Pamela Hansford (1912– ). English novelist and literary critic, wife of C. P. Snow. Among her books are This Bed Thy Center (1935), Six Proud Reconstructions (1958), The Humbler Creation (1960), and An Error of Judgement (1962).

Johnson, Robert Underwood (1853–1937). American poet, editor, and public official. Johnson was editor of Century Magazine (1909–1913) and helped to establish the Hall of Fame at New York University; he was its director from 1919 to 1937. He helped to secure better copyright protection for authors, and served as ambassador to Italy (1920–1921). A volume of Poems was published in 1902, and enlarged in later editions; Johnson's memoirs are called Remembered Yesterdays (1923).

Johnson, Samuel (1696–1772). American philosopher, theologian, and teacher. The first native disciple of the 18th-century movement of rationalists, he is considered one of the most important thinkers of early America. His works include An Introduction to the Study of Philosophy (1731), A System of Morality (1746), and Elements Philosophica (1752), which was printed by Benjamin Franklin. Johnson also served as the first president (1753–1763) of King's College (now Columbia University).

Johnson, Samuel, Known as Dr. Johnson (1709–1784). English lexicographer, essayist, poet, and moralist, the major literary figure in the second half of the 18th century; he was referred to as the Great Cham of Literature. After being a schoolmaster and a bookseller for six years in Lichfield, the town of his birth, he left for London in 1737, with his tragedy Irene under his arm, and remained there permanently.

He was employed by Edward Cave, the founder of The Gentleman's Magazine, and contributed regularly essays, poems, Latin verses, and reports on Parliamentary debates to that publication. In 1738 he published his poem London which was compared favorably with the more mature works of Pope; in 1749, Irene was produced and indifferently received, and in the same year appeared The Vanity of Human Wishes; a poem marked with the pessimism that pervaded his life.

Meanwhile, he was earning renown as a prose moralist, notably with his periodical essays Th Rambler and Th Idler, and later with his philosophical romance Rasselas, which, though not distinguished for its action, is a cogent presentation of Johnson's moral views and his abiding theme: the vanity of human wishes and the impossibility of human happiness in an imperfect world. His literary style, often referred to as "Johnsonese," is severely balanced, Latinate, and pithy.

The monumental Dictionary of the English Language (1755) secured his reputation as a scholar and, though faulty, it was highly useful. His edition of Shakespeare (1765), historical and interpretative in approach, greatly stimulated Shakespearean scholarship. His Preface to Shakespeare is sometimes considered one of his finest pieces of prose. In defending Shakespeare for not following the "rules," he makes a good case for imaginative truth while attacking the classical unities: "The objection arising from the impossibility of passing the first hour at Alexandria, and the next at Rome, supposes, that when the play opens, the spectator really imagines himself at Alexandria, and believes that his walk to the theatre has been a voyage to Egypt, and that he lives in the days of Anthony and Cleopatra. Surely he that imagines this may imagine more."

His last years were spent in the society of other great men. Of this facet of Johnson's career—that of conversationalist—we have Boswell's Life of Samuel Johnson, LL.D., to inform us. In person slovenly, in manner abrupt and even rude, driven by fears of insanity and damnation, suffering from hypochondria, he yet emerges from Boswell's Life as a man of essential kindness, generosity, and sociability. He had married (1734) a woman 20 years his senior to whom he was devoted; her death (1752) may have caused him to seek more and more the society of men with whom he could indulge his fondness for conversation. In 1764 the Literary Club was founded, and here Johnson found an outlet for conversation; he cultivated the art consciously and even admitted that he sometimes talked for the sake of victory.

In 1773, at the age of 64, he was prodded into taking a walking tour of the Hebrides with Boswell. His account of it, A Journey to the Western Isles of Scotland (1775), is overshadowed by Boswell's The Journal of a Tour of the Hebrides with Samuel Johnson, LL.D. which is the more lively for having Johnson as its subject. His last published work, in 10 volumes, is the biographical and critical Lives of the Poets. See Hester Lynch Thrale.

Johnson Over Jordan (1939). A play about time by J. B. Priestley. Johnson, an aviator in an accident, re-experiences events from his past life.
Johnston, Mary (1870–1936). American historical novelist. She is known as the author of some of the best of the historical romances that were so popular at the beginning of the 20th century. Her second novel, To Have and to Hold, which is still read, was her most successful. It was followed by Audrey (1909). Most of her books are set in Virginia, The Long Roll (1911) and Cease Firing (1912) describing the Civil War from the Confederate point of view. Miss Johnston later became interested in mysticism, feminism, and socialism, and these found their way into such books as Silver Cross (1922).

John the Baptist. St. Patron saint of missionaries. He is so regarded because he was sent “to prepare the way of the Lord.” He baptized Jesus in the river Jordan. John the Baptist was a fearless denouncer of the sins of his contemporaries who was thrown into prison and later beheaded because he opposed Herod’s act of making away with his brother to secure his brother’s wife Herodias. For the use of this story in drama and opera, see Salome.

Joinville, Jean de (1224–1317). French chronicler. As royal seneschal he accompanied Louis XI on his first crusade (1248–1252); his Histoire de saint Louis (1305–1309) is a colorful first-person narrative of the events of the crusade and of his friendship with the king.

Jolas, Eugene (1894–1952). American editor and founder of the experimental magazine Transition. Born in Union City, N.J., Jolas spent his childhood in Lorraine. While still a youth, he returned to the U.S., worked on various newspapers, and became passionately interested in the contemporary avant-garde. He then went to Paris, where in 1927 he founded his famous magazine. A brilliant editor, trilingual from childhood, Jolas gave encouragement to numerous important writers in the 20’s and 30’s. His anthology Transition Workshop (1949) contains representative selections of the work he published and encouraged.

Joliet or Joliet, Louis (1645–1700). Canadian-born French explorer. Though intended for the priesthood, Joliet became a merchant and is remembered for his trips through the Mississippi Valley and the regions of the Gulf of St. Lawrence and Hudson Bay. See Jacques Marquette.

Jolly Beggars, The (1785, pub. 1799). A poem by Robert Burns written in the form of a cantata with recitative. It presents a series of songs by a group of beggars who tell variously of their sorrows, their wretchedness, their cynicism and disillusionments, and their scorn for the church and the nobility. The setting of the poem is “Poosie Nansie’s” disreputable inn at Mauchline. (See also The Holy Fair.) It is considered by many critics to be Burns’s most accomplished work.

Jolly Roger. See BLACK FLAG.

Jolyon. A character in John Galsworthy’s The Forsyte Saga. Young Jolyon is the most sensitive member of the Forsyte family. He marries Soames Forsyte’s former wife, Irene.

Jonah. In the Old Testament, the prophet said to have been swallowed by a whale, and the name of the Old Testament book bearing his name. Instructed by Jehovah to preach in the great but wicked city of Nineveh, he willfully took ship in another direction. When a storm arose, the sailors, after casting lots, threw Jonah into the sea to appease the deity. He was swallowed by a whale in whose belly he lived for three days until “the great fish” deposited him on dry land. He then went to Nineveh where he was the cause of widespread repentance.

Jonathan. See David.

Jonathan Wild, the Great. The Life of Mr. Jonathan Wild (1743). A novel by Henry Fielding. Jonathan Wild was a famous highwayman and receiver of stolen goods (1682–1725), but his life has little relation to this ironic satire on tyranny and political innocence. Wild is meant to be an ironic representation of Sir Robert Walpole.

Jones, Sir Henry Arthur (1851–1929). English playwright. Influenced by Ibsen, his plays deal with social relationships and social problems. Among his works are Breaking a Butterfly (1885), Saints and Sinners (1891), Michael and His Lost Angel, and Mrs. Dane’s Defense (1900).

Jones, Inigo (1573–1652). English architect. He is also well known for his designs of sets, costumes, and stage machinery for court masques written by Jonson, Heywood, and Davenant. These designs were of unprecedented elaborateness and ingenuity and had considerable influence upon later theater design. The elegance and grace of his architectural work, which was based on classical Renaissance elements, earned him the title of “the English Palladio.” Among the buildings still in existence are the Banqueting Hall at Whitehall and the Queen’s House at Greenwich.

Jones, James (1921– ). American novelist. Born in Robinson, Ill., Jones joined the U.S. army, which provided the material for his massive and forceful first novel, From Here to Eternity, that established his reputation. The book, which won a National Book Award, aroused a critical storm, many deploring the lurid language and shocking incidents, others admiring its vitality and force. His second novel, Some Came Running (1957), is concerned with the vagaries, mostly sexual, of small-town life. The Pistol (1959), a novella, and The Thin Red Line (1962), a full-length novel, are both concerned with the military.

Jones, John Paul (1747–1792). Scottish-born American naval officer, famed for his exploits in the Revolution. In a naval engagement off the coast of England (1779), Jones captured the British warship Serapis, although his own vessel, the Bonhomme Richard, was sunk. In response to a British demand for surrender during the battle, Jones is said to have replied: “I have not yet begun to fight!” He is the model for the hero of Cooper’s novel The Pilot (1823) and a prominent character in Winston Churchill’s Richard Carvel (1899).

Jones, Robert Edmond (1887–1954). American stage designer. Known for the sets he did for some of the most notable theatrical productions of the first half of the 20th century, he frequently worked with experimental troupes, among them the Washington Square Players, the Provincetown Players, the Greenwich Village Theater, and the Theatre Guild. He also was the author of The Dramatic Imagination (1941).

Jones, Lady Roderick. See Enid Bagnold.

joueurs. Medieval entertainers, including acrobats, jugglers, and exhibitors of animals as well as musicians and reciters of poetry. They entertained at the courts of the nobility, and also in public places, especially near the shrines and churches along the routes of pilgrimages. It was the joueurs who sang the chansons de geste, fabliaux, and other romances and lyrics written by the trouvères, although sometimes a jouleur was also a trouvère: that is, he would be both poet and singer-musician. Joueurs permanently employed by a court were called maistretrés or minstrels, and the security they enjoyed allowed them to devote more time to literary composition, so that by the 14th century there was considerably more specialization of function between composers and performers.

Jonson, Ben (1573–1637). English dramatist and poet. His father having died a month before his birth, Jonson was raised as the stepson of a bricklayer, and briefly entered this trade after leaving school. Though considered the most learned of the Elizabethan dramatists, his formal education seems to have been limited to his years at the Westminster School, where he was sent at the expense of his master, William Camden. He spent a short time as a soldier in the Netherlands, returned to England and, some time not later than 1592, married. During the next six years he probably existed as an actor and dramatic hack-writer, reworking old plays. His first original play, Every Man in His Humour, was performed in 1598, with Shakespeare as a member of the cast. A comedy that already gives evidence of Jonson’s brilliant gift for caricature and comic realism, it presents a group of assorted characters, each dominated—though almost possessed—by one overriding characteristic: wit, or humor. Later in 1598 Jonson killed a man in a duel, and was imprisoned and charged with manslaughter. While in prison he was converted to Catholicism, to which he adhered for 12 years. He narrowly escaped execution, but was released by benefit of clergy, forfeiting his property and receiving a brand on his left thumb. This incident, however, seemed to have few untoward effects on him, and the following year a sequel to his first play, called Every Man Out of His Humour, was produced at the Globe Theater. Less coherent in plot, and containing more blatant caricatures, it assailed the morals and foibles of the age, and contained (in response to John Marston’s satiric portrait of him in Henrici Sexti) veiled attacks on some of his fellow playwrights, Cynthia’s Revels, which followed in 1600, was a flinging down of the gauntlet in the now-raging War of the Theaters between Jonson, Marston, and Thomas Dekker. Marston and Dekker retaliated with plays satirizing Jonson, and Jonson came back into the fray with The Poetaster (1601). Dekker answered with Satromastix, or The Unrussling of the Humorous Poet in 1602, but Jonson did not take up the stage aspects of the war again. He turned to tragedy, writing the play Richard Crookbacke and Sejanus His Fall, the latter performed at the Globe in 1603. A classical tragedy dealing with the attempt of the upstart Sejanus to overthrow the Emperor Tiberius, it lacks the verve and color of his comedies and the depth of characterization and psychological insight requisite for tragedy. Jonson only essayed one more tragedy, Catiline (1611), also based on classical models.

After the accession of James I in 1603 Jonson turned most of his energies to writing masques for the new court, working for a time with the architect Inigo Jones on sets and stage effects. He developed the antimasque, a satiric or grotesque interlude juxtaposed against the imaginative and usually light-hearted content of the rest of the work. His quarrel with his fellow playwrights was evidently patched up, for in 1604 he collaborated with Dekker on The King’s Entertainment and with Marston and George Chapman on Eastward Ho in 1605. When Marston and Chapman were imprisoned because James I found some parts of the play unflattering to the Scots, Jonson voluntarily joined them.

Though his masques far outnumber his plays during the Jacobean period, the five comedies he then wrote are the crowning pieces of his dramatic career: Volpone, or the Fox (performed 1605 or 1606, printed 1607); Epiconium, or the Silent Woman (performed 1609; printed 1610); The Alchemist (1610); Bartholomew Fair (1614); and The Devil is an Ass (1616). Colorful, crowded canvases filled with all manner of contemporary English types, these comedies satirize hypocrisy and greed, exploiters and gulls, rogues and fools; and as Jonson points out in the title of the last piece, the devil himself is a mere piker compared to humankind and its capacity for mischief.

In 1616 Jonson published the first folio edition of his collected works. Two years later he went on an extended holiday to Scotland, where he visited with the Scotch poet William Drummond. From this visit came Drummond’s recollections of their Conversations at Hauorthonden, a source of many of Jonson’s opinions and an implicit portrait of the man as seen through the eyes of his friend.

The plays of Jonson’s last period never reached the heights he had achieved before, though he remained until the end of his life the greatest figure of the English stage, the acknowledged leader of the gatherings of men of letters at the Mermaid Tavern. His last plays include The Staple of News (1625); The Magnetic Lady (1632); and Tale of a Tub (1633). The lovely pastoral drama The Sad Shepherd (printed 1641), was left uncompleted at the time of his death.

A classicist who took the Roman writers for his models, a humanist who would engrat classical control and purity on English forms, and a moralist to whom the drama was a means of instruction and of criticism, Jonson both reflects the temper of his age and anticipates the more rock-ribbed classicism of the Augustan period. His poetry, notable for its balance, its control, its unadorned simplicity that is not without lyricism, prefigured the later lyrics of the 17th-century Cavalier poets, the "sons of Ben." Among his Epigrams, published in the first folio of 1616, are the two well-known poems mourning the deaths of his first daughter and his seven-year-old son; The Forrest, also in the first folio, contains the famous To Celia, beginning "Drink to me, only, with thine eyes." The second folio, published in 1640, contains Underwoods, a collection of miscellaneous poems.

Jormungard. See Midgard Serpent.

Jorocks. A famous amateur sportsman, a Cockney grocer passionately interested in the hunt, created by Robert Smirke. He appeared in Jorocks' Jaunts and Jollities, the Hunting, Shooting, Racing, Driving, Sailing, Eating, Eccentric and Extraordinary Exploits of that Renowned Sporting Citizen, Mr. John Jorocks of St. Botolph Land and Great Coram Street (1838), and other books.

Joruri. Japanese puppet theater. Developed during the Tokugawa period (1600-1868), its most important plays were written by Chikamatsu Monzaemon. The dolls are operated by puppet masters visible to the audience. The roles and narrative explanation of the story are rendered by a reciter (gidayu). Many of the same plays are used also in the kabuki theater.

Josaphat. See Barlaam.

José, Don. A Spanish officer in Bizet's opera Carmen, in love with Carmen.

Joseph. An Old Testament hero of the book of Genesis. The younger son and favorite of his father Jacob, he was hated by his 10 older brothers who sold him as a slave to a caravan going to Egypt. There, with his master Potiphar, he rose to a position of responsibility, but was maligned and imprisoned upon his refusal to respond to the advances of Potiphar's wife (Gen. 39). In time, he was set free and, as a result of his interpretations of the king's dreams, made prime minister. Pharaoh's dreams of seven lean cattle swallowing up seven fat cattle and seven lean ears of corn devouring seven full ears were said to betoken the coming of famine, and Joseph was therefore installed as food administrator. During the famine, his brothers came to Egypt to buy corn and after a dramatic series of events (see Benjamin), Joseph revealed his identity and brought about their migration to Egypt. See Joseph and His Brothers.

Joseph, St. Husband of the Virgin Mary. He is the patron saint of carpenters, because he was of that craft. In art, Joseph is represented as an aged man with a budding staff in his hand. His day is March 19.

Joseph II (1741-1790). Holy Roman Emperor (1765-1790). The son of Maria Theresa, he was called the revolutionary emperor because of his rigorous policy of social and economic reform within the Austrian dominions, which he ruled after her death in 1780.

Joseph and His Brothers (Joseph und seine Brüder; 1933-1943). A tetralogy of novels by Thomas Mann, based on the biblical story of Joseph: Die Geschicthe Jakobs (The Stories of Jacob, 1933), Der junge Joseph (Young Joseph, 1934), Joseph in Ägypten (Joseph in Egypt, 1936), and Joseph der Ernährer (Joseph the Provider, 1943). In these four thick volumes, Mann has expanded the original story tremendously, but most of the added episodes and digressions contribute not so much to the tale itself as to the characters' depth and symbolic significance. In its over-all attitude, the Joseph tetralogy is neither ambiguous like The Magic Mountain nor tragic like Doktor Faustus, but unqualifiedly redemptive. Joseph's return from the pit into which he is cast by his brothers is symbolically connected with Christ's Resurrection, among other things, and indicates the redemption of man from death, whose realm is dominant in most of Mann's earlier writing.

Joseph Andrews (1742). Hero and shortened title of The History of the Adventures of Joseph Andrews and of his friend, Mr. Abraham Adams, written in Imitation of the Manner of Cervantes, a novel by Henry Fielding. Joseph Andrews, a prudent, brawny, pleasant young man, is intended to be the brother of Samuel Richardson's heroine Pamela. His widowed employer, Lady Booby, dismisses him from his position as footman for refusing her advances, and he flees London to rejoin his own true love, Fanny Goodwill. On hearing the news of his disgrace, Fanny rushes to meet him. Both are set upon by thieves, but are providentially rescued by Parson Adams, and the three return to their parish, where Joseph and Fanny, after comic-opera reversals and discoveries, are married in triumph. The time of the novel is coincident with Pamela, which it parodies and transcends. See Mrs. Slopslop; Parson Oliver Trulliber.

Joseph of Arimathea. The rich Jew, probably a member of the Sanhedrin, who believed in Jesus but was afraid to confess it, and after the Crucifixion begged the body of Jesus and deposited it in his own tomb (Matt. 27:57-60). Legend relates that he was imprisoned for years, during which time he was kept alive miraculously by the Holy Grail, and that on his release by Vespasian, about a.d. 63, he brought to Britain the Grail and the spear with which Longinus wounded Jesus, and there founded the abbey of Glastonbury, beginning the conversion of Britain.

The origin of these legends is to be found in a group of apocryphal writings of which the Evangelio Nicodemi is the chief one. These were worked upon at Glastonbury between the 8th and 11th centuries, and were further embellished by Robert de Boron in the 13th century; the latter version was used by Malory in his Morte d'Arthur (c. 1469).

George Moore introduces Joseph of Arimathea into his novel The Brook Kerith (1915).
Josephson, Matthew (1899– ). American editor and biographer. Along with many other young writers, Josephson became an expatriate during the 1920’s. He helped to found and edit a number of little magazines, including Secession, Broom, and transition; he later served as assistant editor of the New Republic. Among his numerous biographies and books on business and politics are Zola and His Time (1928), Jean-Jacques Rousseau (1932), The Robber Barons (1934), The President Makers (1940), and Life Among the Surrealists (1962).

Josiah, Flavius. Original name, Joseph ben Matthias (a.d. 37–95). Jewish historian and general. Imbued with deep admiration for Rome and its institutions, he managed in his later years to live in the sunshine of the favor of the emperors Vespasian and Titus. This was after the defeat of his people in their revolt (a.d. 66) against the Romans in Jerusalem, in which he had taken an active part. Among his writings are History of the Jewish War (7 books in Aramaic and Greek) and Antiquities of the Jews (in 20 books).

Joshi, Gaurishankar Govardhandas. Pen name Dhumketu (1892– ). Indian novelist and dramatist in Gujerati, one of the Indian languages. He wrote more than 50 books in a wide range of styles, among them the famous Jivan-rang (Life’s Colors), an autobiography.

Joshua. In the Old Testament, the successor of Moses and the name given to the 6th book of the Old Testament. Forty years before leading the Israelites into the Promised Land, he had been one of the 12 spies who reported favorably on Canaan; he was thus one of the two Israelites whom Jehovah permitted to enter it. He was a valiant fighter who gradually conquered the land. One of his most striking exploits was his commanding the sun to stand still (Josh. 10:12–13). See Caleb.

Josiah’s Allen’s Wife. The pen name of Marietta Holley.

Josquin. Full name Josquin des Prés (c. 1440–1521). The most celebrated French composer of his day. Josquin began and ended his life in Burgundy (now Belgium), but spent much of his life in Italy, in the service of the Sforza family, and of Popes Innocent VIII and Alexander VI. He wrote secular chansons in French, but his most important works are his masses, and above all, his motets. Their style humanized the mechanical compositional practices of the 15th century, and paved the way for the great flowering of polyphony in the 16th century.

Josse. A jeweler in Molière’s comedy L’Amour Médicin. Lucinde, the young daughter of Sganarelle, pines away, and the anxious father asks his neighbors what they would advise him to do. Josse replies that he would buy the young lady a beautiful piece of jewelry. Sganarelle’s answer is, “You are a jeweler, Monsieur Josse (Vous êtesorfèvre, Monsieur Josse), and are not disinterested in your advice!”

Jötunn[heim] or Utgard (Old Norse, “outer ward”). In Norse mythology, one of the Nine Worlds, the home of the giants, situated at the northernmost edge of the universe. One of the roots of the ash tree Yggdrasill extends into it.

Jotun, Maria (1880– ). Finnish novelist, short-story writer, and playwright. She is best known for her plays, which blend humor with psychological insight and are cleverly constructed. Klaas Louhikon Herra (Klaas, the Master of Louhi), 1941) received a Finnish drama award; other plays include Mikheen Kylikatu (1914), Kaltainen vanikka (1918), and Kudrin prinssi (1932).

Jouhandeau, Marcel (1888– ). Pen name: Marcel Provence. French fiction writer, essayist, dramatist. Among the novels that give a bitterly introspective and cynical account of his own married life are Monsieur Godeau intime (1926), Monsieur Godeau marié (1933), and Chroniques martiales (1938). Cruel portraits of his town are painted in Les Térébintes (1926), and Chaminadour (3 vols., 1934–1941). His short stories include Astaroth (1929), L’Amateur d’imprudence (1932), and Else (1933).

Jourdain, Monsieur. The title character of Molière’s Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme. He is the prototype of the bourgeois who, elevated by sudden wealth to the upper ranks, makes himself ridiculous by his attempts to imitate a gentleman’s manners and accomplishments. Much of the fun of the play derives from the awkward figure M. Jourdain cuts as the pupil of dancing and fencing masters and professors of philosophy. One of his remarks is especially noted: he expresses his astonishment that he has been talking prose all his life and that he never knew it till his professor told him.

Journal of a Voyage to Lisbon, The (1755). A prose account of a voyage to Portugal made by Henry Fielding to recover his health; it is Fielding’s last published work.

Journal of the Plague Year, A (1722). A famous account of the epidemic of bubonic plague in England during the summer and fall of 1665 by Daniel Defoe. It purports to be an eyewitness report by a resident of London named “H. F.,” and is remarkable in its convincingness as such, considering the fact that Defoe was only five years old when the plague ravaged London. Some of the details, such as the bell-man ringing his bell and calling, “Bring out your dead,” seem more authentic than the original accounts reported in such works as the Diary of Samuel Pepys.

Journal to Stella. A private diary kept by Jonathan Swift from 1710 to 1713 in the form of letters addressed to “Stella,” Swift’s name for his friend Esther Johnson. Stella being the Latin word for star, the name was fancifully arrived at from equating this with the Greek word for star, aster, and Esther. The journal reveals the author’s hopes, anxieties, social life, political intrigues. Baby talk sprinkles the correspondence. See PTT; PRESTO.

Journey’s End (1929). A play by Robert Cedric Sheriff. It is set in the British trenches of World War I. The three main characters are Stanhope, the once idealistic school-hero of 18-year-old Raleigh who has just come to the front and Osborne, a former teacher. In the course of the play both Osborne and the boy are killed. Stanhope is still alive, but drinks constantly to calm his shattered nerves and to hide his constant fear.

Journey’s End played successfully in England and America.

Journey to the End of the Night (Voyage au bout de la nuit; 1932). A novel by Louis Ferdinand Céline, about the driftings of the cynical Ferdinand in World War I and afterward. The work
Jouve, Pierre Jean

caused a scandal by the coarseness of its language and the violence of its despairing pessimism.

Jouve, Pierre Jean (1887– ). French poet, novelist, and critic. At first closely associated with the Abbaye Group, influenced by Unanimism and Roman Rolland, Jouve wrote stories of the war and poems of pacifist protest against it. His early poetry was collected in Heures (1919, 1920) and Tragiques (1923). In 1924 he turned to Catholicism and to Freudian psychoanalysis. The resultant energetic mingling of religious and sexual imagery produced his best work: the poems of Les Noces (1928); Le Paradis perdu (1929); Suer de Sang (1933); Kyrié (1938); and the novels Paulina 1880 (1925); Le Monde désert (1926); Histoires sanglantes (1931); and La Scène capitale (1935).

Jouvet, Louis (1885–1951). French actor, director, and producer. Jouvet worked with Jacques Copeau in the Théâtre du Vieux-Colombier before becoming the director of the Comédie des Champs-Elysées in 1924, and establishing his own company at the Théâtre de l' Athénée in 1934. In the drama he sought to achieve a blend of the intellect and the fancy, through the skillful use of light to focus upon the inner drama, combined with stylized staging and acting. Plays by Jules Romains, Marcel Archard, and Jean Giraudoux were produced at his theater, as well as imaginative interpretations of Mollière.

Jove. Another name for Jupiter.

Jovellanos, Gaspar Melchor de (1744–1811). Spanish statesman, economist, and man of letters. Appointed a magistrate in Seville (1767) and in Madrid (1778), he was banished to his native Asturias in 1790 because of his progressive views. He returned from exile to serve briefly as minister of justice, only to fall from favor again. From 1801 to 1808 he was a prisoner in Majorca. Refusing to collaborate with the Bonapartists, he was a prominent member of the Central Junta and helped convene the Cortes of Cadiz.

His finest work is the well-known Informe sobre la ley agraria (1794), ostensibly a report on a projected code of agrarian law, but in reality an enlightened program for extensive economic reform. In Defensa de la Junta Central (1810), he outlined his moderate political ideas.

Jovellanos also wrote verse in the classical tradition. His best poems are probably his didactic and philosophical satires, notably A Arnesto, sátira contra la mala educación de la nobleza y El estado de España, bajo el gobierno de Godoy. His play El delincuente honrado (1794) introduced lachrymose comedy in the manner of Diderot to Spain. His other works include Elogio de las bellas artes (1782), an evaluation of medieval Spanish art, and Pelayo (1792), a tragedy.

Jovial Crew, The, or The Merry Beggars (1641). A comedy by Richard Brome. The fears of the wealthy and kindly Squires Oldrents are realized when his two daughters, Rachel and Meriel, along with their sweethearts and Oldrent's trusted steward, Springlove, run off to join a band of roving beggars. However, the girls are soon discomfited and return with the steward, who proves to be the squire's illegitimate son.

Joyce, James (1882–1941). Irish novelist, short story writer, and poet. He is regarded as one of the greatest literary talents of the 20th century, and is known for his revolutionary innovations in the art of the novel. Joyce's technical innovations include an extensive use of the interior monologue (see Stream of Consciousness) and other experimental narrative techniques; the use, in Finnegans Wake, of a unique language of invented words, puns, and complex allusions; and the use of a complex network of symbolic parallels drawn from mythology, history, and literature. Joyce is also famous for his detailed rendering of Dublin life, his objective presentation of organic functions, his extraordinary psychological penetration, his robust humor, and his sensitivity to auditory impressions (he had a lifelong passion for vocal music). Before other writers had imitated his techniques and critics had explained his methods, his books were denounced as obscure, unintelligible, nonsensical, and obscene.

Joyce was raised in the kind of environment that might be least expected to produce a revolutionary genius. Son of an ordinary, chronically insolvent civil servant and a conventionally pious mother, and eldest of a family of 10 children, Joyce's youth was marked by poverty and the struggle to maintain solid middle-class respectability. He was educated at a succession of excellent Jesuit schools, where he received a thorough training in Catholic and scholastic doctrines and in several languages. Joyce's rebellion against his family background, against Catholicism, and against Irish nationalism (see The Day of the Rattleman), are described in his largely autobiographical novel, A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man. "I will not serve that in which I no longer believe," says the hero, Stephen Dedalus, "whether it call itself my home, my fatherland, or my church; and I will try to express myself in some mode of life or art as freely as I can, using for my defence the only arms I allow myself to use—silence, exile, and cunning." In 1902 the 20-year-old Joyce left Dublin to spend the rest of his life in exile in Paris, Trieste, Rome, and Zurich, with only an occasional brief visit to Ireland. But the world he had rejected remained basic to all his writing. From the short stories in Dubliners to Finnegans Wake, his subject matter is the city of Dublin, its streets, topography, history, and residents, and, to a somewhat lesser extent, biographical details of his own childhood and youth. The Catholicism he had rebelled against remained so ingrained in him that its doctrines and methods of thought, its symbolism and scholasticism, strongly colors all his writings.

Always an admirer of Ibsen, Joyce's earliest publication was an essay on Ibsen's New Drama in the Fortnightly Review of 1900. He also wrote two collections of poems, Chamber Music and Pomes Penyeach (1922), and a play, Exiles.

Joyce had a difficult life. In 1904 he ran away to Trieste with Nora Barnacle, an almost entirely uneducated Dublin chambermaid, whom he met on June 16 of that year (the same day on which the action of Ulysses takes place). On account of his antireligious principles they were not married until many years later. With their two children they wandered about Europe, while Joyce earned an inadequate living teaching languages and doing clerical work; he earned almost nothing from his writings until his last years. His poor eyesight deteriorated until he was almost blind; like Milton, he had to depend in his work on memory and the secretarial help of friends. His books were banned by censors, pirated by publishers, and misunderstood by the public. His much-loved daughter became insane and had to be confined in an institution.

A perfectionist who sought to fill his mature work with the work of complex internal echoes and allusions, Joyce toiled long hours at his writing and repeatedly revised and polished his work: Ulysses required seven years to complete (1914–1921), and Finnegans Wake, which was known until its publication as Work in Progress, took 17 years (1922– 1939).

Joyeuse. The name given to Charlemagne's sword in medieval romances.

Joyous Gard (Fr., La Joyeuse Garde). In Mal-ory's Morte d'Arthur (c. 1469), the castle of Sir Laun-celot. It was given to him by King Arthur for defending Queen Guinevere's honor against Sir Mador.
It is supposed to have been at or near Berwick-on-Tweed, but the Arthurian topography is very indefinite.

Juana Inés de la Cruz, Sor. Religious name of Juana Inés de Asbaje y Ramírez (1651–1695). Mexican poet and dramatist. Sor Juana's love for knowledge, the quality that governed her entire life, first became evident at the age of three when she coaxed her sister's tutor into teaching her how to read. Her intelligence and learning attracted wide attention, and at 14 she became lady-in-waiting to the viceroy's wife. When a panel of 40 scholars and theologians questioned her to determine whether her wisdom came from God, she emerged from the ordeal, as the viceroy reported, like a galleon harried by shallops. Her zeal for study led her to com-template becoming a nun, though some have maintained, on the basis of the love poetry that she was writing at the time, that a blighted romance was another cause. After a short and unsuccessful stay in a Carmelite convent at the age of 16, she took her final vows in the Order of St. Jerome in 1669. In the convent, Sor Juana continued her studies despite the opposition of some prelates.

Sor Juana's literary production was merely one facet of her intellectual activity. She has described her surprise on learning that not everyone wrote poetry; her own verse, while revealing great technical vulnerability and some gongoristic traits, is on the whole as unaffected and spontaneous as the scientific deductions she made while watching an egg fry or the spinning of a top. Among her most famous poems are the redondillas, or quatrains, in which she "rationally describes the irrational effects of love and those in which she censures men for being critical of qualities in women that they themselves have causd. Primer sueto, a long poem modelled on Góngora's Soledades (1627), is an analysis of sleep, describing how man's soul is dazzled at night by its vision of the universe and tries unsuccessfully to comprehend its laws. For church holidays she wrote numerous villancicos, or carols, and autos sacra-tales, or one-act religious plays, the most notable of which are El divino Narciso (1692) and El cetro de José (1692). Her plays include the comedies Los emperadores de una casa, written between 1680 and 1686, and Amor es más laberinto, written in 1688 with Juan de Guevara. Of her extant prose pieces, the best known is the Respuesta a Sor Filotea (1691), a rebuttal to clerical criticism, in which she discusses her devotion to learning and her difficulties in overcoming the hardships inflicted on her sex.

Juan de la Cruz, San. See John of the Cross, St.

Juan Manuel, Infante Don (1282–1349). Spanish statesman and writer. A nephew of Alfonso X, Juan Manuel was an important political figure as well as an outstanding prose writer. His masterpiece is El Conde Lucanor or Libro de Patronio; completed about 1335, it is a collection of 50 "exemplary tales," some of oriental origin, which illustrate the counsels of Patronio to his pupil, Count Lucanor. His other extant works include Libro de los estados, which contains an adaptation of the story of Barlaam and Josaphat, and Libro del caballero y del escudero, a treatise on chivalry and encyclopedia of medieval knowledge.

A full-blooded Zapotec Indian, Juárez became the leader of La Reforma, a liberal, anticlerical movement for political, economic, and social reform.
Named president in 1857, he fought the French-supported regime of Maximilian, whom he defeated in 1867, and ruled Mexico until his death. Though La Reforma was at best a qualified success, Juárez occupies a place in Mexican hagiography similar to that held by Lincoln in the U.S.

Juárez und Maximilian (1924). A play by Franz Werfel. It is about the rising of Mexican patriots to throw off the rule of the Austrian emperor Maximilian. Werfel concentrates more on the luckless emperor than on the Mexicans, and the play ends with his execution and funeral.

Jubal. In the Old Testament, the son of Lamech and Adah. As "father of all such as handle the harp and organ" (Gen. 4:21), he is said to have invented wind and stringed instruments. George Eliot has a narrative poem of this title (1874).

Jubilee. In Jewish history, the year of jubilee was every fiftieth year, which was held sacred in commemoration of the deliverance from Egypt. In this year the fields were allowed to lie fallow, land that had passed out of the possession of those to whom it had originally belonged was restored to them, and all who had been obliged to let themselves out for hire were released from bondage. The year of jubilee was proclaimed with trumpets of ram's horn, and takes its name from Hebrew yobel, "a ram's horn."

Judah. In the Old Testament, the 4th son of Jacob; also, the name of the most powerful of the 12 tribes of Israel. After the death of Solomon, king of Israel, 10 tribes seceded under Jeroboam, and the remaining kingdom, with its capital at Jerusalem, was known thereafter as Judah.

Judas Iscariot. The disciple who betrayed Jesus.
Judas' specific act of betrayal was to cause the arrest of Jesus by the Roman soldiery by identifying him with a kiss in the Garden of Gethsemane. He was paid for this act 30 pieces of silver. Matthew (27:3–10) records that Judas returned the money to the Jewish priests and then hanged himself (see Acelldama). The version in Acts (1:16–20) has Judas dying by "falling headlong" after which "he burst asunder . . . and all his bowels gushed out."
Judas is known as one of the blackest villains in history. Dante in the Inferno places Judas in the mouth of Satan. There are numerous allusions to his crime in figures of speech: a Judas kiss, 30 pieces of silver, and the name itself all signify treachery and deception.

There have also been many attempts to explain the motives of Judas. Early Christians felt that Judas acted as he did for the silver; however, the amount he was paid was not any great fortune, 30 pieces being about the price of one slave. Modern theorists feel that Judas was dissatisfied with Jesus' actions and wanted to force him into a situation where he would have to assert his divine powers and establish a glorious new order on earth. If this was the case it is obvious that Judas had no understanding of Jesus' message or ministry.

Judas Maccabaeus. The Hebrew patriot who gained decisive victories against the Syrians. In 165 B.C., he entered Jerusalem and reconsecrated the Temple; Hanukkah, the Jewish feast of dedication, commemorates this event. See Maccabees.

Jude, St. One of the 12 disciples, also known as Thaddeus. He is represented in art with a club or staff, and a carpenter's square, in allusion to his trade. His day is October 28. According to tradition, he was shot to death by arrows in Armenia.

Jude, The General Epistle of. A New Testament book. It is a general letter denouncing heretical teaching. The identity of the author is not known definitely. One of Jesus' half brothers was called Jude; some scholars feel that he was also the apostle Jude.

Jude the Obscure (1895). Thomas Hardy's tragic last novel. This story dramatizes the conflict between carnal and spiritual life, tracing Jude Fawley's life from his boyhood aspirations of intellectual achievement to his miserable, early death. His passions entangle him in marriage with Arabella, an insensitively materialistic woman who gives birth to a son, but then deserts them both. Jude then falls in love with his cousin, Sue Bridehead, an intelligent, sensitive, high-sounding girl. She marries the decaying schoolteacher, Phillotson, but, finding him physically repellant, she flees to Jude. They both obtain divorces, but Sue, guilt-ridden over her desertion of her husband, cannot bring herself to take the step of marrying Jude, so they live together and have children, scorned by society. "Because there were too many," the children are killed by Arabella's son, a grotesque boy also named Jude, who subsequently hangs himself. Broken by this tragedy, Sue goes back to Phillotson and Jude returns to Arabella. Soon thereafter Jude dies.

Judges. A book of the Old Testament. An historical account of the tribes of Israel between the times of Joshua and Samuel (c. 1225-1020 B.C.). The Israelites had just invaded Canaan; the book tells of their attempts to subdue the former inhabitants and settle the land. Parts of the book are contemporaneous with the events; the rest are later additions. Judges had its present form by 500 B.C.

Judgment Day. See Stude Lonsigan.

Judgment of Paris, The. A mythological beauty contest of goddesses. It led to the Trojan War. Angry at not having been invited to the famous wedding of Theseus, Eris, the goddess of discord, threw into the gathering a golden apple bearing the inscription "For the fairest." It was claimed by Hera, Athena, and Aphrodite. They took it to Paris, a son of Priam, who was then a shepherd on the slopes of Mount Ida. As the handsomest man in the world, he was regarded as an authority. Hera promised him greatness, Athena warlike prowess, and Aphrodite the love of the world's most beautiful woman in return for his vote. He awarded the apple to Aphrodite, and won for his pains the disastrous love of Helen. This famous subject was a favorite with artists both in classical times and the Renaissance.

Judith. A legendary Jewish heroine of Bethulia whose story is told in the Apocryphal book bearing her name. To deliver her native city from the onslaught of Holofernes, general of the Assyrian king Nebuchadnezzar, she entered his camp and slew him in his drunken sleep. When she showed the head of Holofernes to her countrymen, they rushed on the invading army and put it to complete rout. In his tragedy Judith (1841), Friedrich Hebbel deepens the story's psychological complexity by having Judith become intimate with Holofernes before murdering him. Jean Giraudoux adapted the story for his play Judith (1931).

Judo. See jujitsu.

Judson, E[dward] Z[ane] C[arroll]. Pen name, Ned Buntline (1823-1886). American adventurer and dime novelist. Judson's career was more incredible than any of the 400 dime novels he is said to have written. He was an inveterate duelist, led the Astor Place riots against the English actor Macready, was an organizer of the nativistic Know-Nothing Party, and during the Civil War was dismissed from the Union army for drunkenness.

In the meantime, he was a prolific writer of dime novels, a genre that he is credited with originating. Some he published in a magazine he founded, Ned Buntline's Own; later he worked for the publishing firm of Beadle & Adams. On a trip to the West he met William F. Cody and wrote a play, The Scout of the Plains (1872) for him; it was Judson who named the famous scout Buffalo Bill. Judson also wrote hymns and lectured on temperance.

He undoubtedly had an astonishing knack with words and once wrote a novel of more than 600 pages in 62 hours. His dime novels have become collector's items. A few characteristic titles are Magdalena, The Beautiful Mexican Maid (1847), The Black Avenger (1847), and Stella Delormer, or, The Comanche's Dream (1860).

Juggernaut or Jagannath. A Hindu deity, literally "Lord of the World." His temple is at Puri, in Orissa, eastern India. Juggernaut is regarded as the remover of sin, and his image is on view three days in the year. The first day is the Rathayatra, or the Pilgrimage of the Bath, when the image is washed. Ten days later the image is taken in its chariot to a nearby temple. It was formerly erroneously supposed that on this day, known as the Rathayatra or the Journey by Chariot, fanatical devotees threw themselves beneath the wheels of the enormous, decorated chariot, in the hope that they would attain moksha or liberation from the cycle of birth and rebirth. Hence, the phrase the car of Juggernaut is used of customs, institutions, and traditions beneath which people are ruthlessly and unnecessarily crushed.

jujitsu. Literally "soft art." A Japanese system of self-defense without weapons. It is based entirely on the principle that the opponent's own (superior) strength can be used to defeat him. A jujitsu expert is able to nullify his attacker, not by meeting strength with strength, but by using specialized applications of momentum, balance, and leverage to disable or paralyze. Ju do is a refined, modern version of jujitsu. Both are practiced as sports in Japan.

Jukes, The, a Study in Crime, Pauperism, Disease and Heredity (1877). A report of the New York Prison Association by Richard Louis Dugdale (1841–1883). The subjects are the descendants of several sisters who lived in New York toward the end of the 18th century. The study is a sociological companion to fictional studies of the decline and fall of families.

Julia. In Shakespeare's Two Gentlemen of Verona, the faithful love of Proteus. She follows him to Milan, disguised as a page, forgives him his inconstancy, and finally wins him back.

Julia de Roubigoué (1777). A sentimental and theatrical novel by Henry Mackenzie modeled upon Jean Jacques Rousseau's Nouvelle Héloïse. Although she loves Savillon, Julia is forced to marry the count de Montaubon. Misunderstanding and groundless jealousy bring tragedy to them all.

Julian, surnamed the Apostate. Full Latin name, Flavius Claudius Julianus (A.D. 331–363). Roman emperor, nephew of Constantine the Great. Although educated in monastic schools, Julian renounced Christianity when he became emperor (361). He attempted to drive out Christianity and to reinstate a polytheism based on Neoplatonic philosophy. He was, however, killed fighting in Persia before he could carry through his plans.

Julian calendar. See Julius Caesar.

Julian emperors. A collective name for the Roman emperors Augustus, Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, and Nero, as members by birth or adoption of the family of Julius Caesar. As a member of the Julia gens, or clan, Julius Caesar traced his ancestry back to Julius, son of Aeneas; Vergil chose Aeneas as the hero of his great, nationalistic epic, the Aeneid, for this reason.

Caesar, a family name of the Julia gens, was assumed as a surname by Augustus as Julius Caesar's adopted son, and from him was handed down to all the Julian emperors either by adoption or by female descent. Though the Caesar family became extinct with the death of Nero, subsequent emperors retained the name Caesar as part of their title. The name survived to the 20th century in the forms of Czar and Kaiser.

Julie ou la Nouvelle Héloïse. See NOUVELLE HÉLOÏSE, JULIE OU LA.

Juliet. The passionate young heroine of Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet. The love of this wildly romantic girl for Romeo, the son of her father's bitterest enemy, brings about her own death and that of her lover. Strong in spirit, she refuses to marry the husband that her family chooses and secretly weds Romeo. Her speeches contain some of Shakespeare's most beautiful and famous poetry:

O Romeo, Romeo wherefore art thou Romeo? Deny thy father, and refuse thy name; Or, of thou wilt not, be but sworn my love, And I'll no longer be a Capulet . . .

Ol be some other name; What's in a name? that which we call a rose By any other name would smell as sweet.

(2) In Shakespeare's Measure for Measure, the gentle, loyal betrothed of Claudio. Her pregnancy is the cause of Claudio's imprisonment for immorality.

Julius II, Pope. See DELLA ROBBIAM.

Julius Caesar (c. 1599). A tragedy by William Shakespeare. It deals with the conspiracy against Julius Caesar, his assassination, and the defeat of the conspirators by Marc Antony and Octavius Caesar.

The crafty and ambitious Cassius, envious of Caesar's political and military triumphs, forms a conspiracy against him. Although Brutus, a man of great integrity, loves Caesar, he is persuaded to join the conspiracy by Cassius, who argues that Caesar's power is a threat to Rome's freedom. Ignoring the entreaties of his wife, Calpurnia, who has dreamed of his death, Caesar goes to the Senate on the Ides of March and is assassinated by the conspirators. When Antony discovers Caesar's body, he feigns friendliness towards the conspirators and asks only that he be allowed to speak at Caesar's funeral. His oration so inflames the people that the assassins are driven out of Rome. Antony, joined by Lepidus and Octavius, engages the conspirators in battle at Philippi. Cassius' rash suicide weakens the army and turns the tide of battle. Brutus is routed and falls on his own sword rather than be taken captive.

July Revolution (1830). An uprising (July 27–29) of the people of France against the reactionary Bourbon dynasty. The newspapers, protesting the abolition of freedom of the press, fanned the fires of the insurrection. After some fighting in barricaded streets King Charles X, abdicated. The Bourbon-Orléans line then succeeded to the throne in the person of Louis Philippe, "the citizen-king."

Jung, Carl Gustav (1875–1961). Swiss psychologist and author. Jung received his M.D. degree from the University of Basel in 1900. He then attended lectures by the pioneer French psychologist Pierre Janet at the Salpetrière at Paris and worked with Eugen Bleuler, head of the Zurich school of the new depth-psychology. In 1909 he and Sigmund Freud, the head of the Vienna School, traveled to Clark University in Worcester, Mass., to lecture and receive honorary degrees. He broke with Freud four years later, not because he differed with the master in fundamentals but because Freud could not agree with some of the applications which Jung was beginning to see for psychology. In 1912, Jung had published Wandlungen und Symbole der Libido (Psychology of the Unconscious, Engl. trans., 1916; revised for the Collected Works as Vol. 5, Symbols of Transformation), in which he presented several concepts alien to Freudian psychology. For Jung, the term "libido" itself signified a wider area than for Freud. Perhaps the most significant and important departure from orthodox Freudianism was Jung's theory of the collective unconscious advanced in this work. According to this concept, mankind shares a common and inborn unconscious life, not limited to the experience of any one individual, which is expressed in dreams, fantasies, and mythologies in the form of archetypal images and symbols. Among other of Jung’s many contributions to psychology are his formulation of introvert and extravert types (found in Psychological Types, 1923), his development of analytical psychology, his use of the association method, and his extensive work on symbology. An 18-volume edition of Jung’s collected works is now in preparation by the Bollingen Foundation.

Jung Deutsch (Young Germany). A German literary movement of about 1830–1848. Its name was coined by Ludolf Wiener. He and the other important authors in the movement, Laube, Gutzkow, and Mundt, did not actually constitute a group until their names were linked in a Prussian edict (1835) prohibiting their writings. Their principal desire was to break away from the idealism that had characterized most previous German literature in the 19th century, for they felt that every literary work should take a stand on the real political and social problems of the day. Specifically, they advocated freedom of thought—which was by no means a fact under the oppressive Prussian and Austrian regimes of the time—emanicipation of women, and frequently, free love. See Heinrich Heine; Biedermeier.

Jünger, Ernst (1895– ). German novelist and essayist. His works show the influence of existentialism, especially the philosophy of Martin Heidegger. His best-known novel is Auf den Marmorklippen (On the Marble Cliffs), 1939.

Jungfrau von Orleans, Die. See Maid of Orleans, The.

Jungle, The (1906). A novel by Upton Sinclair. Seldom has a book been the subject of more widespread discussion than this appallingly grim account of life in the Chicago stockyards. It depicts with vivid and brutal realism the experiences of a Slavic immigrant, Jurgis Rudkus, and his wife, Ona. Jurgis becomes debased and then, in accordance with Sinclair’s own creed, turns to socialism as a way out.

Jungle Books, The (1894–1895). A series of animal stories for children in two volumes by Rudyard Kipling. The central figure is the human Mowgli, brought up by Mother Wolf and instructed in the lore of the jungle.

Junius Letters. A series of anonymous letters, the authorship of which has never been finally settled, which appeared in Woodfall’s Public Advertiser in London from January, 1769 to January, 1772. Junius was apparently an ardent Whig partisan of the Grenville faction and a bitter opponent of the administrations of the duke of Grafton and Lord North. His daring address to the king brought a libel suit against his printer, but a London jury refused to convict him. The author himself said, “I am the sole depository of my secret, and it shall die with me.”

The letters were probably written by Sir Philip Francis (1740–1818), but many other authors have been suggested.

Junker. A member of the landed aristocracy of Germany, particularly east of the Elbe. The Junkers gained ascendancy in Prussia during the early 18th century, when they represented a political philosophy of competent, military oligarchy, but with the development of the German national state in the 19th century, the Junkers became political and social reactionaries. It was not until after World War II that their large estates were redistributed.

Juno. In Roman mythology, the wife of Jupiter and queen of the gods. Like her Greek counterpart, Hera, she was the special protectress of marriage and of women. In Virgil’s Aeneid, she is represented as the bitter foe of the exiled Trojans.

The Junonian bird was the peacock, dedicated to the goddess-queen.

Juno and the Paycock (1924). A comedy by Sean O’Casey. Again the background of the Irish Civil War of 1922, the action concerns the attempt of Juno Boyle to overcome the triple menace of war, poverty, and drunkenness which result in the destruction of her family. Juno’s heroic posture, which is defined in terms of her unillusioned, long-suffering grasp of reality, is contrasted to that of her husband, the “Paycock,” a vain, posturing—but extremely funny—weakling who hides from reality behind a bottle and a flow of fine language. The initial production, which starred Sara Allgood as Juno and Barry Fitzgerald as the husband, represented one of the finest triumphs of the Abbey Theatre.

junta (Sp.). In Spain, a council or legislative assembly other than the Cortes, which may be summoned either for the whole country, for one of its separate parts, or for some special object only. The most famous is that called together by Napoleon in 1808.

Junto. In English history, a faction of Whigs who exerted great influence during the reigns of William III and Queen Anne. The name was first applied to the advisors of Charles I. The word is a corruption of junta.

Jupiter or Jupitter (from early Lat., Díespiter, “Father of the sky”). The ancient Italian sky-god and the supreme deity of Roman mythology, also known as Jove and corresponding roughly to the Greek Zeus. He was the special protector of Rome and, as Jupiter Capitoline—his temple being on the Capitol hill—presided over the Roman games. He knew and could influence the course of history and made known the future to man by means of signs in the heavens, by the flight of birds, and, most awesomely, by the stroke of his lightning bolt.

Jurgen (1919). A novel by James Branch Cabell. This book, which became a cause célèbre and gave the author popular fame, forms part of an elaborate series of novels laid in the imaginary realm called Poitsme. Jurgen, a middle-aged pawnbroker, is married to a nagging wife who suddenly disappears. Jurgen goes in search of her, but actually he is in quest of his own lost youth. By magical dispensation, he finds himself 21 again and sets out on a series of strange adventures, including visits to Heaven and Hell, in which he meets a lost sweetheart and encounters a host of mythical persons. At the end he returns home, finds his wife there, and is glad to be a middle-aged, henpecked husband again.

Jusserand, Jean Jules (1855–1932). French writer, diplomat, and student of English literature and history. He was minister at Washington, D.C. (1902–1925), and the only non-American ever to head the American Historical Society. In 1917 he received the Pulitzer prize in History for his With Americans of Past and Present Days.

Justice (1910). A drama of social protest by John Galsworthy. A young lawyer’s clerk, William Falder, forges a check in order to secure funds to free the woman he loves from her husband’s cruelty. He serves a three-year prison sentence; on his release, his struggle to live down his past ends in tragedy. The play’s title is ironic. Although Falder is treated justly according to the law, he is in fact treated very inhumanely by his employers, the court, the prison officials, and, on his release, by almost everybody. A basically good man, he is destroyed by society and “justice.” Galsworthy’s play was influential in the reform of English prison administration.

Justine (1791). A novel by the Marquis de Sade, celebrating a sexually persecuted heroine.

Justine. See Alexandria Quartet, The.

Justianian I. Called Justinian the Great. Full Latin name, Flavius Anicius Justinianus (483–565). Emperor of the Byzantine Empire (527–565) during its most brilliant period. He married Theodora (525). In 531 he bought a peace treaty with the Persians. In the West his generals Belisarius and Narses destroyed the Vandal kingdom in Africa and defeated the Ostrogoths in Italy, retaking Rome in 536.

Justinian’s reign is highlighted by the amount of building that took place in the Empire (Sant’ Apollinare in Classe and San Vitale, both in Ravenna, and Santa Sophia in Constantinople) and the code of laws he had published, the Corpus Juris Civilis, now called the Justinian Code. This codification is the foundation of the Roman law still used in many European countries.

Just So Stories (1902). Children’s animal stories written and illustrated by Rudyard Kipling, giving amusing and fanciful answers to such questions as why the leopard has spots or the elephant a trunk.

Jutland, Battle of. One of the greatest naval battles in history. It was fought in 1916 off Jutland peninsula between the German and British fleets. It won for England the undisputed control of the North Sea. Curiously it was the British fleet that sustained the heavier casualties.

Juvenal. Full Latin name, Decimus Junius Juvenalis (A.D. 60?–?140). Satirist of Roman vices under the Empire. Of his life little is known, although most early accounts agree that he spent some time in military service and ended his life in exile for having criticized a popular stage performer who was a special favorite of the emperor Domitian. He is the author of 16 satires, divided traditionally into 5 books. In these biting attacks on public manners and morals Juvenal shows himself to have been a sharp observer of his fellow men. “Whatever men do,” he announces in his first satire, “their devotion, their fear, their rage, their pleasure, their joys, their conversations—all these will make up the potpourri of my little work”; and he fulfills his pledge with the bitter gusto of an inspired cynic. Unlike Horace, the other great satirist of Roman letters, Juvenal seldom places himself among the foolish, the corrupt, and the frustrated; and while Horace’s satires are conversational in tone and meter, Juvenal’s are tight, rhetorical, and finely polished. He excels in sketching memorable vignettes and small portraits etched in vitriol. His satires abound in witty observations and terse proverbs, among which is the motto mens sana in corpore sano, “a sound mind in a sound body.”
K

K., Joseph. The hero of Kafka's The Trial. His initial, like that of K. in The Castle, is the same as Kafka's. This is an example of the way Kafka often introduces elements of himself into his works behind the mask of a character. See Gregor Samsa.

ka. In Egyptian mythology, a double that survived after a man's death if a statue of him were made into which it might enter and certain other rites were performed. Such a statue, placed usually near the mummy in the tomb, came to be called a ka.

Kaaba (Arabic kabah, a square house). The holiest shrine of the Muslims. Located at Mecca, in the center of the Great Mosque, it is said to have been built first by Adam, who received pardon there 200 years after his expulsion from Paradise, and re-built by Ishmael and Abraham after the Flood. In the northeast corner is the famous black stone. See Hajar-al-Aswad.

Kabale und Liebe (Love and Intrigue, 1784). A bourgeois tragedy by Friedrich Schiller. The theme is the love across social barriers of Luise Miller, a musician's daughter, and Ferdinand von Walther, an aristocrat. Ferdinand's father opposes their love, and following the advice of a jealous schemer at court, unwittingly causes the lovers' death.

Kabir, Humayan (1906- ). Indian man of letters. Born in Bengal, he was educated at Calcutta and Oxford universities. From 1938 to 1963 he was minister of scientific research and cultural affairs in the Indian government. He wrote Men and Rivers (1942), a novel, and edited Green and Gold (1960), an anthology of Bengali writing.

kabuki. Japanese theater. Developed together with joruri during the Tokugawa period (1600-1688), it catered to the tastes of the newly arisen merchant class. Kabuki plays are either historical dramas or domestic works, performed by male actors only. The greatest Kabuki playwright was Chikamatsu Monzaemon, who wrote originally for joruri and whose plays were later rewritten for kabuki presentation. Kabuki is still performed extensively today.

Kaddish (Aram., "holy"). In Judaism, the prayer recited to hallow the name of God. Since medieval times, it has been repeated by mourners as a declaration of their faith. It is used in the synagogue to close a section of the service.

Kadr, Al. The night on which the Koran was sent down to Muhammad. Al Kadr is supposed to be the seventh of the last ten nights of Ramadan, or the night between the 23rd and 24th days of the month.

Kaf, Mount. In Muslim myth, the huge mountain that served as the chief dwelling place of the Jinn. According to legend, the earth was sunk in its middle. Its foundation is the emerald Sakhrat, the reflection of which gave the azure hue to the sky.

from Kaf to Kaf. From one extremity of the earth to the other. The sun was supposed to rise from one of its eminences and to set on the opposite.

Kaffir (Arab., "infidel"). A term of contempt for non-Muslims, chiefly in Africa. Hence the name came to be applied in the Western languages to either all or some of the Bantu races in Southern Africa, including the Zulus of Natal.

Kafka, Franz (1883-1924). Bohemian writer of Jewish descent. He is known especially for the unique visionary character of his novels, stories, parables, and sketches, all written in German. His thought is related to that of Soren Kierkegaard, and his writings center on the problematic existence of modern man.
In them, a world of absurdity and paradox, of aimlessness and futility, and sometimes of faint hope, is revealed just beneath the surface of the everyday world. Specific problems Kafka explores, mainly through symbolism and allegory, include the utter incomprehensibility of God and the psychological ambivalence of family relationships, especially between father and son. His own strained family life, as well as his intense personal concern with religious problems, undoubtedly contributed much of the material for his work. But despite the atmosphere of human misery and futility that pervades most of his writing, Kafka did not entirely lack comic detachment, and he often shows a fine sense of humor. His style is remarkably precise and lucid, despite the grotesque unreality of the occurrences that it is used to describe, and his stories, in their combination of clarity and unreality, have often been compared to dreams. Less than one quarter of Kafka's entire production consists of finished works, the most famous of which are the stories, The Judgment (Das Urteil; 1913), The Metamorphosis, and In the Penal Colony (In der Strafkolonie; 1919). When he died of tuberculosis, all his unfinished writings, including the three novels, The Trial, The Castle, and Amerika, were left in manuscript form with his friend Max Brod with orders that they be burned, but Brod preserved and edited them.

Kahn, Gustave (1859–1936). French poet. A member of the school of symbolists, Kahn, with Jules Laforgue, is considered to be the originator of vers libre. Kahn discarded the set line length and introduced such devices as assonance and internal rhyme for rhythmical purposes. His volumes of poetry include Les palais nomades (1881), Chansons d'amant (1891), La Pluie et le beau temps (1892), and Le Livre d'images (1897).

Kaikeyi. In the Ramayana, the daughter of Keka yaa and one of the three chief queens of Dasharatha, king of Ayodhya.

kailyard (Scot., "kale" or "cabbage patch"). The name of a group of Scottish writers of the 1890's who wrote partly in dialect on humble, homespun topics. They took their name from the line, "There is a bonnie brier bush in our kailyard," which was the motto of the poem Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush, written by John Watson (1850–1907) under the pen name Ian Maclaren. Other members of the school beside Maclaren included James M. Barrie and Samuel R. Crockett.

Kaiser, Georg (1878–1945). German playwright. Belonging to the movement of Expressionism, his plays turn, not on personal interaction among individualized characters, but rather on conflicts of ideas as exemplified in contrasting human types; often, in fact, his dramatis personae are nameless. His early writing (pre-1914), consisting mainly of satirical comedies in the tradition of such authors as Sternheim and Wedekind, is of no significance, but, with the coming of World War I, he was finally able to give effective expression to a deep longing for human solidarity. In From Morn Till Midnight, he depicts the complete emptiness of modern life, but in Der Brand im Opernhaus (The Fire in the Opera-House, 1918) he sees a possible solution for the individual in love. He preaches the salvage of peaceful society through individual sacrifice in Die Bürger von Calais (The Burghers of Calais, 1914), but he also envisions the possibility of an increasingly deindividualized society leading to ultimate cataclysm in his Gas trilogy. His later works, which follow the same general thematic lines, include Nebeneinan- der (Side by Side, 1923), an interesting formal experiment involving three parallel plots; Lederköpfle (Leather Heads, 1928), an anti-militaristic piece; Mississippi (1930), a religious play in which love is the spark of hope; and Das Floss der Medusa (The Raft of the Medusa, 1943), a children's tragedy.

Kalb, Johann. Known as Baron de Kalb (1721–1780). German army officer. While serving as a major general in the American Revolutionary army, he was mortally wounded at the battle of Camden, S.C.

Kalevala. Finnish national epic. It was compiled from popular songs and oral tradition by the Finnish philologist Elias Lönnrot (1802–1884), who published his first edition of 12,000 verses in 1835, and a second edition, nearly twice as long, in 1849. There is an account of the origin of the world, followed by the adventures of the three sons of Kaleva: the hero Wainamoinen, Ilmarinen, and the gallant Lemminkainen. The plot takes them to Pohjola, a dismally cold land to the north, both to fight for the return of the lost Sampo and to find a bride for Wainamoinen. It was written in unrhymed, alliterative, trochaic verse; and a German translation in the same meter suggested to H. W. Longfellow both the form and the epic style for his Hiawatha (1855).

Kali. Hindu goddess. From her Calcutta receives its name, Kali-ghat, the steps of Kali, i.e., those by which her worshipers descend from the bank to the river Ganges. As wife of Shiva, she symbolizes the essence of destruction and bloodthirstiness, and the thugs sacrificed their victims to her. Her naked idol is black and besmeared with blood; she has red eyes, four arms with blood-stained hands, matted hair, huge fanlike teeth, and a protruding tongue that drips with blood. She wears a necklace of skulls, ear rings of corpses, and is girdled with serpents. She is described as "terrible and beautiful, terribly beautiful" by a contemporary Indian poet. She plays a major role in Thomas Mann's "legend of India," The Transposed Heads (1940), where she is also Durga and Parvati, her two benign aspects. See SAKTISM.

Kalidasa (3rd century?). Sanskrit dramatist, sometimes referred to as the "Shakespeare of India." He wrote three plays, Shakuntala, Vikrama and Urvashi, Malavikagnimitra; two narrative poems, Raghuvansha and Kumara-sambhava; and three long lyrics, Meghaduta (The Cloud Messenger), Ritusamhara (The Cycle of Seasons), and Sringaratilaka.

Kalila and Dimnah. See BIDPAI, FABLES OF.

Kallas, Aino Julia Maria (Krohn) (1878–1956). Finnish-Estonian novelist. Finnish born, she married an Estonian scientist and wrote in the native language of her new land. Few of her novels have appeared in English; among those translated are The White Ship (1924), Eros the Slayer (1927), and The Wolf's Bride (1930).

Kalyb. The legendary "Lady of the Woods." She is said to have kidnapped St. George from his nurse, brought him up as her own child, and endowed him with gifts. St. George enclosed her in a rock, where she was torn to pieces by spirits.

Kama. Also known as Kamadeva or Kandarpa.

In Hindu mythology, the god of love. His wife is Rati (voluptuousness), his friend the season vasanta (spring); he rides on a sparrow, and holds in his hand a bow of flowers and five arrows which stand for the five senses. He was shrieved into cinders by the eye of Shiva, because Kama stirred passion in Shiva who was practicing penance; later Kama was reborn as Pradyumna.

Kamakura. Japanese historical period (1185-1333) following the Heian. The military clans in Eastern Japan gained the ascendency, destroying the power of the imperial court in Kyoto. New forms of Buddhism, notably Amidism and Zen, arose; a literature developed, centering on military chronicles that reflected the uncertainties of a period of incessant warfare and natural disasters. Kamakura is a small city south of Tokyo, where the military government, or shogunate, had its headquarters. A colossal bronze statue of the seated Buddha, known as the Dibatsu, is in Kamakura.

Kama-sutra (Sans. kama, love; sutra, science). A detailed account of the art and technique of Indian eroticism by the sage Vatsyayana (first century?).

Kamboja. In ancient Indian history, the territory to the east of Kashmir and beyond the Himalayas.

Kamenev, Lev Borisovich (1883-1936). Russian Communist leader. With Stalin and Zinoviev, he formed the triumvirate ruling Russia after Lenin's death. By 1929, Stalin had taken the upper hand, and in 1936 he purged both his cohorts.

Kami. A god or divinity in Shinto, the native religion of Japan. The title is also given to daimyōs or governors, and is about equal to "lord."

Kama. In Hindu mythology, the uncle of Krishna. He is Krishna's unremitting enemy.

Kandarpa. See KAMA.

Kandinsky, Wassily (1866-1944). Russian painter. He was a co-founder, with Franz Marc, of the BLAUE REITER, and a pioneer in abstract expressionist painting. In 1910 he rejected representational art and he evolved a style of turbulent, vividly colored abstractions. After 1920 his style gradually became orderly and strict. The works of this later period are limited to brightly colored dots, bundles of straight or broken lines, rectangles, and circular forms, but these shapes are handled with great freedom and inventiveness. From 1922 to 1933, Kandinsky taught at the BAUHAUS, where he did important work in his basic course on the theory of form and published Punkt und Linie an Fläche (Point and Line to Plane, 1926).

Kane, Harnett [Thomas] (1910- ). American writer. He is best known for LOUISIANA HAYRIYE: AMERICAN REHEARSAL FOR DICTIONARY (1941), the story of the Huey Long administration. In addition to other nonfiction, he has written several popular biographical novels, including BRIDE OF FORTUNE (1948), about the wife of Jefferson Davis; THE LADY OF ARLINGTON (1953), a story based on the life of Mrs. Robert E. Lee; and THE GALLANT MRS. STONEWALL (1957).

Kangaroo (1923). A novel by D. H. LAWRENCE. Set in Australia, it is notable for its vivid account of that country, largely drawn from Lawrence's own experience. The central characters of Richard Lovat Somers and Harriet Somers are closely based on Lawrence and his wife Frieda Lawrence. The novel is largely concerned with their difficult marriage relationship, in which the husband keeps trying unsuccessfully to assert his will over his wife. Kangaroo is the nickname of an invented character, Benjamin Cooley, the leader of a political party whose platform is a combination of fascism and Lawrence's own doctrine of "blood-consciousness."

K'ang-hsi. The Chinese era 1662-1722. K'ang-hsi was a period of great literary and scholastic activity.

Kannon. See KUAN-YIN.

Kansas-Nebraska Act (1854). In U.S. history, an act of Congress that provided for the territorial organization of Kansas and Nebraska. The principle of popular sovereignty, which permitted the admission of new states into the Union with or without slavery according to the decision of local governments, was incorporated in the bill, thereby rescinding the MISSOURI COMPROMISE. Because of the popular sovereignty provision, "bleeding Kansas" became a battleground for proslavery and antislavery forces.

Kant, Immanuel (1724-1804). German philosopher. Kant's attempt to define precisely the domain of rational understanding is a landmark in Western thought. On the one hand, he opposed Hume's skepticism, the idea that pure reason is of no real use in understanding the world, and on the other, he challenged enlightenment faith in the unlimited scope of reason. The basic formulation of what is called his critical philosophy is contained in the CRITIQUE OF PURE REASON, the CRITIQUE OF PRACTICAL REASON, and the CRITIQUE OF JUDGMENT. His ideas were used by Schiller as the basis for aesthetic theories and marked the beginning of German idealistic philosophy, which was developed by Fichte, Schelling, and Hegel. The quiet regularity of Kant's everyday life in Königsberg, where he was a university professor (1770-1804), became proverbial. According to an anecdote of Heinrich Heine, the residents of the town set their watches by Kant's daily walks.

Kantemir, Antioch Dmitryevich (1709-1744). Russian poet. Kantemir helped to form the classic tradition in Russian literature. He is known chiefly for his satires, written in imitation of those of Horace and Boileau. Although he made Russians aware of European classical culture, Kantemir's own work had little direct influence. His prosody, based on the number of syllables in each line of verse, was supplanted by the accentual verse introduced by Mikhail Lomonosov.

Kantor, MacKinlay (1904- ). American novelist. He is known for his popular historical novels, especially those dealing with the Civil War. ANDERSONVILLE (1955), which won a Pulitzer Prize, is a lengthy and grimly realistic story of the infamous Confederate prison. LONG REMEMBER (1934) and AROUSE AND BewARE (1936) also have Civil War backgrounds, the former centering on the battle of Gettysburg. THE VOICE OF BUGLE ANN (1935), the story of a bond, became very popular. Kantor also wrote the scenario for the movie THE BEST YEARS OF OUR LIVES (1947), and many earlier novels. SPIRIT LAKE (1961) is an account of the massacre of 30 settlers near Spirit Lake, Iowa, in 1857.
Katayev, in the role of Shakuntala, the foster father of Shakuntala.

Kapell, Das. See Kapell.

Kapp Putsch. A revolt in Berlin (1920) staged by army officers seeking to replace the Weimar Republic with an authoritarian state. The Putsch collapsed when the unions shut off all public utilities.

Karamazinov. In Feodor Dostoevski’s The Possessed, a satirical portrait of Ivan Turgenev, whose aesthetic posing and love of Western culture Dostoevski detested.

Karamazov, Feodor Pavlovich. In Feodor Dostoevski’s Brothers Karamazov, the father of the Karamazovs. He is a lustful, buffoonish character who thoroughly enjoys his sensual life and the sense of his degradation and only occasionally reveals a contempt for himself because of his unwholesome nature. The shock and disapproval of others only inspires him to further antics. Some of his sensual zest is contained in each of his sons in varying degrees, but none can match him for sheer animalism. He is the model of rampant irrationalism whose favorite mode of expression is the non sequitur.

Dmitri Fyodorovich Karamazov. Also known as Mitya. The eldest of the Karamazov brothers. Dmitri has inherited more of his father’s lustiness than his brothers, but is saved from the old man’s depravity by his own innately noble nature. Accused of his father’s murder, he refuses to defend himself adequately, because by so doing he would injure the reputation of his ex-fiancée, Katerina Ivanovna. The most full-blooded of the characters in the novel, Dmitri is also one of Dostoevski’s most successful character creations.

Ivan Fyodorovich Karamazov. Also known as Vanya. The intellectual member of the Karamazov family. Ivan is used by Dostoevski to represent the dead end to which he believed rationalism led. Tortured by the injustice and suffering in the world, Ivan “returns the ticket” to God, rejecting salvation from a Being who has allowed such a world to exist. Ivan both pities man’s weakness and despises him for being so weak. Both of these attitudes are revealed in his “Legend of the Grand Inquisitor,” a parable he recites to Alyosha during their most prolonged discussion. Ivan’s guilt for wishing for his father’s death renders him, culminating in his hallucinatory conversations with a shabby, imaginary Devil who espouses many of Ivan’s own ideas in a debased form, much as the bastard Smerdyakov does.

Alexei Fyodorovich Karamazov. Also known as Alyosha. The youngest son of Feodor Pavlovich. Alyosha is a novice at the monastery who intends to become a monk, but his mentor, the elder Zosima, orders him to go into the world and serve God there. Although he is a religious mystic, Alyosha is much less removed from normal human concerns than Dostoevski’s other famous mystic, Prince Myshkin of The Idiot. Despite his evident purity of heart, Alyosha admits to having a streak of the Karamazov sensuality in him. In the novel, he acts as the constant, sorrowful, and patient observer of his tormented father and brothers.

Smerdyakov. The illegitimate son of Feodor Pavlovich, who raped the boy’s half-wit mother and later took the bastard into his house as a servant. Smerdyakov is a composite of cheap foppishness and second-rate intellect. He adopts Ivan’s nihilistic ideas wholesale, perverts them in his own less fertile brain, and under their influence eventually commits the murder for which Dmitri is blamed.

Karamzin, Nikolai Mikhailovich (1766-1826). Russian writer and historian. He introduced the romanticism of Jean Jacques Rousseau and the romanticism of the early 19th-century English writers into Russian literature. His best-known works are Letters of a Russian Traveller (Firma russkogo putevzhennika; 1790-1791), based on his journey through Europe; Poor Liza (Bednaya Liza; 1792), a sentimental love story; and the multi-volume History of the Russian State (Istoriya gosudarstva Rossiskogo; 1818-1824). Besides his introduction of new sensibilities and themes into Russian literature, Karamzin is important for his linguistic reforms. He attempted to make literary Russian less heavy in style by introducing French syntax and terms into the language.

Karateyev, Platonic. The wise peasant in Count Leo Tolstoi’s novel War and Peace. His message of the goodness of the natural, simple life affects the spiritual development of Pierre Bezukhov, one of the book’s main characters.

Karenina, Anna. See Anna Karenina.

Karlfeldt, Erik Axel (1864-1931). Swedish poet. Karlfeldt’s work is characterized by its purposely archaic style and its basis in folklore and custom, in such collections as Fridolins visor (1898), Fridolins lustgard (1901), and Hästhorn (1927). In 1918 he refused the Nobel prize for literature, arguing that his work was unknown outside of Sweden. The prize was awarded to him posthumously in 1931. Karma (Sansk., “action, fate”). In Buddhism and Hinduism, the name given the results of action, especially the cumulative results of a person’s deeds in one stage of his existence as controlling his destiny in the next. Among Theosophists the word has a rather wider meaning, viz., the unbroken sequence of cause and effect; each effect being, in its turn, the cause of a subsequent effect.

Karak or Karun. The Arabic form of Korah of the Old Testament, who, according to the commentators of the Koran, was the most wealthy and beautiful of the Israelites. It is said that he built a large palace overlaid with gold, with doors of solid gold. He was the Crowds of the Muslims and guarded his wealth in a labyrinth.

Kartaphilos. See Cartaphilus.

Karttikeya. Also known as Skanda and Kumara.

The Hindu god of war. He is said to have been born without a mother and to have been adopted by the Pandavas or Krittikas, for which reason he is sometimes called “the son of Krittikas.” He rides on a peacock, with a bow in one hand and an arrow in the other.

Kaswa, al. Muhammad’s favorite camel. It fell on its knees in adoration when the prophet delivered the last clause of the Koran to the assembled multitude at Mecca. This is one of the dumb creatures admitted into the Muslim paradise.

Katayev, Valentin Petrovich (1897- ). Russian novelist, short story writer, and playwright. His first important novel was The Embezzlers ( Rasprodachi; 1927), a comic picaresque about two officials who make off with a large sum of money and go through hilarious adventures before being caught.
Another popular comic work of the same period is Katayev's play Squaring the Circle (Kvadratura kruga; 1928).

In 1932, Katayev published Time, Forward!, one of the better novels depicting the Five-Year Plan in Russia. His next novel, Lone White Sail (Beleyet parus odinokii; 1936), is set in Odessa, Katayev's birthplace, during the period of the 1905 revolution. The story, obviously autobiographical, deals with the adventures of two young boys in the exotic seaport. The same two boys, grown into manhood, appear in Katayev's novel about wartime partisans in Odessa; For the Power of the Soviets (* Za silu Sovetov; 1949*).

Katerina Ivanovna. In Fedor Dostoevskii's The Brothers Karamazov, the former fiancée of Dmitri Karamazov. One of Dostoevskii's "infernal woman" characters, Katerina refuses to abandon Dmitri, because of her gratitude to him for helping save her father from disgrace. So tenacious is she that she is described as being in love only with her own virtue. Ivan, the second brother, is in love with her, but their relationship is mainly a harrowing series of sadistic and masochistic scenes. Finally incensed at Dmitri's rejection of her, Katerina is instrumental in bringing about his conviction for his father's murder.

Katharina. The fiery and ungovernable daughter of the bewildered Baptist in Shakespeare's Taming of the Shrew. "Renowned in Padua for her scolding tongue," Katharina is wooed and won in wild and highbanded fashion by the equally high-spirited Petruchio.

Katharine Walton. See Partisan, The.

Kathasaritsagara (Sans., "great ocean of stories"). A collection of stories in Sanskrit consisting of 22,000 verses in 124 chapters. They were written by the Kashmiri poet Somadeva of the 11th century. According to some the work is a recast of the "larger ocean," the Brihat-kathasaritsagara of the fifth century.

Käthchen von Heilbronn, Das (pub. 1810). A play by Heinrich von Kleist. It is Kleist's most romantic work, a kind of dramatized fairy tale. Käthchen, apparently a young commoner, is drawn to the court von Strahl by a mysterious, irresistible love and refuses to leave his side. Her perfect devotion survives through a number of knightly and supernatural adventures, and it is finally discovered that she is the emperor's daughter. She and the count marry in the end.

Katmir or Kratim. In the Koran, the dog of the Seven Sleepers. It spoke with a human voice, and said to the young men who wanted to drive it out of the cave, "I love those who love God. Go to sleep, masters, and I will keep guard." The dog kept guard over them for 309 years, and neither slept nor ate. At death it was taken up into paradise.

_He wouldn't give a bone to Katmir, or he wouldn't throw a bone to the dog of the seven sleepers is a traditional Arabic reproach, applied to a very niggardly man._

Katsushika Hokusai (1760-1849). Japanese painter and wood-block artist. His highly individual work had considerably influence on Western painting.

Kaufman, George S[imon] (1889-1961). American playwright. The author of numerous popular plays and musical comedies, Kaufman worked with a number of well-known writers. His long series of collaborations with Marc Connelly included Dulcy; To the Ladies (1922), a comedy on home life; Beggars on Horseback; and Merton of the Movies (1922), a satire on Hollywood. With Moss Hart, Kaufman wrote Once in a Lifetime (1930), another satire of Hollywood; You Can't Take It with You; I'd Rather Be Right (1937), a satire on the New Deal; The American Way (1939), a paean to democracy; The Man Who Came to Dinner; George Washington Slept Here (1940), a satire on the city dweller's urge to buy and renovate a house in the country; and other plays.

Kaufman worked with Edna Ferber on several plays: Minick (1924), based on one of Miss Ferber's short stories; The Royal Family (1927), dealing with a theatrical family resembling the Barrymores; Dinner at Eight (1932), an expose of high society; The Land Is Bright (1941); and Bravo! (1948). With Morrie Ryskind he wrote the book for the Ira and George Gershwin musical Of Thee I Sing. With Howard Dietz he collaborated on The Band Wagon (1931), with Ring Lardner on June Moon (1929), with Alexander Woollcott on The Dark Tower (1933), with Nunnally Johnson on Park Avenue (1946), and with Leuen MacGrath, his second wife, on The Small Hours (1951).

Kautsky, Karl (1854-1938). German Marxist. He denounced the revisionist socialism of Eduard Bernstein and Jean Jaurès, as well as the revolutionary socialism of the Russian Bolsheviks.
Kavanagh (1849). A romance by Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. Mr. Churchill, the local schoolmaster, is unable to see the drama going on around him, while he attempts to be an author. Two girls fall in love with Fairmeadow's new minister, Kavanagh. Alice Archer, a poor girl, must nurse her invalid mother. Cecilia Vaughn, rich and beautiful, wins the minister, who is blind to Alice's love. The two leave Fairmeadow, and Alice wastes away and dies. On the couple's return, Kavanagh and Churchill discuss literature, and the latter must confess that his romance is still unwritten. The book delighted many discerning readers; it is an amusing and romantic vision of a small New England town, in which passions are either satirized or sentimentalized.

Kaverin, Venyamin. Pen name of Venyamin Aleksandrovich Zilberg (1902– ). Russian novelist and short-story writer. Kaverin was a member of the Serapion Brothers, in which he joined Lev Luntz in advocating more attention to Western literary methods. His special favorite was Edgar Allan Poe. His early stories, published in the collection Craftsman and Apprentices (Mastera i podmasterya; 1923), show an attention to plot that sets them apart from the typical works of the time with their diffuse construction and ornate prose. Kaverin's best early novel is The Artist Unknown (Khudozshnik neizvesten; 1931), the story of a young artist's problems in finding a place for himself in the new society after the revolution. Another novel with a similar theme, although less complex in its structure, is his The Fulfillment of Desires (Ispolneniye zhelani; 1934–1935), translated into English as The Larger View. Kaverin's next novel, Two Captains (Dva kapitana; 1939), was an adventure story of Arctic exploration with some detective elements thrown in.

In 1949, Kaverin published the first part of a novel entitled The Open Book (Otkrytaya kniga), the story of a young girl who becomes a prominent bacteriologist. This fragment was not well received. In 1956, during the relaxed period following Stalin's death, Kaverin issued another part of the novel, a section entitled Searches and Hopes (Poiski i nadezhdy), which proved to be an outspoken criticism of Soviet scientific bureaucracy and the chauvinistic concern for Russian primacy in all fields, in this particular case, penicillin research. Kaverin was criticized for the story and, along with other writers attacked for their works at the time, he defended his views at a meeting of the Moscow Union of Writers.

Kay, Sir. In Arthurian legend, King Arthur's seneschal (steward). In the Welsh tale, Calchawch a'r Olwen (c. 1100), Sir Kay is a great hero—a wound from his sword, no physician might heal. In later tales, such as Lancelot (c. 1180) by Chrétien de Troyes and Le Morte d'Arthur (c. 1469) of Malory, he becomes the rude and boastful knight whose sharp tongue is always stirring up trouble and who is inept in combat; yet Arthur always defers to him. In Le Morte d'Arthur, he is the son of Sir Ector, King Arthur's foster father.

Kaye-Smith, Sheila (1887–1956). English regional novelist. Set in Sussex, her best novels are Sussex Gorse (1916) and Joanna Godden (1921). Other works include Mrs. Gailey (1951) and Quartet in Heaven (1952).

Kazantzakis, Nikos (1883–1957). A Greek poet and novelist. Born in Crete, Kazantzakis took a law degree at Athens, then traveled widely for several years. From 1919 to 1947 he held, off and on, a variety of governmental posts. In his first novel, Toda Raba, written in 1929, he declared, "I am a mariner of Odysseus with heart of fire but with mind ruthless and clear." This essential ambivalence, the conflict between Dionysus and Apollo, between flesh and spirit, was the fundamental subject of his life and his writings. Zorba, the hero of Zorba the Greek, the novel that established Kazantzakis' reputation in America, was bested by the same conflict; it is central also to his next great novel, The Greek Passion. The author's preoccupation with the dual nature of man found its ultimate expression in his monumental poem, The Odyssey: A Modern Sequel.

Kazantzakis was influenced by philosophies as remote from one another as those of Dante, Lenin, and Buddha. His principal mentors, however, were Nietzsche, whose works he avidly read, and Bergson, under whom he studied in his youth. Like his hero Odysseus, Kazantzakis valued freedom above all other blessings. Yet, he believed that the ultimate good is not freedom, which, in any case, can never be achieved, but the passionate, often tragic search for freedom. Though greatly admired by such figures as Albert Schweitzer and Thomas Mann, and repeatedly nominated for the Nobel prize, Kazantzakis' writings became known in America only toward the end of his life.

Keable, Robert (1887–1927). English novelist and clergyman. Simon Called Peter (1921), his portrait of a disillusioned clergyman, was a best seller and perhaps autobiographical in nature.

Kean, Edmund (1787–1833). English actor. He was unrivaled in his day as a tragedian; his greatest successes were Shakespearean roles, notably Othello, Richard III, and Lear. His excessive drinking ruined his career and his health.

Keats, John (1795–1821). English poet. The oldest of four children, Keats was born in London. His father, a livery-stable keeper, died when Keats was eight and his mother six years later. The following year, when he was 15, he was withdrawn from school by his guardian and apprenticed to an apothecary-surgeon. In 1815 he entered a London hospital as a medical student, and though he received his certificate to practice he soon gave up medicine in order to devote himself entirely to poetry. In the autumn of 1816 he gained the acquaintance of the influential editor of the Examiner, Leigh Hunt, who published his sonnet On First Looking into Chap-mans's Homer (1816) and through whom he later met Shelley and Wordsworth. The following year saw the publication of his first collection, The Poems of John Keats. He then began work on Endymion (1818), a long allegory of imagination in search of ideal beauty; the story is based on the Greek myth of the shepherd ENDYMION on Mount Latmos who was loved by Selene, the goddess of the moon.
Though Keats may have attached enough hopes to the poem to be troubled by the attacks of unfriendly critics, he was maturing rapidly both as a poet and as a critic of his own work and soon spoke of Endymion as “mawkish” and “slipshod.” There is little truth in the popular belief, stimulated by Shelley’s preface to his elegy Adonais, that Keats wasted away and died as a result of the “savage criticism” of Endymion, which “produced the most violent effect on his susceptible mind...[ending] in the rupture of a blood-vessel in the lungs.”

In 1818 Keats had to cut short a walking tour because of a severe sore throat, possibly the first sign of his illness. He then nursed his brother Tom, suf-fereing from tuberculosis, until Tom’s death in the beginning of December. He had met Fanny Brawne in September, and he became engaged to her at Christmastime. Between the autumn of 1818 and the summer of 1819, Keats composed his finest poetry.
He worked on Hyperion, a Miltonic blank-verse epic of the Greek myth of Creation, but left it after a little more than two books had been completed. The story was to deal with the Titan Hyperion, god of the sun, and his overthrow by Apollo, representative of the new generation of gods headed by Zeus.

In January, 1819, he began The Eve of St. Agnes;
the story, which he probably got from Boccaccio, is based on the medieval belief that on St. Agnes’ Eve a girl who follows certain rituals will see her future husband in her dreams. He wrote La Belle Dame Sans Merci, a haunting and mysterious ballad, and began to compose his great odes—Ode on Melancholy, Ode on a Grecian Urn, Ode to Psyche, Ode to a Nightingale—adapting elements of the rhyme-scheme of both Petrarchan and Shakespearean sonnets. Notable for their sensuous imagery and sustained feeling, these odes are among the finest in English.

By summer he was at work on Lamia, an allegorical poem based on a story, found in Burton’s Anatomy of Melancholy, of a youth who met a phantom in the shape of a lovely woman and went to live with her. At their wedding, the woman was revealed to be a serpent (a lamia), and all her possessions mere illusions which, with her, vanished “in an instant.”
He began a revision of Hyperion, called The Fall of Hyperion, and The Eve of St. Mark, both of which were left incomplete. By the fall of 1819 his turbcerulosis had progressed until he could do little but revise and prepare his poems for publication. This third and final collection, Lamia, Isabella, The Eve of St. Agnes and Other Poems, appeared in July of 1820. In February of that year he had suffered his first hemorrhage. Bothered by financial problems, frustrated and unhappy in his unconsummated relationship with Fanny Brawne, he became progressively worst until a doctor warned that another English winter would kill him. In August he refused an in-vitiation from Shelley, whom he knew slightly, to spend the winter at the Shelleys’ villa in Italy. He borrowed money and sailed for Italy in September, accompanied by the young painter Joseph Severn, and died in Rome the following February.

Probably the most talented of the English romantic poets, Keats wrote a surprisingly large body of poetry before his early death. Practically all the finished poems of the 1818–1819 group are the work of a mature poet, and a few of them, such as the magnificent To Autumn, are among the finest examples of English lyric poetry. His letters are of particular interest not only for their biographical value but for their poetic and philosophic insights. See Isabella, or the Pot of Basil.

Keble, John (1792–1866). Anglican clergyman and poet. Keble’s Oxford sermon on National Apostasy was considered by Cardinal Newman to be the start of the Oxford Movement. He was professor of poetry at Oxford (1831–1841) and author of a popular collection of religious verse, The Christian Year (1827), as well as several volumes of sermons and Keeldar, Shirley. See Shirley.

Kelland, Clarence Budington (1881–1964).
American newspaperman and novelist. A reporter early in his career, he later became editor of The American Boy and wrote books for juveniles. His fame rests on the title character of his 1921 novel, Scattergood Baines. A shrewd, fat Yankee promoter, Baines appeared in a succession of humorous novels and short stories, including Scattergood Pulls the Strings (1941). Among Kelland’s other books are Dynasty (1929), Archibald the Great (1943),
No Escape (1952), and Monitor Affair (1960).

Keller, Gottfried (1819–1890). Swiss novelist and poet, writing in German. He is known especially for his ability to combine bourgeois good sense and humor with powerful symbolism and subtle psychological perception. After failing to realize his youthful ambition of becoming a painter, he turned to poetry in 1842. He was involved in the Swiss civil disputes of the time, and a number of his early poems are in the manner of such liberal political poets as Herwegh and Freiligrath. During 1848–1855, he traveled and studied in Germany, completing his first major narrative work, the novel Green Henry, (Der grüne Heinrich); first version, 1854; second, 1879–80) which was shortly followed by a collection of stories, Die Leute von Seldwyla. Most of his later years were spent comfortably in Zürich where, during 1861–1876, he was a government official. Outstanding among his later works are the Sieben Legenden (Seven Legends, 1872), treating the early period of the Christian era. In them, he weaves a delicately ironic web of both Christian and pagan elements, by which he implies his own preference for a secularized view of religion, an idea that reflects the strong influence of Feuerbach.

Keller, Helen [Adams] (1880– ). American memorialist, essayist, and counselor on international relations for the American Foundation of the Blind.
Disease deprived her of sight and hearing at the age of 19 months; cut off from human communication, the child finally learned the relationship between words and things from her devoted teacher, Anne was murdered at Clente-in-Cowbage, Gloucestershire.

The murder, says Roger of Wendover, was miraculously reported at Rome by a white dove, which alighted on the altar of St. Peter's, bearing in its beak a scroll with these words:

In Clent cow pasture, under a thorn
Of head bereft, lies Kenelm king-born.

Kenilworth (1821). A novel by Sir Walter Scott, famous for its portrayal of Queen Elizabeth and her court. The other principal characters are Robert Dudley, the earl of Leicester, who entertains ambitions of becoming king-consort, and his beautiful, unhappy wife, Amy Robsart. She suffers neglect, insult, and finally death at his hands. Kenilworth is a magnificent castle near Stratford, now ruined.

Kennan, George (1845-1924). American journalist. The Century Company commissioned him to visit Russia and Siberia, a trip that involved a 5,000-mile trek by dogsled; he was also sent to the front in the Spanish-American and Russo-Japanese wars.
From these experiences Kennan published Siberia and the Exile System (2 v., 1891), Campaigning in Cuba (1899), and several other volumes.

Kennedy, John Fitzgerald (1917-1963). 35th to England, and the grandson of a popular mayor of Boston. Kennedy was born into an atmosphere of wealth and prominence. After attending the London School of Economics (1935-1936), he en-

Sullivan Macy (1866-1936). When she was 10 years old, her "Teacher" helped her learn to speak. Miss Keller graduated from Radcliffe College cum laude in 1904. Mrs. Macy remained her companion until her death. Helen Keller has received several honorary degrees from universities all over the world. She wrote
The Story of My Life in 1902 (reissued, 1947); among her other books are Optimism (1902), The World I Live In (1908), Out of the Dark (1914),
The Open Door (1957), and Helen Keller's Teacher: Anne Sullivan Macy (1955). Several books have been written about Helen Keller; in 1954, a movie called The Unconquered was based on her life story. The Miracle Worker (1959), a Broadway play and later a movie, dramatized Anne Sullivan Macy's first success in communicating with Helen as a child.

playwright. He first achieved fame with The Show-Off (1924), a satire on American success stories.
Craig's Wife won a Pulitzer Prize. Later plays included Behold the Bridegroom (1927) and The Fatal Weakness (1946).

Kempscott Press. A cooperative publishing and printing enterprise established by William Morris in his English country estate in 1891. It was noted for the beauty of paper, binding, and typography in the books it published. The Kempscott Chaucer is considered the masterpiece among these. See CHAUCER.

ekelpie or kelpy. In Scottish folklore, a spirit of the waters in the form of a horse. It was supposed to take delight in the drowning of travelers, but also occasionally to help millers by keeping the mill wheel going at night.

Kemble, Charles (1775-1854). English actor.
His noted family of actors included his brother John Philip Kemble (1757-1822) and Sarah Siddons.
Charles was manager of Covent Garden from 1822.
His daughter Frances Anne or Fanny Kemble (1809-1893) was a popular leading lady who resided alternately in England and the U.S. She wrote several autobiographical books, a play, The Star of Seville (1837), and a collection of notes on Shakepeare.

Kemp, Harry [Hibbard] (1883-1960). American writer, poet, and vagabond. Tramping on Life (1922) and More Miles (1927) are fictional accounts of his vagabond days. His poetry includes Chantey and Ballads (1920) and The Thresher's Wife (1914), a narrative poem. Judas (1910) is a four-act play.

Kemp, William (fl. c. 1600). English comedian and dancer. He acted in the plays of William Shakepeare and Ben Jonson. He was an important member of Shakespeare's company until 1600, and later traveled widely on the continent. Kemp's Nine Daies Wonder is an autobiographical account of his famous morris-dance from London to Norwich.

Kempner, Alfred. See Alfred KERR.
Kemp Owyn. A medieval Scottish or English ballad. It deals with the transformation of Isabel into a "loathly lady" by her stepmother's magic and with her deliverance by the fortitude and courage of the knight Kemp Owyn. Kemp is the Scottish word for champion.

Kenelm, St. An English saint, son of Kenwulf, king of Wessex in the early 9th century. He was only seven years old when, by his sister's order, he

543 Kennedy, John Fitzgerald
entered Harvard University, from which he graduated with honors in 1940. During World War II, Kennedy served as the commander of a PT boat in the South Pacific and was decorated by the navy for the courage and leadership he displayed after his boat was rammed by a Japanese destroyer during a night action in the Solomons.

Kennedy's political career began in 1946 when he was elected to Congress as a representative from Massachusetts. He was re-elected in 1948 and 1950, and in 1952 defeated Henry Cabot Lodge for a seat in the Senate. As a senator, Kennedy quickly became a leader of the moderate liberal wing of the Democratic Party and won prominence as a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and the Select Senate Committee on Improper Labor-Management activities. In 1956 he was a leading contender for the Democratic vice-presidential nomination, and in 1960, after impressive victories in a number of state presidential primaries, he became the Democratic nominee for president, winning the election by a narrow margin over Vice-President Richard Nixon. He was the first Roman Catholic and the youngest man ever to be elected to the presidency.

During his brief administration, Kennedy launched the Peace Corps to aid underdeveloped areas, demanded the withdrawal of Soviet weapons from Cuba, and encouraged the Negro drive for full civil rights. On Nov. 22, 1963, Kennedy was shot to death as he rode in a motorcade in Dallas, Texas. His accused assassin, Lee Harvey Oswald, was himself killed on November 24 by Jack Ruby, a Dallas night club operator, in full view of the nation's television audience.

Kennedy was the author of Why England Slept (1940), an analysis of the causes of England's failure to rearm before World War II; Profiles in Courage (1956), a Pulitzer Prize-winning collection of essays dealing with congressional leaders who, in historically critical moments, placed conscience over political expediency; and The Strategy of Peace (1960), which presented a statement of Kennedy's aims in international affairs.

Kennedy, Margaret (1896- ). English novelist. Author of the best-selling The Constant Nymph, she has also written the novels Return I Dare Not (1931), Troy Chimneys (1953), and The Forgotten Smile (1961).

Kennicott, Carol. See Main Street.

Kenning. In Anglo-Saxon poetry, a figure of speech using a descriptive circumlocution in place of the common noun. Examples are "whale-road" or "gannet's bath" for "sea," and "ash-wood" for "spear." Beowulf contains a number of excellent examples of kenning.

Kensington Gardens (1722). A mock-heroic descriptive poem by Thomas Tickell in which Kensington Gardens, then only a few years completed, is peopled with fairies. The gardens are the royal domain of Oberon, and the hero is Albion, son of "Albion's royal blood," who was stolen thence by the fairy Milkah. He later falls in love with Kenna, daughter of Oberon, and after many adventures and a war caused by Oberon's opposition, they are married. Kensington Gardens is a royal park in London, and site of the Great Exhibition of 1851.

Kent, earl of. In Shakespeare's King Lear, the honest courtier banished by Lear for interfering on behalf of Cordelia. Under the assumed name of Caius, Kent continues to serve Lear.

Kentigern, St. (c. 510-601). The patron saint of Glasgow, born of royal parents. He is said to have founded the cathedral at Glasgow, where he died. He is represented with his episcopal cross in one hand, and in the other a salmon and a ring, in allusion to the well known legend:

Queen Langoureth had been false to her husband, King Roderich, and had given her lover a ring. The king, aware of the fact, stole upon the knight in sleep, abstracted the ring, threw it into the Clyde, and then asked the queen for it. The queen, in alarm, applied to St. Kentigern, who after praying, went to the Clyde, caught a salmon with the ring in its mouth, handed it to the queen, and was thus the means of restoring peace to the royal couple, and of reforming the repentant queen.

The Glasgow arms include the salmon with the ring in its mouth, and also an oak tree, a bell hanging on one of the branches, and a bird at the top of the tree:

- The tree that never grew,
- The bird that never flew,
- The fish that never swam.
- The bell that never rang.

The oak and bell are in allusion to the story that St. Kentigern hung a bell upon an oak to summon the wild natives to worship.

St. Kentigern is also known as St. Mungo, for Mungho (i.e., dearest) was the name by which St. Servan, his first preceptor, called him. His day is January 13.

Kenton, Simon (1755-1836). American soldier and Indian fighter, famous in frontier legends. At one time a scout for Daniel Boone, he fought in the American Revolution and in the War of 1812. See Simon Girty.

Kentucky Cardinal, A (1894). A novel by James Lane Allen. The hero, Adam Moss, is a nature lover who reluctantly cages a Kentucky cardinal at the capricious command of his jealous betrothed, Georgiana. To their great remorse, the bird dies, but the two are reconciled. Aftermath (1896) is a sequel.

Kentucky Tragedy, the. A murder and suicide which took place in 1825. Anna Cook, a Kentucky girl who had been seduced by Col. Solomon P. Sharp, married an attorney, Jeroboam O. Beauchamp, in 1825. She made her husband take an oath to kill her seducer. Beauchamp stabbed Sharp to death the same year in Frankfort, Ky. He was tried, denied his guilt, but was convicted. The evening before his execution, Anna joined him, and both took laudanum. His wife died, but Beauchamp lived to be hung the next day.

The dramatic possibilities of the crime inspired many works. Beauchamp wrote his own Confession (1826). Thomas Holley Chivers treated the theme in his verse drama Conrad and Eudora (1834); Poe used it in Politian. Charlotte Mary Barnes wrote a tragedy called Octavia Bragaldi (1837); Mary E. MacMichael wrote The Kentucky Tragedy (1838); Charles Fenno Hoffman treated the same story in his romance Greyfriar (1849). The popular Southern novelist William Gilmore Simms wrote Beauchamp in 1842. In recent years, two well-known works have been based on the story: Robert Penn Warren's World Enough and Time and Joseph Shearing's To Bed at Noon (1951).

Kenyon Review, The. A quarterly founded by members of the Kenyon College faculty in 1939. John Crowe Ransom was the first editor. The magazine stressed close structural criticism and reviews of important new trends in the arts. The advisory board initially included Allen Tate, Mark Van Doren, Robert Penn Warren, and other writers of reputation. In 1951, Ransom edited the anthology The Kenyon Critics: Studies in Modern Literature from the "Kenyon Review."

Keppler, Johannes (1571-1630). German astronomer. He helped to establish the validity of the Copernican system by his empirical formulation of the laws of planetary motion. Using the precise data of Tycho Brahe, he discovered that all planets move in elliptical orbits with the center of the sun as one of the foci, that the speed of a planet is related to its orbital position, and that the speeds of the different planets have a mathematical relationship to one another.

Kerenski, Aleksandr Feodorovich (1881- ). Russian revolutionary leader. He became the head of the provincial government in 1917 after Czar Nicholas II's abdication. He was overthrown by the Bolsheviks in October, 1917, because of his moderate policies, and fled to Paris.

Kern, Jerome [David] (1885-1945). American composer of musical comedies. The best was undoubtedly Show Boat. Some of his songs, such as Of Man River and Smoke Gets in Your Eyes, are still favorites.

Kerner, Justinus (1786-1862). German poet, writing for the most part in folk-song style. Though a medical doctor, he was especially interested in occult phenomena, and his famous Die Scherin von Preußen (The Prophets of Preußen, 1829) is the record of his experiences with a visionary, somnambulistic peasant woman whom he treated with mesmerism. The poems of Swabian romanticism, including Schwab, Uhland, and Lenau, were frequent guests at his house.

Kerouac, Jack (1922- ). American novelist and poet. Recognized as one of the leading representatives of the beat movement, Kerouac writes in a "spontaneous prose" that parallels the long, loose line employed by many of the beat poets. Like the poets he has been sharply criticized for lack of organization and for extolling the amorality of his characters, who seem concerned only with self-gratification. His best-known novels include On the Road (1957), The Subterraneans (1958), The Dharma Bums (1960), and Big Sur (1962).

Kerr, Alfred. Pen name of Alfred Kemper (1867-1948). German critic. His critical writings, especially on drama, were influential. His works were collected in 1917 under the title Die Welt im Drama (The World in Drama).

Kessel, Joseph (1898- ). Argentinian-born French novelist of Russian parentage. Kessel is best known for Le Lion (1958), a novel set in a wild animal reserve in Kenya. His other books include La Stepe rouge (1922), short stories of the Russian revolution, and adventure tales of war and aviation, such as L'Equipage (1923); Crossroads (Fortune carried; 1932); and Army of Shadows (L'Armée des ombres; 1944).

Kessel, Maurice. See Maurice Drunon.

Kesten, Hermann (1900- ). German novelist. He is known for his attacks on Nazism in such works as Die Zwillinge von Nürnberg (The Twins of Nürnberg, 1946).

Ketch, John. Known as Jack Ketch (d. 1686). English hangman and executioner, notorious for his barbarity. His name appeared in a ballad as early as 1678, and by 1702 it was associated with the executioner in Punch and Judy puppet-plays, which had recently been introduced from Italy.

Kevin, St. An Irish saint of the 6th century. Legend relates that, like St. Senanus, he retired to an island where he vowed no woman should ever land. Kathleen tracked him to his retirement, but the saint hurred her from a rock, and her ghost never left the place while he lived. A rock at Glendalough (Wicklow) is shown as the bed of St. Kevin. Moore has a poem on this tradition (Irish Melodies, iv).

Key, Ellen (1849-1926). Swedish feminist and author. While she was a prominent figure in Sweden, her works, proposing radical social views, gained her fame outside her own country. Her pacifist and feminist sympathies, as well as her broad humanitarian concerns, find expression in Barnet's århundrade (The Century of the Child, 1908), Kvinnooöljen (The Woman Movement, 1909), and Kriget, fred och framtiden (War, Peace, and the Future, 1914).

Key, Francis Scott (1779-1843). American lawyer and author of The Star-Spangled Banner.

Keyes, Sidney (1922-1943). English poet. He was killed in World War II just as he was beginning to show his originality and talent. Collected Poems appeared in 1946.

Keyne, St. A Celtic saint, daughter of Brychan, king of Brecknock in the 5th century. Concerning her well, near Liskeard, Cornwall, it is said that if a bridegroom drinks therefrom before his bride, he will be master of his house, but if the bride gets the first draught, she will rule. Southey has a ballad, The Well of St. Keyne (1798), on this tradition. The man leaves his wife at the porch and runs to the well to get the first draught, but when he returns, his wife tells him his labor has been in vain, for she has "taken a bottle to church."

of Peace (1919), denouncing as unrealistic the reparations of the treaty of Versailles; A Tract on Mon-tary Reform (1923); The End of Laissez-Faire (1926); A Treatise on Money (1930); The General Theory of Employment, Interest, and Money (1936), his most influential and best-known work; and How to Pay for the War (1940). Keynes served on the staff of the Treasury from 1915 to 1919 and was its principal representative at the Paris Peace Conference of 1919. During the 30's he advised wide government expenditure as a counter measure to deflation and depression. Though his suggestions were less followed in Great Britain, they became the foundation of President Roosevelt's recovery program in the U.S. At the close of World War II, Keynes was influential in the planning for the World Bank and for the stabilization of international currency. Though his doctrine of deficit spending has been widely opposed, he was undoubtedly the most brilliant British economist of his time, and his influence is still apparent in British and U.S. government economic planning.

Keyserling, Count Hermann Alexander (1880-1946). Estonian social philosopher and mystic of German stock. Deprived of his estates by the Russian Revolution, he founded at Darmstadt Die Schule der Weisheit (School of Wisdom). His thought was conditioned by contact with many cultures and the direct result of his far-flung travels, which earned him the well-deserved epithet of "the wandering philosopher." His final ideal was a synthesis of the Western notion of doing with the oriental notion of being. His books include Reisetagebuch eines Phi-losophen (1919) or Travel Diary of a Philosopher (1925) and The Book of Marriage.

Kezia. A little girl, the heroine of Katherine Mansfield's stories about her childhood in New Zealand.

Khadijah. Muhammad's first wife and, according to the Koran, one of the four perfect women. The other three are Fatima, the prophet's daughter, Mary, daughter of Imran, and Asia, wife of the Pharaoh drowned in the Red Sea.

Khedive. The title, from 1867 to 1914, of the ruler of Egypt, as viceroys of the sultan of Turkey. The word is Turkish, derived from Persian, and means a prince or viceroys.

Khepera. An Egyptian solar deity represented by the beetle.

Khlebnikov, Velemir Vladimirovich (1885-1922). Russian poet. One of the originators of futurism in Russia, Khlebnikov was an inventive poet whose searchings for new poetic techniques helped re-vivify Russian poetry. His fellow futurist Vladimir Mayakovski described him as “the Columbus of new poetic continents now settled and cultivated by us.”
Khlebnikov, who had a love for old Slavic culture, replaced his original first name, Viktor, with the more archaic name Velemir.

Khmemu. An Egyptian ram-headed deity, worshiped especially in the region of the 5 cataracts of the Nile.

Khodasevich, Vladislav Feliztjanovich (1886-1939). Russian poet. He began publishing verse in 1908, but most of his best work appeared after the revolution. He emigrated in 1922 and became one of the best Russian émigré poets. His best-known collection of poetry is The Heavy Lyre (Tyaziolaya lira; 1921).

Khrushchev, Nikita Sergeyevich (1894– ).
Russian leader of the government and Communist worker, Khrushchev joined the Communist Party in 1918 and began a rapid rise through the ranks. In 1939 he was elected to the Soviet Union's ruling body, the Politburo (renamed the Presidium in 1952).
He was named in 1949 as a secretary of the Communist Party Central Committee. After Stalin's death he became first secretary of the Party, sharing power with Georgi Malenkov, who was chairman of the Council of Ministers (the head of the government).
Malenkov resigned in 1955, and Nikolai Bulganin became head of state, to be replaced by Khrushchev in 1958. He was deposed and disgraced in 1964.

Khrushchev's speech at the 20th Congress of the Communist Party in 1956 created a sensation by its violent attacks on the memory of the past dictator Stalin. The de-Stalinization campaign instituted by Khrushchev created a freer atmosphere that was quickly reflected in Soviet literature. In spite of this new atmosphere, named "the thaw" from the title of a novel by Ilya Ehrenburg, Khrushchev has kept a watchful eye on the work of Soviet writers and has several times personally admonished them to maintain the correct spirit of loyalty to the Party and state. This has been an insistent demand, even though the degree of freedom of Soviet writers has increased measurably since the Stalin era.

Ki. In Sumerian mythology, the primeval earth goddess. Born of Nammu, the sea, she bore the air-god Enil by her brother-consort An, with whom she was originally joined as one. Enil separated them, An becoming the upper sky. In religion she was supplanted by such younger counterparts as Nin-tu.

Kiblah or Keblah. The point of adoration toward which Muslims turn when they worship, i.e., the direction of the Ka'ba at Mecca. In mosques, the direction is shown by the mihrab, or hole in the interior wall.

deals with the legendary William Blackstone who is said to have greeted Boston's first settlers on what is now Boston Common. His later wanderings and other American heroes are also described.

Kidd, William. Known as Captain Kidd (1645– 1701). Scottish-born English pirate. Kidd was originally an affluent ship owner and sea captain who saw service against French privateers during King William's War and was later engaged by the British government to suppress piracy in the Indian Ocean.
By 1759 a combination of circumstances, including a mutinous crew, had induced Kidd to turn to piracy;
he captured several vessels and was declared a pirate by British authorities. Informed that he would be pardoned, he landed at Boston and was promptly arrested. He was sent to England, tried, and hanged at Execution Dock in London.

After his death, Kidd became a legendary figure in both England and the U.S. He became the hero of many ballads, his ghost was seen on several occasions, and numerous attempts were made to unearth a fabulous treasure which he supposedly buried at various points ranging from Oak Island, Nova Scotia to Gardiner's Island, N.Y. Cooper referred to Kidd in several works, notably The Water Witch (1830), a novel. The influence of the Kidd legend is also evident in Poe's short story The Gold Bug (1843), and Stevenson's novel Treasure Island (1883).

Kidnapped (1886). A historical novel by Robert Louis Stevenson. It deals with the adventures of David Balfour, the young hero, and Alan Breck, a Jacobite who is considered one of Stevenson's most interesting and best-drawn characters. A sequel, Catriona, was published in 1892.

Kielland, Alexander Lange (1849–1907). Norwegian novelist, short-story writer, and playwright. Although his own background was wealthy and aristocratic, Kielland's writing was spurred by a strong sense of social protest. In Arbeidsfolk (1881) he criticizes the bureaucracy, and in Sankt Hans Fest (1887) he denounces the clergy. Garman og Worse (1880) and Skipper Worse (1882) are tempered by childhood memory and display a clear beauty of style.

Kieran, John [Francis] (1892– ). American newspaperman. An excellent sports columnist and authority on Shakespeare and bird life, he is best known for his prodigious memory which he displayed on the radio quiz show "Information Please." Kieran has written several books on his specialties, the most recent being Natural History of New York City (1959).

Kierkegaard, Søren Aabye (1813–1855). Danish philosopher. The early years of his life were dark and cheerless, his home a lonely, gloomy place. Kierkegaard published his first philosophical works under pseudonyms. In contrast to Hegel's objective philosophy, he proposed, in such works as Stadier paa Livets Vej (Stages on Life's Way, 1845) and Ojentagelsen (Repetition, 1842), a system based on faith, knowledge, thought, and reality. In Enen Elter (Either-Or, 1843), he discusses the razor-edge decision made by man's free will, which determines his personal relation to God. In 1846, events in his private life led him to experience a deeper commitment to Christianity and to attack with new vigor orthodox, organized religion. For Kierkegaard the relation with God must be a lonely, agonizing experience of a man's inner solitude. During his lifetime he was not recognized in Denmark as a genius; a rebel against secure bourgeois morality, he was mocked and reviled for his unorthodox views and for the strange, ungainly figure he cut on the cheerful streets of Copenhagen. The 20th-century revival of Kierkegaard was initiated by the German philosophers Heidegger and Jaspers, and furthered by members of the French existentialist movement, notably Sartre and Camus.

Killers, The (1927). A short story by Ernest Hemingway. One of Hemingway's most famous works, this story has as its protagonist Nick Adams, the same figure who appears in many of the stories of In Our Time. Two city gunmen enter a small-town lunchroom to inquire about Ole Anderson, an ex-prizefighter, whom they announce they are going to kill for having double-crossed them. Nick, a customer in the lunchroom, goes to warn Anderson in his rooming-house, but Anderson, knowing that there is no final escape for him, refuses to help himself. The story does not really deal with urban gangsters; its focus is on Nick and the effect on him of the acceptance of violence.

Kilgrew, Thomas (1612–1683). English dramatist and theater manager. A favorite of Charles II, he wrote several plays, including the licentious tragi-comedy The Parson's Wedding (1640). He is also remembered as the founder of the first Theatre Royal (1663) in Drury Lane.

Kilmansieg, Miss. The heroine of Thomas Hood's satirical poem Miss Kilmansieg and her Golden Leg (1828). She is an heiress of great expectations who has an artificial leg of solid gold.

Kim, [Alfred] Joyce (1886–1918). American poet. He is remembered chiefly for his poem Trees, which was published first in Poetry in August, 1913, won its author national fame, and became the title poem of Trees and Other Poems (1914). Kilmer had earlier published a collection, Summer of Love (1911), and published another one later, Main Street and Other Poems (1917). He was killed in France during World War I. His wife, Aline Kilmer (1888–1941), was also a poet and published several collections, including Candles That Burn (1919) and The Poor King's Daughter and Other Poems (1925).

Kim (1901). A novel of Indian life by Rudyard Kipling. The hero, an Irish boy named Kimball O'Hara, is an orphan shifting for himself in Lahore. He attaches himself to a holy man, an old lama from Tibet who is on a quest for the mystic River of the Arrows, and together the pair roam about India. By accident Kim is recognized by his father's Irish regiment and much against his wishes is sent to school. During the long vacations he still tramps with his beloved lama. His intimate knowledge of India makes him a valuable asset to the English Secret Service, in which he wins renown while still a boy. The book abounds in brilliant descriptions of Indian scenes.

King, Clarence (1842–1901). American geologist and author. King presented to Congress a plan for the survey of the Cordillera ranges from eastern Colorado to the California boundary. He was placed in charge of the approved project, and, leading a corps of geologists, was the first to explore and describe the Yosemite Valley, an area of about 100 miles in width. The monumental Report of the Geological Exploration of the Fortieth Parallel (1870–1878), one of the finest of government publications, included the results of the survey. King, a gifted writer, also published a volume called Mountaineering in the Sierra Nevada (1872; rev. ed., 1902); appearing first in The Atlantic Monthly, the book includes scientific description as well as vivid narrative. In 1871, King met Henry Adams, with whom he traveled and whose work he greatly influenced. Once considered by many an ideal American, King suffered financial loss during the business depression in 1893. During 1894, he suffered a nervous breakdown and remained in Bloomington Asylum for several months. He died of tuberculosis, alone and uncared for, in an Arizona tavern.

King, Edward. See Lycidas.

King, Henry (1592–1669). English poet and churchman, bishop of Chichester. An intimate friend of Donne and possibly his first editor, he was also close to Ben Jonson and Izaak Walton. King wrote two volumes of verse: Psalms of David Turned into Meter (1651) and Poems, Elegies, Paradoxes and Sonnets (1657).

King Arthur and the Emperor Lucius. See Morto d'Arthur, Le.

King Cole. See Cole, King.

King Horn. See Horn, King.

Kingis Quair (1424, pub. 1783). A long poem by James I of Scotland. Written while the king was a prisoner in England, it laments his fortune and celebrates a beautiful woman, Lady Jane Beaufort, whom he married. Quair is an older form of quire, "booklet." In modern times, Maurice Hewlett has written a novel called The Queen's Quair and James Leslie a trilogy called A Scots Quair.

King James Bible. See Bible, English versions.

King John, The Life and Death of (c. 1595). A historical play by William Shakespeare. The action concerns the efforts of the weak and despicable King John to fend off the royal claims of Arthur, duke of Brittany, who is supported by the king of France. In spite of the able support of Philip Faulconbridge, John alienates the English nobility and runs disastrously afool of the pope. In the end he is poisoned, and his son, Henry III, becomes king. An earlier play, The Troublesome Reign of King John (pub. 1591), was once attributed to Shakespeare.

Kinglyake, Alexander William (1809-1891). English historian. He described a tour of the Near East in Eothen, or Traces of Travel Brought Home from the East (1844), considered a classic English travel book. His Invasion of the Crimea (1853-1887) is a detailed account of the Crimean War.

King Lear (c. 1605). A tragedy by William Shakespeare. Seeking peace in his old age, the weary Lear, king of Britain, resolves to divide his kingdom among his three daughters Goneril, Regan, and Cordelia, but first he requires that they make declarations of their love for him. The first two, crafty and insincere, profess their love in the most grandiloquent terms and are each rewarded, in turn, by the bestowal of a third of the kingdom. Cordelia, the youngest and favorite, then disappoints Lear by stating that she loves him according to her bond "nor more, nor less." Rage blinds him to the deeper, truer love of Cordelia, and he divides the portion designed for her between her sisters. Thus undowered, she is taken by the king of France for his wife. Lear now begins to suffer for his foolish vanity. It quickly becomes clear, as he spends a month first with one and then the other, that Goneril and Regan are grasping hypocrites and that they are bent on humiliating Lear. Goneril refuses to put up his entire retinue and demands that he reduce it to 25; Regan puts Lear's servant, the faithful earl of Kent, in the stocks. In a famous scene, Lear goes out upon the heath in a raging storm and raves with the agony of madness. Cordelia, learning from Kent of her father's condition, brings an army from France to the_mapping of his sons. Goneril and Regan unite against this threat. Cordelia sends attendants out after her father, and they are happily reunited in a tent in the French camp. In the battle that follows, Cordelia's army is defeated and they are taken prisoner. Goneril poisons Regan for love of Edmund, the evil bastard son of Gloucester; then stabs herself.

By an order countermanded too late, Cordelia is hanged in prison and Lear, broken-hearted, dies soon after. A subplot, paralleling the main plot, involves Gloucester, who allows the jealous Edmund to turn him against his real son, Edgar, who loves him. See duke of Albany; duke of Cornwall; Oswald; Lear's Fool; Leir, King.

King Lent. An anglicism for Carême, the festival in which Lent is celebrated.

King Philip (died 1676). Name given by English settlers to Metacom, the son of Massasoit and chief of the Wampanoag tribe. During King Philip's War (1675-76), the most important Indian uprising in New England, Wampanoag, Narragansett, and Nipmuck warriors made sudden raids on frontier settlements, many towns were destroyed and captives taken, including the famous Mrs. Mary Rowlandson. Although the Indians were initially successful, the movement collapsed after Philip's death. See also Benjamin Tompson.

Kings, The First Book and The Second Book of. Two books of the Old Testament. Together these books—originally one—relate the history of Israel from the last years of David to the Babylonian Exile. They record the stories of Solomon's reign (c. 960 B.C.) and the decline of the Southern Kingdom, which followed, ending with the destruction of the temple in Jerusalem in 586 B.C.

king's evil. Scorbut. It was so called from a notion that prevailed from the reign of Edward the Confessor to that of Queen Anne that it could be cured by the royal touch. The Jacobites considered that the power did not descend to William III and Anne because the divine hereditary right was not fully possessed by them, but an office for such healing remained in the Prayer Book till 1719. Prince Charles Edward, when he claimed to be prince of Wales, touched a female child for the disease in 1745; but the last person touched in England was Dr. Johnson, in 1712, when only 30 months old, by Queen Anne.

The French kings laid claim to the same divine power from the time of Clovis (A.D. 481). On Easter Sunday, 1686, Louis XIV touched 1,600 persons, using these words: le Roi te touche, Dieu te guérir.

Kingsley, Rev. Charles (1819-1875). English clergyman, novelist, and poet. Kingsley was much involved in the social reform movements of his time, having been strongly influenced by Carlyle. His earliest novels, Alton Locke and Year (1851), deal with Christian Socialism, a movement with which he was associated. His best-known books are the historical romances Thevaria, Westward Hol, and Hereward the Wake, and his fairy tale The Water Babies. A review of his in Macmillan’s Magazine led to the famous church controversy with Cardinal Newman, which moved the latter to publish his Apologia Pro Vita Sua. See also Muscular Christianity.

Kingsley, Henry (1830–1876). English novelist and journalist, brother of Charles Kingsley. His best-known works are the romantic novels Geoffrey Hamlyn (1859) and Ravenhush (1862). He wrote several other novels, of which The Hillyars and the Burtons (1885) and Mademoiselle Mathilde (1868) are worthy of note, and a number of short stories, essays, and children’s books.

King, the Great Alcalde, The. See MEJOR ALCALDE EL REY, EL.

Kingu. A Babylonian demigod. He was a general and consort of Tiamat, in the War of the Gods. After her defeat, Marduk killed him and fashioned man out of his blood and bones.

King William’s War (1689–1697). A war waged by Great Britain and its American colonies against France and its Indian allies. It was the American phase of the war between the Grand Alliance and Louis XIV and was concluded by the Peace of Ryswick.

Kinsmen, The. See SCUff, THE.

Kipling, Rudyard (1865–1936). English novelist, poet, and short story writer. Born in India of English parents, he was taken to England at the age of six and spent six unhappy years there, later described in Baa Baa, Black Sheep. In 1878 he entered the United Services College in North Devon, and his experiences there later served as the basis for Stalky and Co. Kipling returned to India at the age of 17 where his father had secured him a post at the Civil and Military Gazette of Lahore; the collection of verses Departmental Ditties (1886) and the collection of stories Plain Tales from the Hills were originally written for the Gazette. The stories that he produced as editor, during his last two years in India, of the Allahabad Pioneer were collected into The Phantom Rickshaw (1889).

Kipling returned to England via Japan and America, writing letters during the trip that were to form From Sea to Sea (1899). Once in London, he enjoyed spectacular success: all his Indian volumes were re-published, and he followed up quickly with Life’s Handicap, The Light that Failed, and Barrack-Room Ballads, the collection of poems that included Gunga Din, Fuzzy Wuzzy, Danny Deever, and Mandalay. He wrote The Naulakha (1892) in collaboration with Charles Wilcott Balestier, whose sister Caroline he married in the same year. They settled in Vermont, and during the next five years Kipling published Many Inventions (1893), The Jungle Book (1894), The Second Jungle Book (1895), The Seven Seas (1896), and Captains Courageous (1897). After bitterly quarreling with his brother-in-law Beatty, Kipling returned to England. Except for a brief visit to New York in 1899, when his daughter died of pneumonia and he almost died of the same disease, Kipling never returned to the U.S., and spoke of it with bitterness despite the fact that, with the exception of Mark Twain, no other author had been so popular there as Kipling. In the years between 1897 and 1914, he published The Day’s Work (1899), Stalky and Co. (1899), Kim (1901). Just So Stories, the only book that Kipling himself illustrated, The Five Nations (1903), Traffics and Discoveries (1904), Puck of Pook’s Hill (1906), Actions and Reactions (1909), Rewards and Fairies (1909), A Diversity of Creatures (1917), The Irish Guards in the Great War (1923), a memorial to his only son John, fallen in battle, Debits and Credits (1926), Limits and Renewals (1932), and Something of Myself (1937), an autobiography left unfinished at his death.

Kipling was one of the first English poets to exploit the Cockney dialect. While his life-long glorification of imperialism has antagonized some critics and caused them to miss his more poetic side, it has had no effect on his popularity. Kips (1905). A novel by H. G. Wells. Arthur Kipps is a draper’s apprentice who suddenly acquires wealth and makes comic efforts to fit into his new social world. Eventually he marries a housemaid and settles down to a happy, simple life.

Kirby, William. See GOLDen DOG, THE.

Kirchhoff, Gustav Robert (1824–1887). German physicist. With Robert Bunsen, he developed the method of spectrum analysis and explained the Fraunhofer Lines.

Kirilov, Alexei Nilich. In Feedor Dostoevski’s The Possessed, a fanatically rebellious atheist who resolves to commit suicide, asserting man’s freedom from his terrible fate—death. The idea has been implanted in the half-mad Kirilov by Stavrogin. The revolutionary Pyotr Verkhovencki tries to persuade Kirilov to leave a suicide note confessing to the murder of Savatoev, who has been killed by Verkhovencki’s group.

Kirkland, Caroline [Matilda Stansbury]. Pen name, Mrs. Mary Clavers (1801–1864). American writer. Mrs. Kirkland, who traveled to the West with her missionary husband expressed her disillusionment with the crudeness of pioneer life in these books of semifictional narrative: A New Home—Who’ll Follow (1839), Forest Life (1842), and Western Clearings (1845).

Kirkland, Joseph (1830–1894). American novelist. The son of Caroline Kirkland, he was one of the earliest exponents of realism. Kirkland was known for his frank and powerful studies of life in the Middle West. His best novel, Zury, The Meanest Man in Spring County (1887), was taken from his own grim youthful experience.

Kirkrap. See FAERIE QUEENE, THE.

Kirkup, James (1923– ). English poet, novelist, and playwright. Among his collections of poetry are The Cosmic Shape (1947), A Spring Journey (1954), and The Prodigal Son (1959). The Love of Others (1962) is a novel, and Upon This Rock (1955) is a play.

Kirov, Sergei Mironovich (1886–1934). Russian revolutionary leader. One of Stalin’s chief aides and a member of the praesidium (1930–1934), Kirov was the Communist Party’s secretary for the Leningrad area whose assassination in 1934 set off the purges of 1936–1937.

Kirsanov, Pavel Petrovich. In Ivan Turgenev’s novel Fathers and Children, the chief antagonist of the nihilist Bazarov, Pavel Petrovich, who defends the aristocratic way of life against the iconoclastic young radical, is called by Bazarov “an archaic phenomenon” and an “idiot.”

Kirshon, Vladimir Mikhailovich (1902–1938). Russian dramatist. His plays, which champion the Soviet world against all forms of intervention and counterrevolution, include Konstantin Terekhin (Rast, 1927) and Khleb (Bread, 1930).

Kishar. See Anshar.

kismet (from Turk, qismet, portion, lot). Fate; the fulfilment of destiny.

Kissbreech, Lord. An anglicism for Seigneur de Baiscule, the plaintiff in the great lawsuit against Lord Buckfast in Rabelais’ Gargantua and Pantagruel.

Kiss Me Kate (1948). A musical comedy with libretto by Bella and Samuel Spewack and music by Cole Porter. Based on Shakespeare’s The Taming of the Shrew, it contains some of Porter’s best-known songs and is often considered his best musical.

Kit-cat Club. A club formed in the beginning of the 18th century by the leading Whigs of the day, whose meetings were held in the house of Christopher Catt, a pastrycook. Catt’s mutton pies, which were eaten at the club, were also called kit-cats, and probably gave the club its name. The publisher Jacob Tonson was secretary, and the members included Richard Steele, Joseph Addison, William Congreve, Samuel Garth, John Vanbrugh, Robert Walpole, and William Pulteney. Their portraits by Sir Godfrey Kneller were reduced to three-quarter length in order to accommodate them to the size of the clubroom wainscot. Hence, a three-quarter portrait is still called a kit-cat.

kitchen cabinet. A name applied to President Andrew Jackson’s informal advisers (1829–1833). The name was used in a derogatory manner by Jackson’s political opponents, with particular reference to Francis P. Blair and Amos Kendall, both of whom were connected with the pro-Jackson newspaper The Globe.

Kitely. In Ben Jonson’s Every Man in His Humour, a rich elderly merchant. He is convinced that his young wife has made him a cuckold. His “horns [in the mind are worse than o’ the head.” Ironically, his wife is equally suspicious of his activities.

Kithara. See Greek Music.

Kittredge, George Lyman (1860–1941). American teacher and scholar. Kittredge, who taught at Harvard University from 1888 to 1936, was known as a great Shakespearean authority. Among his important works were The Language of Chaucer’s “Troylus” (1894), English and Scottish Popular Ballads (1904), with H. C. Sargent; Chaucer and His Poetry (1915); Sir Thomas Malory (1925); Witchcraft in Old and New England (1929); and an edition of The Complete Works of Shakespeare (1936).

Kivi, Aleksis. Pen name of A. Stenvall (1834–1872). Finnish novelist, playwright, and poet. Regarded as his country’s greatest 19th-century writer, Kivi found inspiration for his best work in the country life of Finland. In Kullervo (1864) he dramatized an episode from the Kalevala, while in the comedy Nummisuutarit (Shoemakers of the Heath, 1864) and in the novel Seitsemän Veljestä (Seven Brothers, 1870) he depicted Finnish peasant life with a realism and humor that have never been matched by any other writer. He is also noted for his numerous collections of lyric verse.

Kjartan. In the Laxdala Saga, a young Icelander in love with the strong-willed heroine Gudrun. When he returns home from the Danish court and learns Gudrun has married his cousin Bolli, he takes a wife of his own, Hrefna. During the ensuing feud between the two couples, Kjartan continues to love Gudrun and defend her even when she is in the wrong.

Klaboterman. The kobold of the phantom ship, Carmilhan.

Klabund. Pen name of Alfred Henschke (1890–1928). German poet, playwright, and novelist. He was a versatile writer with expressionistic leanings and wide cultural interests. His novels include Piotr (Peter the Great, 1923), Borgia (1928) and Raspustin (1929).

Klaus or Claus, Peter. German legendary hero, the prototype of Rip Van Winkle. Klaus is a goatherd of Sittendorf who is led into a deep dell, where he finds 12 knights silently playing skittles. He drinks of their wine and is overpowered with sleep. When he awakens, he is amazed at the height of the grass; and upon discovering how strange his village seems, he realizes he has been asleep for 20 years.

Klee, Paul (1879–1940). Swiss painter. Generally considered one of the great masters of modern painting, Klee spent much of his life in Germany; he joined the Blaue Reiter group in 1912 and taught at the Bauhaus from 1920 to 1929. Interested in the abstract meaning of pictorial representation, he was a highly original metaphysical painter, who by his playful line and subtle use of color created an art of great whimsy and spontaneity.

Kleist, Ewald von (1715–1759). German poet and grand-uncle of Heinrich von Kleist. He is most famous for his long philosophical lyric Der Frühling (The Spring, 1749) and for his heroic Ode an die preussische Armee (Ode to the Prussian Army, 1757).

Kleist, Heinrich von (1777–1811). German dramatist and novella writer, considered by many the greatest of all German authors in both genres. As a young man, he was induced by his family to undertake a career in the Prussian army, but in 1799 he resigned his commission and began an intensive study of mathematics and philosophy in hopes of perfecting his mind and gaining intellectual control over his destiny. In 1801, however, after reading Kant, his faith in the perfectability of knowledge was shattered, and for the first time he turned decisively to a career in writing. During 1801–1802 he worked on two plays, Robert Guiskard and Die Familie Schroffenstein (The Schroffenstein Family, pub. 1803), a tragedy of errors influenced by Shakespeare’s Romeo and Juliet. Though he never carried the latter beyond a fragmentary stage, he felt that it would be his magnum opus, and parts of it were highly praised by Wieland; but in 1803, in a fit of despair, he destroyed the manuscript, and the fragment of it that he published in 1808 consisted only of some 500 lines restored from memory. The year 1803, however, also saw the completion of his great comedy The Broken John. He then spent three years as a government official in Königsberg. But in 1807 he went to Dresden where, with his friend Adam Müller (1779-1829), he founded the periodical Phäbus (1808) in which his greatest novel, Michael Kohlhaas, appeared. By 1809 he had also completed several more plays: an adaptation of Molière's Amphitryon, Das Königchen von Hellebron, and Penthesilea.

Around 1808, along with the growing anti-Napoleonic movement in Germany, Kleist's interests became more patriotic. In 1810, again with Müller, he began editing the Berliner Abendblätter (Berlin Evening News) in which he took a firm stand against Napoleon; and in the same year he completed his last play, the strongly patriotic Prinz Friedrich von Homburg. But in 1811, after his newspaper had been closed by the government, after all hope had faded of a successful German uprising against Napoleon in the near future, and in despair about his lack of literary recognition, he took his own life.

In form, Kleist's dramas show the clear influence of Schiller's classicism; but Kleist's characters, unlike Schiller's, have no clearly defined structure of moral principles and personal standards upon which to base their actions. They tend more to vacillate unpredictably among various attitudes, to show more the nervousness and insecurity of the modern individual. Some theoretical background to Kleist's dramatic style may be found in his essay Über das Marionettentheater (On the Puppet-Theater, 1810), in which he suggested that man's self-consciousness hinders his creator of abstract paintings, he built tension and simply in accordance with conscious ideas or standards.

Klinger, Friedrich Maximilian (1752–1831). German dramatist of the STURM UND DRANG, which took its name from the title of his play of 1776. His works are noted for boldness of expression and freedom of form. Goethe helped him through Giessen university.

Klingsor or Klingshor. An evil magician in medieval German legend. His small role in Wolfram von Eschenbach's Parzival (13th century) is greatly expanded in Wagner's opera Parsifal. He also appears in the stories of the Wartburg singing contest.

Klostock, Friedrich Gottlieb (1724–1803). German poet in the movement of irrationalism. In his preference for classical forms, especially the elegy and ode, and his virtually total rejection of rhyme, he was consciously attempting to develop for the German language a classical perfection of its own that would place it on a par with Greek and Latin. His major work is a religious epic in hexameters, Der Messias (The Messiah, 1773; final version, 1800), which shows the influence of Milton and pietism. He was deeply patriotic and hoped to be remembered as a prophet of his country's future greatness. This side of him appears in much of his lyric and in his dramatic trilogy (1769–1787) celebrating Hermann, the Germanic hero who defeated the Romans in the first century. His most famous prose work, Die Deutsche Gelehrtenrepublik (The German Republic of Letters, 1774) proposes the outlines of a utopian state in Germany, and parallels the poet's more practical efforts toward the founding of a German Academy. See Bodmer; Göttinger Hain.

Klotho. See the Fates.

Knaben Wunderhorn, Des (The Boy's Wonderhorn; vol. 1, 1805; vol. 2, 1808; vol. 3, 1818). A collection of folk songs edited by Clemens Brentano and Achim von Arnim, named for the first song in it. As opposed to Herder's earlier cosmopolitan collection of Volkslieder (Folk Songs, 1778-1779), the Wunderhorn contains only German songs and was intended to draw attention specifically to the German folk spirit. It is not, however, a scholarly work, for Brentano and Arnim frequently made their own changes in the material they collected.

Knecht, Josef. The hero of Hesse's Magister Ludi. Though he rises to the position of master in the hierarchy of the glass-bead game, the fact that his name in German means servant is a central indication of the book's pervasive irony. Even as he dominates the game, he is dominated by it.

Kneller, Sir Godfrey (1649–1723). German-born English portrait painter. Highly successful, he served English kings from Charles II to George I.

Knickerocker, Diedrich. A character invented by Washington Irving.

Knight, Eric (1897–1943). Anglo-American writer. Knight's best-known tales are laid in Yorkshire, particularly The Flying Yorkshirman (1937), in which he created the character of Sam Small. His other works include the popular juvenile Laistye Come Home (1940), the novel This Above All (1941), and the short-story collection Sam Small Flies Again (1942).

Knight, George Wilson (1897— ). English literary critic. His studies of Shakespeare's plays were controversial and influential; in them he treats the plays as poems expressing cosmic ideas through patterns of imagery. Among his books are The Wheel of Fire (1930), The Shakespearean Tempest (1932), The Mutual Flame (1955), and The Golden Labrinth (1962).

Knight, Sarah Kemble. Known as Madam Knight (1666–1727). American schoolteacher. She is known for the diary in which she recorded observations and impressions of a journey made on horseback from Boston to New York in the winter of 1704–1705. Published in 1825, her Journal is a firsthand source of information on the transportation, housing, manners, and speech of early 18th-century New England.

Knighly, Mr. See Emma.
Knight of the Burning Pestle, The (c. 1607). A comedy by Francis Beaumont. (See BEAUMONT AND FLETCHER.) A performance of a play called The London Merchant is interrupted by a grocer who insists upon interspersing it with scenes from his own concoction, The Knight of the Burning Pestle, with his apprentice Ralph in the leading role. In the hilarious potpourri that follows, hackneyed sentimental scenes from bourgeois romance are laced with scenes from the grocer's effort, a parody of chivalric romance with Ralph cast as a kind of Don Quixote. The whole thing is continuously interrupted with comments by the grocer and his wife.

Knight of the Garter. See GARTER, ORDER OF.

Knights, The (Hippies). A comedy by Aristophanes. Because of its political topicality, this play is less interesting to modern audiences than some others by Aristophanes. It is remarkable, however, for the freedom with which the playwright is able to attack the powerful Athenian demagogue Cleon and for the fact that he was awarded a first prize.

Knight's Gambit (1939). A book of interrelated stories by William Faulkner. Dealing with the various inhabitants of Yoknapatawpha County, Knight's Gambit is a collection of detective stories in which Gavin Stevens, the county attorney, ferrets out the real culprits and saves the innocent. The book is ingenious and skillfully narrated; perhaps the best story is Monk, which deals with an idiot who is imprisoned for a murder he did not commit and who finally is incited to kill the warden who has befriended him.

Knights of Labor. A pioneer U.S. labor organization. Founded as a secret league in Philadelphia in 1869, it aimed at the regulation of wages, of the degree of skill to be exacted from workmen, and of the length of a day's work, as well as attempting to control strikes. The league decided when a strike was to take place and when the workmen of the union might resume work.

Knights of Malta. First called "Knights of St. John of Jerusalem," otherwise "Knights of Rhodes," the most celebrated religious military order of the Middle Ages.

Knight's Tale, The. One of the Canterbury Tales of Geoffrey Chaucer, a chivalric romance adapted from Boccaccio's Teseida. Theseus of Athens defeats Creon at Thebes, and the royal Theban cousins Palamon and Arcite are imprisoned in a tower. They see Emily, sister of Theseus' wife Hippolyta, walking in a garden; both fall in love with her. Arcite is released and banished from the territory, but he returns and works disguised as a court servant. Palamon escapes from prison, also determined to win Emily; the cousins meet by accident and determine to fight the next day in knighthood regalia for the right to love her. Theseus interrupts the battle and orders that in a year the combatants will each bring 100 knights to a tourney. Emily prays to Diana that both warriors will forget their quarrel and desert her, but her prayer is rejected. Palamon prays to Venus that he may win his beloved, while Arcite prays to Mars that he may triumph in the battle. Accordingly, Saturn arranges that Arcite be victorious in the joust, but be thrown by his horse as he rides toward Emily. Dying, he yields Emily to Palamon, and after a suitable time the two are happily married.

Knoblock, Edward (1874–1945). British playwright, scenarist, and novelist. His works include Kismet (1911), Milestones (with Arnold Bennett; 1921), and Grand Hotel (from the novel by Vicki Baum).

Knowles, James Sheridan (1784–1862). Irish-born English playwright and actor. He wrote both verse tragedies, such as Caius Gracchus (1815) and Virginius (1820), and comedies, such as The Hunchback (1832) and The Love-Chase (1837).

Know-Nothing party. In U.S. history, a popular name for the American party, which reached its greatest influence in 1854–1855. Its program called for the exclusion of Catholics and foreigners from public office and for other nativist measures. It was originally a secret society whose members answered questions with "I don't know." The party split over the slavery issue and faded after the election of 1856.

Knox, John (1505–1572). Scottish reformer and founder of Presbyterianism. He was twice at Geneva in personal contact with Calvin (1554, 1556–1558). He published six tracts dealing with religion in Scotland; the best known are his Blasts of the Trumpet Against the Monstrous Regiment of Women (1st and 2nd, 1558). They were not meant for Queen Elizabeth but offended her deeply. Knox preached throughout Scotland against Mary Queen of Scots, whom he simply called "Jezebel," and against Catholicism in general.

Knut. See CANUTE.

kōan (Ch. Chung-an). In Zen Buddhism, the problem or case to be meditated upon. Frequently paradoxical, and usually concerned with the sayings and actions of Chinese Ch'An (Zen) masters, it is one of the methods used for training in Japanese Rinzai Zen. A kōan is always studied under the guidance of a Zen master. There are some 1,700 kōans.

Kobayashi Issa (1763–1827). Japanese haiku poet. He is noted for the humorous and simple treatment of his subjects. He was a prolific writer of both poetry and prose.

Kober, Arthur (1900– ). Polish-born American writer and playwright. Kober is noted for his dialect stories set in the Bronx or Hollywood. These appeared in the New Yorker and were later reissued in several books, the best known being Having Wonderful Time (1937), the story of a group of vacationers in the Berkshires who try to improve themselves culturally. It became a play (1937) and was later made into a successful musical called Wish You Were Here (1952).

kobold. In German folklore a mischievous house spirit, similar to Robin Goodfellow or the Scottish Brownie. It is also a gnome who works in the mines and forests.

Koch, Robert (1843–1910). German physician, one of the pioneers of modern bacteriology. He discovered the anthrax and tuberculosis bacilli and did research on cholera, malaria, and other diseases. He was awarded the Nobel Prize for medicine in 1905.

Koel or Kokila. An Indian bird often mentioned in imaginative writing. The poignance of the koel's song is supposed to convey the sad sweetness of frustrated or alienated love. In Sanskrit it is called parabhrita, "brought up by another," because the female koel leaves her eggs in the nest of a crow, where they are hatched.

Koestler, Arthur (1905- ). Hungarian novelist and essayist. Bilingual from childhood, Koestler became a German-language journalist and a writer of popular articles on science. In 1926 he left Europe for Palestine, and remained in the Near East for some time. His life from his childhood until the end of this period is described in the first volume of his autobiography, Arrow in the Blue (1952). In 1931 he became a member of the Communist Party. While covering the Spanish Civil War for an English newspaper, he was captured by the Fascists early in 1937 and spent three months in prison under sentence of death before being released through British intervention. His war and prison experiences he recorded in Spanish Testament (1938) and in the shorter Dialogue with Death (1942). The Invisible Writing (1954), the second volume of his autobiography, deals with the seven-year period of his membership in the Communist Party. At the beginning of the Second World War he was arrested in France as a refugee and sent to the detention camp at Le Vernet, about which he wrote in Scum of the Earth (1941). He was released in 1940, and after the end of the war became a British subject.

Among his nonfiction works are The Yogi and the Commissar (1943), essays; Promise and Fulfilment (1949), a report of the fighting between the Jews and the Arabs after the partition of Palestine; In Sight and Outlook (1949); The Trail of the Dinosaur (1955); Reflections on Hanging (1957), which helped end capital punishment, except in special cases, in England; and The Lotus and the Robot (1961), an examination of Eastern and Western thought. He is perhaps best known for his novel Darkness at Noon (1941), based on the Moscow trials during the 1930's. His other novels include The Gladiators (1939), based on Spartacus and the slave revolt; Arrival and Departure (1943); Thieves in the Night (1946), a story of Jewish settlers in Palestine in the 1930's; and The Age of Longing (1951).

Kohlhass, Michael. See Michael Kohlhass.

Kokoschka, Oskar (1886- ). Austrian painter and playwright. Known as an exponent of expressionism, he is primarily significant as a painter. His plays, however, with their tendency to depict extreme human agony in almost abstract terms and with their use of an ecstatic and compressed diction, contributed considerably to the development of expressionist dramatic style. The best known are Mörder, Hoffnung der Frauen (Muderer, Hope of Women, 1907), Hiob (Job, 1917), and Orpheus and Eurydice (1918).

Kolchak, Aleksandr Vasilyevich (1874-1920). Russian admiral. The leader of the anti-Bolshevik forces in the Far East during the civil war in Russia, he advanced far into western Russia before having to retreat. He was captured and executed by the Bolsheviks.

Komsomol. The youth organization of the Soviet Communist Party.

Koo, V[i] K[yuin] Wellington (1887- ). Chinese statesman. He represented his country on the Council of the League of Nations (1932-1934); was ambassador to France (1936-1941); ambassador to England (1941-1946); ambassador to the U.S. (1946-1956). "Wellington" became part of his name through sound association with the original Wei-chun.

Kopit, Arthur (1957- ). American playwright. His plays, often distinguished by their dark humor, by their mixing of realistic and antirealistic elements, and by the longest titles in theatrical history—except, perhaps, for those of the Renaissance—have caused certain critics to classify him among the playwrights of the absurd. His works include On the Runaway of Life Yen Never Know What's Coming off Next (1958); Oh Dad, Poor Dad, Mam's Hung You in the Closet and I'm Feeling So Sad (1960); The Day the Whores Came out to Play Tennis (1963); and Milhdaim (1963).

Korah. An Old Testament Levite, his name signifying "ice." He led a rebellion against Moses and Aaron for which he was swallowed by the earth (Num. 16; 269-11). His descendants, the Korahites, were temple musicians.

Koran. The Islam Bible, the sacred book of the Muslims. In Arabic, the word means reading, from quran; the variant form, Al koran, has a prefixed article. Written in the purest Arabic, it is considered the Word of God, the uncreated and eternal truth revealed to Muhammad by the angel Gabriel. The tradition that the text should be transmitted orally had to be broken under the third Caliph, Othman, when the best Koran reciters had fallen in battle. There are 114 Suras or chapters in the Koran, unnumbered but individually named. Historically, the subject matter is of Jewish, and to a lesser extent, of Christian origin.

Kore. See Persephone.

Korneichuk, Alexander Evdokimovich (1905- ). Russian dramatist. Noted for their use of Ukrainian themes and their strong nationalist and militaristic devotion to the Soviet regime, his plays include On the Ukrainian Steppes (1941), a sequel, Guerrillas on the Ukrainian Steppes (1942), The Front (1942), The Sinking of the Squadron (1934), Truth (1937) and Mr. Perkins' Mission to the Land of the Bolsheviks (1944). He has won three Stalin Prizes.

Körner, Theodor (1791-1813). German patriotic poet who died in the wars of liberation against Napoleon (1813-1815). His best-known collection is Leier und Schwert (Lyre and Sword, 1814).

Kornilov, Lavr Georgyevich (1870-1918). Russian general. The commander of the troops in Petrograd after the revolution (1917), he attempted to overthrow the Kerenski regime, and afterwards fought against the Bolsheviks in the civil war until his death.

Korobochka. A dull-witted woman landowner in Nikolai Gogol's Dead Souls. Her fear that Chichi-
Korolenko, Vladimir Galaktionovich

Korolenko, Vladimir Galaktionovich (1853–1921). Russian writer and political radical. He was instrumental in helping the young Máskó Gorkí get his start in literature. Korolenko, who was exiled to Siberia for six years by the Czarist government, was also opposed to the Bolshevik regime, an attitude he forcefully expressed in letters to Anatol Lunacharski, the future commissar of education. Korolenko's best works are Makár's Dream (Son makeřa; 1885), a short story depicting the death of a Siberian native; Tongueless (Bez yazyke; 1895), a humorous story of three non-English speaking peasants in America; and The History of My Contemporary (Istoryia moego sovremennika; 1910–1922), an autobiographical work.

Korzybski, Alfred [Habdan] [Count] (1879–1950). Polish-born American semanticist. Korzybski came to the U.S. in about 1915. He founded what he called "general semantics," an approach to semantics that rejects the Aristotelian language structure, with its is of identity, as tending to confuse words with the things for which they stand, to see propositions as either "right" or "wrong," and to limit severely the levels of abstraction. Among his writings is Science and Sanity: An Introduction to Non-Aristotelian Systems and General Semantics (1933). With other general semanticists, he often expressed his views in ETC., A Review of General Semantics.

Koskenniemi, Veikko Antero. Pen name of V. A. Forsnäs (1885–1962). Finnish poet. A university professor and scholar, he is known for his skill as a lyric poet. Careful artistry and subdued melancholy characterize the poems of Runoja (1910) and Sydänsu arvo (Kuolema (1919) and the ballads of Karkiä iera—his Phoenician counterpart seems to be Chusor.

Kotzebue, August von (1761–1819). German dramatist. His Sämtliche dramatische Werke (Complete Dramatic Works, 1827 ff.) fill 44 volumes, but though he was popular in his time, none of his plays is today considered any more than oversentimentalized melodrama. He was ridiculed by the poets of German romanticism, and his reactionary political writings led to his murder by a university student.

Koussevitzky, Sergey Alexandrovich (1874–1951). Russian-born conductor. He began his career as a performer on the double-bass, first conducted publicly in Berlin (1908), and came to the U.S. to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra (1924–1949). He directed the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood and championed modern music.

Kraft-Ebing, Baron Richard von (1840–1902). German neurologist. His Psychopathia Sexualis (1886) is a famous collection of psychiatric case histories.

Kramm, Joseph (1908– ). American playwright. He is best known for The Shrike (1952), a play about a man who tries to commit suicide to escape an overpossessive wife. It won a Pulitzer Prize.

Krapp's Last Tape (1958). A one-act play by Samuel Beckett. Its one character, Krapp, an old man, plays back tapes of monologues he recorded when young and ridicules the passions and ambitions of his youth and middle years, which have come to nothing. In the light of his broken-down old age, hope and optimism seem absurd, and we are made aware of the futility and meaninglessness of life.

Kreisler, Fritz (1875–1962). Austrian-born violin virtuoso and composer. His colorful career includes an amusing hoax by which he convinced the public that many of his own works were written by Baroque or Classical composers. He wrote some memoirs: Four Weeks in the Trenches: The War Story of a Violinist (1915) about his experiences in the Austrian army.

Kremlin. A walled section of Moscow, containing cathedrals and palaces dating back to the 15th century. There are 20 towers of various sizes and architectural styles. The largest building, the Great Kremlin Palace, is now used for sessions of the Supreme Soviet, the Soviet Union's governing body. Until Peter the Great moved the capital to St. Petersburg in 1712, the Kremlin was the residence of the Czars. After the revolution it became the seat of government and a symbol of Soviet power.

Kretzer, Max (1854–1941). German novelist. He is known only for his early works, which show affinities with the movement of naturalism, especially Die Betrogenen (The Betrayed Ones, 1882), Die Verkommenen (The Fallen Ones, 1883), and Meister Timpe (Master Timpe, 1888). All these novels stress the needs of the proletariat and reflect Kretzer's socialist sympathies.

Kriemhild. Heroine of the Nibelungenlied, known as Gudrun in the Völsunga Saga and Gutrune in Wagner's Ring des Nibelungen.

Krishna (Sansk., "the black one"). One of the greatest of the Hindu deities. The god of fire, lightning, storms, the heavens, and the sun, he is usually regarded as the eighth avatar of Vishnu. One legend relates that Kama, the demon-king of Mathura, committed great ravages so that Brahma prayed to Vishnu to relieve the world of this distress. Vishnu plucked off two hairs, one white, the other black, and promised they would revenge the wrongs of the demon-king. The black hair became Krishna.

Another legend says that Krishna was the son of Vasudeva and Devaki. When he was born among the Yadava tribe at Mathura, between Delhi and Agra, his uncle King Kamsa, who had been warned by a prophecy that this nephew would slay him, sought to kill Krishna, who was, however, smuggled away. He was brought up by shepherds, and later he killed his uncle and became king of the Yadavas. He is often represented playing on his divine flute and attracting the gagis or cowherdesses to dance the rasa-lila around him in the moonlight. To Arjuna on the battlefield (see Bhagavadgita), he becomes a provider of divine consolation and inspiration. See MA-

HABHARATA.

Kriss Kringle. The Pennsylvania Dutch Santa Claus. On Christmas Eve, arrayed in a fur cap and strange apparel, he goes to the bedroom of each good child, where he leaves a present in the stocking that is hung up in expectation of his visit. The word is a dialectal variant of High German Christkindl, "the little Christ child," and has undergone such radical changes because it is no longer associated with either of its component parts.

Kristin Lavransdatter (1920–1922). A trilogy of historical novels by Sigrid Undset. Re-creating a woman's life in the devout Catholic Norway of the 13th and 14th centuries, this great romance appeared in successive volumes: The Bridal Wreath (Kronen

s; 1920), The Mistress of Husaby (Husfre; 1921), and

The Cross (Koret; 1922).

Kröger, Tonio. See Tonio KRÖGER.

Kronos. See CRONOS.

Krook. In Charles Dickens' Bleak House, pro-oprietor of a rag-and-bone warehouse where everything seems to be bought and nothing sold. He is a grasping drunkard who eventually dies of spontaneous combustion.

Kropotkin, Prince Piotr Alekseyevich (1842– 1921). Russian social philosopher and geographer.

A leading theorist of anarchism, Kropotkin took part during the 1870's in the revolutionary movement against the Czarist government. To escape arrest, he emigrated to Europe and settled in England (1876).

He returned to Russia in 1917, but was no friendlier to the Bolsheviks than he had been to the Czars.

His most famous book, Zapisiki revolyutsionera

(Memoirs of a Revolutionist, 1899), describes the social ferment in Russia during the reign of Alexander II.

Krull, Felix. See CONFESSIONS OF FELIX KRULL:

CONFIDENCE MAN.

Krupp. A German family in control of the corporation that built and managed the greatest ordnance works in modern Germany. The firm was founded in 1811 by Friedrich Krupp (1787–1826) as a steel mill, and expanded rapidly under Alfred Krupp (1812–1887). Bertha Krupp (1886–1957), who controlled the firm during World War I, gave her name to the long-range gun, Big Bertha. After World War II, production shifted to peacetime machinery.

Alfred Krupp von Bohlen und Halbach (1907– ) is now the sole owner.

Krutkh, Joseph Wood (1893– ). American critic, essayist, and teacher. Krutch was a drama critic for The Nation for many years, as well as an English professor at Columbia University and elsewhere. His critical works include Edgar Allan Poe: A Study of Genius (1926), one of the first psychoanalytical interpretations of literature; Five Masters, a Study in the Mutations of the Novel (1929); and The American Drama Since 1918 (1939; revised in 1957). His essays are collected in The Modern Temper (1929),

The Measure of Man (1954), and Human Nature and the Human Condition (1959), in which he discussed the need for humanistic values in a mechanized society. The Desert Year (1952) and The Best of Two Worlds (1953) deal with natural history.

Krylov, Ivan Andreyevich (1769–1844). Russian fabulist. In his early career both dramatist and journalist, Krylov published his collections of fables from 1809 on. They have become classics in Russian literature and were translated into English by the British historian Sir Bernard Pares in 1927.

Kshatriya. See CASTE.

Chinese Buddhist deity, the BODHISATTVA of Mercy.

She is much represented in painting and sculpture and the object of popular veneration.

Kubera or Kuvera. In Hindu mythology, the god of wealth. He was the half-brother of Ravana, the demon-king of Ceylon.

Kublai Khan (1216–1294). Mongol emperor of China after 1259 and grandson of Genghis Khan.

He established his court at what is now Peking (1264) and founded the Yuan dynasty, which ended in 1368.

His kingdom, finally extending as far as Russia, flourished under his patronage of commerce and culture. His reign was vividly described by Marco Polo, and the splendor of his court inspired S. T. Cole-ridge's poem KUBLA KHAN.

Kubla Khan (1797). An unfinished poem by

Samuel Taylor COLE RIDGE. According to Coleridge, the poem was composed in an opium-induced sleep; when he awoke he immediately began to set it down, but was interrupted by a visitor, and when he returned to his task, he found that the rest of the poem had vanished from his memory. A precursor, to some extent, of both symbolism and surrealism, the poem is considered one of his best. See XANADU.

Kūkai (774–835). Japanese priest, founder of Shingon Buddhism. The most literate scholar of his time, he was influential in the introduction of Chinese learning to Japan. His command of the Chinese language and the diversity of his writings marks him as one of the major literary figures of the early Heian period (794–1185). He is known posthumously as Köbō Daishi.

Ku Klux Klan. A name given to two American secret societies. The original Ku Klux Klan was formed about 1866, in Pulaski, Tenn.; an organization for ex-Confederates, it was dedicated to Southern white political supremacy. It developed into a secret society whose purpose was frightening Negroes into submission. In April, 1867, the Grand Wizard or Cyclops of the Pulaski group, Nathan Bedford Forrest, called a convention of delegates to Nashville. At this convention the Klan declared its principles, which were to protect the weak and aid the enforcement of the Constitution. Two years later, Forrest disbanded the group when it proved to be an instrument of violence. In 1870 and 1871, Congress passed the Ku Klux Klan acts, to deal with offenders.

In 1915, a new Ku Klux Klan was organized on a nationwide basis in Georgia. Its avowed aims were to maintain “pure Americanism” and white supremacy; it attacked Negroes, Catholics, Jews, as well as such ideas as birth control, Darwinism, pacifism, and the repeal of prohibition. In the early 20's, the Klan was reputed to have a membership of 5 million throughout the U.S. After its terrorist activities were exposed in newspapers after 1923, it began to splinter and decline; it still exists, but in a limited form.

Many novelists have written about the Klan, both favorably and unfavorably. In Thomas Nelson Page's Red Rock, the hero is a Klan leader. A clergyman, Thomas Dixon, Jr., made the Klan the subject of several novels, including the sensational Clansman (1905); this novel, the basis of the motion picture The Birth of a Nation (1915), is credited with reviving interest in the society. Two anti-Klan novels are Howard Fast's Freedom Road (1944) and Ward Greene's King Cobra (1940).

The name of the society is taken from the Greek word kuklos, meaning band or circle; it is often referred to with the abbreviation K. K. K.

Kulak. A wealthy Russian peasant. The name, derived from the word for “fist,” was used derogatorily by Soviet authorities who exterminated the class in the 1920's to make way for the collectivization of agriculture.

Kulbrah and Olwen (c. 1100). One of the tales in the Welsh Mabinogion. This prose narrative is especially important, being perhaps the earliest, fully-fledged Arthurian romance. Kulbrah, the hero, gains the help of Arthur and his followers in accomplishing the hard tasks set by the giant Ysbaddaden, whose beautiful daughter Olwen he seeks to win.

Kulturkampf (Ger., cultural battle). The struggle between Bismarck and the Roman Catholic church in the 1870's. Considering the church a threat to national unity, Bismarck imposed laws restricting Catholic worship and education, expelled the Jesuits, and forced many bishops into exile.

Kumar. See KARTTIKEYA.

Kumarbi. In Hurrian mythology, the supreme god. Kumarbi is probably best known for his role in the Hittite myth of the Stone Monster. After nine years as vizier of the sky god Anu, Kumarbi revolted. He won the ensuing battle by emasculating Anu with his teeth, but was soon alarmed to discover that Anu's two children were growing inside him. After a good deal of trial and error, Kumarbi managed to give birth to them. The second of these children promptly overthrew Kumarbi and replaced his true father, Anu, on the throne. On the advice of the lord of the sea, Kumarbi now impregnated a mountain, which, in due course, labored mightily and brought forth a baby made of stone. The delighted Kumarbi named the infant Ullikummi and arranged to have it placed on the right shoulder of Upelluri, the giant who held up earth and heaven, standing in the midst of the ocean. The stone child grew most remarkably, and soon his immense size threatened to topple heaven itself. Neither the might of the gods nor the wiles of Ishtar could prevail against it. Finally, Ea, the god of wisdom, severed his legs at the ankles with a magic knife, and the stone monster fell into the sea. Thus ended Kumarbi's revolt.

Kunitz, Stanley [asspon] (1905– ). American poet and editor. Though his work is not widely known, Kunitz is regarded as one of the better American metaphysical poets. His first volume of poetry was Intellectual Things (1930); Passport to the War appeared in 1944. His Selected Poems, 1928–1938 (1958) was awarded a Pulitzer Prize. With Howard Haycraft he has edited a number of biographical dictionaries of authors, including British Authors of the Nineteenth Century (1936), American Authors: 1600–1900 (1938), Twentieth Century Authors (1942), and British Authors before 1800 (1952).

Künstlerroman (Ger., artist novel). A type of novel popular in German romanticism. It is basically a Bildungsroman (novel of education) in which the hero finally becomes an artist or poet, and thus the figure reflects a characteristic romantic interest in the growth of the artist as a person. The most important examples are Tieck's Franz Sternbald's Wanderungen (Franz Sternbald's Wanderings, 1798) and Novalis' Heinrich von Ofterdingen (1802). In later literature, Joyce's A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man (1915) is such an artist novel.

Kuomintang. The three parts of this Chinese term mean nation, people, and party. The Kuomintang is the nationalist, republican party that was organized chiefly by Dr. Sun Yat-sen and gained control of most of China in 1926–1927. After years of civil war, the communists finally gained control of the mainland (1949) and the Kuomintang, under Chiang Kai-shek, was forced to Taiwan, which it now governs.

Kuprin, Aleksandr Ivanovich (1870–1938). Russian novelist and short-story writer. Kuprin left Russia during the civil war, but returned two years before his death. His work covers a wide range of subjects. Best known are the short novel Poyedinok (The Duel, 1905), a story of army life in a provincial garrison; Yama (The Pit, 1915), an account of a Russian brothel; V tsirkke (The Circus Wrestlers, 1905); Shtabi-kepitan Rybnikov (Captain Rybnikov, 1906), a spy story; and Granatovy braslet (The Bracelet of Garnets, 1911), a sentimental love story.

Kur. The Sumerian underworld and the dragon-like lord thereof. He carried off ERESHKIGAL and fought with Enki, who pursued him. He was destroyed in two other myths by NINURTA and INANNA, respectively. Obviously related to many other dragons slain by heroes of Semitic mythology, he also seems to have had some of the characteristics of the Greek Hades.

Kurma. See VISHNU.

Kärnberger, Ferdinand (1821–1879). German novelist. He is most famous for his Der Amerika-Müde (Tired of America, 1833), which treats the life of Nicolaus Lenau.

Kurosawa Akira (1910– ). Japanese film director. A large number of his films have been successfully shown in the West. Rashōmon won first prize at the Venice Film Festival (1951).
Kurtz. See Heart of Darkness.

Kuru. In Hindu mythology, a legendary monarch. From him are descended the Kauravas and Pandavas, whose contests form the subject of the epic, the Mahabharata. He was a prince of the lunar race, reigning over the country around Delhi.

Kuvera. See Kubera.

Kyd, Thomas (1557–1594). English dramatist. A scrivener by profession, Kyd became the author of the most popular drama of his day with his Senecan revenge-play The Spanish Tragedy (produced between 1584 and 1589). He may have written a lost play on Hamlet, and is thought to have worked on parts of Shakespeare's Titus Andronicus and Henry VI. Arden of Feversham is sometimes attributed to him, as is the anonymously published Solomon and Perseda (written c. 1588). In 1593 he was sharing a room with Christopher Marlowe, and was arrested with him for atheism and heresy. Possibly suffering from his imprisonment and disgrace, he died the following year.

Kyoto. Old capital of Japan (794–1868), formerly known as Heian. It was the site of the imperial court until moved to Tokyo in the Meiji period (1868–1912). Famous as a cultural and sight-seeing center, it has numerous Shinto shrines, Buddhist temples, objects of art, and places of scenic beauty.

Kyrie eleison (Gr., “Lord have mercy”). Originally an invocation to the Greek sungod. This petition is the first fixed chant in most Western Eucharistic liturgies, and is also used in the liturgies of the Eastern churches.
Laban. In the Old Testament, the uncle of Jacob and father of Leah and Rachel. Jacob served him for 14 years in order to marry Rachel.

labarum. The standard borne before the Roman emperors. It consisted of a gilded spear with an eagle on the top. From a cross-staff hung a splendid purple streamer, with a gold fringe, adorned with precious stones. Constantine the Great added Christian symbols to the Roman military symbols at the time of his vision and subsequent conversion to Christianity.

Labé, Louise (15247–1566?). French poet. Celebrated for her talent and beauty, she was one of the best-known of the school of French poets centered at Lyons. In the elegies and sonnets included in her Oeuvres (1555), she expressed in a direct, intense style the torments of a passionate nature which had been profoundly marked by an unhappy love. The wife of a wealthy rope-maker, she was sometimes called la belle cordière.

Labé, Queen. The Circe of the Abarnians, who, by her enchantments, transformed men into horses and other brute beasts. She is introduced into the Arabian Nights when Beder, a prince of Persia, marries her, defeats her plots against him, and turns her into a mare. Restored to her proper shape by her mother, she turns Beder into an owl, but the prince ultimately regains his own form.

Labiche, Eugène [Marin] (1815–1888). French playwright. Responding to the Second Empire's demand for farcical comedy, Labiche wrote a long series of popular plays including Un Chapeau de paille d'Italie (1851) and La Poudre aux yeux (1862). The delightful Le Voyage de M. Perrichon (1860)—perhaps his best-known comedy—was written in collaboration with Edouard Martin.

labors of Hercules. See Hercules.

La Bruyère, Jean de (1645–1696). French writer and moralist of the neoclassical period. La Bruyère's sympathies lay with the ancients in their literary battle with the moderns, and, in addition to being conservative, his outlook was deeply misanthropic. His most famous work, Caractères de Théophraste traduits du grec, avec les caractères ou les Moeurs de ce siècle (Characters of Theophrastus Translated from the Greek, with Characters or the Manners of This Century, 1688), is a piece of social satire in the manner of Thophrastus, combining maxims with character portraits of French social types and individuals of the day.

Labyrinth (Labyrinthos). The palace of Minos in Knossos, the Minoan capital of Crete, said to have been devised by Daedalus. According to the legend, it was a maze-like building in the center of which the Minotaur was imprisoned. The word has come to be applied to any structure with many confusing passages. The origin of the word is not known, but it may be connected with labros, the double ax constantly used in the religious symbolism of ancient Crete.

Lacedaemon (Lakedaimon). An ancient name of Laconia, and of Sparta, its chief city. (See Laconic.)

La Chaise, Père Francois d'Aix de (1624–1709). French Jesuit confessor to Louis XIV. His favorite retreat near Paris later became the site of the cemetery popularly known as the cimetière du Père-Lachaise.

La Chaussée, Pierre Claude Nivelle de (1692–1754). French dramatist, inventor and champion of the comédie larmoyante (Fr., "sentimental comedy"). His most famous play is Le Préjugé à la mode (1735), in which the fashionable attitude of making light of a wife's love is criticized. Many of his other plays, among which are Mélanide (1741) and L'Ecole des mères (1744), are somewhat moralizing. He was elected to the Académie Française in 1736.

Lachesis. See the Fates.

Lacroix, Pierre [Ambroise François] Choderlos de (1741–1803). French artillery officer and author of the epistolary novel Les Liaisons Dangereuses. The novel depicts the immorality of his times, particularly corrupt and cynical seducers of innocence. He was a member of the Jacobin club, became a general, and played an important military role in the French Revolution.

Laconic, Laconian. Pertaining to Laconia or its main city, Sparta. Hence laconic, sparing of words, as the Spartans were reputed to be.

Lacretelle, Jacques de (1888– ). French novelist. His books are usually psychological analyses of lonely characters, such as Silbermann (1922), about a young Jewish student, and Les Hauts Ponts (4 vols., 1932–1935), about a woman's passion for her family.
estate. Other novels include Marie Bonifas (1925) and A Man’s Life (Amour Nuptial; 1929).

Lady Chatterley’s Lover (1928). A novel by D. H. Lawrence, presenting the author’s mystical theories of sex in the story of Constance, or Connie, the wife of an English aristocrat who runs away with her gamekeeper. Her husband, Sir Clifford, is a physical and emotional cripple. The gamekeeper, Mellors, is a forthright, individualistic man, uncon- taminated by industrial society. Because of the frank language and detailed descriptions of love-making, the book was banned in England and the U.S. as obscene. After historic court cases the ban was lifted in the U.S. in 1959 and in England in 1960.

Lady Day. See ANUNCIATION, THE DAY OF THE.

Lady Geraldine’s Courtship (1844). A poem by Elizabeth Barrett Browning. The lady falls in love with a peasant-poet, whom she marries. The poem contained a tribute to the poetry of Robert Browning, which prompted a warm letter from him and their subsequent meeting, romance, and marriage.

Lady Into Fox (1922). A novel by David Garnett. It is a delicate, solemn fantasy about a man whose wife suddenly turns into a fox—and their consequent marital problems.

Lady Macbeth. See Macbeth.

Lady of Pleasure, The (1635). A comedy by James Shirley. The good Sir Thomas Bornwell becomes increasingly alarmed at the growing extravagances of his wife, Aretina. Pretending to become converted to her spendthrift ways, he turns to gambling and begins paying attention to the beautiful widow, Celestina, Lady Bellamour. Eventually, as he had hoped, Aretina becomes alarmed and returns to modesty and thrift.

Lady of the Arroostook, The (1879). A novel by William Dean Howells. Lydia Blood sails for Europe on the Arroostook; a delicate young schoolteacher, she is traveling for her health. The only woman passenger, she attracts the attention of Stanford, who gradually recognizes the nobility of charac- ter beneath her village rusticity. Lydia’s Venetian relatives are interested only in knowing whether Stanford is socially suitable for her. Although Lydia is free of European social restraints, she reveals her upbringing in her shock at Sunday opera and Vene- tian immorality.

Lady of the Fountain, The. A medieval Welsh tale from the MABNNOIT in which are found King Arthur and his court. This tale has a remarkable parallel in the story Yvain by Chrétien de Troyes.

Lady of the Lake. In Arthurian legend, an ob- scure, supernatural figure endowed with magical powers. In Malory’s Morte d’Arthur (c. 1469), she lives in a castle in the midst of a magical lake, which prevents access to her. She steals LAUNCELOT in his infancy and plunges with him into her home in the lake; hence, Launcelot comes to be called Lancelot du Lac (Launcelot of the Lake). When he has grown to manhood, she presents him to King Arthur. It is from the Lady of the Lake that Arthur receives the magical sword EXCALIBUR; he takes it from the mys- terious arm extending above the surface of the lake. She is also known as Nimue or Vivien, the mistress of Merlin, whom she ultimately imprisons forever in a tower. The Lady of the Lake appears in later works, notably in Tennyson’s Idylls of the King (1859-1885) and James Branch Cabell’s Jurgen (1919).

Lady of the Lake, The (1810). A long narra- tive poem by Sir Walter Scott. It tells of Ellen Douglas, who lives with her father near Loch Katrine, and of the varied fortunes of her suitors in troubled times of border warfare. One of her suitors is the king of Scotland, but she finally chooses the bold Malcolm Graeme.

Lady of the Lamp. See Florence NIGHTINGALE.

Lady or the Tiger?, The (1882). A short story by Frank R. Stockton. Stockton originally called the story The King’s Arena and read it at a party given by a friend. Its reception there was so good that he elaborated it and sent it to the Century Magazine. It was the most famous story that magazine ever published; its plot is simple but unique. In a barbaric land a handsome youth is audacious enough to fall in love with the king’s daughter and she with him. His offense is discovered, and he is condemned. In a great arena he must walk up to two doors and open one of them; behind one door is a beautiful maiden who would be given to him in marriage; behind the other is a ravenous tiger. The princess learns the secret of the doors and signals the young man to open the door on the right. Who comes out, asked Stockton, the lady or the tiger? Stockton wrote another story supposed to solve the puzzle, The Discourager of Hesitancy (1887), but it also cleverly left the query unanswered.

Lady Windermere’s Fan (1892). A comedy of manners by Oscar Wilde. Annoyed at her husband’s persistent interest in Mrs. Erlynne, a woman of little reputation, Lady Windermere decides to leave him and run away with Lord Darlington. Mrs. Erlynne, actually Lady Windermere’s mother who deserted her husband and daughter years ago for a lover who then left her, finds the note and rushes to Lord Darlington’s apartments. Here, without revealing her iden- tity, she persuades Lady Windermere not to take this rash step and succeeds in rushing her off in a carriage just as Lord Darlington appears with Lord Windemere. Lord Windermere immediately notices his wife’s fan; Mrs. Erlynne comes forth and generously assumes guilt, saying that she mistook it for her own, thus saving her daughter’s reputation at the expense of her own. She succeeds, however, in convincing Lord Augustus Lawton that it was in his interests that she came to Lord Darlington’s rooms, and the two marry.

Laelaps. In classical mythology, a powerful dog. It was given by Artemis to Procurs which gave it to Cephalus. While pursuing a wild boar it was meta- morphosed into a stone. The name, which was originally that of one of Actaeon’s fifty dogs, means “the hurricane.”

Laelius. See DE AMICITIA.

Laertes. In Shakespeare’s Hamlet, the son of Polonius and brother of Ophelia. A well-meaning but impetuous young man, he contrasts with the intro-Laestrygonians (Laestrygones). A fabulous race of cannibal giants who lived in Sicily. Odysseus sent two of his men to request that he might land, but the king of the place ate one for dinner and the other fled. The Laestrygonians assembled on the coast and threw stones against Odysseus and his crew; they fled with all speed, but many men were lost.

La Farge, Christopher (1897–1956). American poet and novelist. Originally an architect by profession, La Farge published a long narrative poem, Haxie Sells His Acres (1934), dealing with childhood recollections and followed it in 1939 with Each to the Other, a novel in verse about a happy marriage. Among his other works are Poems and Portraits (1940); The Wilsons (1941), a collection of interrelated short stories; Mesa Verde (1945), a play in verse; and The Sudden Guest (1946), a novel about the 1938 and 1944 New England hurricanes. La Farge was a grandson of the artist John La Farge, a nephew of Father John La Farge, and a brother of Oliver La Farge.

La Farge, John (1880–1963). American Jesuit leader and writer. He became well known for his dedicated and highly successful work in rural American missions, which led to the founding of the National Catholic Rural Life Conference. Beginning in 1928, he was for many years the director of the Catholic Laymen’s Union. From 1942 to 1948 he was first executive editor, then editor-in-chief of the Jesuit weekly America, and he continued as an editor for many years thereafter. Known for his contributions to the causes of minority groups, Father La Farge was the author of several books on the Jesuits and on racial problems. His highly praised autobiography, The Manner Is Ordinary, appeared in 1953, and he completed Reflections on Growing Old just a month before his death. He was an uncle of Oliver and Christopher La Farge.

La Farge, Oliver [Hazard Perry] (1901–1963). American anthropologist and writer. He is best known for his works dealing with the American Indian, especially his notable first novel, Laughing Boy. A member of several anthropological expeditions to Arizona, Mexico, and Guatemala, La Farge was particularly interested in the Navaho and throughout his life was an eloquent spokesman and champion for the American Indian. Tribes and Temples (1945) is a book on archeology. Sparks Fly Upward (1931) and All the Young Men (1935) were collections of short stories. The Eagle in the Egg (1949) is a novel based upon his experiences as an officer in the army’s Air Transport Command. Raw Material (1945) is his autobiography. La Farge and his brother, Christopher, were grandsons of the artist John La Farge, and nephews of Father John La Farge.

Lafayette, Marquis de. Marie Joseph Paul Yves Roch Gilbert du Motier (1757–1834). French statesman and general, known as “the Hero of the Worlds.” He served (1777–1781) the American cause during the Revolutionary War as a major general in Washington’s army. On furlough in France from 1778 to 1780, he did much to cement Franco-American relations. Active in French politics, he advocated moderation during the French Revolution. He was forced to flee to Austrian lines in 1792 after failing in his attempted coup d’état against the revolutionary government in Paris, and returned to Paris in 1799. He did not engage in politics during the Napoleonic era, but after the Bourbon Restoration (1815–1830) he was one of the leaders of the liberal opposition. It was he who persuaded the leaders of the 1830 revolution to accept Louis Philippe as their monarch, saying the famous words: “Take him, he will make the best of republics.” At Lafayette’s suggestion, Louis Philippe appeared on the balcony of the Hôtel de Ville, wrapped in the Tricolor. Lafayette lived to regret his decision, becoming quite disappointed in the July Monarchy.

La Fayette, Comtesse de. Born Marie Madeleine Pioche de La Vergne (1634–1693). French novelist. Although Comtesse de La Fayette borrowed the format of her early work Zayde from de Scudéry, her novels La Princesse de Montpensier (1662) and La Princesse de Clèves (1678) are unmarred by the sentimentality and extravagance that characterize the works of her predecessor. With these simply and soberly written romances, melancholy in mood, Comtesse de La Fayette originated the French novel of character.

Lafecadio’s Adventures (Les Caves du Vatican; 1914). A satirical farce by André Gide. Also known in translation as The Vatican Swindle, the book caricatures various types in society by means of the three brothers-in-law and their many relations who comprise its major characters. The plot concerns the confusion resulting from a swindler’s scheme to extort money by falsely reporting that the pope has been kidnapped and organizing a conspiracy to liberate him. The interest of the book, however, focusses on the apparently unmotivated murder of one of the brothers by Lafecadio, a bastard relative.

Lafeu. In Shakespeare’s All’s Well That Ends Well, an old French lord sent to conduct Bertram to the royal court on the king of France’s invitation.

Lafitte or Lafitte, Jean (1780?–1826). French pirate and smuggler. Lafitte seems to have reached the neighborhood of New Orleans around 1809 as the head of a band of smugglers and privateers. During the War of 1812 he offered his services to Andrew Jackson and took part in the battle of New Orleans. Later he returned to his freebooting in Texas.

The subject of many legends, he was the hero of Lafitte, The Pirate of the Gulf (1836), a best-selling romance by Joseph Holt Ingraham. He also appears in Hervey Allen’s Anthony Adverse (1933). Lord Byron, in a note to The Corsair (1815), suggested some likenesses between his hero and Lafitte.

La Follette, Robert M[arion] (1855–1925). American statesman. An opponent of Republican Party regulars in his native Wisconsin, La Follette was elected district attorney of Dane County in 1880 and served in Congress from 1885 to 1891. In 1900 he won the GOP gubernatorial nomination by acclamation and after his election, instituted an extensive reform program that included opposition to political bosses, establishment of the direct primary, and regulation of the railroads. In the U.S. Senate (1906–1925), he continued his battle against the “interests.” As leader of the newly formed Progressive Party, he sought the 1912 presidential nomination but lost it to Theodore Roosevelt. He opposed President Wilson’s foreign policy and argued against U.S. entry into the League of Nations. In 1924 he won nearly five million votes as the presidential candidate of the Progressives.

His son, Robert M. La Follette, Jr. (1895-1933), was appointed to the elder La Follette's Senate seat in 1925 and served until 1946 when he was defeated by Joseph M. McCarthy.

La Fontaine, Jean de (1621-1695). French author. A prolific writer of comedies, lyrics, elegies, ballads, and licentious tales, La Fontaine is remembered primarily for his FABLES CHOSES, MISES EN VERS and his CONTES ET NOUVELLES EN VERS. Despite disputes with the French Academy, police condemnation of his Contes, and royal disfavor, La Fontaine was little distracted from his work and remained in the eyes of the world a vagabond, dreamer, and lover of pleasure, drifting happily from one patron to another throughout his highly productive literary career.

Laforet, Carmen (1921—). Spanish novelist. Her first work, Nada (1945), won great acclaim in Spain. This is a simple tale centering about the experiences of a young girl who settles in Barcelona after completing her education. Her more recent works include La isla y los demonios (1952), set in the Canary Islands, and La mujer nueva (1955), which relates the fall and spiritual regeneration of an adulterous woman.

Laforge, Jules (1860-1887). French poet. Laforge, with Gustave Kahn, is considered to have invented vers libre, as free verse is known in the 20th century. Associated with the symbolists, his volumes of poetry include Les Complaintes (1885), L'imitation de Notre-Dame la lune (1886), and Le Concile féérique (1886). Moralités Légendaires (1887) is a collection, published posthumously, of satires upon old tales. Laforge exerted considerable influence upon the form, rhythm, attitude, and subject matter of T. S. Eliot's early poetry.

Lagado. In Jonathan Swift's Gulliver's Travels, the capital of Balibari, the continent neighboring Laputa. Lagado is celebrated for its Academy of Projectors, where scholars spend their time in such useless projects as extracting sunbeams from cucumbers and converting ice into gunpowder.

Lagerkvid, Pär (1891— ). Swedish novelist, playwright, and poet. Lagerkvid is a moralist without a system of belief; profoundly humanistic, he probes the human mind and heart with agonized honesty. During the troubled decade of the 1930's, he spoke out against tyranny, Nazism, and totalitarianism. He published Brödela (The Hangman; 1933) to show the evil of violence. His best-known novels are Dvärgen (The Dwarf; 1945), Baraebas, and The Sibyl (1956). He was awarded the Nobel Prize for literature in 1951.

Lagerlöf, Selma (1858-1940). Swedish novelist and short-story writer. Uncomfortable with the literary realism current in her day, Selma Lagerlöf returned to the past for her stories and wrote in a romantic, imaginative manner. Her best known works are the novels Gösta Berlings saga; and Jerusalem. Nils Holgersons underbara rosa genom Sverige (The Wonderful Adventures of Nils; 1906-1907) and Further Adventures of Nils (1911), are fanciful accounts of a young boy's adventures as he travels over Sweden on the back of a wild goose. In 1909, Selma Lagerlöf received the Nobel prize for literature.

Lagrange, Joseph Louis (1736-1813). French-Italian mathematician. He received great acclaim during his lifetime, and was highly honored by Frederick the Great, Louis XVI, and Napoleon.

La Guardia, Fiorello H. Known as the Little Flower (1882-1947). American political leader. From 1901 to 1906 LaGuardia worked for the U.S. consular service in Europe and from 1907 to 1910 was an interpreter on Ellis Island in New York harbor. Elected to Congress in 1916, he resigned to become an air force officer during World War I, then returned to the House, where he served from 1923 to 1933. In 1933 he was elected mayor of New York on an anti-Tammany reform ticket. During his three terms as mayor, La Guardia conducted an energetic, incorruptible administration; sponsored an ambitious public-works program; and secured the adoption of a new city charter. In 1941-1942 he headed the U.S. Office of Civilian Defense and in 1946 was director of the UN Rehabilitation and Reconstruction Administration.

Lahamu. See LAMMU.

Lahar. The Sumerian god of cattle.

Lahmu and Lahamu. A Babylonian god and goddess. Born of the union of fresh water (Apsu) and salt water (Tiamat), they in turn were the parents of Anshar, a sky-god, and Kishar, an earth-goddess.

La Hogue, Battle of. The successful naval operations of the English and Dutch fleets against the French off the coast of Normandy (May 19 to 23, 1692). La Hogue itself is a harbor which served as the base of Louis XIV's attempted invasion of England.

lai. (1) A verse form in medieval French verse, composed of three-line units rhymed aab.

(2) also lay. A short narrative poem using the material of the medieval romances or the fabliaux, of the type written by Marie de France. These lais are not to be confused with the Lais (or legs, meaning legacies) written by François Villon.

Laing, Alexander [Kinnan] (1903— ). American poet and teacher. He is author of several volumes of verse, including Fool's Errand (1928) and The Flowering Thorn (1933), and of a discourse on poetry, Wine and Physic (1934). A teacher at Dartmouth, he has written an epic of the clipper-ship era, The Sea Witch (1933), and a prose work dealing with the same subject matter, ClipperShip Men (1945). Laing has also edited horror stories. With R. A. Lattimore, he published American Sail, a Pictorial History (1961).

Lais. Name of two celebrated Greek hetairae or courtesans. The earlier was the most beautiful woman of Corinth, who lived at the time of the Peloponnesian War. The beauty of Lais the Second so excited the jealousy of the Thessalonian women that they pricked her to death with their bodkins. She was the contemporary and rival of Phryne and sat to Apelles as a model. Demosthenes claims that she sold her favors for 10,000 Attic drachmae.

laissez-faire (Fr., "let do," that is, "let people and things alone"). The principal tenet of laissez-faire is that problems should be allowed to work themselves out without planning or regulation. It is, specifically, the principle of noninterference by government in commercial affairs. The phrase comes from the motto of the physiocrats, a school of French economists of the mid-18th century: Laissez faire, laissez passer (let do, let pass). The physiocrats wished to have all customs duties abolished and demanded free circulation for their goods, thus anticipating the later free traders. Jean Claude Marie Vincent de Gournay (1712-1759) is generally credited with being the author of the motto. Adam Smith was the principal exponent of laissez-faire theories in England, from where they later spread to the United States. As embodied in the writings of Smith, the principle has become one of the bulwarks of capitalist economics.

Laius (Laios). See OEDIPUS.

Lake poets, also called Lake school. A name applied to a group of poets in the 19th century, including Wordsworth, Coleridge, and Shelley, making reference to their residences in the Lake District of England (Westmoreland, Cumberland, Lancashire). The name was first used as an epithet of derision by the Edinburgh Review, but has long since lost its disparaging connotations.

Lakmé (1883). A romantic opera by the French composer Léo Delibes. The libretto by Gondinet and Gille is based on Loti's novel The Marriage of Loï (1880), and is Oriental in character. It contains the famous "Bell Song."

Lakṣmi or Lakshmi. One of the consorts of the Hindu god Vishnu, and mother of Kama, the god of young love. She is goddess of beauty, wealth, and pleasure, and the Ramayana describes her as springing, like Venus, from the foam of the sea.

Lall, Anand (1911- ). Indian novelist writing in English. He was consul-general of India in New York, 1951-1954. He wrote The House at Adampur (1956), a study of the decaying Indian zamindari class, and Seasons of Jupiter (1960).

Lallans. A Scottish dialect used by some modern Scottish poets. It is a synthetic language, made up of the dialects of the Scottish lowlands and elements from the Scottish literary language of the past. See Scottish Renaissance.

Lalla Rookh (1817). A series of four Oriental tales in verse held together by a story in prose, by Thomas Moore. The narrative tells of Lalla Rookh, daughter of the emperor of Delhi who, on a journey to meet her betrothed, is entertained by the young Persian poet Faramor; he relates four tales of romance and she falls in love with him. Ultimately she discovers that he is her betrothed.

The four tales he entertained her with are:

(1) The Veiled Prophet of Khorassan in which the chief figure is the prophet Hakem ben Haschem who wears a silver gauze veil "to dim the lustre of his face" or rather to hide its extreme ugliness.

(2) Paradise and the Peri, about a Peri who is told she will be redeemed to heaven if she brings the gift most dear to the Almighy. After a number of unavailing offerings she brings a guilty old man, who weeps repentantly. The Peri offers the Repentant Tear and the gates of Heaven fly open.

(3) The Fire Worshipers, about Hafed, the fire worshiper, who, when betrayed to the Muslims, throws himself in the sacred fire and is burned to death.

(4) The Light of the Harem, about Nourmahal, who regains the love of her husband, the Mogul Emperor Jehangir, by means of a magic spell.

Lama. A Buddhist monk or priest in Tibet. Prior to 1959, when he was forced to flee from the Chinese, the Dalai Lama had been both the temporal and spiritual leader of the Tibetans. Ruling from the Potala, a huge palace-lamasery in Lhasa, the Dalai Lama is considered a reincarnation of Avalokitesvara, the ancestor of the Tibetan race.

Lamark, Chevalier de. Jean Baptiste Pierre Antoine de Monet (1744-1829). French naturalist. Lamark advocated views on organic evolution which are sometimes mistakenly interpreted as representing Darwinism in a preparatory stage. In his Philosophie zoologique (1809), he held that an organism reacts to a new or changing environment by fitting developments; he did not hold, as did Darwin, that a new or changing environment permits the survival of the accidentally fittest. Lamark also introduced new principles in the classification of animals and originated the term vertebrate and invertebrate. See Charles Robert Darwin.

Lamartine, Alphonse Marie Louis de (1790-1869). French poet, writer, and statesman. Lamartine's work is marked by a preoccupation with nature, religion, and love, all subjectively presented (see Romanticism). He is regarded as the first truly romantic poet in French literature. Among his published volumes are Les Premières méditations (1820), Les Nouvelles méditations (1823), and Les Harmonies poétiques et religieuses (1830). His narrative poems include Josélyne (1836), dealing with a priest's love, and La Chute d'un ange (1838). A liberal in his beliefs, Lamartine tended toward radical republicanism in politics. Serving as a deputy for several years, he distinguished himself as an orator. A leader in the Revolution of 1848, he became the virtual chief of the provisional government, but fell from power upon the coup d'état of Napoleon III (1852).

Lamasery. A Buddhist monastery (or convent) of Tibet or Mongolia, presided over by a lama, who corresponds to a Christian abbot.

Lamassu. In Babylonian religion, one of a race of semidivine beings. The Lamassus were visualized as colossal bulls or lions with human heads. Statues of them flanked the entrances of palaces and public buildings.

Lamb. In Christian art and imagery, Jesus is often symbolically represented as a lamb, in allusion to John 1:29, "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sins of the world." The reference is to his sacrificial act for the redemption of the sins of all men.

Lamb, Lady Caroline (1785-1828). English novelist, the wife of William Lamb (later 2d Viscount Melbourne, prime minister to Queen Victoria). She is better known for her nine-months' intrigue with Lord Byron than for any of her novels. She was neurotic and demanding, and Byron soon tired of her. She took revenge in an anonymous novel, Glenarvon (1816), which contains a caricature of the poet. After Byron's death she gave way to conduct of such impropriety that Melbourne was forced to separate from her.
Lamb, Charles. Pen name Elia (1775-1834). English essayist of the romantic period, a schoolmate of Coleridge and friend of other figures of English romanticism. He attempted work in the fields of drama and poetry, but was most successful in the personal essay. His writings in this form are known for their humor, whimsy, and faint overtones of pathos. He was also a perceptive critic with a special sympathy for the work of Elizabethan and early 17th-century writers; a sympathy that is reflected in his own vivacious, idiosyncratic style.

His essays are contained in the two series entitled Essays of Elia, which appeared in The London Magazine from 1820 to 1823 and from 1824 to 1825, being collected and published in 1823 and 1833, respectively. Outstanding single essays are: A Dissertation on Roast Pig; A Chapter on Ears; Mrs. Battle's Opinions on Whist; Dream Children; and The Superannuated Man. Other works of Lamb are The Tale of Rosamund Gray and Old Blind Margaret (1798), a prose narrative; John Woodvil (1802), a dramatic tragedy; Tales from Shakespeare (1807), adaptations for children written in collaboration with his sister, Mary Lamb; The Adventures of Ulysses (1808), another book for children; Specimens of English Dramatic Poets Contemporary with Shakespeare (1808); Album Verses (1830), poetry.

Though he was much loved for his personal sweetness and good humor, Lamb's life was marked by frustration and sorrow. Because of a stammer, he was unable to qualify for a university position and went to work as an accountant for the East India Company, where he stayed until 1825. There was a strain of insanity in the family, and Mary Lamb had several attacks of madness, during one of which she killed her mother. Lamb, who himself suffered from alcoholism and stayed for a while in a sanatorium, took care of her.

Lamber, Juliette. See Juliette Adam.

Lambert, Marquise Anne-Thérèse de (1647-1733). French writer. Famed for her salon, which was reputed to exercise influence in the appointment of members to the French Academy and where aristocracy and men of letters freely mixed, the marquise de Lambert expressed her high moral principles in two instructive works: Avis d'une mère à son fils (A Mother's Advice to her Son; 1726) and Avis à sa fille (Advice to her Daughter; 1728).

Lamentations of Jeremiah, The. An Old Testament book. It is ascribed to the prophet Jeremiah, but is probably the work of various authors. It is comprised of five poems, the first four of which are alphabetical acrostics. The book's theme is that suffering is the result of sin.

Lamerok, Sir. In Arthurian legend, one of the knights of the Round Table. In Malory's Le Morte d'Arthur (c. 1469), he is the son of King Pellinore. He becomes the lover of Queen Margawse and her son Sir Gawain kills him.

La Mettrie, Julien Offroy de (1709-1751). French physician and philosopher, the most notorious materialist of his day. His most famous work, L'Homme machine (1747), shows how thought depends on matter, not on God or the soul, and that though man is a machine, he is too complicated ever to be completely understood.

Lamia. A female phantom. Her name was used by the Greeks and Romans as a bugbear to children. She was a Libyan queen beloved by Zeus, but robbed of her offspring by the jealous Hera. In consequence she vowed vengeance against all children, whom she delighted to entice and devour.

Witches in Middle Ages were called lamiae, and Keats's poem Lamia (1820), which relates how a bride when recognized returns to her original serpent form, represents one of the many superstitions connected with the race. Keats's story came (through Burton) from Philostratus' De Vita Apollonii, Bk. iv. In Burton's rendering, the sage Apollonius, on the wedding night found her out to be a serpent, a lamia. ... When she saw herself described, she wept, and desired Apollonius to be silent, but he would not be moved, and thereupon she, Lammas. Elements of the word are "loaf" and "mass." Formerly a harvest festival, Lammas Day falls on August 1.

Lamming, George (1927— ). West Indian writer. In The Castle of My Skin (1953) is an evocation of village life in his childhood home of Barbados.

Lamplighter, The (1854). A novel by Maria Susanna Cummins (1827–1866), originally published anonymously. The author's first book, it was an immediate success; sentimental and materialistic, it was typical of the best-selling women's novels of the time. Gerty, the heroine, is brought up in squalid surroundings, from which she is rescued by a kindly old lamplighter, Trueman Flint. She finds a playmate named Willie, and is taken into the home of Emily Graham, a rich blind girl, when Flint dies. There Gerty learns that her father is really Emily's brother, who ran away from home when he accidentally blinded his sister. Finally, she marries Willie, who has become wealthy and successful. The fantastic sales of The Lamplighter puzzled Nathaniel Hawthorne, who complained that the America of his time was "wholly given over to a d—d mob of scribbling women."

Lamoon (F. lampoon, from the refrain lampons, let's drink, in 17th-century French satirical drinking songs). A malicious, often scurrilous satirical piece, in prose or poetry, attacking an individual's character or appearance. The lampoon flourished in 17th- and 18th-century England. It fell into disuse as a result of a revival of public feeling, as well as of modern libel laws. The term is still in use, however, both as noun and verb, for any piece of pointed mockery of an individual or institution. A generalized use is seen in the name of the Harvard University humor magazine, The Harvard Lampoon.

Lancastrian. A member or supporter of the English royal house of Lancaster during the Wars of the Roses.

Lancelot, Sir. See Launcelot.

Landino, Cristoforo (1469–1527). Florentine teacher and critic. Connected with the circle of Lorenzo de' Medici, he gave lectures on poetry and rhetoric and wrote the commentary for a 1481 edition of Dante that included some designs by Botticelli. His most famous critical work is the Disputationes Camaldulenses, which consists of discussions on literary subjects supposedly held at the monastery of Camaldoli in 1468.

Landino, Francesco (1325–1397). Italian composer, poet, and organist. The most important composer of 14th-century Italy, Landino was renowned for singing to his own organ accompaniment, musical settings of his own poems. He won a laurel crown at a tournament in Venice in 1364; Petrarch was on the jury.

Land of Nod. See Nod, Land of.

Land of Promise. See Promised Land.

Landon, Letitia Elizabeth (1802–1838). English poet and novelist. Her sentimental poems, usually signed L.E.L., were a popular feature of annuals during the second and third decades of the century. She also wrote several novels, including Esther (1837).

Landor, Walter Savage (1775–1864). English poet, literary critic, and prose writer. Landor is best remembered for his interest in the classics and for the severity and intellectual coldness of his lyrics, many of which were written in direct imitation of Greek and Latin models. Among his works are Gethir (1797), an Oriental tale in blank verse; Count Julian (1812), a tragedy; Imaginary Conversations (1824–1853), a series of discussions between historical figures on a variety of subjects; Citations and Examination of William Shakespeare (1834), literary criticism; Pericles and Aspasia (1836), imaginary letters; Poemata et Inscriptiones (1847), Latin verse; The Hellenics (1847), poems on Greek subjects; Last Fruit Off an Old Tree (1853); Antony and Octavious (1856), dramatic dialogues; Heroic Idyls (1863). Rose Aylmer is his best known lyric.

In his youth, Landor was influenced by the revolutionary atmosphere of the time and was forced to leave Oxford because of his opinions. In 1808 he went off with a regiment he had raised to fight Napoleon in Spain. He tried to institute humanitarian reform on his estate in Wales but failed, and for a number of years lived in Italy. His poetry was never popular in his own time.

land o' the leal. The land of the faithful or blessed. It is a Scottishism for a hypothetical land of happiness, loyalty, and virtue; hence, the equivalent of heaven.

Landseer, Sir Edwin Henry (1802–1873). A famous English animal painter. He drew Sir Walter Scott's dogs with the poet in their midst. His paintings owe their popularity largely to the etchings made of them by his brother Thomas Landseer (1795–1870).

Land's End. The most westerly point in England. Called Boleraun in ancient geography, Land's End is on the southwest coast of Cornwall, and consists of granite cliffs, 60 to 100 feet high.

Lang, Andrew (1844–1912). Scottish scholar and man of letters. In a controversy with Max Müller he held that literary mythology is the outgrowth of anonymous folklore. He wrote several books of graceful verse, collaborated with Samuel Henry BUTCHER on a well-known prose translation of the Odyssey (1879), and edited numerous volumes of fairy tales.

Lang, Fritz (1890— ). German motion-picture director and producer. Among his notable films are Destiny (1921), Dr. Mabuse (1922), and M (1931).
Laocoön

Langbehn, Julius (1851–1907). German popular philosopher, opposed to materialism and rationalism. His Rembrandt als Erzieher (Rembrandt as Educator, 1890), published anonymously, was a best-seller.

Langer, Susanne K. (1895– ). American philosopher and teacher. Mrs. Langer's interest in the symbol-making function of the mind led her into aesthetics and to her book Philosophy in a New Key: A Study in the Symbolism of Reason, Rite, and Art (1942). It was influenced by the work of the German philosopher Ernst Cassirer, whose Language and Myth she translated in 1946. Feeling and Form; A Theory of Art appeared in 1953; 10 of Mrs. Langer's lectures on philosophy and aesthetics were printed in Problems of Art (1957).

Langland or Langley, William. See under

PIERS PLOWMAN.

Langer, Lawrence (1890–1962). Welsh-born American playwright and producer. Langer came to the U.S. in 1914 and shortly thereafter organized the Washington Square Players; the group performed several of his early plays, including Another Way Out (1916), a popular one-act drama. Out of the Washington Square Players grew the Theatre Guild, of which Langer was the founder and, after 1919, the director. He also founded the American Shakespeare Festival Theatre and Academy of Stratford, Conn. In addition to adapting foreign plays for the American stage, Langer collaborated with his wife, Armina Marshall, on several successful plays. Pursuit of Happiness (1934) deals with a Hessian soldier involved in the old American custom of bundling. The Langners also conducted their own summer theater in Westport, N.Y., until 1959. Langer's G.B.S. and the Llanitic (1963) describes the business relationship between the Theatre Guild and George Bernard Shaw.

Langton, Stephen (c. 1150–1228). English prelate, statesman, and scholar, Archbishop of Canterbury (after 1207). King John refused to recognize his appointment until 1213, and Langton became the leader of the barons in their struggle against John, representing them with his signature on the Magna Carta.

Langtry, Lily. Born Emily Charlotte Le Breton (1852–1929). English actress, known as the “Jersey Lily,” famous for her great beauty. She went on the stage in 1881 in the role of Kate Hardcastle in Goldsmith's She Stoops to Conquer.

langue d'oc and langue d'oil. The two groups of medieval Romance dialects that emerged from Vulgar Latin in Gaul, named after the word for “yes” in each group. The langue d'oc was spoken in the region of southern France and northern Italy known as Provence. The langue d'oil was spoken in France north of a line running approximately from the mouth of the Gironde River east to the Alps; it was the ancestor of standard modern French (in which oil became oil).

Lanier, Sidney (1842–1881). American poet. After graduating from Oglethorpe University in his native Georgia in 1860, Lanier enlisted in the Confederate army and, in 1864, was captured and imprisoned for four months at Point Lookout, Md. He emerged from the war afflicted with the tuberculosis that remained with him for the rest of his short life. Prevented by economic necessity from devoting himself to literature, Lanier worked at odd jobs after the war. In 1873 he settled in Baltimore, becoming first flutist with the Peabody Symphony Orchestra.

Considered one of the most accomplished poets of the American South in the latter half of the 19th century, he tried to achieve in his work the auditory effect of music and experimented with varying metrical patterns and unusual imagery. Much of his poetry shows an affinity with that of the Pre-Raphaelites and Swinburne. His best-known poems include The Symphony (1875), a denunciation of industrialism designed to illustrate the close relationship between poetry and music; The Marshes of Glynn, and The Song of the Chattahoochee (1883), notable for its successful combination of alliteration, onomatopoeia, and melody. Lanier also wrote Tiger Lilies (1867), a novel based on his Civil War experiences, and three works of criticism, The Science of English Verse (1880), The English Novel (1883), and Shakespeare and His Forerunners (1902).

Langian, George Thomas (1845–1886). Canadian-born American journalist and humorous poet. He sometimes published under the pseudonym of G. Washington Aesop. Lanigan worked on the New York World from 1874 to 1883 and published two volumes, Canadian Ballads (1864) and Fables (1875). He is chiefly remembered for his poem Threnody for the Ahkoon of Swat (1878), which was inspired by an item in the London Times. One of Lanigan's best sayings was that he dreamed of the day “when the singular verb shall lie down with the plural noun, and a little conjunction shall lead them.”

Lantern Land. The land of literary charlatans, pedantic graduates in arts, doctors, professors, prelates, and so on. They were ridiculed as “Lanterns” by Rabelais (with a side allusion to the divines assembled in conference at the Council of Trent) in his Gargantua and Pantagruel.

Laocoön (Laokoön). In Greek mythology, a Trojan priest who, having offended the gods, was strangled by sea serpents. In Vergil's Aeneid, he draws down the anger of Athena by warning the Trojans not to accept the Trojan horse and by hurling his javelin into the hollow flank of the wooden statue dedicated to her. She sends two huge sea snakes to the shore where Laocoön, assisted by his two sons, is sacrificing to Poseidon. The monsters choke the three to death.

The famous group of sculpture representing these three in their death agony, now in the Vatican, was discovered in 1506, on the Esquiline Hill in Rome. It is a single block of marble, and is attributed to Agesandrus, Athenodorus, and Polydorus of the school of Rhodes in the second century B.C. The discovery lent tremendous impetus to the renascence of interest in the classical period and had great impact on the art world.

In a famous treatise on the limits of poetry and the plastic arts (1766), Lessing uses this group as the peg on which to hang his dissertation, called Laocoön.

Laocoön, or On the Limits of Painting and Poetry (Laokoon, oder Über die Grenzen der Malerei und Poesie; 1766). An essay by Gotthold Ephraim LESSING. It seeks to dispute the idea that art criticism and literary criticism may be based on the same principles. The fundamental point is that a painting exists in space and all its parts are perceived simultaneously, whereas a work of literature exists in time and its parts are perceived one after another.
On this basis, Lessing develops an extensive theory of the respective domains of painting and poetry, in which he challenges some of Winkelmann's ideas.
Lessing uses the statue "Laocoön" as one of his central examples.

Laodomia. In classic myth, the wife of Proteus, who was slain before Troy.

Laodicée. One indifferent to religion, caring little or nothing about the matter. The reference is to Revelation 3:14–18 where the Christians of the city of Laodicée are "lukewarm."

Laomedon. In classic myth, a king of Troy, the father of Priam. He is remembered chiefly for his ingratitude in refusing to give the reward he had promised to Apollo for pasturing his flocks on Mount Ida, to Poseidon for building the walls of Troy, and to Heracles for rescuing his daughter Hesione from the sea-monster sent to Poseidon. Heracles slew him and all his sons but Priam in revenge.

Lao Tsu. Legendary Chinese sage, supposedly contemporary with Confucius (6th century B.C.) and regarded as the founder of Taoism. Lao Tsu is also the name of the basic text of the Taoist religion;
it is more commonly known as the Tao Te Ching.

Lapiths (Lapithai). A Thessalian tribe. They were neighbors of the Centaurs, with whom they had a famous battle. The Lapiths invited the Centaurs to the wedding of their king Pirithous to Hippodamia. Under the influence of wine, the Centaurs tried to carry off the Lapith women, including even the bride, but were roundly defeated. During the battle, an invulnerable Lapith leader named Caeneus was driven into the ground by the Centaurs, since he could not be killed. This Caeneus had been a girl until, upon being violated by Poseidon and granted a boon, she chose to become a man and invulnerable.
The battle of Centaurs and Lapiths was a favorite subject for Greek artists. It appeared on the Parthenon, the Theseum at Athens, and the temple of Apollo at Bassa, as well as on numberless vases.

Laplace, Marquis Pierre Simon de (1749–1827).
French astronomer and mathematician. Laplace made discoveries in celestial mechanics and set forth a nebular hypothesis of cosmogony (Exposition du systeme du monde; 1796) which is essentially similar to that advanced by Immanuel Kant.

Laputa. The flying island which Gulliver visits in Jonathan Swift's Gulliver's Travels. It is largely inhabited by abstract philosophers. In this third voyage, technical knowledge is extensively satirized.
Laputans, in their preoccupation with the theoretical and with innovation in technical methods, are ill equipped for living in society. Swift regarded Laputan ingenuity as misplaced. See Laodicea; Glamunden; Lauder

Lara. See CORSAIR, THE.

Lara, Cantar de los siete infantes de. A lost Spanish epic, or cantar de gesta, parts of which are preserved in the Crónica general of Alfonso X and in the Crónica de 1344. Menéndez Pidal used these fragments as the basis for his reconstruction, La leyenda de los infantes de Lara (1896).

The legend deals with the seven sons of Gonzalo Gustos, lord of Salas, or Lara. Gonzalo González, youngest of the brothers, incurs the enmity of his aunt, Doña Lambra, by killing her cousin, Alvar Sánchez, at a tournament celebrating her marriage to Ruy Velázquez. As a result, a bloody vendetta ensues. Spurred by his wife, Ruy Velázquez asks Al-manzor, military governor of Córdoba, to kill Gon-zalo Gustos, but the magnanimous Moor merely holds him captive. Meanwhile, as a result of Velázquez' machinations, the sons and their old tutor, Nuño Salido, are killed while fighting against the Moors. They are later avenged by their half-brother, Mudarra, the offspring of their father's union with a Moorish slave.

This legend has formed the basis of many later works, notably Juan de la Cueva's Tragedia de los siete infantes de Lara, Lope de Vega's El bastardo Mudarra, and the romantic epic El moro expósito (1834) by Angel Saaavedra, duque de Rivas.

La Ramée, Pierre. Known as Petrus Ramus (1515–1572). French philosopher, grammarian, and mathematician. He is known for his opposition to Aristotelian logic, which he attacked in his Dialec-tique (1555). He was a victim of the Massacre of St. Bartholomew.

Larbaud, Valéry (1881–1957). French poet, fiction writer, critic. His Poèmes par un riche amateur (1908) and especially the Journal d'A.O. Barnabooth (1913) are lyrical reflections upon his many travels and express his yearning for some unattainable ab-olute. He was a close friend of James Joyce, and helped to launch Ulysses in 1922.

Lardner, Ringgold Wilmer (1885–1933). American humorist and short-story writer. He is known for his bitterly humorous and satirical stories and sketches of 20th-century American life, told in the language of baseball players, boxers, songwriters, stockbrokers, stenographers, chorus girls, etc. Lardner's first important work was You Know Me Al, letters of a baseball player which first appeared in the Saturday Evening Post. Previously, he had published a collection of verse, Bib Ballads (1915), and a long series of books followed, including How to Write Short Stories; The Love Nest and Other Stories
(1926), a collection that includes the famous story
Haircut; The Story of a Wonder Man (1927), a satirical autobiography; and June Moon (1929), a play written with George S. Kaufman, satirizing the song writers of Tin Pan Alley.

lares. Household gods of the ancient Romans, usually referred to in the singular (lar), there being one lar to a household. The lares were protective, and were usually deified ancestors or heroes. The lar familiaris was the spirit of the founder of the house who, never leaving, accompanied his descendants in all their changes. See penates.

Lark, The (L'Alouette); 1953. A play by Jean Anouilh about Joan of Arc. It was translated into English by Christopher Fry.

Larkin, Philip [Arthur] (1922– ). English poet and novelist. He has been a leader in the Eng-ish antiromantic movement of the 1950's. The Last Deceived (1955) is a collection of witty poems. Jill (1946) and A Girl in Winter (1947) are novels.

La Rochefoucauld, Duc François de (1613– 1680). French writer. In his Mémoires (1662), La Rochefoucauld records his political activities, describing his efforts to destroy the power of Cardinal Rich-lieu over the royal family and his participation in the battle of the FRONDE. After 1652 he abandoned politics for a sheltered intellectual life. The Maximes (Maxims, 1665) are concise and biting observations upon society and human nature, illustrating his conviction that self-interest is the spring of human conduct and that men delude themselves in pretending to virtue or disinterested behavior.

Laarra y Sánchez de Castro], Mariano José de. Known as Figaro (1809-1837). Spanish journalist, literary critic, and author. The penetrating intelligence of this thoroughly romantic spirit brought him fame through his articles concerning Spanish regional life. These appeared in the 14 issues of the biting and satiric magazine El pobrecito hablador (1832-1833), which Larra edited and wrote himself. His reputation established, he went on to become one of the leading journalists of the period. His novel El doncel de don Enrique el Doliente (1834) and the drama Macías (1834) deal with the tragic loves of a minstrel who figures in Spanish literature as one of the authors who contributed to the Cancionero de Baena, an anonymous collection of medieval Spanish lyrics.

larvae. A name among the ancient Romans for malignant spirits and ghosts. The larva, or ghost, of the emperor Caligula was often seen (according to Suetonius) in his palace.

La Salle, Sieur de. Robert Cavelier (1643-1687). French explorer in North America. La Salle descended the Mississippi River to the Gulf of Mexico (1682), claiming the entire valley for France. He named the region Louisiana after the French king Louis XIV.

Lasea, II. See Anton Francesco Grazzini.

Lascaris, Constantine (1434-1501). Greek scholar and teacher in Italy during the Renaissance. After teaching at Milan and Naples, he settled atMessina, where he school drew such northerners asBembo for Greek studies. His Greek grammar was very popular in Italy and throughout Europe at the time.

Lascaris, John (1445-1535). Greek scholar in Italy during the Renaissance. He lectured at Florence and published there the first edition of the Planudean Anthology, part of the Greek Anthology as the entire collection was later called.

Las Casas, Bartolomé de (1474-1566). Spanish-born Dominican missionary and historian. He came to Santo Domingo in 1502 and was the first priest ordained in the New World (1510). In 1514, Las Casas suddenly became aware of the injustice with which the Indians were being treated in America, and subsequently devoted himself entirely to promoting their welfare, usually with the support of the crown, but against the bitter opposition of the Spanish settlers. Brevisima relation de la destrucción de las Indias (1552), his vivid, but probably exaggerated, account of Indian sufferings, was instrumental in fostering the long-lived "black legend," which denigrated the colonial policies of Spain in America. His major work, Historia general de las Indias (1875), is an important source for the early period of colonization in Latin America.

Laski, Harold J[oseph] (1893-1950). English political scientist. A convinced Marxist but not a Communist, he was an authority on American politics, history, and law.

Laski, Marghanita (1915- ). English novelist and critic. She is the author of Little Boy Lost (1949), about an orphan, and The Victorian Chaste Longue (1954), a tale of the supernatural. Among her other works are The Offshore Island (1959), a play, and Ecasty: A Study of Some Secular and Religious Experiences (1961).

Lassalle, Ferdinand (1825-1864). German socialist. His program of state socialism, or cooperation between worker and government, was criticized by Marx. His life is the source of George Meredith's novel The Tragic Comedians (1880).

Lassus, Orlandus de. Also Orlando di Lasso. Original name Roland Delattre (1530-1594). Flemish composer and choirmaster. Though, with Palestrina, he represents the apogee of 16th century polyphonic composition for voices, he also understood and composed for the instruments of his day. He left over 1,250 compositions at his death, including Italian canzone, French chansons, secular madrigals, sacred motets, psalm-settings and masses.

Last Days of Pompeii, The (1834). A historical novel by Edward Bulwer-Lytton. The young Greek lovers, Glaucus and Ione, are thwarted in their intentions by Ione's rancorous guardian. The eruption of Vesuvius fortuitously allows them to escape to happiness.

Last Leaf, The (1907). A short story by O. Henry. None of O. Henry's tales is more characteristic of his technique and sentiment than this account of a girl who lies, desperately ill of pneumonia, in a Greenwich Village apartment and makes up her mind to die as soon as the last leaf of five drops off the vine outside her window. One leaf hangs on, and she recovers—but there is a typical O. Henry twist to the ending.

Last of the Barons, The (1843). A historical novel by Edward Bulwer-Lytton dealing with the Wars of the Roses. The hero is Richard Neville, earl of Warwick, known as the Kingmaker. The novel traces his downfall. Sybil Warner and her father Adam Warner are important characters.

Last of the Just, The. See Andre Schwarz-Bart.

Last of the Mohicans, The (1826). A novel by James Fenimore Cooper, the second of The Leatherstocking Tales. The plot revolves around the efforts of Alice and Cora Munro to join their father, the British commander at Fort William Henry, near Lake Champlain. Their course is blocked by Magua, the leader of a group of Hurons, who are leagued with the French against the British in the war. The schemes of Magua, an evil Indian, are frustrated by Uncas, the last of the Mohicans, his father, Chingachgook, and their friend, Natty Bumppo. The rhythm of the book is set by a series of thrilling attacks, captures, flights, and rescues. The climax is the escape by suicide of the ill-fated lovers, Cora and Uncas.

Last Puritan, The (1936). A novel by George Santayana. Subtitled A Memoir in the Form of a Novel, the book is a study of Oliver Alden, descendant of an old and wealthy New England family, who comprises in himself the Puritan characteristics of austerity, single-mindedness, gravity, and conscienc-tious, scrupulous devotion to purpose. He is out of place in the civilization of the 20th century; as a friend of his in the novel says, "In Oliver Puritanism worked itself out to its logical end. He convinced himself, on Puritan grounds, that it was wrong to be a Puritan. . . . He thought it his clear duty to give Puritanism up, but couldn't." Oliver is presented in the prologue of the novel supposedly as a former student of the author at Harvard University and one of the young men killed during World War I. (Santayana later stated that he was partly based on W. Cameron Forbes.) In style, subject matter, and approach, The Last Puritan recalls the novels of Henry James.

Last Rose of Summer, 'Tis the. The title and first line of a song, generally known from the second act of the opera Marsha (1847) by Flotow. It was written (1813) by Thomas Moore to the tune of an old air.

Last Supper. The last meal shared by Jesus and his 12 apostles. They celebrated the Passover, then Jesus gave his followers bread and wine, thus instituting the sacrament of the Eucharist, also known as the Lord's Supper, and Holy Communion. The original occasion has been the subject of many works of art, the most famous of which is a fresco by Leonardo da Vinci in the refectory of Santa Maria delle Grazie, Milan. It shows the consternation of the disciples when Jesus told them that he would be betrayed that night.

Late George Apley, The (1937). A novel by John P. Marquand. Subtitled A Novel in the form of a Memoir, the story is told by Horatio Willing, a staid and polished annotator, who manages to satirize himself as he recounts the life of the recently deceased George Apley, a conventional, tradition-bound, but somewhat pathetic Bostonian. A highly successful book, it was awarded a Pulitzer Prize and later dramatized (1946) by its author and George S. Kaufman.

Lateran. See SAINT JOHN LATERAN.

Lathrop, George Parsons (1851–1898). American poet, biographer, and editor. Lathrop founded the American Copyright League in 1883, was editor of the Boston Sunday Courier, and associate editor of the Atlantic Monthly. In 1871, he married Rose Hawthorne Lathrop, and five years later wrote a Study of Nathaniel Hawthorne (1876), her father. He also published several collections of verse, among them Rose and Roof-Tree (1875) and Dreams and Days (1892).

Lathrop, Rose Hawthorne [Mother Mary Alphonsa] (1851–1926). American poet; memoirist; humanitarian. The second daughter of Nathaniel Hawthorne, she married George Parsons Lathrop in 1871. The marriage was unhappy, and Lathrop became a heavy drinker. In 1891, both husband and wife were converted to Roman Catholicism; working together, they established the Catholic Summer School of America and wrote a history of the Order of the Sisters of Visitation, published as A Story of Courage (1894). In 1895, the Lathrops separated permanently. Mrs. Lathrop began to work in a hospital, and after her husband's death was received into the Dominican order as Mary Alphonsa. In 1901, she bought a home in Westchester County, N.Y., which she named Rosary Hill Home, and devoted the rest of her life to the care of incurable cases of cancer. In 1897 she published her Memories of Hawthorne.

Latimer, Hugh (1485–1555). English bishop and Protestant martyr. Latimer was made bishop of Worcester in 1535, but resigned because he felt unable to accept the Act of the Six Articles of 1539. On the accession of Mary he was committed to the Tower, and was burned at the stake for heresy in 1555.

Latini, Brunetto (c. 1220–c. 1294). Italian philosopher and scholar, Dante's teacher. He wrote a didactic poem, the Tesoretto, in rhymed couplets of seven-syllable verse. His major work, the prose Liure du Trésor (c. 1265), was written in French and soon translated into Italian as Tesoro by Bono Giamponi; it is an encyclopedic "treasure book" of medieval scholastic knowledge.

Latin Quarter (Fr. le Quartier Latin). The University quarter of Paris on the left bank of the Seine. For centuries it has been a center for artists, writers, students, intellectuals, and Bohemians of all varieties and from many lands.

Latinus. The legendary king of the Latini, the ancient inhabitants of Latium. According to Vergil's Aeneid, Latinus had been advised by an oracle to give his daughter, Lavinia, in marriage to a stranger. Accordingly, he offers her to Aeneas, but Turnus, king of Rutuli, declares that she is betrothed to him. The contest between Aeneas and Turnus is settled by single combat, in which Aeneas is victorious.

Latitudinarians. Members of the liberal faction of the Church of England in the time of Charles II. They opposed the doctrinal rigidity of both the High Church and the Puritans. The term came to be applied to those persons who attach little importance to dogma and what are called orthodox doctrines.

Latomos, Mount. The mountain where Endymion pastured his flocks when Selene, goddess of the moon, fell in love with him.

La Tour du Pin, Patrice de (1911– ). French poet. After the youthful lyrics of La Quête de Joie (1933), he collected the succeeding volumes into Une Somme de Poésie (1946), a long and allusive work interspersed with prose speculations which give it a mythological and philosophical unity. The development of the adolescent concerned only with himself into an adult involved with the fraternity of men provides subject and pattern for the work. Le Second Jen (1959) stresses again that the man is born only through the death of the child, and leads La Tour du Pin to the third stage, the Christian confrontation with the mystery of God.

Laube, Heinrich (1806–1884). German novelist and dramatist. His most famous work is the novel Das junge Europa (Young Europe, 1838 ff.), which attempts to define a unifying connection between the Launcelot Greaves, The Adventures of Sir (1760). A rambling, satiric novel by Tobias Smollett. It is an attempt to adapt Don Quixote to the 18th century by creating a benevolent reformer so disinterested as to seem mad. The hero, Sir Launcelot Greaves, is a well-bred and noble-minded young English squire of the George II period, half-crazed by love. He sets out, attended by Captain Crowe, to detect fraud and to right the wrongs of the world. After sundry adventures which give the author opportunity for satiric treatment of English life, he is welcomed back by his faithful love Aurelia Darnel. The novel was among the first serialized in English.

Laura. The beloved of Petrarch and the subject of his collection of lyrics called Rime (verses) or Canzoniere (song book). The poet says he first saw her in the church of St. Claire at Avignon on April 6, 1327, fell in love, and was inspired to write poetry. Her death, on the same date 21 years later, resulted in a profound spiritual crisis with which the poet struggled for the remainder of his life. Who Laura actually was is still a controversial matter. It was formerly thought that she was a certain Laura de Noves of Avignon, born in 1308, wedded to Hugues de Sede and the mother of 11 children, who died in the great plague of 1348. Modern scholars reject this identification in favor of the idea that Laura is a poetic fiction, a symbol of the poet's aspirations as well as a focal point of his psychological conflicts. In the poems, Petrarch frequently puns on the name because of its resemblance to the Italian words for air and laurel (hence, inspiration and fame). The name has been used by poets ever since, in love poems addressed to a similar idealized lady. Robert Tofte entitled his 1597 collection of love lyrics Laura; Lord Byron used the name for the Venetian lady who marries Beppo in the poem of the same name; and Schiller wrote a series of poems to Laura.
laureate. See POETS LAUREATE.

Laurence, Friar. The wise and kindly Franciscan friar in Shakespeare's ROMEO AND JULIET who marries the young lovers. He hopes that the alliance will end the feud between the Montagues and Capulets.

Laurent, Jacques. Pen names: Jacques Laurent-Cely, Cécil Saint-Laurent, Albéric Varenne (1919- ). French novelist and historian. The risqué popular novels he has published as Saint-Laurent, such as Caroline chérie (1947) and Cloîtilde (1957), are better known than his more serious Les Corps tranquilles (1948) and Le Petit Canard (1954). Laurie, Annie (1682-1764). The subject of a Scottish song (c. 1700). A daughter of Sir Robert Laurie of Maxwellton, Dumfriesshire, she married Alexander Ferguson. The song was written by the man she rejected, William Douglas. It was revised and set to music by Lady John Scott (1855).

Lauriers sont coupés, Les (We'll to the Woods No More, 1888). A novel by Edouard Dujardin. It is considered the first example in fiction of an intended interior monologue (see STREAM OF CONSCIOUSNESS). Daniel Prince, a young Frenchman, is in love with an actress, Léah d'Asray, and pretends to himself to be satisfied with a merely "Platonic" relationship, although he actually wishes to make her his mistress. She allows him to believe that she is about to grant him her favors, but after she has secured a sum of money from him she skillfully puts him off. He therefore resolves never to see her again.

The story is told through the thoughts and impressions of the hero as he walks in the street, meets friends, sits in a restaurant, rides in a carriage, and visits Léah. James Joyce is said to have read this book about 1901 and to have been partly influenced by it while writing Ulysses. Dujardin himself claimed to have been influenced in his technique by Richard Wagner's device of the musical Leitmotiv, by the dramatic monologue of Robert Browning, and by the psychological monologue of Dostoievski.

Laval, Pierre (1883-1945). French politician. A member of the Chamber of Deputies (from 1914) and premier (1931-1936), Laval is remembered for his policy of collaboration with the Germans during the Occupation. He was ousted as vice-premier of the Vichy government by Pétain (Dec., 1940) but reinstated through German pressure as administrative chief of state. At the end of the war, Laval was tried by a French court for high treason and executed by a firing squad.

Lavater, Johann Kaspar (1741-1801). Swiss divine and poet. In his Physiognomische Fragmente zur Beförderung der Menschenkenntnis und Menschenliebe (Physiognomical Fragments for the Promotion of Knowledge and Love of Man, 1775 ff.), on which Goethe collaborated, he founded the study of "physiognomy." See PHRENOLOGY.

Lavengro: The Scholar, Gypsy, Priest (1851). A novel by George Borrow. Mingling autobiography with fiction, the author relates the wanderings of a young man who is interested in philology and becomes intimate with a family of gypsies. His adventures are resumed in the sequel, The Romany Rye (1857). The name Lavengro, which means philologist in the language of the gypsies, was applied to Borrow in his youth.

Lavinia. (1) In Vergil's AENEID, the daughter of LATNUS. She is betrothed to Turnus, king of the Rutuli. When Aeneas lands in Italy, Latnus makes an alliance with the Trojan hero and promises to give him Lavinia as his wife. After Aeneas defeats the angry Turnus, he marries Lavinia and becomes by her the ancestor of Romulus, the mythical founder of Rome. The ancient city of Lavinium near Rome was said to have been built by Aeneas and named after her.

(2) In Shakespeare's TITUS ANDRONICUS, the daughter of Titus. Described as "gracious Lavinia, Rome's rich ornament," she is abducted and married to her betrothed, Bassanius, to prevent her forced marriage to his brother Saturninus. Later the evil sons of thevengeful Tamora slay Bassanius, rape Lavinia, and cut off her tongue and hands.

Lavoisier, Antoine Laurent (1743-1794). French chemist. Lavoisier, who discovered oxygen and the composition of air (at the same time as Priestley), is one of the founders of modern chemistry. He is best known for his theory of the indestructibility of matter. His reforms in chemical nomenclature are the basis of the system still in use. In 1794, he was guillotined by the Revolutionists.

Lavransdatter, Kristin. See KRISTIN LAVRANSDATTER.

Law, John. See MISSISSIPPI BURBLES.

Law, William (1686-1761). English devotional writer who was influenced in later life by the philosophy of the German mystic Jakob Böhme. He is the author of the Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life (1729), which strongly influenced the Evangelical revival in England, and is especially remembered for his attack on Bernard Mandeville's Fable of the Bees (1723). In 1740, Law became the spiritual advisor to Edward Gibbon's aunt, as well as to John and Charles Wesley.

Lawless, Emily (1845-1913). Irish novelist and poet. Her best-known works are the novels Hurish (1886) and Grania (1892). With the Wild Geese (1902), a volume of poems, is also noteworthy.

Lawrence, St. The patron saint of curriers. He was broiled to death on a gridiron. He was deacon to Sextus I and was charged with the care of the poor, the orphans, and the widows. In the persecution of Valerian (258), being summoned to deliver up the treasures of the church, he produced the poor under his charge and said to the praetor, "These are the church's treasures." He is generally represented as holding a gridiron, and is commemorated on August 10.

The phrase lazy as Lawrence is said to take its origin from the story that when being roasted over a slow fire he asked to be turned, "fox," said he, "that side is quite done." This expression of Christian fortitude was interpreted by his torturers as evidence of the height of laziness, the martyr being too indolent even to wriggle.
Lawrence, D[avid] H[erbert] (1885-1930). English novelist, short-story writer, poet, and essayist. He is known for his frequently misunderstood but basically idealistic ideas about sexual relations, and for his interest in primitive religions and nature mysticism. Lawrence regarded sex, the primitive subconscious, and nature as cures for what he considered modern man's maladjustment to industrial society. His philosophy, life history, and prejudices are intrinsically involved in his writings; many of his views are expressed in Women in Love and Lady Chatterley's Lover. Sons and Lovers is a partly autobiographical novel which deals with the author's boyhood and adolescence as the son of a coal miner. Lawrence struggled to become a teacher, then an established member of London's literary society, but he never ceased to rebel against Anglo-Saxon puritanism, social conventions, and mediocrity. He was attracted to the Nietzschean idea of the superman, and expressed his idea of the hero in his novels Kangaroo and The Plumed Serpent.

Lawrence's work, of great volume and variety, is uneven in literary value. At its best it is marked by intensity of feeling, psychological insight, vivid evocation of events, places, and particularly nature. A controversial figure, he is regarded by some critics as the greatest of modern English novelists; most concede that he is a major writer in spite of his overfondness for preaching, his obscurantism, and his ranting attacks on the people and institutions he regarded as his enemies. Lawrence's other novels are The White Peacock (1911), The Trespasser (1912), The Rainbow, The Lost Girl (1920), Aaron's Rod (1922), and The Boy in the Bush (1924), in collaboration with M. L. Skinner. Among his short novels are St. Mau (1925), The Man Who Died, and The Virgin and the Gipsy (1930). Lawrence's short stories, which do not have the faults of his novels, are widely admired. Among these are The Peussian Officer, The Captain's Doll, Sun, The Fox, The Woman Who Rode Away, The Man Who Loved Islands, The Rocking-Horse Winner, and Things. His early fiction tends to be fairly conventional and realistic while his later work is more immersed in the subconscious and rich in symbolism. Some of his later short stories, however, are taut and naturalistic.

Lawrence's first published works were poems (see MIRIAM). He began by writing in the school of imagism. His best-known poems are in free verse, about the individual, inner nature of animals and plants: Fish, Snake, Mountain Lion, and Bavarian Gentians are among them. Birds, Beasts and Flowers (1923) is a well-known collection. Look! We Have Come Through (1917) is a collection of poems about his relationship with his wife, Frieda von Richthofen Lawrence. Pansies (1929) is a collection of didactic, satiric, and iconoclastic poems, which was seized as immoral by the English authorities on its first publication.

Lawrence's fine, vivid collections of travel sketches are Twilight in Italy (1916), Sea and Sardinia (1921), Mornings in Mexico (1927), and Etruscan Places (1927). His most influential book of criticism is Studies in Classic American Literature (1923), which contains brilliant, eccentric insights into American writers from Benjamin Franklin to Walt Whitman. Psychoanalysis and the Unconscious (1921) and Fantasia of the Unconscious (1922) are statements of his philosophy. He wrote a great many colloquial, iconoclastic essays, including Pornography and Obscenity (1930), Reflections on the Death of a Porcupine (1934), and Democracy (1936). He also wrote Movements in European History (1921), under the pen name of Lawrence H. Davidson, and a few unsuccessful plays. His interesting Letters were edited by Aldous Huxley (1932).

Even after Lawrence established himself in London literary circles—he was a close friend of Aldous Huxley (see Point Counter Point), and Katherine Mansfield and J. Middleton Murray—he still had many troubles. He suffered from tuberculosis, saw his books banned as obscene, and was persecuted during World War I for his supposed pro-German sympathies. Disgusted by England, he left it to travel with his wife, but he was continually disappointed in his quest for a homeland and congenial associates. At one time or another, Lawrence lived in Italy, Germany, Ceylon, Australia, New Zealand, Tahiti, the French Riviera, Mexico, and the southwestern part of the United States. In Taos, New Mex., an artists' colony, he once dreamed of setting up an ideal social community. (See Mabel Dodge Luhan.) At the end of his life he was extravagantly admired by several women who called him "Lorenzo," regarded themselves as his disciples, and engaged in jealous quarrels over his attentions. After Lawrence's death a number of people who had known him published books and memoirs about him, both unfriendly and admulatory, often attacking each other. Among these remembrances were those of J. Middleton Murray, Catherine Carswell, Mabel Dodge Luhan, Dorothy Brett, Richard Aldington, E. T. (see Miriam), and his wife.

Lawrence, Frieda von Richthofen (1879-1956). Aristocratic German wife of D. H. Lawrence. She was married to Professor Ernest Weekley, an English philologist, and had three children when she met Lawrence and eloped with him in 1912. Lawrence described their stormy, happy marriage in his writings, especially in the collection of poems Look! We Have Come Through and in the novels Women in Love and Kangaroo. She wrote Not I, But the Wind . . . (1934), a memoir of her husband. Her brother, Manfred von Richthofen, was a celebrated German aviator during World War I.

Lawrence, James (1781-1813). American naval officer. During the War of 1812 he commanded the Chesapeake in an engagement (June 1, 1813) with the British frigate Shannon near Boston harbor. Mortally wounded, Lawrence is said to have shouted, "Don't give up the ship!" The British captured the Chesapeake, but Lawrence's last words became a popular slogan in the U.S. navy.

Lawrence, Josephine (1897- ). American newspaperwoman and novelist. She writes of the common problems faced by average people in such books as Head of the Family (1932), If I Have Four Apples (1935), No Stone Unturned (1941), The Web of Time (1953), All Our Tomorrows (1959), and Hearts Do Not Break (1960).

Lawrence, T[homas] E[dward]. Known as Lawrence of Arabia (1888-1935). English soldier, archaeologist, and author. He is famous for his activities in arousing and directing a successful rebellion of the Arabs against the Turks during World War I, for his account of his exploits in Seven Pillars of Wisdom (1926), and for his enigmatic personality. During the war he became an almost legendary figure in the Middle East; after the war, he received a number of honors and was offered, but refused, the Victoria Cross and a knighthood. He retired from public life to write the Seven Pillars of Wisdom, an abridgement of it called The Revolt in the Desert (1927), and a prose translation of Homer's Odyssey (1932). Meanwhile he sought still more obscurity by joining the Air Force as a private under the name of Shaw. His journal from this period was published as The Mint (1935). There has been much interest in, and controversy about, Lawrence's psychological motivations. B. H. Liddell-Hart, Robert Graves, and Richard Aldington are among those who have written about him.

Lawrence, Sir Thomas (1769–1830). English portrait painter. A child prodigy, he succeeded Sir Joshua Reynolds as principal painter to the king in 1792. He was the graceful and romantic portraitist of the most brilliant society of England, and after his reputation spread to the continent, he painted the European princes and the heroes of the Napoleonic wars.

Lawrence of Arabia. See T. E. Lawrence.

Lawson, John Howard (1895– ). American playwright. He is known for his experiments in expressionism in the 1920's and his later plays expressing proletarian sympathies. Processional (1925), set in a West Virginian town during a coal strike, is perhaps the best known of his plays influenced by the expressionist movement. Loud Speaker (1927), on American politics, The International (1928), dealing with a worldwide revolution of the proletariat, and Marching Song (1937), dealing with a sit-down strike, are all examples of his proletarian plays. Among his books is Film in the Bottle of Ideas (1953).

Laxdale Saga. An Icelandic saga of the early Middle Ages, dealing chiefly with the wilful, selfish, and much-married Gudrun who falls in love with Kjartan. While Kjartan is at the court of King Olaf, his cousin Bolli tells Gudrun that Kjartan has become friendly with Olaf's sister Ingebjorg. Vindictively, Gudrun marries Bolli; when Kjartan returns to Iceland and hears of the marriage, he marries Hrefna, also vindictively. He gives to Hrefna an ornate cof, which Ingebjorg had originally sent with him as a gift for Gudrun, and this causes Gudrun to precipitate a feud between the two families by having the cof stolen. There follows a series of raids and battles in which Kjartan is eventually killed through the machinations of the woman who really loved him and whom he loved.

Lazarillo de Tormes, La vida de (1554). A picaresque novel by an anonymous author, sometimes identified with Diego Hurtado de Mendoza. Divided into seven chapters or tratados, it is the autobiography of the wily Lázaro, who describes his experiences with the various masters whom he served: the blind man, the miserly priest, the proud but hungry squire, the mendicant friar, the seller of indulgences. He ends his career as town-crier of Toledo. Written with vigorous realism and irony, Lazarillo was enormously popular and inspired several sequels. It is considered the greatest Spanish work in this genre.

(2) Another better-known Lazarus of the New Testament is the brother of Mary and Martha of Bethany, whom Jesus raised from the dead after four days (John 11:12).

Lazarus, Emma (1849–1887). American poet and translator. She translated Heine's poems and published a novel, Aile: An Episode in Goethe's Life (1874). This early work, flowery and romantic, would not have won her a reputation. In 1882, however, her indignation was kindled by the Russian pogroms; she set out to defend and glorify the Jewish people. Songs of a Semite (1882) includes her best poem, Dance to Death. Her sonnet The New Colossus (1883) is inscribed on the pedestal of the Statue of Liberty. By the Waters of Babylon (1887) showed the influence of Whitman.

Lazarus Laughed (1927). A drama by Eugene O’Neill. It deals with Lazarus after his resurrection by Jesus. The man to whom new life has been given goes about preaching a new religion of love and eternal life, symbolized by laughter. He eventually goes to Rome and causes a sensation there, finally being stabbed by Caligula in the great amphitheater of the city but affirming until the last his belief in the triumph of life. Seven masked choruses, symbolizing varying periods of life, are used in this play.

le, la, l. For titles beginning with these words, see following words.

Leacock, Stephen (1869–1944). Canadian humorist and political scientist. His satirically humorous short stories and essays were very popular; among them are Nonsensical Novels (1911), Moonbeams from the Larger Lunar (1915), and The Garden of Folly (1924). He also wrote standard works on political science, and studies of Mark Twain (1932) and Charles Dickens (1933).

League of Nations. A league to promote international cooperation and peace, formed after World War I. Its headquarters were at Geneva, Switzerland. Its members were the signatories of the treaty of Versailles on behalf of the Allies, with certain other states, including Germany and the U.S.S.R. Although it was created largely through the exertions of President Woodrow Wilson, the U.S. Senate refused to ratify the treaty of Versailles, and thus the U.S. was never a member of the league.

During the 1920’s the league was able to settle a few minor disputes between nations, and its contributions in the fields of refugee rehabilitation, public health, and international labor problems were considerable, but it had no power to enforce its policies in cases of war waged by important nations. It failed especially to be effective at the invasion of Ethiopia by Italy (1935), of Manchuria by Japan (1931), and also during the Civil War in Spain (1936–1939). Several members, including Italy, Japan, and Germany, resigned from the league in the late 1930’s. It was formally dissolved on April 18, 1946, its material and moral heritage being taken over by the United Nations.

Leah. In the Old Testament, the daughter of Laban and sister of Rachel. She became one of the wives of Jacob.

Léandre. (1) In Molière’s Les Fourberies de Scapin (Rogueries of Scapin, 1671), the son of Géronste. During the absence of his father, he falls in love with Zerbinette, whom he supposes to be a young gypsy but who is in reality the stolen daughter of Argante, his father’s friend. Scapin raises the money to ransom the girl from the gypsies and Léandre marries her.

(2) In Molière’s Le Médicin malgré lui, the lover of Lucinde.

leaning tower. The campanile of the cathedral of Pisa, Italy. About 180 feet in height, it began to lean during its construction in the 12th century, and this condition has worsened until it is now about 17 feet out of plumb.

Lear, Edward (1812–1888). English painter and writer. He is known for his limericks and nonsense verse, marked by absurd humor, whimsy, and fantasy. These are inimitable in their kind, and perennial classics of English humorous verse. The Owl and the Pussycat (1871) is his best-known set of verses. His books include A Book of Nonsense (1846), Nonsense Songs, Stories, Botany, and Alphabets (1871), More Nonsense Songs (1872), and Laughable Lyrics (1877). Lear was also the author of interesting illustrated travel books, such as a Journal of a Landscape Painter in Greece and Albania (1852) and so prominent a painter of landscape and animals that he once gave drawing lessons to Queen Victoria.

Learchus (Learchos). See INO.

Leatherstocking Tales, The. A series of five novels by James Fenimore Cooper. The novels appeared in the following sequence: The Pioneers (1823), The Last of the Mohicans (1826), The Prairie (1827), The Pathfinder (1840), and The Deerslayer (1841). The series follows the career of Natty BUMPTO from his youth (Deerslayer) to his death (The Prairie). An abridgment of the five novels was made by Allan Nevins in a single volume called The Leatherstocking Saga (1954).

Leaves of Grass. A collection of poems by Walt WHITMAN. First published in 1855, it was revised and augmented every few years until the poet’s death in 1892. The first edition, unsigned, contained only 12 untitled poems. The first and longest was later called Song of Myself. In 1855 the poems were preceded by a preface declaring Whitman’s poetic credo. “The United States themselves,” he said, “are essentially the greatest poem.” The country’s genius is the common people; the poet must be “commensurate” with the people and “incarnate” the spirit and geography of the States. Echoing Walden (1854), Whitman praises simplicity. A great poem, he says, is for “all degrees and complexities and all departments and sects.” The poem’s form was to be organic; it must grow out of the demands of its subject.

The book, radical in form and content, takes its title from the themes of fertility, universality, and cyclical life. Critics have noted the influence of Shakespeare and the Hebraic poetry of the Bible. As he revised and added to the original edition, Whitman arranged the poems in a significant autobiographical order. In the final poems, the poet, though dead, survives in his work. In 1881, the permanent order of the volume was established; all later work was assigned to an annex. The final or “death-bed” edition was issued in 1892.

Leavis, F[rancis] R[aymond] (1895– ). English literary critic. One of the Cambridge Critics, he edited the influential magazine Scrutiny (1932–1953). Making it his business to maintain standards in English literature and criticism, Leavis wrote controversial essays attacking what he considered mediocre and dilettante work. Above all, he required literature to have moral value and to be concerned with the health of society. He found the qualities he admired in the novelists George Eliot and D. H. Lawrence, and praised them extravagantly. Leavis’ criticism was very influential in England. His chief works are New Bearings in English Poetry (1932), Revaluations (1936), The Great Tradition: George Eliot, James, and Conrad (1948), The Common Pursuit (1952), and D. H. Lawrence, Novelist (1955). Much of the material in these books first appeared in Scrutiny, which served as a vehicle for the ideas of Leavis and of other Cambridge critics who shared some of his principles.

Le Beau. In Shakespeare’s As You Like It, a garrulous French courtier, “his mouth full of news,” attending on Duke Frederick.

Lebensraum. See Karl HAUSHOFER.

Lebyadkin, Marya Timofeyevna. In Feodor Dostoevsky’s novel The Possessed, the crippled half-wit Stavrovit has married for obscure and perverse reasons that are not clarified. She is portrayed in the tradition of the Russian “holy fool” and, along with Stavrov, is the vehicle for the expression of many of Dostoevsky’s own religious ideas.

Lebyadkin, Captain. The comical and unscrupulous brother of Marya Timofeyevna, Stavrogin’s half-wife. He calls himself a retired army captain, although doubt is cast on the truth of this by the narrator. Lebyadkin, who callously mistreats his sister, continually tries to extort money from Stavrogin for her support. He is murdered along with Marya at the end of the novel.

Le Charlier, Jean. See Jean GERSON.

Leconte de Lisle, Charles Marie René (1818–1894). French poet, leader of the PARNASSIANS. A dislike for the excessive subjectivity and exaggerated emotionalism of the romantic writers caused him to write poetry that was objective in content and austere in style. Leconte de Lisle gave voice to dark pessimism, and his hatred for the ugly industrial civilisation in which he lived led him to seek his subjects in the past or in strange, distant places. His works include Poèmes antiques (1852), Poèmes barbares (1862), Histoire populaire du Christianisme (1871), Poèmes tragiques (1884), and Derniers Poèmes (1895). His drama L’Apollonide (1888) and the verse tragedy Les Erinnyes (1889) are also well known.

Lecocq, Monsieur. A brilliant French detective created by Émile Garroujau. Monsieur Lecocq appears in several novels: Monsieur Lecocq (1869), L’Affaire Lerouge (1866) and Le Dossier no. 113 (1867). He is one of the first of the famous detectives of literature and a precursor of Sherlock Holmes.

Le Corbusier. Real name, Charles Edouard Jeanneret (1887– ). Swiss-born French architect and painter. He is known for his contributions to functionalism. Among these are the corner window, the glass façade, the use of ferroconcrete in buildings, and the elevated traffic ramp. Le Corbusier is an innovator in city planning. His suggested plans for Algiers and St. Dié are no less influential than his planning, undertaken in 1951, of the new town of Chandigarh for the Indian government. He is the author of Towards a New Architecture (1923). Among his best-known works are the Radiant City of Marseilles (1946–1952) and the chapel at Ronchamp (1955). As a painter, Le Corbusier demands of art a total submission to its architectural setting. About 1918, with Amédée Ozenfant, he developed purism with the idea of preventing cubism from becoming a mere decorative ornament. He adopted the machine as an object of absolute perfection and rejected every accidental detail in his rigorous compositions. Yet at no time did Le Corbusier condemn lyricism, but rather sought rules, both in painting and architecture, proper to the creation of a setting that would satisfy the very nature of man as he conceives it, with its need for light, order, and joy.

Lecouvreur, Adrienne (1692–1730). French actress. The greatest tragedienne of her day on the French stage, Lecouvreur substituted unaffected delivery for the then current bombastic, declamatory style of tragic acting. The church’s refusal to grant her burial in consecrated soil provoked an anticlerical scandal and aroused Voltaire to compose an elegy on her death. Lecouvreur is the subject of a play by Scribe and Legouvé and of an opera by Cipéla, both based on the unfounded tradition that she was poisoned by a rival in love.

Leda. In Greek mythology, the wife of Tyndareus. She was the mother by Zeus (who is said to have come to her in the shape of a swan) of two eggs, from one of which came Castor and Clytemnestra, and from the other Polydeuces and Helen. There are, however, many versions of their birth. The subject of Leda and the Swan has been a favorite with artists; Paul Veronese, Correggio, and Michelangelo have all left paintings of it.

Ledoux, Louis Vernois. American poet and critic. Head of the firm of Ledoux & Co., chemists and assayers, Ledoux wrote such volumes of verse as Songs from the Silent Land (1905), The Soul’s Progress and Other Poems (1906), and The Shadow of Actea (1914). Following one of his main interests, he wrote The Art of Japan (1927) and Japanese Prints of the Primitive Period (1942).

Ledwidge, Francis (1891–1917). Irish nature poet. He wrote Songs of the Field (1914) and Songs of Peace (1916). He was killed in World War I.

Lee, Ann (1736–1784). English mystic and founder of the American Shaker society in Watervliet, N.Y. (1776). She claimed the power of discerning spirits and working miracles. She was known to her followers as “Ann the Word” or “Mother Ann” since they were convinced that she was the manifestation of the female counterpart of Christ.

Lee, Henry. Known as Light-Horse Harry Lee (1756–1818). American soldier and statesman. The father of Robert E. Lee, he was a brilliant cavalry commander in the Revolutionary War and received his nickname because of his quick movements in the field. His eulogy of Washington (1799) contains the famous words: “First in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen.”

Lee, Laurie (1914– ). English poet. The author of simple lyrics, mostly about nature, he has written The Bloom of Candles (1947) and A Rose for Winter (1955). Cider with Rosie (1959) is an autobiography.

Lee, Lorelei. The heroine of Anita Loos’s novel Gentlemen Prefer Blondes. Not very bright but an enterprising young lady, she is a remarkably successful “gold-digger.”

Lee, Manfred B. See Ellery QUEEN.

Lee, Nathaniel (c. 1653–1692). English dramatist. His bloody and extravagant tragedies, extremely popular in his time, include The Rival Queens, or The Death of Alexander the Great (1677); Mithridates, King of Pontus (1678); and Cæsar Borgia (1680). He also collaborated with Dryden.
Lee, Robert E[dward] (1807–1870). American soldier. The son of Henry Lee, he was graduated from West Point in 1829, fought in the Mexican War, and commanded the marine detachment that quelled John Brown’s abortive insurrection in 1859. Although Lee favored preservation of the Union, loyalty to his native Virginia, where his family had long been prominent, led him to refuse field command of the U.S. army in 1861 and to accept command of the state’s forces. Named commander of the Army of Northern Virginia in 1862, he thwarted McClellan’s Peninsula Campaign against Richmond in the Seven Days’ Battles (1862), suffered a technical defeat at Antietam, and won engagements at Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville. His defeat at Gettysburg began the attrition of Confederate strength that compelled him to surrender to Grant at Appomattox Courthouse on April 9, 1865. After the war, Lee became president of Washington College in Virginia, which was later renamed Washington and Lee University in his honor. An excellent strategist and leader of men, Lee is admired in both North and South for his courage and chivalry.

Lee, Vernon. Pen name of Violet Paget (1856–1935). English novelist, essayist, and writer on aesthetics, politics, and Italian art and life. Euphorion (1884) is a study of Renaissance art.

Leech, Margaret (1893— ). American writer. Her works in the field of American history and biography are known for their careful research and readable style. For Revelle in Washington (1941), an account of life in the capital during the Civil War, she received a Pulitzer Prize. Her other books include Anthony Comstock, Roundman of the Lord, written with Heywood Broun (1927), and In the Days of McKinley (1959), another Pulitzer Prize winner.

Leech-gatherer, The. See Resolution and Independence.

Le Fanu, Joseph Sheridan (1814–1873). Irish novelist, journalist, and balladeer. He is known for his mystery novel Uncle Silas (1864), and his tales of the supernatural, the best of which is The House by the Churchyard (1863). His work compares favorably with that of Poe and Wilkie Collins. He was a distant relative of the 18th-century playwright Sheridan.

Lefèvre d’Étaples, Jacques. See Jacques Lefèvre d’Étaples.

left, right, center. Names applied to political positions. In the amphitheater where the French National Assembly of 1789 convened, the nobles still commanded sufficient respect to be given places of honor to the right of the president. The radicals moved naturally as far away from them to the left as they could. The moderates found themselves squeezed in between in the center. Hence the political connotations of these terms. Carlyle, in The French Revolution (1847), was one of the first to speak in English of "the extreme Left." Such derivatives as leftist, leftism, and the like, did not come into general use until after the Russian Revolution (c. 1920).

Legalist School. Chinese political philosophy of the 4th and 3d centuries B.C. Largely based on the teachings of the Han Fei Tzu, it called for harsh and expedient means for gaining political and military control. Its teachings were adopted during the Ch’in Dynasty.

Le Gallienne, Eva (1899— ). English-born American actress, director, and producer. The daughter of the English writer Richard Le Gallienne, she founded (1926), directed, and acted in the Civic Repertory Theatre in New York, and was co-founder of the American Repertory Theatre (1946). She is noted for her continuing interest in repertory theater in the U.S. In addition, she has translated many of Ibsen's plays and has written an autobiography At 33 (1934), continued in With a Quiet Heart (1953).

Legenda Aurea. See Golden Legend.

Legend of Good Women, The (c. 1386). Unfinished poem by Geoffrey Chaucer, of over 2700 lines in decasyllabic couplets. In the prose, which contains the best poetry, the poet describes his delight at wandering through the meadows on a May morning, especially celebrating the daisy. He falls asleep and dreams that the god of Love, attended by Queen Alcesta, appears and berates him for having transgressed the Romance of the Rose and written Troilus and Criseyde, thereby discouraging men from the service of Courtly Love. Alcesta intercedes, pointing out Chaucer's exaltation of love in other works, and suggests that he be allowed to redeem himself by writing a collection of 20 lives of women who have served Love truly and well. There follow nine short narratives, modeled on stories by Vergil and Ovid, about women who suffered or died because they were faithful in love and (except for the first two stories) because men were treacherous: Cleopatra; Thibse; Didó; Hypsipyle and Medea, both betrayed by Jason; Lucrece; Ariadne; Philomela; Phyllis, betrayed by Demophon; Hypermenestra.

Legend of Montrose, The (1819). A novel by Sir Walter Scott, dealing with the struggle between the Royalists and the Parliamentarians in the time of Charles I. Interwoven with this are the amorous quandaries of the heroine, Annot Lyle.

Legend of Sleepy Hollow, The (1819). A tale by Washington Irving, collected in his Sketch Book of Geoffrey Crayon, Gent. The story takes place at Sleepy Hollow, near Tarrytown, N.Y. Ichabod Crane, the local schoolmaster, courts Katrina Van Tassel. The affair is interrupted when Crane's rival, Brom Bones, masquerades as a headless horseman, and scares the schoolmaster out of town.

Legends of the Alhambra, The (1832; enlarged, 1852). A group of tales and sketches on Spanish subjects by Washington Irving. The book grew out of Irving's sojourn in Spain as a member of the U.S. Embassy, in 1826. The legends deal with the clashes between Spaniard and Moor. Irving, an admirer of Moorish civilization, invests the tales with glamour and mystery.

Léger, Aléxis St.-Léger. See St.-John Perse.

Léger, Fernand (1881–1955). French artist whose paintings, murals, tapestries, mosaics and stained glass windows exercised a profound influence upon his time. In 1917, he began to construct his compositions from mechanical elements—indicators, railway wheels, or cogs; human figures were themselves treated as machines. Léger's art gradually became more human, achieving a liveliness, and gaiety, while retaining its monumental quality. His construction workers, mechanics, divers, or picnickers Legion of Honor (Legion d'honneur). A French order of distinction and reward instituted by Napoleon Bonaparte in 1802 for either military or civil merit. The order has continued to exist in France during the 19th and 20th centuries.

Lehár, Franz (1870–1948). Hungarian composer of operettas. He wrote The Merry Widow; The Count of Luxembourg (1909); and others.

Lehmann, John (1907–1938). English editor, brother of Rosamond Lehmann. He edited the influential left-wing magazine New Writing and its successor from 1936 to 1950 (publishing the work of Auden and other left-wing poets), and edited The London Magazine from 1954. His autobiographies are The Whispering Gallery (1955) and I Am My Brother (1960).

Lehmann, Lotte (1888–1975). German-born concert and operatic soprano. She is especially famed for her interpretation of German lieder. She wrote a novel, Orplid mein Land (1937; translated, Eternal Flight, 1938), and two autobiographies: Anfang und Aufsteig (1937; translated, Midway in My Song, 1938) and My Many Lives (1948).

Lehmann, Rosamond (1903–1985). English novelist. She is the daughter of L. C. Lehmann, long on the staff of Punch, and sister of John Lehmann and of Beatrice Lehmann, an actress. Dusty Answer (1927) is about the emotions of a young girl growing up, especially during her years at college. Insultion to the Waltz (1932) describes the experiences of a girl at her first elegant party. The Ballad and the Source (1945) is an experimental novel in which the most violent events that afflict three generations of a tragically doomed family are narrated by a 14-year-old girl in the order in which she hears about them. She also wrote A Note in Music (1930), and The Echoing Groove (1953). A writer of grace and sensibility, her work may be compared with that of Virginia Woolf and Elizabeth Bowen.

Leibniz or Leibnitz, Gottfried Wilhelm (1646–1716). German philosopher. A major figure in the German enlightenment, he believed in a pre-established harmony, created by God, of matter and spirit. His statement that "this is the best of all possible worlds" was ridiculed by Voltaire in Candide for its supposedly irresponsible optimism; actually, however, Leibniz meant his statement in a metaphysical sense and did not intend it to be directly applied to everyday life. In his Monadology (1714), Leibniz maintains that the divine order of the universe is reflected in each of its parts, the smallest unit being the monad. The happiness of man is in striving for harmony with God, the original creator of harmony. Leibniz formulated the calculus in 1676, independently of Newton.

Leigh, Augusta. See Anne Isabella Milbanke.

Leino, Eino. Pen name of Armas Eino Leopold Lönnbohm (1879–1926). Finnish poet, playwright, and novelist. Considered the outstanding lyric poet of modern Finland, Leino published many collections of highly subjective verse. In such works as Ajat Aidoloita (The Waves of Time, 1899) and Helka-virsiat (Helga Hymns, 1903), he gave expression to the feelings of his people and to his own intense emotional life.

Leipzig, battle of. Also called the battle of the nations (October 16–18, 1813). A famous battle where the French under Napoleon Bonaparte were badly defeated by the allied forces of Prussia, Austria, Sweden, and Russia.

Leir, King. A central figure in a tale in the History of the Kings of Britain by Geoffrey of Monmouth. His story is much the same as that found in Shakespeare's great tragedy King Lear. Leir divides his kingdom among his three daughters; he rejects Cordelia, and is subsequently rejected by Goneril and Regan. In this tale, however, the king goes to France to enlist the aid of Cordelia, reconquers Britain, and, when he dies, is buried under the river Soar. For his tragedy, Shakespeare seems to have made use of the version of Leir's story found in Holinshed's Chronicles.

leitmotiv or leitmotif (Ger., "leading motive"). In the Wagnerian music drama, a theme consistently reappearing with the reappearance of a given character, problem, emotion, or thought. The term has also been applied to a corresponding device in literature. Thomas Mann has used the leitmotiv technique in conscious emulation of Wagner. For instance, in The Magic Mountain, each appearance of Settembrini is accompanied by the same brief description of his clothes.

Leland, Charles Godfrey. See Hans Breitmann.

Lélia (1833). A novel by George Sand. The highly romantic tale describes the tragically misguided feelings of love that motivate the various characters. These include Lélia, the lovely heroine; her sister Pulcherie, a prostitute; Stenio, an idealistic young poet; and Magnus, a priest who becomes insane.

Lely, Sir Peter. Originally Pieter Van der Faes (1618–1680). Dutch-born English portrait painter. He migrated to England in 1641, where his studio became a school that introduced Dutch technique to the artistically isolated English.

Lemaitre, [François Elie] Jules (1853–1914). French writer and critic. Lemaitre served as drama critic for the Journal des Débats and was noted for his lively impressionistic articles, refreshing for the spontaneity of their reactions. His essays and reviews were published in the 7-volume series Contemporains (1855–1899), the 8th volume appearing posthumously in 1918, and in his 10-volume Impressions de Théâtre (1888–1898) whose 11th volume also appeared posthumously (1920).

Lemnos. The island where Hephaestus fell when Zeus flung him out of heaven. One myth connected with Lemnos tells how the women of the island, in revenge for their ill-treatment, murdered all the men. The Argonauts found the place an "Adamless Eden." They were received with great favor by the women; as a result of their few months' stay the island was re-populated, and the queen, Hypsipyle, became the mother of twins by Jason.

Lemon, Mark (1809–1870). English playwright, editor. Author of some 60 plays, numerous novels, essays, and children's books, Lemon is remembered as one of the founders and first editor (1841–1870), of Punch, the English magazine of humor and satire, whose tone and popularity he did much to establish.

Le Morte d'Arthur. See Morte d'Arthur, Le.

Lemoyne, Jean Baptiste. See Sieur de Bienville.

Lemière, John (1765–1824). English classical scholar who compiled the reference work Bibliotheca Classica, or Classical Dictionary (1788), dealing with classical history and mythology.

lemures. The name given by the Romans to the spirits of the dead, especially specters which wandered about at nighttime to terrify men.

Lemuria. The name given to a lost land that supposedly connected Madagascar with India and Sumatra in prehistoric times.

Lenau, Nikolaus. Name at birth: Edler von Strehlau von Niembsch (1802–1850). Hungarian-born Austrian poet. His lyrics are marked by a striking exactness of imagery and an occasionally morbid personal intensity that reflects the instability of his temperament. He wrote two religious epics pleading for tolerance, Savonarola (1837) and Die Albigenser (The Albigensians, 1842), and an epic-dramatic Faust (1836). In 1832 he came to the U.S., hoping to begin a new, idyllic existence, but returned disappointed to Germany in 1833, and in 1844 he went mad. See Ferdinand Künberger.

Lenclos, Anne. Known as Nino de Lenolos (1620–1705). French lady of fashion. Famous for her wit and beauty, she conducted a dazzling salon and numbered among her lovers the most distinguished men of the day. In the novel Clélie, her friend Madeleine de Scudéry drew a portrait of her under the name Clarisse.

Lenin, Nikolai. Pseudonym of Vladimir Ilyich Ulyanov (1870–1924). Russian Communist leader. Lenin, who led the Bolsheviks to power in 1917, was born in Simbirsk (now called Ulyanovsk in his honor), the son of a provincial schoolmaster. His elder brother Alexander was executed in 1887 for an attempt on the life of Czar Alexander III. Lenin, who studied at the universities of Kazan and St. Petersburg where he became a profound student of Marxism, entered revolutionary activity in the 1890's. Much of his time was spent in Siberian exile or abroad. In 1903 he became a leader of the Bolshevik faction of the Social Democratic Party, having been largely responsible for the schism that split the party, the other faction being known as the Mensheviks. Lenin's drive and astuteness as a practical revolutionary led the Bolsheviks to power in the coup d'état of October (November by the Western calendar) of 1917. He became the head of the Soviet state and retained the post until his death. Like his colleague Trotsky, Lenin had a background of bourgeois culture and apparently was little interested in the manipulation of cultural life of the kind that took place in the Soviet Union under Stalin. His giant mausoleum in Red Square, Moscow, is a national shrine to the Russians.

Lenore (1774). A ballad in folk style by Gottfried August Bürger, in which a soldier appears after death to his sweetheart and carries her with him on horseback to the graveyard where a macabre marriage is celebrated by departed spirits.

Lenormand, Henri René (1882–1951). French dramatist. His plays, influenced by Freudian theory, show the psychological conflicts of men at the mercy of the forces of nature. Time is a Dream (Le Temps est un songe; 1919), Failures (Les Ratés; 1920), The Dream Doctor (Le Manège de rêves; 1922) and Man and His Phantoms (L'Homme et ses fantômes; 1924) are among his better known works.

Lenz, Jakob Michael Reinhold (1751–1792). German dramatist of the Sturm und Drang, admirer of Goethe. His plays, which are distinguished by a revolutionary realism and looseness of form, include Der neue Menoza (The New Menoza, 1774) and Die Soldaten (The Soldiers, 1776).

Leo X. Pope. See Medici.

Leo XIII. Original name: Gioacchino Pecci (1810–1903). Pope (1878–1903), and Italian poet. His encyclical Rerum Novarum (1891), urging reform in favor of the working classes, is significant for its liberal approach. He wrote poetry in Italian and Latin and in 1832 was admitted to the Arcadian Academy, whose bicentenary (1890) he later celebrated in a long poem praising Metastasio, Parini, and Alfieri. Also noted is his ode written on New Year's Eve, 1900, in which he calls for spiritual renewal and the avoidance of war in the coming century.

Leodegrance, King. See Round Table.

León [y Román], Ricardo (1877–1943). Spanish novelist. His works of popular fiction include Casta de hidalgos (A Son of the Hidalgos, 1908), a descriptive narrative, and El amor de los amores (The Wisdom of Sorrow, 1910), a study in mysticism.

Leonard, William Ellery (1876–1944). American poet and educator. He is best known for the sonnet sequence, Two Lives (1925), which forms an autobiographical account of Leonard and his first wife. He also published several volumes of verse, including A Man Against Time (1945), The Vaunt of Man and Other Poems (1912), and The Lynching Bee and Other Poems (1920). The Locomotive God (1927) is his autobiography. A student of Lucretius, Leonard translated his poems (1916), wrote a study of his life and poetry (1942), and helped edit the Latin text.

Leonardo da Vinci (1452–1519). Italian painter, sculptor, architect, engineer, scientist, poet, and musician. A universal genius and one of the greatest intellects in the history of mankind, Leonardo was born at Vinci, near Florence, and became, in 1466 an apprentice to Verrocchio. The latter's Baptism of Christ contains an angel and landscape features probably executed by his pupil, who was already his superior. In 1482, he went to Milan where he worked for Lodovico Sforza as an engineer as well as a designer of costumes and scenery for court entertainments. He also made sketches for churches, painted the murals and ceiling pictures of the Sforza castle, and worked on problems of irrigation and central heating. In 1502, he served for a time as military engineer to Caesar Borgia. An offer from the French king, Francis I, took him to France in 1516, where he stayed until his death. Misfortune and Leonardo's own habit of endlessly experimenting with pigments have left few of his paintings to posterity. The best known are The Adoration of the Magi in the Uffizi; The Madonna in the Grotto (c. 1495) and Mona Lisa (also called La Gioconda, 1503), both in the Louvre; and the Last Supper (1495–1498) in the Milan church of S. Maria delle Grazie. The Battle of Anghiari, done in 1505 at Florence in competition with Michelangelo, survives only in drafts. His style in painting is characterized by the use of sfumato, or blurring of outlines. The mysterious effects of chiaroscuro, the clarity of composition, and the over-all tone of serenity. In sculpture, only sketches remain of the destroyed equestrian statue of Francesco Sforza and of the unfinished one of the condottiere Trivulzio. He left no architectural works, but his sketches for buildings and even whole cities were influential for his contemporaries. As engineer and scientist, Leonardo was led by his avid curiosity to speculate about and experiment with various mechanical devices, including guns and cannon, flying machines, parachutes, hydraulic works, submarines, and spiral staircases. In his notebooks, there are some 5,000 pages of sketches and comments that reveal his concern with anatomy, botany, and mathematics, including mechanical perspective drawings, studies of people and animals, caricatures, plant studies and landscapes. He left also a treatise on painting, Trattato della pittura (1489–1518), which has been extracted from the notebooks. Here he espoused again his favorite motif: fidelity to nature, which must be observed directly, not through abstractions or Aristotle or Galen. It was this attention to things themselves which produced the paradox of Leonardo's life, for he accomplished hardly a fraction of his schemes, so overwhelmed was he by the need to investigate and know everything. But even his most tentative ideas and experiments were years ahead of his time and simply beyond the capacities of his contemporaries.

Leonato. In Shakespeare's Much Ado About Nothing, the governor of Messina, father of Hero and uncle of Beatrice. He joins with Don Pedro in bringing Beatrice and Benedick together and later forgives Claudio for having doubted Hero's virtue.

Leoncavallo, Ruggiero (1858–1919). Italian operatic composer and librettist. He is best known for I Pagliacci (1892).

Leone. In the Orlando Furioso of Ariosto, a Greek prince, and prospective husband of Bradamante. His rival, Ruggiero, wins Bradamante by defeating her in a duel, but he is wearing Leone's armor! Finally, Leone gives up to Ruggiero his right to wed Bradamante.

Leonidas. A Spartan king and hero (fl. early 5th century b.c.). He resisted the Persians at Thermopylae with only three hundred Spartans and was slain with all his forces at the pass.

Leonov, Leonid Maksimovich (1899– ). Russian novelist, dramatist, and short-story writer. Leonov fought with the Red Army during the civil war. He published some short stories during the early 1920's, but first attracted attention in 1924 with a long story, The End of a Petty Man (Konets mel'kogo cheloveka). The story, dealing with the acceptance of the revolution by a member of the old generation, foreshadowed a theme Leonov and others were to take up often in later works. Leonov's first novel, The Badgers (Barsu; 1925), dealt with the conflict between the city and countryside during the civil war. The conflict is personified in two brothers, one of whom leaves the village for the city and eventually comes back at the head of an armed force sent to quell a revolt led by his brother. Leonov's second novel, considered by some critics as his best work, is The Thief, which is set in the period of the New Economic Policy in Russia.

Leonov's other novels are Soviet River (Sot; 1930), Slutarevski (1932), Road to the Ocean (Dorogna na okean; 1935), and Russian Forest (Russki les; 1953). His best-known plays include The Orchards of Polovchanskiy (Polovchanskiy sad; 1936), Nakheshchava, Zhizn (Invasion; 1942), and Lyonitchka (1943). One of his best wartime works was the short novel The Taking of Velikoshumsh (Vzyatiye velikoshumsk, 1944), describing a Red Army offensive in the Ukraine.

Leonov is noted as one of the foremost stylists of Soviet prose. His rich and exuberant language and his predilection for complex intrigues in his stories have caused critics to cite him as a follower of Dos-toevski, although this influence is only plainly evident in his novel The Thief.

Leontes. In Shakespeare's Winter's Tale, the king of Sicilia, husband of Hermione and father of Perdita. Consumed with blind, unreasoning jealousy, he accuses his wife of adultery and tries to poison his friend Polixenes. When he finally realizes his folly, he is stricken with remorse.

Leopard, The (Il Gattopardo), (1956). An historical novel by Giuseppe Tomasi, prince of Lampedusa (1896–1957), Sicilian novelist. It describes the impact of Garibaldi's invasion of Sicily and the subsequent unification of Italy on a proud, aristocratic Sicilian family devoted to the Bourbon kings. The novel is celebrated for its refined, poetic style.

Leopardi, Count Giacomo (1798–1837). An Italian poet. A self-taught prodigy, afflicted by physical deformity and spinal disease, he distinguished himself at an early age with the lyrical beauty and intense melancholy of his poetry. All his writings express beliefs in a cosmic nature that is unalterably hostile to man and the chief obstacle to human happiness. This pessimism provides the connective motif in the various collections of his verse: Cansoni (1824), Versi (1826), and Canti (1836). It is treated philosophically in the brief dialogue-essays Le Operette Morali (1824) and the miscellany of aphorisms Pensieri (1834–1837).

Leopardi described himself as an ardent patriot and a confirmed classicist, but he revealed romantic tendencies in asserting that imagination rather than reason is the true source of poetic inspiration.

Lepanto, battle of (Oct. 7, 1571). A naval engagement in the gulf of Corinth, fought between the forces of the Ottoman Empire and those of a Holy League comprising Spain, Venice, and the papacy. Under the leadership of Don John of Austria, the Christians overwhelmingly defeated the Turks, ending their naval domination of the Mediterranean. Cervantes took part in the battle and was wounded in the left hand.

Lepidus, Marcus Aemilius (d. 13 B.C.). A member, with Octavius and Mark Antony, of the Second Triumvirate (43–33 B.C.). He was forced by Octavius into retirement.

Leporello. In Mozart's opera Don Giovanni, the valet of Don Giovanni.

Leprechaun. An elf-like creature in Irish folklore, often associated with shoemaking and the guarding of hidden treasure. He is usually characterized by small stature, supernatural qualities, and a puckish sense of humor. Modern treatment of the leprechaun may be found in James Stephens' fantasy The Crock of Gold (1912) and in William Butler Yeats' Faery and Folk Tales (1888).

Lermontov, Mikhail Yurevich (1814–1841). Russian poet and novelist. In his work and his life he was the outstanding example of the influence of Byronic romanticism on Russian literature. His reputation as a poet in the 19th century was excelled only by Pushkin's. Many of Lermontov's works are set in the Caucasus, where he was exiled for a poem denouncing court circles after Pushkin's death. He returned to St. Petersburg later, was exiled again for duel, and was killed in a duel in the Caucasus. A few months before, he had described a death similar to his own in a short poem Son (A Dream). His most famous poems are Angel, Demon, Mtsyri (The Novice), and Zaveshehianye (The Testament). Lermontov's only completed novel, A Hero of Our Time, was important in the development of the Russian novel, marking a transition from the earlier form of a cycle of stories to the traditional novel form of the later 19th century. It consists of five stories, centering around the romantic hero Pechorin, which are presented out of their chronological sequence for purposes of suspense and retardation of the narrative, just as later novelists were to do. Lermontov's psychological analysis of the hero and realistic treatment of the secondary characters, also, anticipate the work of the great 19th-century Russian realists.

Lernean hydra. See HYDRA.

Lesage or Le Sage, Alain René (1668–1747). French novelist and dramatist. His early works are translations of Spanish authors, such as Rojas, Lope de Vega, Calderón, and others; these works caused no comment. His first original work, Crispin, rival de son maître (1707), a comedy, made him a reputation. It was soon followed by the novel Le Diable boiteux (1709), an imitation and enlargement of Louis Velez de Guevara's El Diablo cojuelo (1641). Asmodeus, as this novel is sometimes called in English translation, is an unrelated series of satirical tableaux, more descriptive than moralistic, of life in 18th-century France. His next play, Tuccacott, ou le Financier (1708) is a bitter satire on money and financiers, and caused a great scandal. After this comedy, Lesage wrote some 100 farces or comedies of manners, often interspersed with popular airs, for the Théâtre de la Foire. His masterpiece, Histoire de Gil Blas de SANTILLANE (definitive ed. 1747), is considered by some critics to be the first novel of manners. Lesage wrote three other picaresque novels, Don Guaman d'Alfarache (1732), Estevanillo Gonzàles (1734), and Le Bachelier de Salamanque (1736), and some inferior minor works of fiction. Celebrated for his animated style, and for his vivid and dramatic presentation of human foibles and absurdities, he had a marked influence on Fielding, Smollett, and Sterne, the English novelists.

Lesbian. Pertaining to Lesbos, one of the islands of the Greek Archipelago. It pertains also to Sappho, the famous poetess of Lesbos, and to the practices of female homosexuality (Lesbianism) attributed to her.

Lesbino. In the GERUSALEMME LIBERATA of Tasso, the youthful page of Solimano, the leader of the Arab forces pitted against the Crusaders. The lad is killed by the knight Argillano, whom the bereaved Solimano then kills in revenge.

Lescaut, Manon. See MANON LESCAUT.

Leskov, Nikolai Semionovich (1831–1895). Russian novelist and short-story writer. Leskov, whose parents died when he was 17, supported himself as a civil servant, estate manager, and journalist in various provincial towns, until the age of 30, he became a journalist in St. Petersburg. His first large literary work, the novel Nekuda (No Way Out, 1864), won little critical acclaim. The radical critics held sway over literature at the time and Leskov had displeased the radicals with some of his journalistic articles. His next novel, Na Nozakhkh (At Duggers Drawn), 1870–1871, depicted young radicals in a manner that enraged the radical camp still more. Leskov was disinclined to placate the critics, even though their influence was able to delay his recognition as a major writer. He eventually attained this recognition with the general reading public for the humor and raciness of his stories and for his remarkable prose, which is full of puns, colloquial expressions, folk etymologies, and neologisms. Many of his most popular stories are set in the milieu of the clergy and Old Believers; which Leskov had had ample time to observe during his early years in the provinces. Leskov was one of the early masters of the narrative technique termed skaz by Russian critics: the re-creation in prose of indigenous oral narration, by reproducing the speech mannerisms, cadence, and vocabulary of a fictional narrator. Leskov often placed the skaz narration in the framework of the story by having the recorder of the story meet a character who relates the tale in his own words.

Leskov's most popular works include the novel Soboryane (Cathedral Folk, 1872), and the tales Zapechatlioni infangel (The Sealed Angel, 1873), Ocharovannî strannik (The Enchanted Wanderer, 1874), Melochi arkhiyereiski zhizni (Details of Episcopal Life, 1880), and Saz o tul'skpm leshke i o stal'noi bloke (The Left-handed Smith of Tula and the Steel Flea, 1882).
Les Misérables

Les Misérables. See Misérables, Les.

Lespinasse, Julie Jeanne Eléonore de (1732–1776). French letter-writer. She was the companion and protégée, from 1754 to 1763, of the blind Mme du Deffand. Together, they conducted for a time a sparkling literary salon; later, her own salon became a center for the Encyclopédistes (see Encyclopédie). She was a friend of d'Alembert, the marquis de Mora, and the comte de Guibert. To this latter she addressed her passionate love letters, Lettres de Mlle de Lespinasse, with their constant theme, Je ne fais qu'aimer, je ne sais qu'aimer (Fr., "I do nothing but love, I can do nothing but love"). The letters were published by Guibert's widow in 1809.

Lessep(s), Vicomte Ferdinand Marie de (1805–1894). French diplomat and engineer. The original conceiver of the Suez Canal, de Lesseps received a concession from Said Pasha, viceroy of Egypt in 1854. He completed the canal in 10 years (1859–1869). De Lesseps was also, unfortunately, president of a French company that began work on cutting through the isthmus of Panama (1881–1888). The scheme collapsed and de Lesseps was condemned for misappropriation of funds, although his sentence was never carried out.

Lessing, Doris [May] (1919– ). English novelist, short-story writer, and essayist, born and for many years resident in Southern Rhodesia. Her intense commitment to socialism and to other causes is reflected in her work. She began a series of novels about Maria, The Quest in 1955: The Grass is Singing (1950) and This Was the Old Chief's Country (1951) are set in Africa. In Pursuit of the English (1960) is a sociological essay. The Golden Notebook (1962) is an ambitious experimental novel about a modern "liberated" woman.

Lessing, Gotthold Ephraim (1729–1781). German dramatist, aesthete, and critic, a strong advocate of religious tolerance. His thought has roots in the enlightenment but is not cramped by a too strict rationalism. Perhaps more than any other, he was responsible for the emergence of German drama as a significant contribution to world theater; in his critical work Hamburgische Dramaturgie (Hamburg Dramaturgy, 1767–1768), he attacked the formalism of neo-classicism and called for a drama in which the form springs from the dramatist's vision of life. Among his more general works on aesthetics are the Briefe, die neueste Literatur betreffend (Letters, Concerning the Most Recent Literature, a periodical with Christoph Nicolai, 1759–1765), which includes a Faust fragment and a classic attack on Johann Gottsched; Laocoon, or On the Limits of Painting and Poetry; and Wie die Allen den Tod gebildet (How the Ancients Represented Death, 1769). Late in his life, he wrote a number of tracts on theological subjects, the best known of which is Erziehung des Menschengeschlechts (Education of the Human Race, 1780). His most famous dramas are Miss Sara Sampson (1755), Minna von Barnhelm, Emilia Galotti, and Nathan the Wise.

Les Six. A group of French composers: Darius Milhaud, Arthur Honegger, Francis Poulenc, Georges Auric (1899– ), Louis Durey (1888– ), and Germaine Tailleferre (1892– ). A music critic coined this sobriquet in comparing these composers with "The Five" Russians. Although they jointly Erik Satie, their mentor, and Jean Cocteau, their spokesman, in decrying the pretentiousness of Romanticism and admiring the directness of popular music, they seldom met, and developed different musical styles. They collaborated without Durey on Cocteau's ballet Les Miserables de la Tour Eiffel (1921). L'Estrange, Sir Roger (1616–1706). English journalist, political pamphleteer, and translator. In 1663 he became surveyor of printing presses and licensor of the press and established The Public Intelligence and The News, both of which ceased publication in 1666. He later edited the Observer, in which he attacked the Whigs. His best-known translation is The Fables of Aesop (1692).

Lethe (Gr. letho, latheo, lathano, to cause persons not to know). In Greek mythology, one of the rivers of Hades. The souls of all the dead are obliged to taste its water, that they may forget everything said and done when alive. See Styx.

Leto. In Greek mythology, a daughter of the Titans Coeus and Phoebe and mother by Zeus of Apollo and Artemis.

Leto, Pomponio (1428–1498). Italian scholar. He was prominent during the Renaissance as the leader of a group of Humanists and men of letters who formed one of the first modern academies at Rome.

Letters from an American Farmer (1782). A group of essays by Crévecoeur, under the pseudonym of J. Hector St. John. They deal with farm life on the American frontier in the 18th century, sometimes idealizing it in the tradition of Jean Jacques Rousseau, yet depicting realistically the hard unpleasant facts of the social life and customs in the American colonies. Crévecoeur sees America as a refuge for the persecuted and oppressed peoples of the world.

Letters of Unknown Men. See Epistolary Obscurorum Virorum.

Letters on the Study of History (1752). A political and philosophical treatise by Henry St. John, Viscount Bolingbroke, setting forth the concept that "history is philosophy teaching by examples." St. John proclaims a new Tory position which, in effect, is no different from the Whig doctrines of the Revolution of 1688.

Lettres provinciales. See Blaise Pascal.

Leucadia's Rock. A promontory, the southern extremity of the island Leucas or Leucadia in the Ionian Sea. According to legend, Sappho leapt from this rock when she found her love for Phaon unrequited. At the annual festival of Apollo, a criminal was hurled from Leucadia's Rock into the sea but birds of various sorts were attached to him in order to break his fall, and if he was not killed, he was set free.

Leucippus (Leukippos; fl. 450 b.c.). A Greek philosopher. His atomist theory held that all matter is composed of an irreducible and unchanging set of Leucothea (Leukothea). See Iso.

Leute von Seldwyla, Die (The People of Seldwyla; vol. 1, 1856; vol. 2, 1874). A collection of humorous novellas by Gottfried Keller, all set in the fictional Swiss town of Seldwyla. The two best-known ones are Kleider machen Leute (Clothes Make the Man), about a man who is taken for a Polish nobleman and, with an eye to his personal advantage, continues the pose, and Spiegel, das Kätzchen (lit., Spiegel, the Little Cat, trans. as The Fat of the Cat), about a down-and-out cat who sells his cat-fat to a magician without fully realizing that in order to relinquish his fat, he must be killed.

Leutnant Gustl (1901). A short novel by Arthur Schnitzler. An early experiment in the technique of stream-of-consciousness, this story probes deeply into the mind of a young officer whose traditionally based values are put to a severe test by the prospect of a duel.

Levana (from Lat., levare, "to raise up"). In Roman mythology the goddess who watched over newborn infants. It was in her name that the father accepted the infant as his legitimate offspring; he did this by the ritual of lifting the child from the ground and raising it aloft. In Suspiria de Profundis (1845), Thomas De Quincey writes of an opium dream in which he beheld the goddess.

Levelers or Levellers. In English history, a group of ultrarepublicans during the Civil War, who wanted to give all men the right to vote and to end class distinctions. John Lilburne was one of the leaders of the sect, which was active from 1647 to 1649, when it was suppressed by Cromwell's troops.

In Irish history, an illegal association of 18th-century agrarian agitators, also called Whiteboys.

Lever, Charles James (1806-1872). Irish novelist. His early novels, reminiscent of student and military life, are his best, and include The Confessions of Harry Lorrequer, Charles O'Malley (1841), and Tom Burke of Ours (1843). These books are highly anecdotal, notable for their swift and witty narrative and comic secondary characters. In his day, Lever was an extremely popular writer.

Leverkühn, Adrian. The hero of Thomas Mann's novel Doktor Faustus. He is a contemporary composer, and in several places Mann has used actual music of Arnold Schoenberg to describe the fictional works of his protagonist. In order to achieve a breakthrough into the most sublime realms of art, Leverkühn, like the legendary Faust, makes a pact with the powers of evil. Like Faust, he himself is utterly destroyed by the forces he has set in motion, but the magnificence of his music remains as a monument. The name Leverkühn suggests "one who lives boldly."

Leverrier, Urbain Jean Joseph (1811-1877). French astronomer. Leverrier determined mathematically, on the basis of previously observed irregularities in the motion of the planet Uranus, the existence and exact position of another planet. Galle, a German astronomer, discovered the planet (1846) and named it Neptune. The same discovery was made independently by the English astronomer J. C. Adams.

Leverson, Ada (1865-1936). English novelist. She is well known for her literary friendships; she befriended Oscar Wilde during his trial. Her urban, witty novels are in the manner of Wilde; The Limit (1911) is a typical work.

Levertov, Denise (1923- ). English-born American poet. Of Welsh and Jewish parentage, Miss Levertov married an American and came with him to the U.S. in 1948. Recognized as one of the most accomplished of the younger poets, she shows the influence of William Carlos Williams and Wallace Stevens and writes poetry that is lyrical, graceful, and of colloquial simplicity. Her collections include Overland to the Islands (1958), With Eyes at the Back of Our Heads (1959), and The Jacob's Ladder (1961).

Levi (1). In the Old Testament, one of the sons of the patriarch Jacob. The tribe of his descendants are known as Levites, the priestly tribe of the Israelites (Deut. 21:5).

(2) In the New Testament, a name for Matthew.

Levi, Carlo (1902- ). Italian writer. He is especially noted for his book Christ Stopped at Eboli. Other books include Le Parole Sono Pietre (1955), a study of Sicily, and Il Futuro Ha Un Cuore Antico (1956), a study of Soviet Russia. His novel The Watch (L'Orologio; 1950) is set in the turbulent period following World War II. La Doppia Notte dei Tigli (tr. 1962 as The Linden Trees) records his impressions of a visit to Germany, a nation split both by artificial borders and its sense of guilt for the past while enjoying prosperity.

leviathan. A word from the Hebrew, meaning literally "that which gathers itself together in folds," and given in the Bible to a mythical sea serpent (Job 41:1; Isa. 27:1; Ps. 104:26). The name is also applied to the whale and the crocodile, and by extension it has come to mean something vast and formidable of its kind.

Hobbes, following the trend of his time, tended to regard politics as a branch of physical science, a kind of social physics. Comparing the motion of physical bodies to human behavior, he argued that just as physical things, when left to themselves, pursued their own direction, so individuals, when uncontrolled, naturally followed their own direction, their private self-interest. Thus, in his view, the first principle of human behavior was egoism, or self-interest, and it was this egoism that was the root of all social conflict. He believed that social peace could only be achieved within a stable government which had an absolute authority over its subjects and its institutions. Since the attainment of all desirable social ends was hindered by the "war of all against all," it was necessary that men agree among themselves, upon the basis of a social contract, to accept a common and absolute power that would protect them from themselves and from each other, keep the peace, and allow thereby a moderate satisfaction of human desires.

Levin, Konstantin. See Anna Karenina.

Levine, Jack (1915– ). American painter. He is known for his satirical portraits and mordant social commentaries.

Leviticus. A book of the Old Testament. It was written about 475 B.C. and records the religious and ceremonial law of the Jews in the period after the rebuilding of the temple in 516 B.C. In an effort to give the book greater authority, the author ascribes it to Moses. It is the basic compendium of Jewish law.

Levy, Benn [Wolfe] (1900– ). English playwright. His works include Mrs. Moonlight (1928), Art and Mrs. Bottle, Springtime for Henry (1931), and Topase (from the French of Marcel Pagnol).

Lewes, George Henry (1817–1878). English scientific writer and critic. Lewes is better known for his connection with the novelist George Eliot than for his own work; the two lived together as man and wife from 1854 (Lewes being separated from his first wife), and he discovered and fostered her talent. He was the first editor of the Fortnightly Review (1865–1866). His plays and novels were never successful; his works on marine biology, physiology, and psychology (fields in which he did original scientific work) are dated; but his Biographical History of Philosophy (1845–1846), Life of Goethe (1855), and A Lecture and the Art of Acting (1875) retain some interest.

Lewis, Alun (1915–1944). Welsh poet, killed in World War II. Hal Hal Amongst the Trumpets (1945) is a posthumous collection of verse.

Lewis, Cecil Day. See Cecil Day-Lewis.

Lewis, C[live] S[taples] (1898–1963). English novelist, literary critic, and writer of essays on Christian theological and moral problems. Lewis wrote science fiction in the form of interplanetary fantasies which are really Christian allegories of good and evil: Out of the Silent Planet (1938), Perelandra (1943), and That Hideous Strength (1945). The Problem of Pain (1940) and The Screwtape Letters (1942) were widely read works of Christian apologetics. Among his important books of literary criticism are The Allegory of Love (1936), a study of the medieval courtly tradition; Preface to Paradise Lost (1942); and An Experiment in Criticism (1961).

Lewis, D[ominic] B[evan] Wyndham (1894– ). Welsh-born English humorist, essayist, and biographer. Lewis is perhaps best known as a whimsical, chatty essayist in the manner of Chesterton. His humorous works include A London Farrago (1922), At the Green Goose (1923), At the Sign of the Blue Moon (1924), and On Straw and Other Conceits (1927). He also edited with Charles Lee an anthology of bad verse, The Stuffed Owl (1930), and conducted a humor column for the London News Chronicle under the name Timothy Shy, which he used as co-author with Ronald Searle of The Terror of St. Trinian's (1954).

In addition, Lewis has written several scholarly and colorful biographies, including François Villon (1928), King Spider (1930), Emperor of the West (1932; U.S. title, Charles of Europe), Ronsard (1944), The Hooded Hawk (1946; republished as James Boswell, 1952), Doctor Rabelais (1957), and Misère: The Comic Mask (1959). Despite the similarity in names, he is not related to novelist and painter Wyndham Lewis.

Lewis, Matthew Gregory (1775–1818). English novelist and dramatist, author of the famous Gothic Novel Ambrosio, or The Monk, for which he was known as "Monk Lewis." A lover of poetry, Lewis collaborated with Sir Walter Scott and Robert Southey in a collection of verse, Tales of Wonder (1801). Lewis' contributions included some of the earliest translations of the German romantics Goethe and Herder. He was a successful dramatist and a liberal who did his best to alleviate the condition of the slaves on his Jamaica plantation, where he died. See Alonzo the Brave.

Lewis, [Harry] Sinclair (1885–1951). American novelist. Born in Sauk Centre, Minn., Lewis was an awkward, lonely boy, something of a dreamer. After his graduation from Yale in 1908, he spent several years in newspaper and editorial work. His first novel, Hike and the Aeroplane (1912), was a story for boys. He achieved moderate success with his early novels, and two of them—Our Mr. Wrenn: The Romantic Adventures of a Gentle Man (1914) and The Job: An American Novel (1917)—contain hints of the satire and realism that were to be characteristic of his best work.

According to Mark Schorer, Lewis' biographer, the appearance of Main Street in 1920 was "the most sensational event in the 20th-century American publishing history." Although there were some howls of outrage, in general both the critics and the public were delighted with Lewis' devastating portrayal of the smugness and provincialism of the American small town, as typified by Gopher Prairie, the novel's mythical locale. Lewis next directed his barbs at the American businessman in Babbitt, in many ways an extension of Main Street. In Arrowsmith, often considered his best work, he attacked the vulgarity and pettiness that impede the search for scientific truth. Although Lewis was awarded a Pulitzer Prize for Arrowsmith, he promptly refused to accept it, because the terms of the award state that it is to be given, not for literary merit, but for the best presentation of "the wholesome atmosphere of American Life." Other successes of this period were Elmer Gantry and Dodsworth.

Lewis was awarded the Nobel Prize in 1930, the first American to win such an honor. But his work declined in the 1930's, and he tended to make peace with the attitudes he had earlier satirized. Ann Petters (1933) traces the career of a neurotic woman who starts as a social worker and ends as the mistress of a politician, The Prodigal Parents (1938) presents rebellious children in an unsympathetic light. Perhaps the most vigorous of Lewis' work in the 30's was
It Can’t Happen Here, a warning about the possibility of fascism in the U.S. Among his later novels are Cass Timberlane (1945), the story of an older man’s love for his young and unsuitable wife; Kingsblood Royal (1947), about racial prejudice; and The God-Seeker (1949), about a missionary in Minnesota in the 1840’s.

There is much disguised biography in Lewis’ work, and many suggestions of Lewis himself in his characters. A Romantic as well as a realist and satirist, he loved the Babbitts and Main Streets of America even as he deplored them.

Lewis, [Percy] Wyndham (1882-1957). English novelist, essayist, and vorticist painter. A vitriolic satirist, Wyndham Lewis wrote the notable satirical novels Tarr, The Apes of God, and the trilogy The Human Age. His largest output consisted of essays written to express his near-fascist political views and his literary opinions. Trained as an artist, Lewis first attracted attention, before World War I, as the leader of the school of painting known as vorticism. In association with Ezra Pound, he edited the little magazine Blast (1914-1915). With Pound, T. S. Eliot, and James Joyce, he sympathized with a French-inspired movement to reject “romanticism” and return to “classicism.” The four were sometimes called “the men of 1914.” Blasting and Bombardiering (1937) is an autobiography about Lewis’ experiences in action in the second half of the war. Lewis’ sympathy with fascism came to a peak in the years between the wars; at the outbreak of World War II he emigrated to Canada, describing his experience, in fictional form, in Self-Condemned (1954). Rotting Hill (1951) is a novel purporting to demonstrate the decay of England under postwar socialism. In 1949 Lewis began to go blind.

Among Lewis’ other works are poems (1933); The Wild Body (1927), a collection of short stories; the novels Snooty Baronet (1932), The Revenge for Love (1937), and The Red Priest (1956); and the autobiography Rude Assignment (1950). Some of his political and literary tracts are The Art of Being Railed (1926), Time and Western Man, The Lion and the Fox: the role of hero in the plays of Shakespeare (1927), Hitler (1931), Men Without Art (1934), and The Demon of Progress in the Arts (1954).

In his heyday in the 1920’s Wyndham Lewis was thought as original and exciting as James Joyce. Since then he has been neglected.

Lewis and Clark Expedition (1804-1806). An expedition across the U.S. to the Pacific Ocean led by Meriwether Lewis (1774-1809) and William Clark (1770-1838). Starting out from St. Louis in the spring of 1804, the party of 23 soldiers, three interpreters, and one slave ascended the Missouri River, spent the winter among the Mandan Indians of North Dakota, and descended the Columbia River to the Pacific late in 1805. The expedition showed that an overland route to the Pacific was feasible and provided scientific data about the previously unexplored region. The Original Journals of the Lewis and Clark Expedition were edited by R. G. Thwaites in 1904-1905. See Sacajawea.

Lewisohn, Ludwig (1883-1959). German-born American editor, teacher, critic, and writer. Lewisohn, who came to America as a boy, became an authority on German literature and translated works of Hauptmann, Rilke, and others. Some of his critical works are The Modern Drama (1915), The Spirit of Modern German Literature (1916), The Story of American Literature (1937), and Goethe (2 vols., 1949). He treated the problems of Jews in The American Jew (1950) and other volumes. This subject also found its way into his fiction; among his novels are The Island Within (1928), The Last Days of Shylock (1931), Anniversary (1948), and In a Summer Season (1955). He also published memoirs in Up Stream (1922) and Mid-Channel: An American Chronicle (1929).

Lexington. A town in Massachusetts, site of the first engagement of the American Revolution (April 19, 1775). General Gage sent 700 men to destroy the American supply depot at Concord, 21 miles from Boston. At Lexington, 5 miles from Concord, the troops ran into 70 armed minutemen, forewarned by Paul Revere, who forced them to withdraw. Moving on to Concord, the British were turned back at the Concord bridge and shot at from behind walls and trees. They retreated to Boston under fire of gathering swarms of minutemen. Estimates of the casualties vary.

Ley, Robert (1890-1945). German Nazi, noted for his extreme anti-Semitism. As head of the Labor Front (1933-1945), he mobilized German war industry and supervised the slave labor camps. He committed suicide after his capture by the Allies.

Lhasa. The capital of Tibet and sacred city of Tibetan Buddhists. Its chief buildings are monasteries, some of which are 1,200 years old, and the Potala, palace of the Dalai Lama. Prior to Chinese occupation, Lhasa was the goal of religious pilgrims from all over the Himalayan plateau. Not open to Westerners until the British forced entry in 1904, Lhasa is still known as the Forbidden City. In 1959 the Dalai Lama fled to India to escape the Chinese who had assumed control of Tibet in 1951.

L’Hermite, François. Known as Tristan l’Hermite (1602-1655). French author and playwright. The popularity of his tragedy La Marianne (1636) rivaled that of Le Cid, and La Mort de Sénèque (The Death of Seneca, 1644) is the finest French tragedy on a classical theme outside of Corneille’s and Racine’s. The comedy Le Parasite (1654) introduced to the French stage the stock parasitic figure of Latin comedy, and the autobiographical novel Le Page disgracié (The Disgraced Page, 1642-1643) recounts episodes from the author’s erratic youth.

L’Hospital or L’Hôpital, Michel de (1505-1573). Chancellor of France (1560-1568) and the most celebrated French orator of his century. His speeches urging religious tolerance and justice during the religious wars are notable for their simplicity and honesty. The complete Œuvres de L’Hôpital were published in 1824-1825.

Liaisons dangereuses, Les (1782). An epistolary novel by Pierre Choderlos de Laclos. The novel deals with the corruption of innocence and virtue by Valmont, a libertine, and his equally vicious and immoral mistress, Mme de Merteuil, for their own amusement. It is essentially a study of the fascination and power of evil, and one is struck by the absence of frivolity and sentimentality in this work;
the battle of the sexes is depicted with utter seriousness and humorlessness. The style is Racinian in its brilliance, lucidity, and precision, diabolical in its impassivity.

Liar, The. See MENTEUR, Le.

Libellus Merlini. See MERLIN.

Liber. An Italian god of wine, later identified with the Greek Dionysus, known in Rome as BACCHUS. He and his feminine counterpart, Libera, were honored at the festival of the Liberalia on March 17.

Liberal arts. In the Middle Ages, the seven branches of learning: grammar, logic, rhetoric, arithmetic, geometry, music, and astronomy. In modern times, the liberal arts include the languages, sciences, philosophy, history, and related subjects. The term is a translation of Latin artes liberalis, so called because their pursuit was the privilege of the freemen who were called liberi. See QUADRIVIUM.

Libertins (Libertines). A sect of French free-thinkers and skeptics of the 17th and 18th centuries, precursors of VOLTAIRE and the encyclopedists. Advocates of total freedom of thought and conscience, the Libertins questioned the doctrines and morality of all received religion and were continually accused of atheism and immorality. The greatest religious thinkers of the day, including Bossuet and Pascal, denounced their views, and ultimately the Libertins' own poor conduct discredited their very name.

Liberty, Statue of. A colossal statue, Liberty Enlightening the World, which stands on Liberty (formerly Bedloe's) Island, at the entrance to New York harbor. Dedicated in 1886, it was a gift of the French people, and commemorates the alliance between the two nations during the American Revolution. Of bronze, it stands 152 feet high on a pedestal almost 150 feet high, and represents a woman, draped, holding a lighted torch in her upraised hand. It is the work of Frédéric Auguste Bartholdi (1834-1904). On its base is carved a sonnet, The New Colossus, by Emma Lazarus, which ends with the lines:

Give me your tired, your poor,
Your huddled masses yearning to breathe free,
The wretched refuse of your teeming shore,
Send these, the homeless, tempest-tost, to me
I lift my lamp beside the golden door!

Liberty Bell. The bell in Independence Hall, Philadelphia, which was rung when the Continental Congress adopted the Declaration of Independence. First cast in London (1752) with the inscription, "Proclaim Liberty throughout all the Land unto all the Inhabitants Thereof," it was recast in Philadelphia (1753) with the same legend, and cracked in 1835 when it was tolled for the death of John Marshall.

liberty cap. A symbol of freedom. When a slave was manumitted by the Romans, a small Phrygian cap, usually of red felt, called pilus, was placed on his head; he was termed libertinus (a freedman), and his name was registered in the city tribes. When Saturninus, in 100 A.D., possessed himself of the Roman Capitol, he hoisted a similar cap on the top of his spear, to indicate that all slaves who joined his standard should be free; Marius employed the same symbol against Sulla; and, when Caesar was murdered, the conspirators marched forth in a body with a cap elevated on a spear, in token of liberty. In the French Revolution, the cap of liberty (ronnet rouge) was adopted by the revolutionists as an emblem of their freedom from royal authority.

Libethra. The place in Greece where the nightsingales sing most sweetly. It is there that the Muses buried the fragments of Orpheus' body.

Libro de buen amor, El. See Juan Ruiz.

Libya. The name given by the Greeks to Africa in general. The Romans used the word sometimes as synonymous with Africa, sometimes for that section on the Mediterranean which included Carthage.

Libya was also a goddess whom the Greeks identified as a daughter of the Egyptian king Epaphos and mother of Belus and Agenor.

Licenciado Vidriera, El. One of the tales in Cervantes' NOVELAS EJEMPLARES. It is really a collection of aphorisms, uttered by a demented law student who believes that he is made of glass but who, like Don Quixote, displays amazing insight and perspicacity.

Lichas. In Greek mythology, the friend of HERACLES who brought him Deianira's fatal tunic. He was thrown into the sea by Heracles.

Li-chi. See Book of Rites.

licitor. In ancient Rome, an officer attending a magistrate. A dictator, for example, had 20 licitors, a consul 12, a praetor 6, and so on. The licitor bore the fasces as the insignia of his office. He cleared the way, enforced respect for his superior, and arrested offenders and executed condemned criminals.

Liddell, Alice. See Henry George Liddell.

Liddell, Henry George (1811-1898). English classical scholar and dean of Christ Church (1855-1891). He is the author, with Robert Scott, of the standard Greek Lexicon (1843; last revised 1925). He also wrote a History of Ancient Rome (1855). His daughter Alice Liddell was the original Alice, the child for whom Lewis Carroll wrote his famous Alice's Adventures in Wonderland and Through the Looking-Glass.

Lidia. In the ORLANDO FURioso of Ariosto, a princess of Lidia whose spirit is encountered by Astolfo in his journey through Hell. There among those sinners who are being punished for treating their lovers cruelly in life, she tells Astolfo her story, revealing her cruelty to her suitor Alceste.

Lido. A reef and sandbank outside the lagoon of Venice, famous as a fashionable bathing resort on the Adriatic.

Lie, Jonas [Lauritz Iedemil] (1833-1909). Norwegian novelist, playwright, and poet. Financial difficulties caused Lie, always fascinated by literature, to begin his professional literary career. In 1870 he published Den Premysyte; both this first novel and later volumes of stories, Trolle (1891-1892), mingle realistic with fantastic elements. His studies of family life in the middle classes—among them Loden og hans Hustru (1874), Familien paa Gifte (1883), and Kommandørens Døpte (1886)—are his finest work.

Lie, Trygve (1896—). Norwegian statesman and secretary-general of the United Nations (1946-1953). Formerly Norwegian minister for foreign affairs (1940; 1941–1945), Lie served in the cabinet as minister of justice (1935–1939) and minister of commerce (1939–1940).

LIEBEL. See LIGHT O' LOVE.

LIEBNECHT, Karl (1871–1919). Socialist leader in the German Reichstag, son of Wilhelm Liebn-ekte. As a member of the SPARITIST PARL, he opposed the war policies of the government and supported the Russian Bolsheviks. The proletarian revolt that he organized with Rosa Luxemburg in 1919 was suppressed by the provisional government, and he was shot.

LIEBNECHT, Wilhelm (1826–1900). German socialist and associate of August Bebel. He helped to found the German Social Democratic Party in 1869.

LIED VON BERNADETTE, Das. See SONG OF BERNADETTE, THE.

LIEU CHI ALTANGI. Narrator and central figure of Oliver Goldsmith's epistolary novel THE CITIZEN OF THE WORLD, a Chinese who, for all his philosophy, cannot help being surprised by the follies of Goldsmith's England. He also prophesies the successful revolution of the American colonies and the rise of Russia.

LIF. See VALL.

Life and Death of Mr. Badman, The (1680). An allegorical dialogue by John Bunyan, in which Mr. Wiseman tells of the vicious life and habits and the eventual death of Mr. Badman, using his story to point out the folly of wickedness.

Life Is a Dream. See VIDA ES SUEÑO, LA.

Life of Galileo, The (Leben des Galilei; 1938–1939). A play by Bertolt Brecht. Written in the style of the Epic Theater, it concerns Galileo's conflict with the church. Brecht deliberately makes Galileo a very unheroic figure, always ready to compromise his principles when pressure is put on him. The play is not so obviously tendentious as most of Brecht's later works, but there are several anachronisms in which Marxist doctrine is propounded.

Life of Samuel Johnson, LL.D., The (1791). A biography by James Boswell, generally considered the greatest in the English language. Boswell met Dr. Samuel Johnson in 1763 in London and visited him periodically from that time, spending a great deal of time with him in the three years before Johnson's death. Boswell's method is of particular note: occasionally he made notes on the spot during Johnson's conversation; more often, however, from the habit of a lifetime, he made notes in his copious journals nightly on the events and conversation of the day, and for this, he had a prodigious memory to serve him. He questioned Johnson himself, prodding him into talk, and questioned Johnson's friends; after Johnson died, he was in constant quest of letters and anecdotes. He was greatly aided in his task by Edmund Malone, who went over the last draft of the manuscript. Boswell's aim and achievement was completeness; no detail was too small for him, and on this very point Dr. Johnson remarked to him: "There is nothing, Sir, too little for so little a creature as man." Boswell's achievement is twofold: first he was able, from his scrupulously accurate memory, to record faithfully the brilliance and wit of Dr. Johnson's conversation; second, he had the artistry to transform a painstaking, almost scholarly profusion of detail into a perceptive, lifelike portrait. The result is a

Russell Crouse and achieved the longest unbroken run of any American play. The second book of sketches, Life with Mother (1936), was dramatized by the same playwrights but had only a moderately successful run.

Ligeia (1838). A tale by Edgar Allan Poe. Ligeia, the narrator’s mysterious dark-haired wife, dies after a lingering illness. He later remarries, though he does not love his fair Rowena. In the lavishly furnished English abbey to which they move, Rowena dies. The narrator, affected by opium, sees signs of life return to the corpse. Finally she rises; the Lady Rowena has been transformed into Ligeia.

Light in August (1932). A novel by William Faulkner. The book reiterates the author’s concern with a society that classifies men according to race, creed, and origin. Joe Christmas, the central character and victim, appears to be white but is really part Negro; he has an affair with Joanna Burden, a spinster whom the townsfolk of Jefferson regard with suspicion because of her New England background. Joe eventually kills her and sets fire to her house; he is captured, castrated, and killed by the outraged townspeople, to whom his victim has become a symbol of the innocent white woman attacked and killed by a Negro. Other important characters are Lena Grove, who comes to Jefferson far advanced in pregnancy, expecting to find the lover who has deserted her, and Gail Hightower, the minister who ignores his wife and loses his church because of his fanatic devotion to the past.

Lightnin’ (1918). A play by Winchell Smith and Frank Bacon. Its 1,291 performances set a record for its day. Bacon himself played the leading role of Lightnin’ Bill Jones, owner of a hotel which lies half in Nevada and half in California. An amusing liar, Lightnin’ has numerous troubles, but manages entertainingly to solve them all.

Light o’ Love (Liebelei); 1894. A play by Arthur Schnitzler. It is a more serious treatment of the erotic themes that Schnitzler had stated earlier in Anatol (1891). The naive young heroine Christine commits suicide when she learns that her lover has died dueling over another woman.

Light that Failed, The; (1890). A novel by Rudyard Kipling. Through his experience as an illustrator in the Sudan, the hero, Dick Heldar, wins both professional success and a firm friend in the war correspondent Torpenhow. He is in love with his foster sister Maisie, now an artist, but Maisie is shallow and selfish and does not appreciate his devotion. Dick gradually goes blind from a sword cut received in the Sudan, working courageously against time on his painting, Melancholia. Although Maisie is summoned by Torpenhow, she heartlessly leaves Dick to his fate, and he carries out his plan of dying at the front. In a later edition a happy ending is provided.

Li Hung-chang (1823–1901). Chinese statesman; long the major force in foreign policy, after the emperor. Visited Europe and U.S. (1898). Commissioned to restore peace after the Boxer uprising (1900). Often referred to as “the Bismarck of Asia.”

Lilburne, John; (1614–1657). English political agitator and Puritan pamphleteer, noted for his rancorous temper. He was imprisoned several times for printing unlicensed books and for verbal attacks on persons of authority. See Levelers.

Liliencron, Detlev von (1844–1909). German poet. All his youth was spent as an officer in the Prussian army, in which he served through three wars, and his army experiences form the background for his first and most important volume of poems, Adjutantentreffen (An Adjutant’s Ride), (1884). In this book, he emphasizes a subjective but realistic treatment of the individual experience, as opposed to the emphasis on formal polish and generalized experience in such authors as Heyse and Geibel. These characteristics made his writing important in the budding movements of naturalism and impressionism.

Liliom; (1909). A play by Ferenc Molnár. It was produced in New York in 1921. The hero is a disreputable but fascinating side-show barker. One act shows him before the judges of the other world; another, on earth again with a single chance to redeem himself. The play was made into the musical play Carousel (1944), by Richard Rodgers and Oscar Hammerstein.

Lilith. In Talmudic tradition, a demon, probably of Babylonian origin, said to haunt wildernesses in stormy weather and be especially dangerous to children and pregnant women. She is referred to as “the screech-owl” (Isa. 34:14), and as “the night monster” in the Revised Version. Hebrew legend holds that she was created simultaneously with Adam and was his first wife, but, refusing to be considered his inferior, she left him and was expelled from Eden to a region of the air. In Arabic mythology, she married the Devil and became the mother of evil spirits. Superstitious Jews put four coins in the chambers occupied by their wives inscribed with the names of Adam and Eve and the words, “Avantu thee, Lilith!” Goethe introduced her in his Faust (1790–1833), and Daniel Gabriel Rossetti in his Eden Bower (1870) made the serpent the instrument of Lilith’s vengeance against Adam.

Lillibulero or Lilliburlero. A political song, popular during the English revolution of 1688 and still the most savagely thunderous of British marching songs. The music is by Henry Purcell. The text by Thomas Wharton (c. 1686) satirizes James II and the Catholics, using the refrain “Lillibulero bullen a la” which is said to have been used as a watchword by the Irish Catholics in their massacre of the Protestants (1641). The song was included by Bishop Percy in his Reliques.

Lilliput. The country of Gulliver’s first voyage in Gulliver’s Travels by Jonathan Swift. The Lilliputians are about ½ human size, and Gulliver is a giant among them. At first he falls in with their ways, takes an interest in their disputes, helps them, and accepts their honors to him as real proofs he is soon disillusioned when the little creatures grudge him food and propose binding him lest he fend for himself. Their smallness is not merely a matter of stature; the pettiness of their lives is used by Swift to mirror the pettiness of human beings. See *Gul-
LINCOLN, Abraham (1809–1865). 16th president of the U.S. (1861–1865). Born in a log cabin in Hardin (now Larue) County, Ky., Lincoln was the son of his mother, Nancy Hanks Lincoln. In 1818, while the family was living in Indiana. In 1831 he settled in New Salem, Ill., where he studied law and worked as a store-keeper, postmaster, and surveyor; in 1838 he was admitted to the bar. From 1834 to 1841 he served in the state legislature as a Whig and supporter of Henry Clay. While Lincoln was living in New Salem, he met Ann Rutledge (1816–1835), to whom he became engaged and who died in 1835; their romance has inspired many legends for which there is little concrete evidence. The truth about Lincoln's relationship to Mary Todd, whom he married in 1842, has also been distorted, largely as a result of the writings of William HERNDON, Lincoln's law partner, who disliked Mrs. Lincoln intensely.

After serving one term (1847–1849) in Congress, where he voiced his opposition to the Mexican War, Lincoln returned to his flourishing law practice in Illinois. Stirred to renewed political activity by the sectional agitation of 1854, Lincoln soon aligned himself with the newly formed Republican Party and ran for the U.S. Senate against Stephen A. DOUGLAS in 1858; although Lincoln lost the election, his famous LIMEHOUSE. Violent and vitriolic abuse of one's political opponents; so called out of compliment to an oratorical display by Mr. Lloyd George at Limehouse, London, on July 30, 1909, when he poured forth scorn and abuse on dukes, landlords, financial magnates, etc., many of whom, in the course of later events, became his best friends. It is also the name of London's Chinatown.

LIMERICK. A humorous, usually epigrammatic piece of verse in five lines of mixed iambic and anapestic meter, lines 1, 2, and 5 in trimeter and 3 and 4 in dimeter, rhyming a-b-a-b-a. The form, the origins of which are uncertain, was popularized by Edward LEAR in his Book of Nonsense (1846). Following Lear's practice, the first line of most limericks ends in a place name, usually the place of origin or residence of the protagonist of the verse. The last line, in most of Lear's limericks, repeated the place name instead of furnishing another rhyme upon it, but most modern limericks end with a rhyme word instead of a repetition. The subject of the typical limerick is likely to be somewhat ribald and puns and plays on words are often included. The limerick has a wide oral circulation and, being a truly popular form of verse, is often of anonymous authorship. The following is an example:

There once was a man from Nannucket
Who kept all his cash in a bucket;
But his daughter named Nan Ran away with a man.
And as for the bucket, Nantucket.

LINACRE, Thomas (1460?–1524). English physician and classical scholar, one of the earliest representatives of British humanism. He was physician to Henry VIII and one of the founders of the College of Physicians in London (1518). Among his students were Sir Thomas More and Erasmus. He was the author of Rudimenta Grammatica (1523), a Latin grammar; a Latin translation of Galen; and various medical works.

LINDSAY, Robert (1338–1402). Scottish poet whose works are notable for their religious themes and the authenticity of their moral precepts. His Carmen monachorum is a poem on the vices and virtues of the life of a monk. His Scintilla divinae veritatis is a poem on the same subject. His best-known work is the long poem The Opening of the Mouth of the Lamb, which is a paraphrase of the Apocalypse. His other works include the poem The Shenandoah, a love poem, and the poem The Fair Rose, which is a parable on the vanity of life.
debates with Douglas won him national prominence. In 1860 he won the Republican presidential nomination over such rivals as William Seward largely because of his conservative record on the slavery question, but the Southern states seceded from the Union soon after his election. His first inaugural address was conciliatory: he emphasized the indissolubility of the Union, but promised not to interfere with slavery where it already existed. During the Civil War, which began with the Confederate attack on Fort Sumter, Lincoln did not hesitate to use his extensive powers as commander-in-chief, and although Northern Democrats and members of his own party often assailed his war policies, he handled his opponents with aplomb. In the election of 1864 he easily defeated George B. McClellan, who had often tried his patience in the early days of the war. In his second inaugural address, he asked the nation "to finish the work we are in ... with malice toward none, with charity toward all." Just after Lee's surrender, Lincoln was shot by John Wilkes Booth and died the following day.

Now transformed into a major American folk hero, Lincoln has been the subject of numerous literary works. Among the best-known poems about him are Walt Whitman's O Captain! My Captain! and When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloom'd. He is a character in many novels and stories, notably Henry Ward Beecher's Norwood (1867), Edward Eggleston's The Graysons (1888), and Winston Churchill's The Crisis. His early life is the subject of Robert E. Sherwood's play Abe Lincoln in Illinois. Edgar Lee Masters wrote a hostile biography, Lincoln the Man (1931), while another poet, Carl Sandburg, offered a vivid portrayal in the six volumes of Abraham Lincoln. See Mary Todd Lincoln; Gettysburg Address; Emancipation Proclamation.

Lincoln, Mary Todd (1818–1882). Wife of Abraham Lincoln. Descended of a distinguished Kentucky family, Mary Todd was courted by Lincoln when she moved to Springfield, Ill., in 1839 to live with her sister, Mrs. Ninian W. Edwards, who was the daughter-in-law of the state governor. There is no contemporary evidence for the story that the wedding was scheduled for Jan. 1, 1841, and that the groom failed to appear; some emotional crisis in Lincoln's life, however, probably did lead him to delay the marriage, which took place in 1842. Despite the testimony of William Herndon, Lincoln's law partner, the Lincolns' married life was probably happy, though some difficulties arose after his election to the presidency, when Mrs. Lincoln was accused of extravagance and disloyalty to the Union cause. Her mind weakened by her husband's assassination and by the loss of three of her four sons, she was adjudged insane in 1875 but declared competent the following year.

Lind, Johann Maria. Known as Jenny Lind or Madame Jenny Lind-Goldschmidt (1820–1887). Swedish coloratura soprano called "the Swedish Nightingale." She made her début as Agatha in Der Freischütz (1838). She was introduced to the U.S. by P. T. Barnum (1850–1852). She married (1852) Otto Goldschmidt, a German-born composer and pianist, and toured the continent. A resident of England during her last years, she was professor of singing at the Royal College of Music (1883–1886).

Linfield, Anne Morrow (1906– ). American writer. The wife of Charles A. Lindbergh, she has described their flights together in North to the Orient (1935) and Listen! The Wind (1938). Her controversial essay, The Wave of the Future (1940), was influenced by her husband's isolationism and was regarded by some as an apologia for fascism. She also wrote Gift from the Sea (1955), essays especially addressed to women; The Unicorn and Other Poems (1956); and Dearly Beloved (1962).

Lindbergh, Charles Augustus (1902– ). American aviator. Lindbergh is best known for his solo flight across the Atlantic on May 20–21, 1927, the first in history. With Fitzhugh Green he wrote an account of the flight called We (1927); the title refers to Lindbergh and his plane, The Spirit of St. Louis. In 1929 he married Anne Morrow, the daughter of the U.S. ambassador to Mexico, Dwight Morrow. The tragic kidnaping and death of their infant son, Charles, Jr., in March, 1932, resulted in the passing of "Lindbergh laws" which make interstate kidnaping a federal offense. The Lindberghs moved to Europe in 1935, where he worked with Alexis Carrel on the mechanical heart. In the years immediately preceding World War II, Lindbergh was an advocate of American neutrality. He wrote Of Flight and Life (1948) and an autobiography, The Spirit of St. Louis (1953), which was awarded a Pulitzer Prize. See Anne Morrow Lindbergh.

Lindsay, Howard (1899– ). American actor, director, producer, and playwright. In collaboration with Russel Crouse, he dramatized Life with Father, in which he and his wife played the leading roles for five years. Also with Crouse, he wrote State of the Union (1945), which won a Pulitzer Prize, and produced Arsenic and Old Lace (1941). Lindsay also worked with Damon Runyon on A Slight Case of Murder (1935); with Irving Berlin on Call Me Madam (1950); and with Richard Rodgers and Oscar Hammerstein on The Sound of Music (1959).

Lindsay, Jack (1900– ). Australian poet, novelist, and classical scholar. His Marxist, mass-declamation poems were popular in England and in the leftist 1930's. Most of his novels are historical, about ancient Greece and Rome, such as Caesar is Dead (1935). His other works are polemical writings on Russia and Marxism, literary criticism, translations from Greek and Latin, and the history Byzantium into Europe (1952). He was the son of Norman Lindsay.

Lindsay, [Alfred William] Norman (1879– ). Australian artist and novelist. Lindsay, the son of a physician, turned to art at an early age, and worked later for a Melbourne paper. His pen drawings hang in English galleries. A novel, Red Heap (1913), was censored in Australia but well received in America under the title Every Woman's Son. His talent for satire and plot are discernible in The Caustic Amorist (1934) and Age of Consent (1938). He has been described by critics as a "true humorist," while his writing has the "gauntness of Australia." Other works include A Carute in Bohemia (1913), The Magic Padding (1919), Pam in the Parlor (1934), Halway to Anyway (1947), and Dust or Polish (1950).

Lindsay, [Nicholas] Vachel (1879–1931). American poet. Known for the dramatic and auditory effects of his poetry, he read from the lecture platform with theatrical gestures and intonation in an effort to make a love of poetry public property. His own work dealt in the main with American subjects and heroes, patriotism, and a mystic faith in the earth and nature. The crusading spirit was strong in Lindsay, and for a time he lectured for the Anti-Saloon League in the winter; in the summer (1912) he walked from Illinois to New Mexico, exchanging for meals the poems collected in Rhymes to Be Traded for Bread (1912). In the following year he published one of his best-known poems, General William Booth Enters Into Heaven. The Congo and The Santa Fe Trail were published in 1914. Among others of his more famous single poems are A Gospel of Beauty (1908), A Net to Snare the Moonlight (1913), The Eagle That Is Forgotten (1913), Abraham Lincoln Walks at Midnight (1914), The Chinese Nightingale (1917), The Ghost of the Buffaloos (1917), and In Praise of Johnny Appleseed. The Golden Book of Springfield (1920) is a prose work giving a Utopian picture of his native city. His other books include Adventures While Preaching the Gospel of Beauty (1914), The Art of the Moving Picture (1915), The Golden Whales of California and Other Rhymes in the American Language (1920), The Candle in the Cabin (1926), Every Soul Is a Circus (1929). His Selected Poems (1931) were edited by Hazelton Spencer.

As his poetic powers failed, Lindsay became weary and disillusioned. In 1931 he committed suicide by drinking poison.

Lingard, Captain. As a young man, the hero of Joseph Conrad's The Rescue; in later life, in An Outcast of the Islands and Almayer's Folly, a powerful white trader who takes Almayer and Willems for protégés.

linguistic philosophy. See *logical positivism.

Linnaeus, Carolus. The latinized name of the great Swedish botanist Carl von Linné (1707–1778). In his Systema Naturae (1735), he outlined what was largely adopted as the Linnaean classification or system of plants. It is also known as the sexual system. It differs from Jussieu's system (1789), by which it was superseded, in that it made no attempt to show the relationship of species and genera. Hence the name artificial system as opposed to Jussieu's natural system. Linnaeus' Species Plantarum (1753) is considered the foundation of modern botanical nomenclature.

Linné, Carl von. See Carolus Linnaeus.

Lins do Rego, José (1901–1957). Brazilian novelist. In the sensitive, realistic novels of his "sugar-cane cycle" (Ciclo da Cana-da-áçúcar), Lins do Rego depicted the decline of the patriarchal society that revolved around the sugar plantations of northeastern Brazil. The works usually included in the cycle are Menino de Engenho (1932), Doidinho (1933), Bangue (1934), O Moleque Ricardo (1935), and Usina (1936). In Pedra Bonita (1938) and other novels, he portrayed aspects of rural life in the arid portions of this same region.

Lin Yu-t'ang (in English usually Yutang) (1895– ). Chinese teacher, translator, editor, and writer. Lin attended Harvard Graduate School, after which he returned to China to teach. He founded and wrote for several English and Chinese periodicals and edited textbooks. He is chancellor of Nanyang University, Singapore, and head of the Arts and Letters Division of UNESCO. Lin has written several books interpreting China and her people; among these are My Country and My People (1935), A History of the Press and Public Opinion in China (1956), The Wisdom of Confucius (1938), and The Chinese Way of Life (1959). He has written and translated short stories, among them Famous Chinese Short Stories (1952) and Widow, Nun and Courtesan (1951). Among his other books are A Leaf in the Storm (1941); Between Tears and Laughter (1943); and an anthology, The Wisdom of China and India (1942). His most recent works are The Importance of Understanding (1960) and The Red Peony (1962).

lion. The "king of beasts." This animal figures perhaps more than any other in legend, symbolism, and heraldry. In religious art, the lion is an emblem of the Resurrection. According to tradition, the lion's whelp is born dead, and remains so for three days, when the father breathes on it and it receives life. Another tradition is that the lion is the only animal of the cat tribe born with its eyes open, and it is said that it sleeps with its eyes open.

St. Mark the Evangelist is symbolized by a lion because he begins his gospel with the scenes of St. John the Baptist and Christ in the wilderness. The device of Venice is the winged Lion of St. Mark. St. Jerome befriended lions. (See Androcles, Heracles, and Ulysses for legends of lions.)

Ever since 1164, when it was adopted as a device by Philip I, duke of Flanders, the lion has figured largely, and in an amazing variety of positions, as a heraldic emblem.

Lion Gate. The gate leading from the ancient Greek city of Mycenae in Argolis to the acropolis. It is about 10 feet high and wide, has monolithic jambs and a huge lintel. Above the lintel is a great slab with a relief of two affronted rampant lions which account for the name. It was built in the Mycenaean era (1400–1100 a.c.).

Lipschitz, Jacques (1891– ). Russian-born French sculptor. Established in New York since 1941, he has composed powerful figures, notably of bulls, in which the play of light on rough surfaces and on large masses contributes to a great feeling of movement; he has also done monumental semihuman standing columns of interpenetrating circular forms and shafts.

Li Po or Li Tai Po or Li Tai Peh (c. 701–c. 762). Chinese poet, considered one of the greatest. Fond of wine, fencing, and adventure, he traveled widely, then retired to the mountains as one of the Six Idlers of the Bamboo Streams. Admired by the emperor for his learning and his poetry, he was brought to the royal court, but palace intrigue and his part in the rebellion of An Lu-shan (775–776), forced him to leave and resume his wanderings. Imperial orders, however, allowed him to obtain free wine, and he formed another group of companions called the Eight Immortals of the Wine Cup. According to legend he drowned one night trying to embrace the reflection of the moon near his boat. His poems are passionate lyrics about wine and love, rich in delicate, imaginative imagery of natural beauty. See Arthur Waley, _The Poetry and Career of Li Po_ (1950).

Lippi, Fra Lippo or Filippo (1406-1469). Italian painter. A Florentine monk of the Carmelite order, he painted religious easel paintings and frescoes in a style stressing charm, imaginative detail, and sinuous outline. He was influenced primarily by Masaccio, Fra Angelico, and Donatello, and in turn was the teacher of Botticelli. Among his best-known works are the 'Madonna and Child with Angels', the Allegory of Music, and the frescoes of the Strozzi Chapel in the Florentine church of S. Maria Novella. He also finished the frescoes left incomplete by Masaccio in the Brancacci Chapel of the Carmine.

Lippmann, Walter (1898- ). American journalist. After aiding in the preparations for the peace conference after World War I and holding important editorial positions on the _New Republic_ and _New York World_, Lippmann became famous for the thoughtful and reasoned political comments of his influential newspaper column, which he began to write in 1913 for the _New York Herald Tribune_. He has lucidly set forth his social philosophy in several influential volumes, including _Public Opinion_ (1922), _A Preface to Morals_ (1929), _The Good Society_ (1937), and _The Public Philosophy_ (1955).

Lippold, Richard (1915- ). American sculptor. He is known for constructions of metal plates and wires, such as the hanging _Orpheus and Apollo_ in the New York Lincoln Center Philharmonic Hall.

Lismahago, Captain. In Tobias Smollett's novel _Humf ry Clinker_, an eccentric, superannuated veteran officer of the Indian wars who marries Miss Tabitha Bramble. He is a forbidding Scotsman, singular in dress and in manners, conceited, disputatious, and rude. Though most taciturn in argument, he can yield to Miss Tabitha, whom he wishes to conciliate.

Lissauer, Ernst. See _Hymn of Hate_.

Liszt, Franz (1811-1886). Hungarian composer and virtuoso pianist. A child prodigy, he first performed in public at the age of nine. He studied in Vienna under Czerny and Salieri, in Paris under Reicha. He lived at Geneva (1835-1839) with the Comtesse d'Agoult, by whom he had three children, one of whom was Cosima, who later married Richard Wagner. Liszt was court Kapellemeister at Weimar from 1848 to 1859. In 1865 he entered the Franciscan order at Rome (1865) and was thereafter known as the Abbé Liszt. He died at Bayreuth (1866) in the midst of a Wagner festival. He was outstanding as a piano teacher as well as a performer.

Much of his music, especially from the last 20 years of his life, is marked by daring innovations in form and harmonic relations, which have fascinated and influenced composers ever since, even though he had no true disciples or imitators. His works include the _Faust Symphony_ (1853-1861), the _Dante Symphony_ (1856); twelve symphonic poems, including _Les Preludes_ (after Lamartine), two piano concertos; much piano music, notably the _Années de Pèlerinage_ and the 20 Hungarian Rhapsodies (1851-1886); two oratorios, several masses, and other church music; songs, and organ pieces.

Literary Club, The. A group founded by Sir Joshua Reynolds and Samuel Jefferies in 1764 under the simpler title of "The Club." They met weekly for conversation at The Turk's Head Tavern in Gerrard Street, Soho, until 1783, when the tavern was converted to a private dwelling. They continued at various meeting-places until the end of the century. The members included Edmund Burke, Thomas Percy, James Boswell, Edward Gibbon, David Garrick, Oliver Goldsmith, and Adam Smith, among other famous 18th-century figures.

Litigants, The. See _Plaideurs, Les_.

Little, Henry. The inventor-hero of Charles Reade's _Put Yourself in His Place_.

Little, Thomas. Pseudonym under which Thomas Moore's _Poetical Works_ of 1801 were published. Moore is called by this name in Byron's _English Bards and Scotch Reviewers_.

Little Clay Cart, The or The Toy Cart (Sans., _Mricchhakatika_). A Sanskrit comedy ascribed to King Shudraka and variously assigned to the 3rd to 10th centuries. The hero is Charudatta, an impoverished Brahmin merchant, the heroine the lovely courteasan Vasantasena. The villain of the play, Sanshankara, the king's brother-in-law, smothers Vasantasena in a remote garden and accuses Charudatta of the crime, but Vasantasena recovers and appears just in time to save her lover from execution. An important subplot is concerned with a successful conspiracy to overthrow the reigning monarch. Goethe paraphrased the drama in his poem _The God and the Bayardere_, and it was made the basis of a popular ballet _Le Dieu et la bayardere_ which was staged throughout Europe about the year 1830. The drama itself was produced in New York by the Neighborhood Playhouse players in 1924-1925.

Little Corporal. An epitath applied to Napoleon Bonaparte after the battle of Lodi in 1796. Bonaparte stood barely five feet two inches in height.

Little Dorrit (1855-1857). A novel by Charles Dickens. William Dorrit, with his three children Edward, Fanny, and Amy (who is Little Dorrit), lives in prison where he is confined for debt. Little Dorrit was born in the prison, spends most of her life there, and ultimately, chooses to be married there. The three children try to make a living outside the prison and bring back their earnings each night. Little Dorrit does her part by sewing for Mrs. Clennam. Suddenly, her father comes into a fortune and the whole family becomes as pretentious and despicable as they were formerly objects of compasion. Only Little Dorrit remains unchanged with her father's changing fortune, retaining her sweet and generous disposition. She grows to love Arthur Clennam, middle-aged son of Mrs. Clennam, who has recently returned from India; he helps to free her father from prison. In Arthur's struggle with the civil service's _Circumlocution Office_, Dickens levels an attack on bureaucracy. Arthur is sent to prison for debt and Little Dorrit labors to help him. Their love ends happily, and they are married in the old church prison. This novel is one of Dickens' strongest attacks on bureaucratic inefficiency and the practice of imprisonment for debt.

Among the many memorable characters in the book are the soft-hearted Meagles family; the Barnacles; and Mr. and Mrs. Ploomish. See Marshalsea.

Little Emily. See Peggoty.

Little-Endians. See Big-Endians.

Little Entente. See Entente.

Little Eva. A character in Harriet Beecher Stowe's Uncle Tom's Cabin.

Little Foxes, The (1939.) A play by Lillian Hallman. In telling the story of the Hubbard family, it depicts unfavorably the rise of industrialism in the South and condemns the new breed of Southerners as rapacious and ruthless—like "the little foxes who spoil the vines" of the biblical verse. Another Part of the Forest (1946) deals with an earlier stage in the Hubbards' career.

Little Gidding. The home of an Anglican lay religious community in England in the 17th century. It was composed of the family and friends of Nicholas Ferrar, who was intimate with the poets George Herbert and Richard Crashaw. It is the setting for the novel John Inglesant, by J. H. Shorthouse, and for T. S. Eliot's poem Little Gidding (see Four Quartets). The community was dispersed by the Parliamentarians in 1647, during the Civil War.

Little John. A chief follower of Robin Hood in the English Robin Hood ballad cycle. He was a big stalwart fellow, first named John Little (or John Nailer), who encountered Robin Hood and gave him a sound thrashing, after which he was rechristened, Robin standing as godfather. He appears in Scott's novel The Talisman (1825).

Little Lord Fauntleroy. A story for children by Frances Hodgson Burnett (1886), illustrated by Reginald Birch. The seven-year-old hero, Cedric Errol, is the son of a disinherited English father and an American mother. His title of Lord Fauntleroy he would normally inherit from his grandfather, an English earl, who has, however, never forgiven the boy's father for marrying an American. On the death of the father the boy is summoned to England, leaving his mother, whom he calls "Dearest," in the poverty-stricken quarters where they have been living in New York. He so completely wins the hearts of his English relatives that they are soon persuaded to extend to "Dearest" a cordial welcome. Little Lord Fauntleroy is a striking figure, dressed in black velvet with lace collar and yellow curls, and his name passed into common usage as referring either to a certain type of children's clothes or to a beautiful but pampered and effeminate small boy.

Little magazines. A name applied to small, non-commercial, usually short-lived periodicals whose aim is to promote avant-garde writing. These magazines, frequently the only means of expression available to young, unknown experimental writers, have provided a meeting-ground for writers and thereby sometimes formed the nucleus of new literary movements. They were a major factor in the literary revolution of 1910-1920.

The little magazine form goes back to the mid-19th century with the Transcendentalist magazine The Dial (1840–1844), The Philistine (1895–1915), and The Mirror (1893–1920) in America, and The Germ (1850) and The Yellow Book (1894–1897) in England. Between 1910 and 1920 little magazines began to appear in abundance: The Blue Review (England, 1911), Poetry (1912), Blast (England, 1914), The Little Review (1914), Bruno's Weekly (1915), The Seven Arts (1916), The Dial (1917). During the 1920's a number of magazines were published by American expatriates in London and Paris: The Criterion (London, 1922), Transition (Paris, 1927), Exile (Paris and Chicago, 1927), Broom (Rome, then London, then New York, 1921–1925), Secession (Vienna, Berlin, New York, 1922–1924). The most important American little magazine during this period were The Double Dealer (1921), The Fugitive (1922), and The Chicago Literary Times (1923).

The late 20's and 30's saw a shift in emphasis away from the more purely literary little magazines toward two new forms: the politico-literary journal, such as the New Masses (1926), which was dominant during the 30's, and the quarterly review, such as the Prairie Schooner (1927), which became important in the late 30's and have continued to be widely influential critical and usually academic journals. New magazines in the 30's and 40's included The Harkness Hoot (1930), Story (1931), The Partisan Review (1934), New Directions in Prose and Poetry (1936), The Kenyon Review (1939), Furioso (1939), Accent (1940), Chimera (1942), Quarterly Review of Literature (1943), Hudson Review (1948), and Cronos (1947). In reaction against the quarters, which were no longer avant-garde and were critical more for the sake of being critical, a new group of little magazines appeared during the 50's, many of them with titles borrowed from now-defunct magazines of the twenties: The Dial, The Seven Arts, Transatlantic Review, Contact. Practically all the major writers of the 20th century had their early work published in little magazines: Sherwood Anderson, Van Wyck Brooks, Hart Crane, E. E. Cummings, John Dos Passos, Theodore Dreiser, T. S. Eliot, William Faulkner, Robert Frost, Ernest Hemingway, James Joyce, D. H. Lawrence, Marianne Moore, Eugene O'Neill, Katherine Anne Porter, Ezra Pound, Gertrude Stein, Dylan Thomas, William Carlos Williams, Edmund Wilson, and others. Critical studies of the little magazines include F. J. Hoffman's The Little Magazine (1946).

Little Minister, The (1891). A novel by J. M. Barrie. The hero, Gavin Dishart, is a young preacher in the Scottish village of Thrums. He struggles in vain against his love for the irresistible gypsy, Babbie, and marries her on impulse. The parish is scandalized. The two are separated, but after many vicissitudes, the Little Minister regains both his prestige and his bride.

Little Nell. See Old Curiosity Shop, The.

Little Orphant Annie (1885). A poem in Hoosier dialect by James Whitcomb Riley. Orphant Annie tells hair-raising tales about the goblins, and is finally carried off by them. A comic strip by Harold Gray is called Little Orphan Annie.

Littlepage Manuscripts, The (1845–1846). A series of three novels by James Fenimore Cooper: Satanstoe, The Chainbearer, and The Redskins. Presumably related by several generations of Littlepage men, the novels deal with the antient controversy and its historical background. In this now forgotten issue, the tenants of the New York patroons, suffering hardships, refused to pay rent. Cooper defended the landlords' rights, insisting that the tenants had enjoyed years of advantages in the bargain. Cooper saw, in this controversy, a crisis in American democracy; if contracts could be broken by mob rule, democracy would turn to anarchy.

The three novels become progressively weaker, as Cooper's political principles outweigh those of his art. The trilogy marks the end of his most creative period.

Little Red Riding-Hood. A nursery tale. It comes to us from Le Petit Chaperon Rouge (1697) of Charles Perrault (in his Contes de Ma Mère l'Oye), though with slight alterations the story is common to France, Germany, and Sweden and probably originated in Italy. A little girl bringing a present to her grandmother is devoured by a wolf who has disguised himself in the old lady's ruffled night-cap. The brothers Grimm added a happy ending to the tale: a huntsman slits open the wolf and restores the child and her grandmother to life.

Little Review, The (1914–1929). An American literary periodical. It was published, first in Chicago, later in New York and Paris, under the editorship of Margaret Anderson, and championed all the 20th-century experimental movements, publishing the work of outstanding English, American, and European writers of the period. When James Joyce's Ulysses appeared in installments (1918–1921), four issues were confiscated and burned by the Post Office.

Little Shepherd of Kingdom Come, The (1903). A novel by John Fox, Jr. The highly sentimental story deals with Chad Buford, a shepherd of doubtful parentage who, before going to fight in the Civil War, comes to live for a while at the Cumberland Mountain settlement which is used in the book's title. The novel was dramatized by Eugene Weller in 1916.

Little Tragedies (Malen'kiye tragedii; 1830). Four short dramatic works in blank verse by Aleksandr Pushkin. The short dramas, which Pushkin referred to as "essays of dramatic investigation," are studies of character in four varied situations. The Stone Guest (Kamyennyi gost') is a re-telling of the Don Juan legend. Mozart and Salieri (Mozart i Sal'yeri) depicts Salieri's jealousy of Mozart's artistic genius and his legendary poisoning of Mozart. The Covetous Knight (Skupoi rytzar') is a study of the effects of avarice. The Feast during the Plague (Pir vo vremya chumy), translated from the English drama City of the Plague by John Wilson, shows the evil effects on human behavior of imminent death. All four of the small dramas are regarded as being among Pushkin's most powerful poetic work.

Little Women, or Meg, Jo, Beth, and Amy (1868, 1869). A widely read story for young people by Louisa May Alcott, The heroine is Jo March. The tomboyish and literary member of the family, who retires to the attic when "genius burns." Meg, her older sister, marry, marry, and marry, tutor, John Brooke, and reappears in the sequel, Little Men (1871), with her twins, Daisy and Demi. Gentle, music-loving Beth dies young. The fashionable and artistic Amy finally marries Laurie, a high-spirited boy who had long been Jo's boon companion, but who failed to persuade her to marry him. Jo herself becomes the wife of a kindly old German professor, Mr. Bhaer; in Little Men, she and the professor turn their home into a school for boys. Jo's Boys (1886) is a second sequel.

Litvinov. The hero of Ivan Turgenev's novel Smoke, who allows his former lover, Irina, to disrupt his love affair with Tanya.

Lives of the Poets, The (1779–1781). A collection of biographical and critical essays on 52 English poets from Cowley to Johnson's contemporaries by Samuel Johnson. It is noted for its approach; Johnson was interested in establishing a causal relationship between the artist's life and his art.

To judge rightly of an author we must transport ourselves to his time, and examine what were the wants of his contemporaries, and what were his means of supplying them.—Life of Dryden

His criticism was vigorous and articulate. He considered Dryden, Pope, Swift, and Addison the most important authors of the Restoration and Queen Anne periods. Some of his critical opinion has been discredited with the perspective of time; the romantics deplored his failure to appreciate the odes of Thomas Gray and Milton's work, and his attack on metaphysical poetry, in the Life of Cowley, is not compatible with the modern view. However, Johnson's Lives remains an achievement beyond the "correctness" of its critical evaluations.

Livingstone, David (1813–1873). Scottish-born English missionary and explorer in Africa. After working in a cotton mill from the age of 10, he went to college in 1837, received a medical degree in 1840, and left England for South Africa as a medical missionary. He discovered Lake Ngami (1849), Zambesi River (1851), the Victoria Falls of the Zambesi (1855), and Lake Nyasa (1859). On his return to England (1864) he published Narrative of an Expedition to the Zanzibar and Its Tributaries (1865). Appointed British consul in central Africa, he went back with the express purpose of wiping out slave trade and determining the watershed of the Nyasa-Tanganjika region. Exhausted and near death, he spent some months in Ujiji; in 1871 an expedition was sent out under Sir Henry M. Stanley (1841–1904) to find Livingstone and their famous encounter began with Stanley's antilimactic, "Dr. Livingstone, I presume?" Livingstone died in a village on the south shore. His body was taken to England and buried in Westminster Abbey. His journals for the years 1866 to 1873 were published as Last Journals of David Livingstone in Central Africa (1873). Livingstone's example was followed by many missionaries and his influence was considerable in reducing slave trade.

Livius Andronicus (fl. 3d century B.C.). Founder of Roman epic poetry and drama. He was a Greek slave who, after being freed by his master Livius, whose name he adopted, introduced both comedies and tragedies in Latin on Greek models for performance in Rome. He also made a Latin translation of Homer's Odyssey which was used for centuries in Roman schools. His importance is due to the fact that he gave the Romans their first contact with Greek literature in translation.

Livre de mon ami, Le. See Anatole France.
Lochinvar. Full Latin name, Titus Livius (59 B.C.—A.D. 17). Roman historian. His Ab Urbe Condita Libri, the history of Rome from the founding of the city, was written in 142 books of which only about 36 have been preserved. We have, however, summaries of all but two of the missing books; these outlines, written by an unknown scholar of the fourth century, give an indication of the vast scope of the work which extended from the mythological beginnings of Rome down to A.D. 9. Though Livy's research must have been voluminous, it was unscrupulous; his information is often inaccurate, and his facts are sometimes self-contradictory. But scientific history was not his primary objective. He wished to hold up to his countrymen the great panorama of their past, to recall to them the glories of their ancestors, and to urge them to abandon the decadent ways they had. In this sense his aim was similar to that of Vergil in his Aeneid. Livy's style is one of polished rhetorical brilliance; the speeches which he puts in the mouths of historical personages are masterful, both as oratory and as character analysis.

A native of Patavium (Padua), Livy began his great work about 26 B.C., but did not publish his first 21 books until A.D. 14. Excerpts were, however, in circulation much earlier, for Asinius Pollio, who died in A.D. 4, had occasion to criticize Livy's "patavinitas." This was apparently a reference to his provincial, Paduan manner of expression, evidence of which scholars have not been able to detect in Livy's prose.

Liza of Lambeth (1897). The first novel of W. Somerset Maugham. It depicts the life and loves of Liza, a girl of the London slums. Written in the tradition of naturalism, it is filled with minute descriptions of poverty, violence, and physical and psychological illness. The novel was considered shocking when it was first published.

Llareggub or Llaregyb. See Under Milk Wood.

Lloyd's of London. An association of underwriters, merchants, shipowners, and brokers. The company deals principally with ocean-borne commerce, marine insurance, and the publication of shipping intelligence, but it has a worldwide reputation of being willing to insure almost anyone against almost anything. The company is so called because the society was founded, in 1688, at a coffee house kept in Lombard Street by one Edward Lloyd. In 1774, the offices, or Lloyd's Rooms, were moved to the Royal Exchange, where they still are.

Lloyd's books. Two enormous ledgerlike volumes, placed on desks at the entrance (right and left) of Lloyd's Rooms. They give the principal arrivals, and all losses by wrecks, fire, or other accidents at sea.

Lloyd's List. A periodical, in which the shipping news received at Lloyd's Rooms is published. It has been issued regularly since 1726, and as a daily since 1800.

Lludd and Llefelys. See Marignon, the local color. In reference to literature, the concrete details of natural scenery, architecture, language, local custom and tradition, used by authors to lend a sense of authenticity to their work. Local color writing flourished in the U.S. during the post-bellum 19th century. Native manners and dialect were frequently exploited for humorous effect. Among the outstanding local colorists of the Far West were Bret Harte and Joaquin Miller; New England scenes and characters were delicately recorded by Sarah Orne Jewett and Rose Terry Cooke. In the Middle West, Edward Eggleston and John Hay employed local color, while Hamlin Garland and Edgar Lee Masters, under the influence of the new realism, presented their devastating studies of local life. The South was nostalgically or accurately portrayed by George Washington Cable, Lafcadio Hearn, Charles Egbert Craddock, Joel Chandler Harris, Thomas Nelson Page, and Grace Elizabeth King.

In Great Britain, writers who employ local color to a significant degree include J. M. Synge, Sean O'Casey, Thomas Hardy, Arnold Bennett, A. E. Housman, and Winifred Holtby. In the novels and stories of James Joyce, the atmosphere of Dublin is vividly evoked. In France, Guy de Maupassant reveals the details of life in Normandy; Alphonse Daudet, Frédéric Mistral, and Jean Giono have written of Provence.

Locarno Pact or Treaty. A series of five treaties between Germany and Belgium, France, Great Britain, Italy, Poland, and Czechoslovakia (October 1925). They were negotiated at Locarno in Switzerland with the purpose of guaranteeing peace and the existing territorial boundaries.

Lochiel. The title of the head of the clan Cameron. The hero of Thomas Campbell's poem Lochiel's Warning (1802) is Donald Cameron, known as the Gentle Lochiel. He was one of the Young Pretender's staunch adherents, and escaped to France with him after Culloden (1746). He took service in the French army, but died two years later.

Lochinvar. A young Highlander, hero of a ballad in Scott's Marmion. Being in love with a lady already committed to an unenviable marriage, he persuades her to dance one last dance, during which he swings her into his saddle, and makes off with her before the bridegroom and his servants can recover from their astonishment.

Locke, David Ross. See Petroleum Vesuvius Nasby.

Locke, John (1632–1704). English philosopher. Educated at Christ Church, Oxford, Locke was a lecturer in Greek, rhetoric, and philosophy at that university and apparently practiced medicine, though he never received a medical degree. He became confidential secretary to the earl of Shaftesbury, who was one of the proprietors of Carolina, and wrote a well-known constitution for the colony in 1669. Suspected of complicity in Shaftesbury’s plots against the government, Locke was forced to leave England and lived in the Netherlands from 1684 to 1689. After the accession of William and Mary, he was appointed commissioner of appeals.

Locke’s most famous work is An Essay Concerning Human Understanding, an inquiry into the nature of knowledge. His Two Treatises on Government (1690), written in defense of the Glorious Revolution, exerted enormous influence on British and American political thought. The Declaration of Independence, in particular, echoes his contention that government rests on popular consent and that rebellion is permissible when government subverts the ends—the protection of life, liberty, and property—for which it is established. Locke also wrote Some Thoughts Concerning Education (1693), The Reasonableness of Christianity (1695), and four Letters on Toleration (1689–1692, 1675).

Locke, William [John] (1633–1930). English poet. He was noted for his light verse and elegant vers de société. He was the author of London Lyrics (1857), and editor of Lyra Elegantiarum (1867), an anthology of light verse. Lampson was the maiden name of his second wife.

Lockhart, John Gibson (1794–1854). Scottish editor and writer. He published the sketches of Edinburgh life Peter’s Letters to his Kinsfolk (1819), under the pseudonym Peter Morris, and translated Ancient Spanish Ballads (1823). At the age of 23 he wrote for Blackwood’s Magazine a series of four articles, signed “Z,” dealing with the supposed Cockney School of poetry and excoriating Leigh Hunt and John Keats. Though the ruthlessly tone of these articles is abusive and though to later generations many of Lockhart’s adverse judgments seem as vicious as they are abuse, especially in their confession of enmity with criticism, Lockhart enjoys a high reputation in English letters, his life of his father-in-law Sir Walter Scott (7 vols., 1837–1838) ranking second only to Boswell’s Johnson among the great biographies in the language. Lockhart also published a biography of Robert Burns (1828).

Lockit. See BEGGAR’S OPERA, THE; THREEPENNY OPERA, THE.

Locksley. In Scott’s Ivanhoe, a name assumed by Robin Hood, who appears as an archer at the tournament. It is said to have been the name of the village where the outlaw was born.

Locksley Hall (1842). A poem by Alfred Tennyson. The hero takes a last look at Locksley Hall, the remote seaside mansion where he spent his youth. Here he fell in love with his cousin Amy, who, yielding to social and parental pressure, married a rich “clown.” Though disgusted by the weakness of women and the mercenary corruption of the age—he even considers exiling himself to some tropic island—his youthful belief in progress and in the high destiny of Europe reasserts itself. In 1886 Tennyson published Locksley Hall Sixty Years After, a sequel.

Lockyer, Sir Joseph Norman (1836–1920). British astronomer. He initiated (1866) the spectroscopic observation of sunspots. He investigated the chemistry of the sun, and, in 1868, determined the presence in its atmosphere of an unknown element to which the name helium was given (from Greek helios, “the sun”)—a name that it has kept although helium was later discovered to exist also in the earth’s atmosphere.

Loco-Focos. The radical urban wing of the Democratic party in New York in the mid-1830’s. They favored the abolition of monopolies and advocated “hard” (as opposed to paper) money. They derived their name from a Tammany Hall meeting in 1835 at which the Democratic regulars nominated a ticket, ignoring the protests of the radicals, and turned out the lights in order to evict them. The radicals then obtained candles, which they lit with the new self-igniting matches called loco-focos, and proceeded to select their own candidates.

Locrine. In Geoffrey of Monmouth’s History of the Kings of Britain, king of England and son of Brutus. His love for Estralidis, daughter of a German king, causes his jealous wife Gwendolen to raise arms against him. Locrine is slain, and Gwendolen, assuming power, drowns Estrildis and her daughter Sabrina. According to Geoffrey, England (Loegria) received its name from him.

Locusta. One who murders those she professes to nurse or take care of. The original Locusta was a professional poisoner living in Rome about A.D. 54. She poisoned the emperor Claudius at Agrippina’s bidding and was hired by Nero to poison Britannicus. She was put to death under the emperor Galba.

Lodge, Thomas (1558?–1625). English poet, playwright, and prose writer. The son of the Lord Mayor of London, Lodge was educated at Oxford and became one of the group in London known as the University Wits. Considered by some to be the best of the imitators of Lyly and the Euphuistic style (see EUPHUISM), Lodge wrote several prose romances, the first of which was The Delectable History of Forbonius and Pisceria (1584). During a voyage to the Canary Islands he wrote Rosalynde, Euphues Golden Legacie (printed 1590), his most famous work. Based to some extent on the medieval tale of Gamelyn, it provided Shakespeare with the plot for As You Like It. Lodge’s poetry includes Scillaes Metamorphosis, Entreated with the Unfortunate Love of Glaucus (1589; reissued as Glaucus and Scilla). As the first example of a classical story given romantic treatment in verse, it may have influenced Shakespeare’s Venus and Adonis, Phyllis, a sonnet sequence, was published with the narrative poem The Complaint of Elstred in 1593. A Fig for Momus (1595), based on the satires of Horace, is one of the earliest English verse satires.

Title page of Locrine. Possibly by George Peele, it was mistakenly included in the Shakespeare Third Folio.

Only two of Lodge's plays have survived: A Looking Glass for London and England, written with Robert Greene in about 1590, published in 1594; and The Wounds of Civil War, produced c. 1587, published 1594. Some critics believe Lodge may have had a hand in Part II of Shakespeare's Henry VI and in King John. In the latter part of his life Lodge became a physician, and his writings after that time are confined to more serious and edifying subjects, such as a Treatise on the Plague (1603) and a translation of Seneca.

Lodi, League of (1454). A 25-year nonaggression pact signed by the major states of Italy. Negotiated by the Venetians, it is regarded as the first triumph of modern diplomacy.

Lodovico. In Shakespeare's Othello, kinsman to Brabantio, father of Desdemona.

Lofing, Hugh (1886-1947). English-born American writer, author and illustrator of children's books. Lofting created the amiable and fantastic Dr. Dolittle, the title character of several popular and imaginative works such as The Story of Dr. Dolittle (1920), The Voyages of Dr. Dolittle (1922), and Dr. Dolittle's Garden (1927).

Loftus, Cissie. Stage name of Marie Cecilia McCarthy (1876-1943). Scottish actress. She starred no the stage and in early motion pictures. She was famous for her sparkling impersonations of other stage and screen stars.

Log, King. A king who rules in peace and quietness, but never makes his power felt. It is an allusion to the fable of the frogs who ask for a king. Jupiter first threw them down a log of wood, but they grumbled at its spiritless king. He then sent them a stork, which devoted them eagerly.

Logical positivism. A leading school of 20th-century philosophy. Logical positivists believe man's thoughts, ideas, and concepts are dependent on his command of language, so they approach truth and logic through a study of language. The school had its origin in Vienna but it is now centered at Oxford in England. It was much influenced by the writings of Ludwig Wittgenstein. Logical positivism is also known as linguistic philosophy and its exponents are often called the Oxford philosophers. A. J. Ayer is a leading English member of the school. Linguistic philosophy has profoundly influenced literary critics in England. See Cambridge critics.

Logistilla. In the Orlando Furioso of Ariosto, the sister of the witch Alcina. Herself a symbol of reason and virtue, she teaches Ruggiero to ride the Hippogriff and gives Astolfo a book that enables him to break enchantments, and a horn whose sound has a shattering impact on all who hear it.

Lohengrin. A son of Percival or Parsifal in German legend, the Knight of the Swan. He appears at the close of Wolfram von Eschenbach's Parsival (c. 1210), and in other German romances, where he is the deliverer of Elsa, a princess of Brabant, who has been dispossessed by Telramund and Ortrud. He arrives at Antwerp in a skiff drawn by a swan, champions Elsa, and becomes her husband on the sole condition that she shall not ask his name or lineage. She is prevailed upon to do so on the marriage night, and he, by his vows to the Grail, is obliged to disclose his identity, but at the same time disappear. The swan returns for him, and he goes, but not before re-transforming the swan into Elsa's brother Gottfried, who, by the wills of the sorceress Ortrud, had been obliged to assume that form. Richard Wagner has an opera based on the subject, composed (words and music) in 1847.

Lohenstein, Daniel Caspar von (1635-1863). German dramatist, poet, and novelist of the late baroque period. Like the poems of Hofmann von Hofmannswaldau, his plays are rich and sensual in language and imagery. Unlike Gryphius, who often gives his heroes a martyr's death, Lohenstein's tragedies frequently end in suicide—showing less of an attempt to remain within Christian teachings. His most famous tragedies are Cleopatra (1661), Ibrahim Sultan (1673), and Sophonisbe (1680). His historical novel Arminius (1689) reveals many parallels with the actual political situation of the time and embodies the author's own views.

Loki. In Scandinavian mythology, the Satanic Aesir god of strife and evil who fathered the 3 monsters with the giantess Angerboda: the Midgard serpent, Fenris, and Hel. As enemy of the good gods, he artfully contrived the death of Balder. He was finally bound to a rock by 10 chains and tortured by drops of venom from a serpent overhead. One legend holds that he will remain captive until the Twilight of the Gods, when he will break his bonds. Another story says that he was freed at Ragnarok when he and Heimdall slew each other.

Lokman. A fabulous personage, the supposed author of a collection of Arabic fables. The name is based on Lugman, the title of the 31st Sura of the Koran, in which it is stated, "We gave to Lugman wisdom." Like AESOP, he is said to have been a slave, noted for his ugliness.

Lollards. A name given, sometimes disparagingly, to members of the 14th-century English movement in England associated with John Wyclif and his demands for ecclesiastical reform. The Lollards held that the Church in England had become so encrusted with false doctrine as to be virtually useless and that the only way of life was one based on the Bible. They particularly objected to the wealth and power of the clergy and advocated that the Church practice the poverty exemplified by Christ in the Gospels. The Lollards' rise to prominence during the latter half of the 14th century can best be understood in the historical context of the times: while the great mass of the people were plagued by warfare, pestilence, and poverty, the English clergy by skillful abuse of ecclesiastical prerogatives had amassed enormous power, wealth, and property. The Lollards reached the height of their strength in the decade following Wyclif's death; in 1395, it was said that one out of every two Englishmen was a Lollard. Under the house of Lancaster in the 15th century, they were more and more sternly repressed and, waning in numbers, responded to their loss of strength by ever-increasing fanaticism. In part their decline was due to a loss of leadership; in the 16th century, to all practical intents and purposes, the Lollards had ceased to exist. Though it cannot be said that the Lollards sparked the English Reformation, the movement bore important fruit: the placing of the clergy under lay jurisdiction, the curbing of clerical abuses (especially in the form of the reduction in ecclesiastical holdings and possessions), and the insistence that the Bible through translation into the vernacular be made available to the reason of common men and women are all due, directly or indirectly, to the legacy left by the Lollards.

Lomax, John Avery (1872-1948). American folklorist and collector of folk songs. These he published in numerous books. His work has been continued by his son Alan Lomax (1915- ), who has collected thousands of American and European folk songs by means of phonograph recordings, many of which are in the Library of Congress; some are also available on commercial recordings.

Lombard. A banker or money-lender. They are so called because the first English bankers were from Lombardy, and set up in Lombard Street (London), in the Middle Ages. The name Lombard is a contraction of Longobards. Among the richest of these Longobard merchants was the celebrated Medici family, from whose armorial bearings the pawnbrokers' insignia of three golden balls may have been derived (see St. Nicholas). The Lombard bankers exercised a monopoly in pawnbroking until the reign of Elizabeth I.

Lombard, Peter (c. 1100-c. 1164). Italian scholastic theologian. He studied Aristotelian philosophy under Pierre Abélard, then himself became a teacher at Paris. He is often called Master of the Sentences (Lat., "Magister Sententiarum") because of his compilation of the Sententiarum Libri Quattuor (Four Books of Sentences). These volumes contain quotations from the authorities on doctrinal questions, with objections and replies also from "the sayings of the fathers." The fourth volume, concerning the nature of the sacraments, was especially important at the time; the whole work became a theological textbook and inspired innumerable commentaries.

Lomonosov, Mikhail Vasilyevich (1711-1765). Russian scholar and poet. He is considered the founder of modern literary Russian and the first to introduce what became standard Russian prosody. The son of a fisherman, Lomonosov became one of the most versatile and brilliant Russians of his time. He made valuable contributions in chemistry, mathematics, grammar, and rhetoric. He formed modern literary Russian by establishing a working relationship between the Old Church Slavonic language and the Russian vernacular, producing a literary language that rivals any other for richness and flexibility. Realizing that the old-style syllabic versification, based on the number of syllables in a line, was not fitted for Russian, Lomonosov introduced a system based on accents—alternating stressed and unstressed syllables. This system became the standard one used by the great classic Russian poets. Not until the early 20th century were new methods of versification introduced into Russian by Aleksandr Blok.

London, Jack. Real name, John Griffith London (1876-1916). American writer. Born in San Francisco, an illegitimate child, London was for a time the highest-paid and best-known writer in America. Brought up in dire poverty, he had already been at the age of 20, a hobo, a sailor, and a Klondike adventurer. Largely self-educated, he was influenced by the ideas of Darwin, Marx, and Nietzsche, and his work is marked by sympathy with the poor; prophecies of world revolution and a future socialist state; emphasis upon the primitive, the powerful, the cruel; and a predilection for the violent, usually embodied in an animal or a Superman.

Going to the Klondike in 1897, London began writing stories of his Alaskan experiences for various magazines. These were collected in The Son of the Wolf (1900). His first novel, A Daughter of the Snows (1902), stresses his belief in Anglo-Saxon superiority, seen often in his later books. In 1903 came his most popular and enduring book, The Call of the Wild, the story of the dog Buck; White Fang was a sequel. The Sea-Wolf, again based on his own experiences, is an attempt to portray the Nietzschean superman. The Game (1905) is a novelette about a prizefighter, engaged to be married, who dies in his last fight. Before Adam (1906) describes the experiences of mankind in the far distant past; The Iron Heel turns to the future. Martin Eden is a partly autobiographical novel in which the hero commits suicide, just as London was ultimately to do. John Barleycorn (1913), a tract against drinking, is also autobiographical. The Valley of the Moon shows London's faith in socialism. The Star Rover (1915) describes trances experienced by a man in prison.

Best Short Stories of Jack London (1945) and Tales

of Adventure (1956) are selections of his stories.

London Merchant, The (1731). A bourgeois tragedy by George Lillo. It tearfully presents the seduction of George Barnwell by the villainous Millwood and his subsequent crimes and degradation. The play, which was highly popular in its time, is chiefly remembered as an extreme example of sentimentality and bathos.

Loneliness of the Long Distance Runner, The (1959). A long short story by Alan Sillitoe. A boy who is sent to reform school for robbing a bakery narrates his own story. The corrupt society that has made him a delinquent is incidentally analyzed. The boy scores a triumph over the wardens of the reformatory and the Establishment in general by deliberately losing in a long-distance race against another school.

Long, Gabrielle Margaret Vere (1886-1952). Prolific English novelist who wrote under 6 or 10 pen names. As Marjorie Bowen she wrote historical romances, such as The Viper of Milan (1906). As Joseph Shearing she wrote historical novels usually based on actual criminal cases, such as Lucile Clery: A Woman of Intrigue (1932).

Long, Huey [Pierce] (1893-1935). American politician. Perhaps the most notorious as well as the most successful of American demagogues, Long began his career as a traveling salesman and later studied at Tulane University, completing the three-year law course in seven months. Having served as railroad commissioner of Louisiana, he was elected governor in 1928 and consolidated his power by placing his followers in strategic positions. After the failure of an attempt to remove him from office (1929), he was elected to the U.S. Senate in 1930 and, retaining the governorship until 1932, made himself master of the state; he provided Louisiana with good schools and highways during his term as governor, built a new state capitol at Baton Rouge, and helped the state university. In 1934 he announced a Share-Our-Wheat program to provide financial security for every American. After declaring himself a candidate for the presidency, he was assassinated on the steps of the state capitol by Dr. Carl A. Weiss, who was killed by Long's bodyguards.

Long's career inspired several novels, including Hamilton Basso's Sun in Capricorn (1942) and John Dos Passos' Number One (1943). Although Robert Penn Warren has denied that the character of Willie Stark in All the King's Men should be identified with Long, the similarity is striking.

Longville. In Shakespeare's Love's Labour's Lost, one of the three young lords who join Ferdinand, king of Navarre, in an oath of celibacy and study. He becomes enamored of Maria.

Long Day's Journey into Night (1956). A play by Eugene O'Neill. An autobiographical drama, it was apparently written before July 22, 1941, when O'Neill presented the manuscript to Carlotta, his third wife. It deals with the Tyrone family: the father, mother, and two sons. The only other character is Cathleen, a servant girl. The father is a celebrated actor; the older son is a drunkard and ne'er-do-well.

A harrowing domestic tragedy, the play offers a clear insight into the character of O'Neill himself.

Longest Journey, The (1907). A novel by E. M. Forster. Its main character is Rickie Elliot, a student at Cambridge University. Lame, an orphan, and weak-willed, he neglects his good friend, Stewart Ansell, to marry Agnes Pembroke. Agnes, a shallow girl, with her brother influences Rickie to cheat his half brother, Stephen Wonham. Rickie finally redeems himself when he loses his life in saving Stephen's. The novel is notable for its picture of the intellectual and social life of Cambridge students.

Longfellow, Henry Wadsworth (1807-1882). American poet, translator, romancer, and college professor. Longfellow was two poets: one, the popular schoolroom image of the wise but harmless old man who wrote A Psalm of Life; The Children's Hour, and The Village Blacksmith; and the other, the serious but limited poet who wrote Mezzo Cammin and was the subject of a recent study by the critic Newton Arvin.

Descended from old New England families, Longfellow went to Bowdoin College in Maine and then to Europe to study languages. On his return, he became professor of languages at Bowdoin and married Mary Potter. Dissatisfied with life in Maine, he turned to reminiscences. The result was his first book, the Irvingesque series of travel sketches Outre-Mer: A Pilgrimage Beyond the Sea (1835). After another trip to Europe, he accepted the chair of modern languages at Harvard, succeeding George Ticknor. His wife had died in Rotterdam on the European trip.

At home, Longfellow wrote Hyperion, a romance in which he modeled his heroine on Frances Appleton, whom he had met in Europe. In the same year, he published his first volume of poems, Voices of the Night, and three years later, his second, Ballads and Other Poems (1842). In 1843, after another trip to Europe, he married Frances Appleton. Her father gave them the magnificent present, the beautiful Cambridge mansion, Craigie House. Longfellow lived in the house for the rest of his life, and it is now dedicated to his memory.

Increasingly interested in narrative forms, he produced a series that helped to establish a native mythology: Evangeline, The Golden Legend, Hiawatha, The Courtship of Miles Standish, and Tales of a Wayside Inn. To these he added a long prose romance of curious charm, Kavanagh.

In 1861, at the height of his fame, Mrs. Longfellow died. The poet's shock and sorrow prevented his working for several years. He finally finished his translation of The Divine Comedy (1865-1867) and his religious poem, Christus (1872). In his last years he added to his volumes, expanding earlier editions, and writing a number of sonnets.

His poetry and values have been subject to great reversals in critical opinion. Never profound or powerfully original, he did have a sound lyric sense and an effective understanding of European culture. His work, however, is rooted in literature, rather than life; there is always a feeling of aloofness in his lines. Longfellow's immense popularity did a great deal to develop audiences for poetry in America. See ARSENAL AT SPRINGFIELD, THE; BUILDING OF THE SHIP, THE; MY LOST YOUTH; WRECK OF THE HESPERUS, THE.
Longinus. See On the Sublime.

Longinus, or Longius. The traditional name of the Roman soldier who stabbed Jesus with a spear at the crucifixion.

Longinius, Cassius (c. 220–273). Greek rhetorician and philosopher. A Neo-Platonist and the teacher of Porphyry, he is not to be confused with the unknown author of the treatise, On the Sublime. Longinus taught at Athens, and counseled Queen Zenobia at Palmyra. He was executed by Aurelian for his loyalty to the queen.

Long Parliament. In English history, the Parliament that assembled in November, 1640, after the dissolution of the Short Parliament. The Long Parliament impeached the earl of Strafford, passed the Grand Remonstrance, and, after the final rupture with Charles I in 1642, conducted the Civil War against the king's forces. In 1648, the members who were willing to come to terms with Charles were ousted during Pride's Purge. The remaining members constituted the Rump Parliament, which was forcibly dissolved by Oliver Cromwell in 1653 but was twice recalled in 1659. Early in 1660, the Rump was dissolved and was joined by the members expelled in 1648, the Long Parliament declared itself dissolved.

Longstreet, Augustus Baldwin (1790-1870). American lawyer, clergyman, editor, writer, and college president. Longstreet, in addition to many activities, founded and edited the States Rights Sentinel in Atlanta in 1834, and wrote a classic of regional humor, Georgia Scenes. Later he wrote a series of short stories and a novel, Master William Mitten (1864).

Longus (4th or 5th century A.D.). Greek writer, supposed author of Daphnis and Chloe.

Long Valley, The (1938). A collection of 13 stories by John Steinbeck. They deal with the life of people in the Salinas Valley in California, especially in relation to the migrants who have come into the valley. Best known of the tales is The Red Pony, separately printed in 1945.

Lonigan, Stubs. See Stubs Lonigan.

Lonsdale, Frederick (1881-1954). British playwright. He is best known for his sophisticated comedies such as The Last of Mrs. Cheyney (1925).

Look Back in Anger (1957). A play in 3 acts by John Osborne, one of England's Angry Young Men. Tied down by his working-class origins, Jimmy Porter turns his resentment against English class values on his upper-class wife, Alison. Although he has brought her down to his own level of poverty, it gradually becomes apparent that only by breaking her spirit can he revenge himself on the injustices he has suffered, but Alison remains impassive in the face of his insults and cruelty. When a childhood friend, Helena, learns that Alison is pregnant, she persuades her to leave Jimmy. Helena then becomes his mistress and scapegoat, but because she is incapable of real suffering he can take no pleasure in her. When Alison comes back in complete despair after having lost her baby, Jimmy is able to show her his love, and they are finally united in their mutual degradation and pain.

Look Homeward, Angel: A Story of the Buried Life (1929). A novel by Thomas Wolfe. It describes the childhood and youth of Eugene Gant in the town of Altamont, state of Catawba (said to be Asheville, N.C.), as he grows up, becomes aware of the relations among his family, meets the eccentric people of the town, goes to college, discovers literature and ideas, has his first love affairs, and at last sets out alone on a mystic and romantic pilgrimage. Or Time and the River is a sequel.

Looking Backward: 2000–1887 (1888). A utopian novel by Edward Bellamy. The author describes a collectivist Boston society in the year 2000. Its hero transported into the future, the book advocates the peaceful evolution of society until it reaches the point of state socialism. The book was extremely popular; numerous other writers adopted Bellamy's plot and characters to qualify or attack his theme, and the book led to the forming of a Nationalist Party to advocate his principles.

Loos, Anita (1893—). American humorous writer. Her famous light satire Gentlemen Prefer Blondes inspired a play (1925), a sequel, But Gentlemen Marry Brunettes (1928), a musical comedy (1949), a movie (1953), and the title of her autobiography, This Brunette Prefers Work (1956). Miss Loos is also the author of the play Happy Birthday (1946) and numerous film scenarios.

Lope de Vega. See Lope Félix de Vega Carpio.

López de Ayala [y Herrera], Adelardo (1838–1879). Spanish statesman and dramatist. He is best known abroad as an exponent of the moral tendency that infused 19th-century Spanish drama, in spite of the fact that he attained the rank of prime minister of the Spanish government. His plays include El tanto por ciento (1861), dealing with wealth and honor in love, and Consuelo (1870). His delicate and lyrical sonnets have also added to his reputation.

López de Ayala, Pero or Pedro. Also known as the Chancellor or el Canciller Ayala (1832–1407). Spanish statesman, poet, and historian. His chronicles of the reigns of Peter the Cruel, Henry II, John I, and Henry III are distinguished by their dramatic style and psychological penetration. As a poet he is best known for Rima del Palacio, a miscellaneous compilation containing religious verse as well as realistic satire on contemporary society. He also wrote a treatise on falconry and translations of the works of Boethius, St. Isidore, and Boccaccio.

López de Mendoza, Hijo. See marques de Santillana.

López Velarde, Ramón (1888–1921). Mexican poet. A disciple of Leopoldo Lugones, López Velarde wrote about love, religion, and his homeland in a style characterized by the use of eccentric, unexpected words and images. The poems in La sangre devota (1916) and Zozobra (1919) deal with the spiritual and carnal aspects of love, showing the poet's final disenchantment and dismay at his failure to satisfy either his physical appetites or the demands of his soul. La sueca patria, his best-known poem, which appears in El son del corazón (1953), is an ironic but tender tribute to his native province.

López y Fuentes, Gregorio (1895—). Mexican novelist. His best-known novel is El indio (1935), in which he reveals the injustices inflicted upon Mexico's Indians in the early decades of the 20th century and realistically describes tribal customs and institutions.
Lorca, Federico García. See Federico García LORCA.

Lord Jim (1900). A novel by Joseph CONRAD. It is about a man’s lifelong efforts to atone for an act of instinctive cowardice. The young Jim is one of the officers of the Patna who fraudently take to the boats when their ship appears to be sinking—leaving their passengers, eight hundred Muslim pilgrims, to apparently certain death. But the ship survives and is towed to port, and Jim becomes a wandering outcast. Eventually he wins a measure of satisfaction and self-respect from a busy, useful life among the natives of Patuan, which put complete confidence in Tuan Jim (Lord Jim). His life comes to its second crisis when a group of white men whom he has befriended betray his trust by murdering Dain Waris, his best friend, the son of the old chief Doramín. In spite of the pleas of the native girl he loves, Jim immediately gives himself up to native justice and is killed by Doramín. He wins back his lost honor and triumphs in death. The story is told obliquely, through Marlow’s account of his own experiences and stories and letters from his friends.

Lord of Burleigh, The (1842). A ballad by Alfred, Lord Tennyson. In the guise of a village painter the noble-born hero courts and wins a simple country maiden; but, when he takes her home to his castle, she feels out of place and pines away and dies.

Lord of Misrule. Sometimes King, or Abbot of Misrule. An official appointed to oversee the horse-play of Christmas festivities during the 15th and 16th centuries. In Scotland he was called the Abbot of Unreason; in France, L’abbé de Lissé (jollity). At Oxford and Cambridge one of the Masters of Arts superintended both the Christmas and Candlemas sports, for which he was allowed a fee of 40s. A similar “lord” was appointed by the lord mayor of London, the sheriffs and the chief nobility. These mock dignitaries often had other officers under them, and were furnished with hobby-horses, dragons, and musicians. Polydore Vergil says the Feast of Misrule was derived from the Saturnalia, the disorderly Roman festival held in December.

Lord of the Flies (1955). A novel by William GOLDING about a group of boys stranded on a par- diseal island after a plane crash. In spite of the efforts of a few leaders to form an organized society, the group reverts to primitive religious rites and ritual murder. Children’s adventure stories and anthropology are powerfully combined with Eden and original sin.

Lord Ormont and His Aminta (1894). A novel by George MREDDITH. It is based on the career of the earl of Peterborough, who rendered distinguished service at Valencia but in later life nourished resentment against the government, which had re- called him for high-handedness in 1707. He married Anastasia Robinson, the singer, but made no public acknowledgment of the marriage for many years. In the novel the names are changed, and the heroine, Aminta, remedies her equivocal position by eloping with Matthew Weyburn and opening a school in the Alps.

Lord Ullin’s Daughter (1809). A ballad by Thomas CAMPBELL. Lord Ullin’s daughter elopes with the Chief of Ulva’s Isle, and is pursued by her father with a party of retainers. The lovers reach a ferry, and promise to give the boatman “a silver pound” to row them across the Lochlyle. The waters are very rough, and the father reaches the shore just in time to see the boat capsize, and his daughter drowned.

Lorelei or Lurlei. The name of a rock cliff that juts into the Rhine near Bingen and is known as a danger to shipping. Clemens Brentano, in his ballad “Lore Lay” (included in the novel Godwi, 1800–1801), was the first to associate the rock with a woman of the same name; and the poem is so convincingly folklike in style that Brentano’s invention came to be regarded as a genuine folk legend. But Brentano’s Lore Lay is only a woman, and it was not until Heinrich HEINE’s famous poem Die Lorelei (1827) that the now-popular idea of a siren sitting atop the rock and luring ships to their destruction by her singing was actually created.

Lorenzetti, Ambrogio (1265–1348) and Pietro (fl. 1306–1348). Italian painters of the early Sienese school. Ambrogio is noted for his allegorical fresco The Effects of Good Government and for his paintings of religious subjects. His brother Pietro is noted for his Deposition fresco and for the Madonna and Child with Saints in the church of St. Francis at Assisi.

Lorenzo. In Shakespeare’s MERCHANT OF VENICE, the impractical but honest young man with whom Jessica, the daughter of Shylock, elopes.

Lorenzo. The name by which D. H. LAWRENCE was known to his admirers and disciples.

Loretto, the house of. Santa Casa, the reputed house of the Virgin Mary at Nazareth. It was miraculously translated to Fiume in Dalmatia in 1291, thence to Recanati in 1294, and finally to a plot of land belonging to a certain Lady Lauraetta, near Ancona, Italy, around which the town of Loretto sprang up. The chapel contains bas-reliefs showing incidents in the life of the Virgin, and a rough image traditionally held to have been carved by St. Luke. See Richard CRASHAW.

Lorna Doone, a Romance of Exmoor (1869). A historical novel by R. D. BLACKMORE set in 17th-century Devonshire at the time of the rebellion of the duke of Monmouth. The young hero, John Ridd, falls into the hands of the Doones, an outlaw clan. He is saved by Lorna Doone, a mere child, and when he comes of age, he sets out to find her again. Because the Doones killed his father he hates them, but protects Lorna against them, and finally, learning that she is the kidnapped daughter of a Scottish nobleman, marries her.

Lorrain, Claude. Originally, Claude Gellée or Gelée (1600–1682). French landscape painter. At the age of 27, Claude Lorrain established himself permanently in Rome, where he studied the surrounding countryside and the varying aspects it assumed with the passage of the day. Acknowledged a master during his lifetime, he permanently influenced the art of landscape painting. His calm and poetic, idyllic scenes are known for their golden light.
Los de abajo (The Underdogs, 1916). A novel by Mariano Azuela. Ignored for years after its first appearance in a Spanish-language El Paso newspaper, Los de abajo is now generally regarded as the best of the many novels inspired by the Mexican Revolution. Written in a spare, colloquial style, the novel consists of a series of sharply etched vignettes that recount the career of Demetrio Macías, the leader of a band of ignorant, often bestial, peasants. Through Macías, Azuela brilliantly re-creates the blind, apparently futile struggle of the nameless masses who took up arms for a cause they did not understand and, swept along by the turbulence of the revolution, continued fighting because they did not know how to stop.

Lost Chord, The (1858). A once popular poem by Adelaide Anne Procter (1825-1864), daughter of Bryan Waller Procter. She wrote it under the pseudonym of Mary Berwick; it begins “Seated one day at the organ . . .” and was set to music by Sir Arthur Sullivan.

Lost Colony of Roanoke. See ROANOKE ISLAND.

Lost Generation. A term used to refer to the generation of men and women who came to maturity during World War I (1914-1918); specifically it refers to their experiences in the war itself, to the social dislocations following it, and to their rootlessness and disillusionment. Gertrude Stein is said to have coined the term in a conversation with Ernest Hemingway, whose early novels are considered to typify the attitudes and behavior of the lost generation. The Lost Generation (1931) by Malcolm Cowley dealt with the subject.

Lost Lady, A (1923). A novel by Willa Cather. The “lost lady” of the title is Marian Forrester, the charming young wife of a rugged pioneer and railroad-builder. She is seen, with a naiveté that becomes the most delicate irony and revelation, through the eyes of Niel Herbert, an adoring young boy. Her husband’s death leaves Marian in financial difficulties, and she becomes the mistress of Ivy Peters, an aggressive businessman of the new generation. After Peters marries and moves into the Forrester mansion with his wife, she disappears and is heard of again only by rumor as the wife of a wealthy Englishman in South America.

Lost Weekend, The (1944). A novel by Charles Jackson. It is a realistic study of an alcoholic who first resists, then succumbs to his passion for liquor. On a five-day “lost weekend” much of his life flashes before him. The title has become a catchword for a drunken fling of major proportions.

Lost. In the Old Testament, the son of Haran and nephew of Abraham, who accompanied his uncle to Canaan and divided the land with him. Lot was one of the inhabitants of the wicked city of Sodom and escaped by the intervention of an angel, just before the city was destroyed by fire and brimstone, but Lot’s wife was turned into a pillar of salt for ignoring the warning not to look back at the city (Gen. 19:26).

Lot, King. In Arthurian romance, king of Orkney and one of the kings subdued by Arthur. In Malory’s Morte d’Arthur (c. 1469), he is the husband of Margawse and father of the knights Gawain, Aggravaine, Gaheris, and Gareth.

Lothair. A novel by Benjamin Disraeli (1870). The hero, Lothair, is a young English nobleman who, upon coming of age, inherits a great fortune. The plot centers about the struggle of the Anglican Church, the Church of Rome, and the revolutionary societies of Italy to secure his money and support. One of the most interesting characters of the book is the witty Lord St. Aldegonde. A primary cause for the popularity of the book was the interest taken by the English public in identifying the persons of prominence who appeared in it as characters only slightly disguised.

Loti, Pierre. Pen name of Louis Marie Julien Vialaud (1850-1923). French novelist. His career as a naval officer sent him to distant places, providing him with the exotic backgrounds for many of his novels, which were sentimental in theme and luxurious in setting. Asiyadé (1879) is set in Constanti-nople, Le Mariage de Loti (1880) in Tahiti, and Madame Chrysanthème (1888) in Japan. In his sensuous and impressionistic style, Loti gave voice to a persistent melancholy. Although his travel romances first brought him fame, it was the publication of his three novels of Breton life—Mon Frère Yves (1883), Pécher d’Îles, and Matelot (1893)—that won him enduring acclaim.

Lotis. See LOTUS.

Lotte in Weimar. See BELOVED RETURNS, THE. Lottery, The (1949). A short story by Shirley Jackson. This quietly told tale describes an annual lottery held since time immemorial in a small American town. Only in the final lines of the story does it become apparent that the winner is to be stoned by the other townspeople.

Lotus. A name of many plants. To the Egyptians, it was various species of water-lily, to the Hindus and Chinese the Nelumbo (a water-bean, Nymphaeaceae speciosum), their sacred lotus, and to the Greeks Zizyphus Lotus, a North African shrub of the natural order Rhamnae, the fruit of which was used for food.

According to Muhammad a lotus tree stands in the seventh heaven, on the right hand of the throne of God, and the Egyptians pictured God sitting on a lotus above the watery mud.

The lotus is a symbolic flower in Indian religion and literature. Brahma sits on a lotus and is himself born out of the lotus in Vishnu’s navel. The Buddha is always depicted seated on a lotus. The Tibetan prayer chant is Om mani padme hum (1 salute the jewel in the lotus). Growing in stagnant village ponds, the flower stands for the emergence into light from the darkness and sensuality of the phenomenal world; the leaves, unaffected by water, symbolize the atman (self) unpolluted by the attractions of the gunas (senses); and the daytime opening and nighttime closing of the flower suggest the timeless day and night of Brahma in the context of Hindu metaphysical belief.

The classic myth is that Lotis, a daughter of Poseidon, fleeing from Priapus was changed into a tree, which was called Lotus after her. Another story goes that Dryope of Oechalia was one day carrying her infant son, when she plucked a lotus flower for his amusement, and was instantaneously transformed into a lotus.

Lotus-eaters or Lotophagi. In Homeric legend, a people who ate the lotus-tree. The effect of this was to make them forget their friends and homes, and to lose all desire of returning to their native country, their only wish being to live in idleness in Lotus-land (Odyss. ix).

Hence, a lotus-eater is one living in ease and luxury. Tennyson wrote one of his best-known poems on this subject.

Lotus Sūtra. (Sans. Saddharma-pundarikā; Ch.
Fahua ching; Jap. Hokkekyō). Buddhist sūtra of great popularity in China and Japan. The T‘ien-t’ai (Jap. Tendai) and Nichiren sects base their teachings on this work.

Loubet, Émile (1838–1929). French statesman and president of France (1899–1906). Loubet, with other liberals, sought revision of the Dreyfus case.

Louis XIV. Called Louis the Great, the Roi
Soleil (the Sun King), and le Grande Monarque (1638–1715). King of France (1643–1715). The greatest autocratic monarch that France has ever known, he left his country bankrupt through his wars, conquests, and extravagances. His reign was marked by his lavish patronage of art, literature, and women, and coincided with the greatest flowering of French civilization to date. Louis secretly married Mme de Maintenon, the last of his many mistresses, after the death of his first wife, Marie Thérèse of Spain.

Louis XVI (1754–1793). King of France. He married Marie Antoinette in 1770, and in 1774, on the death of his grandfather Louis XV, he began his reign; he was deprived of his powers by the Legislative Assembly in 1792 and was beheaded in 1793.

Louise, the Glee-maiden. A prominent character in Scott’s Fair Maid of Perth. Enamored of Prince James of Scotland, she flings herself from a precipice at his death.

Louisiana Purchase (1803). The acquisition of Louisiana from France during the consularship of Napoleon by the U.S. for approximately $15 million.
Alarmed by the threat implicit in Spain’s retrocession of Louisiana to France in 1800, President Jefferson appointed James Monroe to purchase New Orleans and West Florida from the French. Napoleon, however, had abandoned his projects for a French empire in the New World and offered to sell the whole of Louisiana instead. The purchase of Louisiana, a vaguely defined tract of some 828,000 square miles lying between the Mississippi River and the Rocky Mountains, more than doubled the area of the U.S.

Louis Philippe (1773–1850). King of France (1830–1848). A son of Philippe Egalité, he was the first elected king of France. At the insistence of Thiers and Lafayette, Louis Philippe was elected constitutional monarch after the deposition of Charles X (see JULY REVOLUTION). A partisan of the Revolution in his youth, and democratic in the first years of his reign, he became, more and more, a typical Bourbon and absolute. He himself abdicated the throne after the revolution of February, 1848, and died in exile at Claremont, England.

Lounsbury, Thomas Raynesford (1838–1915).
American scholar and educator. A professor of Eng-ish literature at Yale, he wrote a History of the English Language (1879), Life of James Fenimore
Cooper (1882), and edited Chaucer’s minor poems and the works of Charles Dudley Warner. A student of Early and Middle English, he was one of the original members of the American Academy of Arts and Letters, and a fellow of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences.

Lourdes. See BERNADETTE OF LOURDES.

Louys, Pierre. Pen name of Pierre Louis (1870– 1925). French poet and novelist. A close friend of André Gide and Paul Valéry, he still remained primarily a disciple of the Parnassian school of José-María de Heredia, whose daughter he married in 1899. Astarte (1891) is a collection of Hellenistic poetry; Aphrodite (1896) is a novel of Alexandrian manners. Although much of his fiction, such as the short story Les Aventures du roi Pausole (1901), was intended to shock conventional morality, Louys was essentially a worshiper of form and beauty, and a moralist. His other works include La femme et le pantin (1898), Le Crépuscule des Nymphes (1925), Psyche (1927), and Poésies (1927).

Love and Intrigue. See KABALE UND LIBRE.

Love and Mr. Lewisham (1900). A semi-autobiographical novel by H. G. WELLS. Mr. Lewisham is a rather comical young English science teacher and, later, college student. He reluctantly gives up his schemes for an ambitious scientific, literary, and political career when he falls in love and marries ordinary, domestic Ethel. The teaching and college background are like Wells’s own; after an unsuccessful first marriage he always feared domestic claustrophobia.

Loved One, The (1948). A novel by Evelyn WAUGH. It is a very funny, biting satire on American life, especially Hollywood mortuary practices, and on the more universal themes of love and death.
The hero finally cremates the heroine in a dogs’ cemetery.

Love feast. A meal or banquet in token of brotherly love and friendship. It is often used as a synonym for the agape, or common meal, shared by early Christians, which originally always preceded the Lord’s Supper.

Love for Love (1695). A comedy by William Congreve. The extravagant Valentine agrees to relinquish his inheritance to his sea-faring brother Ben if his father, Sir Sampson Legend, will pay his debts.
Valentine’s attempts to regain his inheritance are unsuccessful until the resourcefulness of his devoted Angelica extricates him from his predicament. Among the well-known lesser characters are Prue, Angelica’s rustic cousin, and Jeremy, Valentine’s enterprising servant.
Lovelace, Richard (1618-1658). English poet. One of the Cavalier Poets, Lovelace was known for his grace, his handsome appearance, and his aristocratic gallantry. A passionate Royalist, he was imprisoned twice by Parliament during the Civil War and ruined himself supporting Charles I. He died in a London slum in great poverty.

Lovelace's poetry is very uneven: a large proportion of it is lifeless, extravagant, and labored, but he wrote a few lyrics whose nobility and grace equal anything of the period. Such are To Althea from Prison; To Lucasta, Going Beyond the Seas (1649); and To Lucasta, Going to the Wars.

Lovelace, Robert. The principal male character in Samuel Richardson's novel Clarissa Harlowe. He is a polished libertine who is kind and considerate to all who acknowledge his power, but ruthless (to himself and to Clarissa) in his search for proven affection. He is killed in a duel by Colonel Morden, Clarissa's cousin.

Love Me Little, Love Me Long (1859). A novel by Charles Reade. It is concerned with the successful wooing of Lucy Fountain, the heroine, by David Dodd, a seaman completely at home on shipboard but extremely ill at ease on land. In a sequel, Hard Cash (1864), David's struggles to bring home a large sum of money result in his losing his mind, and as "Silly Billy Thompson" he escapes from a burning lunatic asylum to a frigate and lives through a series of exciting adventures before fate restores to him his reason, his wife, his exuberant daughter Jullia, and his bank account of "hard cash." This novel was written as an exposure of conditions in the private lunatic asylums of England and as such aroused much discussion.

Lover, Samuel (1797-1868). Irish novelist, painter, and song writer. A successful portrait artist, Lover later turned to writing on Irish themes. His novel Rory O'More (1839) was avidly received, as was Handy Andy, an entertaining story of a singularly inept Irishman. His sympathetic portrayal of the Irish peasantry and his popular songs and ballads helped to herald the dawning of Irish Nationalism.

Lover's Complaint A. An anonymous poem. It was attributed to William Shakespeare on the basis of its inclusion in the first edition of the Sonnets of Shakespeare in 1609. The poem, which is somewhat wooden and stilted in its manner, is not generally regarded as a legitimate item in the Shakespearean canon.

Love's Labour's Lost (c. 1594). A comedy by William Shakespeare. Ferdinand, king of Navarre, and his friends, Berowne or Biron, Longaville, and Dumain, take an oath to eschew the company of women and devote themselves to study for three years. The charming princess of France arrives with her three vivacious ladies, Rosaline, Maria, and Katherine, on a diplomatic mission and, because of Ferdinand's vow, is housed in a pavilion outside the city gates. Despite their oath, the four gentlemen fall in love with the four ladies: Ferdinand with the princess, Biron with Rosaline, Longaville with Maria, and Dumain with Katherine. Discovering each other's perfidy, the gentlemen acknowledge love's power and decide to pursue the ladies, who gently mock them for their conceits. Learning that the king of France has died, the ladies are obliged to leave, but they assign various penances to the four suitors and promise to return to them in a year.

The play cannot be attributed to any early source, and the plot, which is based on current court life, is presumed to be of Shakespeare's invention. See Holofermes.

Loves of the Angels (1822). The stories of the love of three angels for mortal women, in verse, by Thomas Moore. The stories are founded on Eastern and rabbinical tales.

Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock, The (1915). A poem by T. S. Eliot. Said to have been written when Eliot was still an undergraduate at Harvard, it was first published in Poetry magazine after he had settled in England. Through the person of the poem's narrator, J. Alfred Prufrock, Eliot explores a kind of death in life and suggests the spiritual decay of his society. Prufrock, a middle-aged man of anonymous respectability, differs from those around him only in his greater degree of self-awareness and suffering. Conscious of the sterility of his world, he longs to make some significant gesture, but lacking the necessary will and passion, puts the matter off in introspection. The poem ends on a note of hopelessness. Completely paralyzed by social habit and a sense of his own futility, Prufrock will never escape and is finally identified with his surroundings.

Love, the Doctor. See Amour Médecin, L.'

Loving (1945). A novel by Henry Green. Set in an Irish castle during World War II, it is a picture of the lives of the owners and their many servants. On this level, the book is a light, witty social comedy. Each of the characters loves some person or idea, and the different kinds of love are revealed by an ironic juxtaposition of scenes. The central characters are Raunce, the butler, and Edith, a maid, both of whom grow mature as their love develops. This love is emphasized by various recurrent symbols, like an imaginary cave of fairy gold. The gold is later replaced by a valuable ring whose loss and recovery is a focal point of the plot and a touchstone for the attitudes of the various characters.

Lowell, Amy [Lawrence] (1874–1925). American poet, critic, and biographer. A member of an old and distinguished New England family, Amy Lowell became a serious student of poetic forms. She is known for her association with and leadership in the imagist movement, in accordance with which she wrote numerous poems in free verse and "polyphonic prose." Her first book was A Dome of Many-Coloured Glass (1912). A year after its publication she met Ezra Pound and others in the imagist movement in England and subsequently became the leader of the movement in this country. Although Pound complained that she converted IMAGISM into "Amygism" she did much to sponsor imagist poets and edited a number of imagist anthologies. Celebrated as a personality as well as an artist, she was eccentric in behavior, keeping a large troupe of dogs, smoking large black cigars, and using language of extreme frankness. One of her best single poems is Liacis (1925); several others are familiar to readers of anthologies, notably Patterns. Among her books of POETRY are Sword-Blades and Poppy Seed, Men, Women, and Ghosts (1916), Can Grande’s Castle (1918), and What’s O’Clock (1925). Among her critical works are Six French Poets (1915), A Critical Fable, and a two-volume biography of Keats (1925). Her Complete Poetical Works (1955) were edited by Louis Untermeyer.

Lowell, James Russell (1819–1891). American poet, editor, critic, and diplomat. Although he was born into a distinguished Brahmin New England family, Lowell favored democratic ideas, attacked slavery, and was an early admirer of Lincoln. Trained for the law, he turned instead to journalism; he contributed to The Dial, and founded a short-lived magazine, The Pioneer.

In 1844, Lowell married Maria White, poet and firm abolitionist. Four years later, he published The Biglow Papers, First Series, which brought him to the notice of the literary world. The dialogue between Hosea Biglow, the Yankee farmer, and his friends was especially important for its use of authentic New England dialect. The interest in language was to remain with Lowell throughout his career. In the same year, his long poem, The Vision of SirLaunfal, was published; long a favorite among schoolchildren, it is far from his most significant work. Lowell’s satirical, often accurate, always amusing A Fable for Critics was also published during this important literary year.

His reputation established, Lowell became a leader of what is now called the popular, conservative school of American letters. After travel abroad, he succeeded Longfellow to the chair of modern languages at Harvard, and in 1857 was appointed as the first editor of The Atlantic Monthly. In 1861, he became co-editor with Charles Eliot Norton of the North American Review.

Lowell’s active public life included the positions of minister to Spain and to England; in both countries he was an able spokesman for democracy. See Conmemoration Ode.

Lowell, Robert [Traill Spence], Jr. (1917– ). American poet. One of the Lowell family of Boston, he is considered a leading poet of his generation. Many of his poems are set in New England, and several of them deal with his ancestors. His conversion to Catholicism in 1940 is reflected in many of the poems in his first collection, Land of Unlikeness (1944). A number of poems in this private ritual book were included in Lord Weary’s Castle (1946), for which he was awarded the Pulitzer Prize. His poetry is complex and intense, occasionally ironic, and is marked by a strong sense of rhythm. The Mille of the Kavanaughs, of which the title poem is a dramatic narrative set in Maine, appeared in 1951. Life Studies (1959) is a short autobiographical piece in prose and verse.

Lower Depths, The (Na dce; 1902). A drama by Maksim Gorki. The best known of Gorki’s works, it is set among the derelicts of a sleazy flophouse. The theme of the play is the problem of whether to live without illusions and on one’s own strength or to shield oneself from the pain of life by accepting a romanticized view of things. These choices are supported by the thief Satin and the wandering pilgrim Luka. A highly similar theme was used by U.S. playwright Eugene O’Neill in his drama, The Iceman Cometh.

Lowes, John Livingston (1887–1945). American teacher and scholar. Lowes taught at several universities before he joined the Harvard faculty (1918–1939). Among his works are Convection and Revolt in Poetry (1919), an account of action and reaction in the history of poetry; The Road to Xanadu (1927), an examination of the sources of Coleridge’s Kubla Khan and The Ancient Mariner; two books on Chaucer; and two collections of essays, Of Reading Books and Other Essays (1930) and Essays in Appreciation (1936).

Low Heels and High Heels. Two great political factions in the Lilliput of Jonathan Swift’s Gulliver’s Travels who are also called the Tramecksan and Slamecksan. The High Heels are the Tories, and the Low Heels are the Radicals. The king is a Tramecksan, the heir-apparent a Slamecksan.

Lowndes, Mrs. Bellloc. Pen name of Marie Adelaide Lowndes, born Bellloc (1868–1947). English novelist. The sister of Hilaire Bellloc, she wrote historical and mystery novels, including The Lodger (1913), a murder story based on the legend of Jack the Ripper.

Lowry, Malcolm (1909–1957). English novelist and traveler. He wrote Ultramarine (1933), a sea story in experimental, impressionistic style; Under the Volcano, a psychological, symbolical novel about Europeans living in Mexico; *Hear Us O Lord from Heaven Thy Dwelling Place (1961), a collection of novellas and short stories; and Selected Poems (1962).

Loyola, St. Ignatius of (1491–1556). The founder of the Society of Jesus (the order of Jesuits). He is depicted in art with the sacred monogram I.H.S. on his breast, or as contemplating it, surrounded by glory in the skies, in allusion to his claim that he had a miraculous knowledge of the mystery of the Trinity vouchsafed to him. He was a son of the Spanish ducal house of Loyola, and after being severely wounded at the siege of Pampeluna (Pamplona) (1521) he left the army and dedicated himself to the service of the Virgin. His Order of the Society of Jesus, which he projected in 1534, was confirmed by Paul III in 1540. His Spiritual Exercises (Exercitii; 1548), a manual of devotions and prayer, is considered a remarkable treatise on applied psychology as an inducement to mystic vision.

Lucan. Full Latin name, Marcus Annaeus Lucanus (A.D. 39–65). Roman poet and prose writer. He wrote the Pharsalia, an epic in 10 books on the civil war between Caesar and Pompey. No other work of his is extant. He was, like Brutus and Cassius before him, an aristocrat and a rebel; like them, he regretted the lost republic and hated the regime of the Caesars. He joined Piso's conspiracy against Nero, was denounced and, like Seneca, was ordered to commit suicide. He was only 25 when he took his own life.

Lucan enjoyed a great vogue during the Middle Ages, but of late has been more criticized than praised for his exaggerated treatment of the war between Caesar and Pompey.

Lucas, Edward V[errall] (1868–1938). English novelist, poet, essayist, and man of letters. He wrote numerous essays in the manner of Charles Lamb, on whose work he became an authority. Among his collected essays is Adventures and Misgivings (1938). He was also a prolific writer of novels, such as Over Bemerton's (1908) and The Barker's Clock (1931); travel books, such as A Wanderer in London (1906) and French Leaves (1931); biographies, such as The Life of Charles Lamb (1905); poetry; and art criticism.

Lucas, Frank Laurence (1894– ). English writer and literary critic. He is the author of such works as Decline and Fall of the Romantic Ideal (1936) and The Greatest Problem and Other Essays (1960).

Luce, Clare Boothe (1903– ). American playwright and wife of Henry Luce, the publisher. Although she has written a novel, Stuffed Shirts (1931), under the name of Clare Boothe Brokaw, her literary reputation rests on her plays. Among them are The Women (1937), an anti-feminine play set on Park Ave.; Kiss the Boys Good-bye (1938), a satire set in Hollywood; and Margin for Error (1939), an anti-Nazi mystery melodrama. She also wrote Europe in the Spring (1940), observations on her travel abroad at the time of Germany's invasion of France and the Low Countries.

Mrs. Luce became more and more interested in politics and served two terms in Congress (1943–1947). She later became U.S. ambassador to Italy (1953–1956).

Luce, Henry Robinson (1898– ). American editor and publisher. With Briton Hadden, Luce founded Time, the weekly news magazine, in 1923. Fortune, a monthly for businessmen, followed in 1930, and Life, the weekly picture magazine, appeared in 1936. Luce, who is married to author and diplomat Clare Boothe Luce, also publishes Sports Illustrated, Architectural Forum, and House and Home.

Lucentio. In Shakespeare's Taming of the Shrew, a young man who comes to Padua to "deck his fortune with his virtuous deeds." He is immediately smitten with Bianca and resorts to a number of tricks in order to win her hand.

Lucia di Lammermoor (1835). An opera by Gaetano Donizetti. It is based on Sir Walter Scott's Bride of Lammermoor. In the opera Lucy Ashton is Lucia, Arthur Bucklaw is Arturo, and Edgar of Ravenswood is Edgardo. Bucklaw does not recover from the wound given him by his bride, as he does in the novel, and Edgardo, instead of being swallowed up in the quicksands, kills himself. The opera contains a celebrated "Mad Scene" for Lucia, and a popular "Sextet."

Lucian. The chief character in The Golden Ass of Apuleius. His behavior when changed into an ass, which he remains throughout most of the book, satirizes the follies and vices of the age.

Lucian (Loukianos, c. 120–200). A Greek satirist. He was the most brilliant wit of Greek letters under the Roman empire. A free-thinker, he was often referred to in his own time as the blasphemer and later compared with Swift and Voltaire. He wrote rhetorical, critical, and biographical works, romances, dialogues, poems, and other works. His Voracious History, a mock narrative of travel, is the archetype of such books as Swift's Gulliver's Travels. His Dialogue of the Dead have been called brilliant satires of the living. He is regarded as the inventor of the satirical dialogue. His novel, Lucius, or The Ass may have been based on a work by Lucius of Patrae that also served as a model for Apuleius' The Golden Ass.

Luciana. The meek and gentle sister of the shrewish Adriana in Shakespeare's Comedy of Errors. She is wooed by Antipholus of Syracuse.

Lucifer. The morning star. The Hebrew name for it was figuratively applied by Isaiah to Nebuchadnezzar, the proud but ruined king of Babylon; "Take up this proverb against the King of Babylon, and say... How art thou fallen, from heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning!" (Isa. 14:4,12). It was later claimed that Satan, before he was driven from heaven for his pride, was called Lucifer. In Marlowe's Doctor Faustus and Dante's Inferno Lucifer is the ruler of hell. In Milton's Paradise Lost, Lucifer is called Satan after his fall.

Lucifer, Lawrence. The narrator in Lawrence Durrell's novel The Black Book.

Lucifera, Queen. See Faerie Queene, The.

Lucile (1860). A narrative poem by Owen Meredith. The heroine is beloved by two bitter rivals, an English lord and a French duke. She loves the former, but misunderstandings keep them apart. Many years later the lord's son and the duke's niece fall in love, are separated by the old rivalry, but are reunited through the efforts of Lucile, who has become a nursing nun.

Lucilius. In Shakespeare's Julius Caesar, a friend of Cassius and Brutus. Captured by the enemy at Philippi, he pretends to be Brutus, but Antony, recognizing him, asks that he be treated with kindness for he would like to count such a man among his friends.

Lucilie. In Roman mythology, a goddess of childbirth. She was sometimes identified with Juno.

Lucinde. (1) The heroine of Molière's comedy L'Amour Médicin. She is the daughter of Sganarelle. As she has lost her spirit and appetite, her father sends for four physicians, who all differ as to the nature of the malady and the remedy to be applied. Lisette, her waiting woman, sends in the meantime for Clitandre, the lover of Lucinde, who comes disguised as a doctor. He tells Sganarelle that the disease of the young lady must be reached through the imagination and prescribes a mock marriage. As his assistant is in reality a notary, the marriage turns out to be a real one, and Lucinde, who has been pining because her disapproved of her beloved, is cured.

(2) The heroine of Molière's Le Médicin malgré lui. Géronte, her father, wants her to marry Horace, but as she is in love with Léandre she pretends to have lost the power of articulate speech, to avoid a marriage which she abhors. Sganarelle, the woodcutter, is introduced as a doctor specializing in dumb cases, and soon he sees the state of affairs. He takes with him Léandre as an apothecary; the young lady receives a perfect cure, an elopement.

Lucius Apuleius. See Apuleius, Lucius.

Lud's Town. London, so called from King Lud.
Ludendorff, Erich (1865–1937). Quartermaster-General in the German High Command (1916–1918). He was more powerful than either Hindenburg or Kaiser Wilhelm II during the last years of World War I. Acknowledging German defeat, he ordered the formation of a constitutional government to negotiate with the Allies. Later, he supported Hitler, then deserted him. See Beer-Hall Putsch.

Ludwig, Otto (1813–1865). German novelist and playwright who popularized the term poetic realism as a description of the realistic trend in German literature of his time. His own works, realistic in style, include the novel Zwischen Himmel und Erde (Between Heavens and Earth, 1856), about the tragic conflict of two brothers both in love with the same woman; Der Erbörster (The Forester, 1850), a domestic tragedy; and Die Makkabäer (1854), a play in verse about the revolt of the Maccabees.

Luftscape (Ger., “air weapon”). The air force of Nazi Germany, organized by Hermann Göring.

Lug. In the Gaelic mythological cycle, a hero of the people called the Tuatha Dé Danann. Later, he becomes an important god for the Sons of Mil, who are said to be the first Celts in Ireland. See Balor.

Lugnasad. August 1, one of the 4 great feast days of the ancient Celtic year. See Samain; Beltine; Imbolc.

Lugné-Poë, Aurélien-François (1869–1940). Actor and producer. An actor at the Théâtre d’Art of Paul Fort, he later became director of the theater (1893) and called it Théâtre de l’Oeuvre. Lugné-Poë encouraged new dramatic talent: Cremelmyck, Sarment, Salacrou, and Marcel Archard were first played in his theater. The avant-garde Théâtre de l’Oeuvre, begun as a symbolist theater, sought to return poetry and an atmosphere of mystery to the French stage.

Lugones, Leopoldo (1874–1938). Argentine poet. The outstanding exponent of modernism in Argentina, Lugones was a close friend of Rubén Darío, whom he resembled in verbal virtuosity and ingenuity. In his first books of poetry—Las montañas de oro (1897), Los crepúsculos del jardín (1905), and Lunario sentimental (1909)—he revealed a penchant for startling but beautiful imagery and rhythmical experimentation. His return to poetic orthodoxy was signaled by his Odas seculares (1910), written to commemorate the centenary of Argentine independence. In this and later works, including Romancero (1924) and Poemas solaregos (1928), he expressed his ardent love of country in a style that became progressively less personal and more realistic. His prose writings include La guerra guacha (1905), poetic accounts of episodes in Argentina’s war for independence, and Las fuerzas extrañas (1906), fantastic short stories.

Luhan, Mabel Dodge (1879–1962). American patroness of the arts and memoirist. Famous for her salons in Italy and New York in the early 20th century, she cultivated close associations with Max Eastman, D. H. Lawrence, John Reed, Gertrude Stein, and Carl Van Vechten. She told of their lives and hers in a four-volume autobiography, Intimate Memories (1933–1937). She had three husbands before she married a Pueblo Indian and settled down in Taos, N.M., where she was a vital force behind the art colony there. She also wrote Lorenzo in Taos (1932) about her relationship with Lawrence.

Lu Hsun (1881–1936) Pseudonym of Chou Shu-jen. Chinese short-story writer, essayist, and educator. A leader in the movement to overthrow the Ch’ing government and an ardent reformer, he is idolized by the communists. Many of his stories have been translated into English by Chi-chen Wang, in Ah Q and others (1941).

Luke, The Gospel According to St. The 3rd book of the New Testament. One of the Synoptic Gospels, it was the third account of the life of Jesus to be written, the author using Mark and Matthew as sources, as well as other documents now lost. It has high literary merit and a strong humanitarian appeal. The author is almost certainly the Greek physician who was a traveling companion of Paul and the author of The Acts of the Apostles.

Lully, Jean Baptiste or Giovanni Battista Lulli (1632–1687). Florentine-born French composer. Known as the originator of French opera, he was appointed court superintendent of music by Louis XIV in 1653, and received his French naturalization patent in 1661. Out of the music that he composed for court entertainments, notably the ballets of Benserade and the comédie-ballets of Molière, he developed French opera with its characteristic accompanied recitatives, dramatic scoring, and balletic interludes. In 1672, Lully founded the Académie Royale de Musique, which later became the Paris Opéra, and for which he composed 20 or more operas and ballets to librettos by Quinault. Reflecting the fashion of the day in their choice of classical subjects (Alceste, 1674; Proserpine, 1880), these works held the stage for almost a century.

Lunsford, Sir Thomas (c. 1610–c. 1653). English jailer and long-time governor of the Tower of London. He was noted for his vindictive temper. Samuel Butler mentions him in Hudibras.

Luntz, Lev NatanoWich (1901–1924). Russian playwright and critic. An active member of the Serum Brothers, Luntz was especially insistent on Russian writers looking to the West for their methods, particularly for ways of handling plot. He advised Russian writers to pay attention to such authors as Conan Doyle and Rider Haggard. Besides his work publicizing the viewpoint of the Serum Brothers, Luntz also wrote four plays: The Outlaw (Vne zakon; 1921), The Apes Are Coming (Obezymy idut; 1921), Bertrand de Born (1922), and The City of Truth (Gorod pravdy; 1923–1924).

Luny-Fü. See Amlawig.

Lupercalia. In ancient Rome, an annual festival, held on February 15, probably in honor of Faunus, worshipped under the name of Lupercal. The worshippers gathered at a grotto on the Palatine where Romulus and Remus were supposed to have been suckled by the wolf (lupus). It was a festival of expiation and purification, and goats and a dog were sacrificed. The ceremony survived into Christian times; it was suppressed in A.D. 494. In Shakespeare’s Julius Caesar, it is during one of these festivals that Antony thrice offers Caesar the crown and Caesar refuses saying, “Jupiter alone is king of Rome.”

Lurcanio. The brother of Ariodante in a tale from the Orlando Furioso of Ariosto. He charges Ginevra, the heroine, with having caused the suicide of his brother, in despair over her alleged unfaithfulness. As a result, she is doomed until rescued by Rinaldo and the returned Ariodante, who had survived.

Luria (1846). A poetic drama, written in Elizabethan style, by Robert Browning. The titular hero, a noble Moor, leads the army of Florence to victory against the Pisans, but the Florentines distrust him and summon him to trial. Overwhelmed by their ingratitude, he ends his life with poison. The poem is based on a historical character of the 15th century.

Lurlei. See Lorelei.

Lusiadas, Os (The Lusiads, 1572). An epic poem by Luís de Camões. It relates the illustrous actions of the Lusians, or Portuguese, of all ages, but deals principally with the exploits of Vasco da Gama and his comrades in their “discovery of India.” Gama sailed three times to India. It is the first of these voyages (1497) which is the theme of the epic, but its wealth of episode, the constant introduction of mythological “machinery,” and the intervention of Bacchus, Venus, and other deities make it far more than the mere chronicle of a voyage. Bacchus is the guardian power of the Muslims, and Venus, or Divine Love, of the Lusians. The fleet first sails to Mozambique, then to Quiloa, then to Melinda in Africa, where the adventurers are hospitably received and provided with a pilot to conduct them to India. In the Indian Ocean, Bacchus tries to destroy the fleet, but the “silver star of Divine Love” calms the sea, and Gama arrives in India safely.

Lusitania. (1) The ancient name for Portugal
 (2) A British transatlantic liner torpedoed without warning by a German submarine off the coast of Ireland on May 7, 1915. She sank in 18 minutes with a loss of 1198 lives, including 124 Americans. Indignation over this act contributed to U.S. entry into World War I.

Lustra (1916). A collection of poems by Ezra Pound. The title, from the Latin, refers to the offerings made by Roman censors “for the sins of the whole people.” Pound also issued a collection called Lustra of Ezra Pound (1917), an extension of the earlier volume, containing Near Perigord.

Lutetia (from Lat. lutum, mud). The ancient name of Paris, which, in Roman times, was merely a collection of mud hovels. Caesar called it Lutetia Parisorum (the mud town of the Parisi), from which comes the present name Paris.

Luther, Martin (1483–1546). German religious reformer. He was an Augustinian monk and the professor of biblical exegesis at Wittenberg where, in 1517, he posted his critique of the Roman Catholic Church’s practices, the Ninety-Five Theses which are usually regarded as the original document of the Reformation. From then on, he was the center of a violent religious upheaval in Germany where—among the humanists, for example—there had already been a great deal of feeling against Rome. The most important of Luther’s later contributions to the controversy were his pamphlets An den Christlichen Adel deutscher Nation (Address to the Christian Nobility of the German Nation, 1520) and Von der Freiheit eines Christenmenschen (On Christian Liberty, 1520).
 His principal contention was that man is justified by faith alone, and not by works. On the basis of this idea of a personal faith, he favored the abolition of many church rituals and challenged the supreme authority of the pope. He was excommunicated in 1520 and appeared before the Diet of Worms in 1521, where he took a firm stand upon his views and was put under the ban of the Holy Roman Empire. The elector of Saxony, however, undertook to protect him; and in a safe retreat, Luther began his translation of the Bible into German (New Testament, 1522; Old Testament, 1534). His other works include the Send-brief von Dolmetschen (Letter on Translation, 1530), defending his rendering of the Bible, and 40 Kirchenlieder (Church-Songs, 1524), among which is the famous hymn Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott (A mighty fortress is our God). His Tischreden (Table Talk) is a valuable source of detail about his personality and beliefs. See Philipp Melanchthon; Ulrich von Hutten; Thomas Murner.

Lutrin, Le (The Lectern, cantos 1-4, 1674; cantos
 5-6, 1683). A mock-heroic poem by Nicolas Boileau,
It satirizes a dispute between the treasurer and the choirmaster of the Sainte-Chapelle over the positioning of a choir lectern. The treasurer triumphs, but the poem ends with a reconciliation. Boileau not only lampoons clerical pomposity and pettiness with merciless irony, but manages, by contriving a battle in a bookshop, to comment satirically upon the literary feud between the ancients and the moderns. (See Querelle des Anciens et des Modernes.)

Luxemburg, Rosa (1870–1919). German socialist. She was killed with Karl Liebknecht by the provisional government, because of her leading position in the Spartacist Party revolt of 1919.

Luzán Claramunt de Suelves y Gurrea, Ignacio de (1702–1754). Spanish scholar and critic. A bilingual academician, he is known for his championship of the neoclassic cause in Spanish literature. His ideas are contained in the treatise Poética, o reglas de la poesía en general y de sus principales especies (1737), which advocated a didactic poetry and adherence to the three unities in the drama. He also gained fame as a result of his Latin compendium of Descartes' ideas.

Lycaon (Lykaon). In classical mythology, a king of Arcadia. Desirous of testing the divine knowledge of Zeus, he served human flesh on his table, for which the god changed him into a wolf. His daughter, Callisto, was changed into the constellation Bear, whence this is sometimes called Lycaonis Arctos.

Lyceum (Lykeion). A grove and gymnasium on the banks of the Ilissus, in Attica. Aristotle taught philosophy there as he paced the walks. The name is sometimes used to stand for Aristotle's philosophic school.

Lycidas (1637). An elegiac poem by John Milton, commemorating the death of Edward King (1612–1637), a Cambridge schoolmate who was drowned in the Irish Sea. The title is taken from the name of a shepherd in Vergil's third Bucolic. One of the most famous English elegies, Lycidas is not only concerned with King's untimely death, but attempts to deal with a world in which the good die young and false priests and poets prevail. Milton's solution is partly that of the Christian—ultimately God's justice will win out on earth; meanwhile virtue is rewarded in heaven—and partly that of the dedicated humanist poet—true genius is interconnected and immortal and enjoys a special relationship to, and survival in, the powers and beauties of the natural world. Lycidas has the strength and majesty of Milton's mature poetry and is consciously a poem of self-redemption and dedication to great work ahead.

Lycurgus (Lykourgos). A legendary legislator of Sparta. He is referred to by Herodotus and Xenophon, but nothing certain is known about him. His reforms are dated, as a result of archaeological evidence, at 600 B.C. Lycurgus is credited with transforming the Spartans from an art- and luxury-loving people into the stern and disciplined state-directed citizens of the sixth century.

Lycus (Lykos). See Amphion.

Lydgate, Dr. See Middlemarch.

Lydgate, John (c. 1350–c. 1451). English poet and priest. Lydgate studied in both English and European universities, and was ordained as a priest in 1397. He was a close friend of the son of Chaucer, and knew the elder poet, whose influence is obvious in much of Lydgate's work. An amazingly versatile and prolific writer, he is one of the few poets of merit in the 150-year period between the death of Chaucer and the beginnings of the Elizabethan period. However, though his work was esteemed only less than that of Chaucer during the 16th century, his prolixity and medieval attitudes make him little read today. Among his numerous works are two allegorical poems, the Complaint of the Black Night and The Temple of Glass; the Troy Book (1412–20), based on the Historia Troiana of Guido delle Colonne; The Story of Thebes (1420–22); The Pilgrimage of Man (c. 1424), a translation of a work by Guillaume de Deguileville; and the Falls of Princes (1430–38), based on a French prose version of Boccaccio's De Casibus Virorum Iliustrium.

Lylj, John (15547–1606). English prose writer, poet, and dramatist. Lylj gained a reputation as a wit at Oxford, and took M.A. degrees both at Oxford and Cambridge. He went to London, where he became one of the University Wits, and tried to gain a place at court. Though associated with the court for a number of years, he never gained the position of Master of Revels for which he had hoped. He came under the patronage of Edward Vere, earl of Oxford, and wrote the first part of his most famous work, Euphues; the Anatomy of Wit (1579), for which he was immediately acclaimed. The following year he published the second part of this work, called Euphues and his England. The balanced, elegant, and highly artificial style of these pieces was very possibly Lyly's own invention. It was widely imitated for many years, notably by Robert Greene and Thomas Lodge, and has come to be known as Euphuism (see Euphues).

Lyly succeeded in becoming the vice-master of the acting company of the Children of St. Paul's, for whom he wrote plays to be presented at court. Of the eight plays he wrote for the Children the best known are Alexander and Campaspe (1584; reissued as Campaspe, 1591); Endimion (1591); and Midas (1592). He took his plots from Greek and Roman classic literature and transformed them into charming, ornate allegories of court flirtations and intrigues and the political affairs of the time, and refined and intellectualized comedy from its former and cruder state. All but one of his plays (The Woman of the Moon, 1597) were written in Euphuistic prose.

Lyly was involved on the side of the bishops in the Marprelate controversy, although only one pamphlet thought to be his has survived. Called Papp with an Hatchet (1589), it was answered by Gabriel Harvey in Advertisement for Papp-Hatchet and Martin Marprelate, which was appended to his Pierce's Supererogation.

Lynceus (Lynkeus). One of the Argonauts and brother of Idas. He was so sharp-sighted that he could see through the earth, and distinguished objects nine miles off. He and his brother were killed in a fight with their fellow Argonauts, Castor and Polydeuces.

Lynch, Benito (1885–1951). Argentine novelist. Lynch is best known for his depiction of the Argentinian gaucho and for the homely fidelity with which he described rural life in Argentina. (See gauch o literature.) His books include Los caranchos de La Florida (1916), which relates the conflict between the domineering master of La Florida ranch and his impetuous son; El inglés de los gaucho (1924), a love story of an English scientist and a gaucho girl; and El romance de un gaucho (1930), which is written entirely in gaucho idiom.

Lynd, Robert (1879–1949). Anglo-Irish essayist and journalist. He wrote essays in the manner of Charles Lamb; among his collections are Books and Authors (1922) and In Defence of Fink (1939). His wife, Sylvia Lynd (1888–1952), was a poet and novelist.

Lyndonnesse. A legendary land in medieval romance. It was located near Land's End, off the coast of England; at present, it is submerged "full forty fathoms under water." King Arthur came from this mythical country, and the battle of Lyndonnesse was the final conflict between Arthur and Sir Mordred.

Lyons, Eugene (1898– ). Russian-born American journalist. At one time warmly sympathetic to Soviet Russia, Lyons became disillusioned and vigorously attacked the regime in articles and books, including The Red Decade (1941). He was editor of American Mercury (1939–1944) before becoming a senior editor for Reader's Digest.

Lyre. See Greek music.

Lyrical Ballads (1798). A volume of poems by Samuel Taylor Coleridge and William Wordsworth; a second edition was published in 1800, and a third in 1802. It was the first important publication of the poetry of the romantic period in English literature, and is considered one of the landmarks of literature. Wordsworth's contributions were his poems of country scenes and people, written in plain language and style, and his Tintern Abbey. Coleridge's principal contribution was The Rime of the Ancient Mariner. The second edition of Lyrical Ballads contains a preface by Wordsworth explaining his theory that poetry should be drawn from the everyday life and speech of men; this preface came to be considered the manifesto of English romanticism.

Lysander. In Shakespeare's Midsummer Night's Dream, a young Athenian in love with Hermia. He escapes with her into the woods in order to prevent her marriage to Demetrius.

Lysandros (Lysander) (died 395 B.C.), Spartan naval and military commander. He defeated the Athenians at Aegospotami in 405 B.C., thus ending the Peloponnesian War.

Lysistrata (c. 415 B.C.). The title and heroine of a comedy by Aristophanes. It deals with an effective women's peace organization. In the 21st year of the Peloponnesian War, Lysistrata persuades the wives of Athens and Sparta to shut themselves up away from their husbands until peace shall be concluded. She has the satisfaction of dictating the terms.

Lytton, George. Baron Lyttleton (1709–1775). English author and statesman who was in the forefront of the opposition to Sir Robert Walpole. His works include Letters from a Persian in England (1735), an imitation of Montesquieu's Lettres Persanes; and Dialogues of the Dead (1760).

Lytton, Edward George Earle Lytton Bulwer. See Edward George Earle Lytton Bulwer-Lytton.

Lytton, Edward Robert Lytton Bulwer. See Owen Meredith.
Maarten, Maarten. Pen name of Joost Marius William van der Poorten-Schwartz (1858-1915). A Dutch author. He wrote almost exclusively in English. Although he wrote novels and stories chiefly of his native Holland, he was more admired elsewhere. His writings had an almost austere moral tone, although he was not an admirer of any organized religion.

Maat. Egyptian goddess of truth, justice, law, and the daughter of Ra and wife of Thoth. On Osiris' scales of justice, she placed her symbol, an ostrich plume, opposite the scale holding a human heart.

Mab or Queen Mab (perhaps from the Welsh "mab," a baby). In 15th-century English and Welsh legend, the queen of the fairies, an honor later given to Titania. She is described in Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet as the "fairies' midwife"—i.e., she is employed by the fairies as midwife to deliver man's brain of dreams. Excellent descriptions of Mab are given by Shakespeare (Romeo and Juliet, Act 1, scene 4), by Ben Jonson, by Herrick, and by Drayton in Nymphidia (1627).

Mabinogion. The. A collection of medieval Welsh tales first translated into English (1838-1849) by Lady Charlotte Guest. The tales, 11 in all, were preserved in two Welsh sources: The White Book of Rhydderch (written about 1300-1325), and The Red Book of Hergest (1375-1425). Though the tales were, for the most part, not committed to writing until the 14th century, internal evidence indicates that they originated far earlier. Kulhwech and Olwen, for example, is at least 11th century, and reflects in language and custom an even more ancient time.

These 11 prose tales fall into three divisions. The first, called "The Four Branches of The Mabinogi," includes Puwyll, Branwen, Manawyddan, and Math. The second, called "Independent Native Tales," includes The Dream of Macion Wledig, Lludd and Llefelys, The Dream of Rhonabwy, and Kulhwech and Olwen, the last being the earliest Arthurian tale in Welsh. The third grouping consists of three comparatively late Arthurian romances: The Lady of the Fountain; Peredur, Son of Efraug, an early Pericval story; and Geraint Son of Ersin.

Most of the stories are concerned with Celtic mythological subjects and filled with folk themes. Archaisms in custom and language reflect an ancient time when such tales were not written down, but were memorized and transmitted orally from generation to generation.

The title word, Mabinogion, is a modern term appended to the collection by Lady Charlotte Guest. See ARTHURIAN LEGEND.

Macaire, Richard de. The name of the mur-of the U.S. forces in the Far East in 1941. After the Japanese attack on the Philippines, he was forced to abandon Manila and retreat to Bataan Peninsula. In 1942 he was evacuated to Australia and named commander-in-chief of the Allied forces in the southwest Pacific. In 1945, MacArthur, now a five-star general, was given command of all U.S. army forces in the Pacific; he accepted the formal Japanese surrender on the U.S.S. Missouri and directed the Allied occupation of Japan. Named commander of the UN troops in Korea in 1950, he was removed by President Truman in 1951 because of his public statements urging that stronger military action be taken against Communist China. He returned to a hero's welcome in the U.S. and made a memorable address to a joint session of Congress (April 19, 1951), in which he said, "Old soldiers never die; they just fade away."

Macaulay, Dame Rose (1889-1958). English novelist. Her early novels were notable for their wit, urbanity, and mild satire. The best known were Potterism, Told by an Idiot (1923), Crewe Train (1926), and Staying with Relations (1930). They Were Defeated (1932, U.S. title The Shadow Flies) is an excellent historical novel about Robert Herrick and 17th-century intellectual life. Her post-World War II novels are marked by irony and tenderness; The World My Wilderness (1950) is about a wild young girl in conflict with civilization, and The Towers of Trebizond (1956) describes a religious and historical pilgrimage in the Middle East.

Macaulay, Thomas Babington (1800-1859). English statesman, poet, historian, essayist, and biographer. He is best known for his History of England from theAccession of James the Second (1848, 1855, 1861), a work extremely popular in his day, marked by a colorful style and vivid presentation. His Lives of Ancient Rome, narrative poems dealing with Roman heroes, were also popular. In addition he wrote a number of well-known historical and biographical essays under the guise of book reviews for the Edinburgh Review and a series of biographies of literary figures for the Encyclopaedia Britannica. Macaulay was a staunch Whig and an advocate of moderate reforms. He served in the House of Commons, was a member of the Supreme Council of India, and Secretary of War. In 1857 he was made Baron Macaulay of Rothley. Macaulay's prose style, much admired in its day, is somewhat pontifical and monotonous; similar qualities vitiate his poems. Much of his prose writing, however, in spite of stylistic faults, instances of insensitivity, prejudice, and exaggeration, remains interesting in itself and as an expression of Victorian tastes and standards. His essays are collected in Critical and Historical Essays (1843).

Macbeth (c. 1606). A tragedy by William Shakespeare. Shakespeare's shortest play, Macbeth has been described as a study in fear. It is thought that the play may have been written as a tribute to James I because of its emphasis on the supernatural, a subject in which he was interested, and its flatteringly portrayal of the origins of the Stuart line, to which he belonged.

Two victorious generals, Macbeth and Banquo, are accosted on a deserted heath by three mysterious witches, who prophetically hail Macbeth as thane of Glamis, thane of Cawdor, and future king of Scotland and then tell Banquo that his sons will sit upon the throne. Macbeth is already thane of Glamis, and when he learns that the title of the traitorous thane of Cawdor is to be bestowed upon him, his ambition to be king is kindled. When his wife, Lady Macbeth, hears of the prophecy, she urges Macbeth to kill King Duncan and caustically reproaches him for his scruples. Macbeth reluctantly acquiesces, murders Duncan, and is proclaimed king. Fearing the second part of the witches' prophecy, Macbeth engages two assassins to murder Banquo and his son Fleance, but Fleance escapes them. When Macbeth learns that the Scottish thane MacCuff has joined Duncan's son Malcolm, who is raising an army in England to proceed against him, he orders the death of Lady Macduff and her children. Lady Macbeth, driven mad by her conscience, finally commits suicide, and Macbeth is slain by Macduff, who has returned to Scotland with the English forces. Malcolm is then proclaimed king.

The direct source of the play is Holinshed's Chronicles (1577). It records the career of a real Macbeth (died c. 1058), who was killed Duncan of Scotland in 1040, seized the throne, and was overthrown by Malcolm, Duncan's son, 17 years later.

The sleep-walking scene in Act V, in which Lady Macbeth, tormented by the memory of her victims, tries to wash imaginary bloodstains from her hands, is one of the most famous in Shakespeare.

Maccabees. The family of Jewish heroes, descended from Mattathias the Hasmonaean and his five sons: John, Simon, Judas, Eleazar, and Jonathan. They delivered the race from the persecutions of the Syrian king Antiochus Epiphanes (175-164 B.C.) and established a line of priest-kings, which lasted until Herod's reign in 40 B.C. Their exploits are told in I and II Maccabees, the last two books of the Apocrypha. See Judas Maccabaeus.

MacCarthy, Sir Desmond (1878-1952). English literary and dramatic critic and journalist. He is the author of Portraits (1931), Drama (1940), and other books.

McCarthy, Joseph R[aymond] (1908-1957). American politician. McCarthy was elected to the U.S. Senate from Wisconsin in 1946. As chairman of the Senate Permanent Investigating Subcommittee, he conducted an investigation of communism in the government that aroused great controversy because of McCarthy's sensationalistic and irresponsible methods. After a series of hearings (1953-1954) on alleged subversion in the U.S. army, McCarthy was formally censured by the Senate.

McCarthy, Mary (1912- ). American novelist, short-story writer, and critic. Her scathing satires of American literary life acquire a particular effectiveness from being thinly disguised romans à clef and from being couched in a prose style which has a classic fluidity and precision. Born in Seattle, Wash., Miss McCarthy and her brother, actor Kevin McCarthy, lost both of their parents in the influenza epidemic of 1918. As a result, she spent her childhood being passed around among relatives of vastly different backgrounds, an experience she recounts with chillingly detailed accuracy in Memories of a Catholic Girlhood (1957). After graduating from Vassar in 1933, she was engaged as a book reviewer for The Nation and The New Republic, which provided the experience for a group of loosely connected short stories published as The Company She Keeps (1942). In 1937 she became the drama reviewer for the Partisan Review and quickly established herself as the severest, as well as the wittiest, critic of the New York stage. Her theater pieces have been collected under the title Sights and Spectacles, 1937–1956 (1956). Members of the Partisan Review group figure prominently in two of her other novels, The Oasis (1949) and A Charmed Life (1955). She also drew upon her experience as a college teacher for her satirical The Grooves of Academe (1952). Her latest novel The Group (1963) brought her to the attention of a larger audience, which tended to solidify her position as America's foremost female author. A former wife of Edmund Wilson, she is the author of a collection of short stories, Cast a Cold Eye (1950), as well as Venice Observed (1956) and The Stones of Florence (1959), pictorial studies of the two cities, and On the Contrary (1961), a collection of articles on contemporary subjects.

McCaslin. A family in Go Down, Moses and other works by William Faulkner. Among the first families to settle in Yoknapatawpha County, the McCaslin evidence—more directly than any other Faulkner characters—the guilt of slaveholding, which continues to influence their lives after the Civil War. The founder of the family is [Lucius Quintus] Carothers McCaslin, father of Uncle Buck and Uncle Buddy (both white) and of Tomasina ("Tomey"), who is born a black slave. Incest is added to miscegenation when Carothers seduces Tomasina. Isaac ("Ike") McCaslin is the son of Uncle Buck and the last male McCaslin to bear the name. He is the principal character in the short-story The Bear. Unable to accept the family guilt, he refuses to inherit the family property which passes to Carothers McCaslin ("Cass") Edmonds, the great-grandson of the first McCaslin. Uncle Buck, who also appears in The Unvanquished, and Uncle Buddy do not believe in slavery and invent a system whereby their slaves can earn their freedom. Lucas Beauchamp, who also appears in * Intruder in the Dust*, is a part-Negro grandson of the first McCaslin; his friend and rival is his part-Negro cousin Isaac ("Zack") Edmonds, who temporarily steals Lucas' wife.

McCauley, Mary. Known as Molly Pitcher (1754–1832). American Revolutionary heroine. She earned the name of Molly Pitcher when she carried water to thirsty American soldiers during the battle of Monmouth (June 28, 1778). After her husband fell, she manned his cannon through the rest of the battle.

McClellan, George B[rinton] (1826–1885). American general. A West Point graduate who had become a railroad executive, McClellan was named commander of the Union forces in 1861. Although he had great organizing ability, his reluctance to take offensive action against the enemy exacted a heavy moral toll on President Lincoln, and he was relieved of one command after another until his retirement in 1863. In 1864 he was the unsuccessful Democratic candidate for president against Lincoln. There is still considerable controversy about McClellan; many historians have charged him with ineptitude and even with disloyalty, while others, notably J. G. Randall, have contended that he was the great Union general of the war. See ANTIETAM.

McClellan, S[amuel] S[idney] (1857–1949). Irish-born American editor. Having arrived in the U.S. in 1866, McClure studied at Knox College and later worked for the Century Magazine. In 1884 he created a revolution in publishing by starting the first newspaper syndicate, the purpose of which was to reprint in serial form material that had already been published.

In 1893 McClure founded McClure's Magazine, which became the most influential periodical in the country, particularly because of its muckraking articles. (See MUCKRANKERS.) In 1906, at its peak, McClure's partner, John S. Phillips, along with Ida M. Tarbell, Ray Stannard Baker, and Lincoln Steffens resigned because of differences with McClure. They founded the American Magazine, which continued the policies of McClure's and became equally influential. In 1914 McClure suspended his own magazine and later revived it briefly. It became part of the New Smart Set in 1929 and expired in 1933. McClure spent his last years in retirement. My Autobiography (1914) was ghost-written by Willa Cather. McClure appears twice in fiction. R. L. Stevenson, whom he helped to win an audience, presented him as Jim Pinkerton in The Wrecker (1892). Less friendly is the characterization of him as Fulkerson, an aggressive Westerner, in W. D. Howell's A Hazard of New Fortunes (1890). A biography, Success Story: The Life and Times of S. S. McClure, by Peter Lyon, appeared in 1963.

MacCool, Finn. See FIONN MAC CUMHAIL.

McCormack, John (1884–1945). Irish-born American lyric tenor. He sang opera roles and German lieder with immense refinement of style. In later years, he was famous for his concert programs of Irish songs.

McCormick, Anne O'Hare (1882–1954). American journalist. As foreign correspondent and columnist for the New York Times, she was the first woman to receive a Pulitzer Prize in journalism (1937). An eloquent and prescient writer, she predicted the rise of Mussolini well ahead of her colleagues. The World at Home (1956) is a selection of her writings.

McCrae, John (1872–1918). Canadian physician and poet. He wrote In Flanders Fields, an inspirational poem popular during World War I.

McCullers, Carson [Smith] (1917– ). American novelist and short-story writer. Recognized as one of the talented literary artists of her generation, Carson McCullers was born in Georgia and studied music in New York. Her first novel was The Heart Is a Lonely Hunter (1940), a parable on fascism told as the story of a deaf-mute in a small Southern town. Reflections in a Golden Eye (1941) deals with a violence at a peacetime army post in the South. With A Member of the Wedding, her reputation, already established in literary circles, became widespread. The Ballad of the Sad Café (1951) contains the title novelle, dramatized by Edward Albee in 1963, and a selection of short stories. It was followed by The Square Root of Wonderful, a play (1958), and Clock Without Hands, a novel (1961).

McCUTCHEON, George Barr (1866–1928). American newspaperman and novelist. Best known for his romance Graustark and two sequels, McCutcheon also wrote the very popular Brewher's Millions (1902), a farcical account of the results of unexpectedly inheriting a fortune.

McDiarmid, Hugh. Pen name of Christopher Murray Grieve (1892– ). Scottish poet, critic, and translator. He is a leading figure in the Scottish Renaissance. His poems are written in LALLANS, a synthetic Lowland Scots dialect. He is an ardent Marxist and Scottish Nationalist, and much of his poetry is concerned with social and political themes; many of his poems are satires. He writes of the conditions of the poor in his country, the state of society in his time, and the hope of a future under socialism. His published volumes of poetry include Sangscha (1925), Pennyweep (1926), First and Second Hymn to Lenin (1931, 1932), and A Kit of Whistles (1946). For a collection of his poetry published in 1961 McDiarmid drew upon his 12 published volumes of poetry as well as previously uncollected poems. Lucky Poet (1934) is an autobiography. His critical works include Contemporary Scottish Studies (1924) and At the Sign of the Thistle (1934). He collaborated on Scottish Scene (1934) with Lewis Grasie Gibbon.

MacDONAGH, Donagh (1912– ). Irish poet and dramatist. The son of Thomas MacDonagh, he wrote the ballad-comedies Happy as Larry (1946) and God's Gent'ry (1951).

MacDONAGH, Thomas (1878–1916). Irish poet and patriot. He was executed after the Irish Easter Week rebellion. His Poetical Works was published in 1916.

MacDONALD, Flora (1722–1790). Scottish Jacobite heroine who aided Prince Charles Edward Stuart in his escape after the battle of Culloden. She resided in the United States (1774–1779), where her husband Allan Macdonald was a brigadier general in the British Army during the American Revolution. See PRETENDER.

MacDONALD, George (1824–1905). A Scottish novelist and poet best known for the juvenile fantasy At the Back of the North Wind (1871).

MacDowell, Edward Alexander (1861–1908). American composer of symphonic poems, piano sonatas, and orchestral suites. His widow founded in his memory the MacDowell Colony for musicians, artists, and writers at Peterborough, N.H., where a group of talented persons congregate every summer for a period of undisturbed production. His most popular work is Woodland Sketches (1896).

Macduff. In Shakespeare's Macbeth, the thame of Fife and a former friend of Macbeth. Horrified at the crimes which Macbeth has committed and deeply loyal to his country, he joins Malcolm in England and returns with him to Scotland to unseat Macbeth. Macduff, who was "from his mother's womb un- timelv ripp'd," slays Macbeth, thus fulfilling the witches' prophecy that no man born of woman could harm him.

Lady Macduff. The wife of Macduff. She and her children are murdered at Macbeth's order when it is discovered that her husband has joined Malcolm's forces.

McFee, William [Morley Punshon] (1881– ). English-born American novelist and essayist. McFee ran away to sea in 1906, and many of his books have a sea setting. His first book, Letters from an Ocean Tramp (1908), was followed by Casuals of the Sea (1910), which deals with an impoverished family in a London suburb. Command (1922), one of his best novels, laid in Salonika, is the story of a mediocre man's rise to heroism. He also wrote The Harbormaster (1932), about a sea-loving man who stays on land; Sailors of Fortune (1929), short stories; and Harbours of Memory (1921), essays. Many of his stories are told by Chief Engineer Spenlove, whom McFee acknowledges as his "garrulous, ironic, goaded alter ego."

M'Flingal. A verse satire by John TRUMBULL. The first canto was published shortly after Lexington and Concord in 1775; in 1782 Trumbull lengthened and reissued the poem, which was immensely popular. Modeled on Samuel Butler's Hudibras (1663–1678), it ridicules extremism on both sides of the Revolution, especially the bombastic oratory of the Scotch-American Tory, M'Flingal, who is tarred and feathered, repents, and prophesies final victory for the colonists.

M'Fleknnoe (1682). A satirical poem by John DRYDEN. It is directed against Thomas SHADWELL, who was to succeed Dryden as poet laureate in 1689. The title of the poem comes from the name of Richard Flecknoe (c. 1600–c. 1678), an Irish priest noted for his bad verse. Dryden depicts Shadwell as Flecknoe's successor in the monarchy of nonsense. Pope used the poem as a model for his Dunciad (1728–1743).

McGee, Thomas D'Arcy (1825–1868). Irish-born Canadian editor, public official, poet, and political agitator. McGee was at first a violent advocate of the Irish Confederation; after being arrested, he escaped to the U.S., where he gradually lost his revolutionary zeal. He finally settled in Montreal, where he founded the New Era, was elected to the Legislative Assembly, became president of the Council, and was active in the movement for a Canadian Federation. When that was established he was chosen a member of the Dominion parliament and the minister of agriculture and emigration. He was assassinated by a political enemy. He wrote Irish Writers of the 17th Century (1846) and a collection of Poems (1869).

William Holmes McGuffey (1800-1873). American educator and textbook compiler. College teacher and president, McGuffey was known to thousands of Americans as the author of their first schoolbook. The series began in 1836 with the First and Second Readers. The Primer, Third, and Fourth Readers appeared in 1837, the Speller in 1838, the Rhetorical Guide in 1841, the Fifth and Sixth Readers in 1844 and 1857. He collaborated with his younger brother, Alexander Hamilton McGuffey, on the "Eclectic Series." The books have sold 122 million copies, with new editions issued as recently as 1920. McGuffey was a political conservative who supported the Hamiltonians rather than the Jeffersonians; his Readers reflect his point of view.

Machado de Assis, Joachim Maria (1839-1908). Brazilian novelist and poet. Widely regarded as Brazil's greatest novelist, Machado de Assis was the son of a Negro house painter and a humble Portuguese woman. He first earned his livelihood as a typesetter and as a journalist, but in his mid-20's he began to be recognized for his creative writing. In 1869 he married a Portuguese woman of distinguished family and, although afflicted by epilepsy, led a conventional private life until his death. In 1897 he founded and became first president of the Brazilian Academy of Letters.

In its musicality and detachment, his verse reflects the influence of the French Parnassians. Two of his best-known poems are the ironical sonnet Círculo Vicioso and the perceptive Mosca Asul, which appear in Occidentaes (1900). Other collections include Chrysalidas (1864) and Phalenas (1870).

The serenity that characterizes the poetry of Machado de Assis is also present in his novels; they have been compared to those of Henry James in their psychological probing, and to those of Laurence Sterne in their philosophical humor and whimsical digressions. In such works as Memorias Posthumas de Brao Cubas (Epitaph for a Small Winner, 1881), Quinas Borba (1891), and Dom Casmurro, his masterpiece, Machado de Assis emerges as a skeptic who observes humanity with few illusions but great understanding.

Machado [y Ruiz], Antonio (1875-1939). Spanish poet. His use of landscape and his desire for simplicity and sincerity link this leader of Spanish poetry to the Generación del 98. His first volume, Soleadas (1903), concentrates upon the background of Seville, which it renders in somber tones. Better known, and more characteristic of his verse, is the volume Campos de Castilla (1912). This work contains such poems as El dios ibérico and Las encinas. His is a serious poetry of message, clothed in form, with the accent on spiritual meditation. With his brother, Manuel Machado, he is the coauthor of several successful dramas.

Machado [y Ruiz], Manuel (1874-1947). Spanish poet and dramatist. The brother of Antonio Machado, he is a more colorful and sensuous poet, particularly in his use of native Andalusian folk motifs. His early volumes, which have been well received, include Alma (1902) and Museo (1910). In the drama, he collaborated with his brother to write the well-known La Lola se va a los puertos (1930) and La duquesa de Benamejí (1932), which reveal the French influence upon his work.

Machon. A son of Asclepius. One of the Greek heroes in the Trojan War, he was skilled in medicine and cured the wounds of many of his fellow-soldiers.

Machau[l]t, Guillaume de (1300?-1377). French poet and composer. He was in the service of the king of Bohemia until 1346, of the royal house of France thereafter, and simultaneously holder of several ecclesiastical positions. He was the chief of a school of lyric poets including Eustache Deschamps and Jean Froissart, establishing the rigid forms for the ballade, chant royal, rondel, and lain. By introducing material from his personal life into his lyrics, he marked the transition from the impersonal conventions of troubadour poetry to the introspection of François Villon.

His long narrative poems include the Jugement du roy de Navarre (c. 1349); Le livre du voir-dit, supposedly the true story of the love he inspires in a young girl, though old himself, because of his poetry; La Prise d'Alexandrie (c. 1370). Chaucer borrowed from the Livre de la fontaine amoureuse for his Book of the Duchess, and was probably significantly influenced by Guillaume's work in general.

Macheath, Captain. See Beggar's Opera, The; Three Penny Opera, The.

Machen, Arthur (1863-1947). Welsh novelist, essayist, and journalist. Preoccupied with black magic and the horrors of the supernatural, he wrote short novels on these subjects, such as The Great God Pan (1894). The Hill of Dreams (1907) is about the aura of a terrifying past which surrounds an old Roman fort. His other books include Strange Roads (1923), Notes and Queries (1926), and Dreads and Drollz (1926).

Machiavelli, Niccolò (1469-1527). Florentine statesman and political philosopher. He is famous for his Il Principe (The Prince) and other political, historical, and literary writings. His early experience as an envoy for the Florentine republic, filled him with first-hand knowledge of Italian political squabbles and intrigues and of powerful figures like Caesar Borgia, and shaped his thought; the need to report these affairs precisely and economically shaped his style. At the same time he read widely and deeply in ancient historical writers. In 1512, the return of the Medici to Florence left him without position, but the enforced exile gave him the time to compose The Prince and his other masterpiece, the Discorsi (Discourses), between 1513-1517. Other writings that followed include a book on the art of war, a discourse on the government of Florence, a life of the condottiero Castruccio Castracani, and a history of Florence. His literary efforts include the Clizia and La Mandragola (The Mandrake), the latter comedy one of the best produced during the Italian Renaissance; a Novella entitled Belfagor; and a dialogue on the Italian tongue. Il Principe, dedicated to a younger memer of the Medici clan, and in part motivated by a desire to show how useful its author could be as a political advisor, ranges from philosophical discussion of the nature and origins of principalities to realistic and practical comments on the relations between a prince and his subjects. The ruthlessness of Borgia towards his enemies is praised, but senseless cruelty condemned; Italian politics are viewed with cynicism, but there is also an idealistic and stirring call to unity. Much emphasis is placed upon the military, especially the need for citizens rather than mercenaries to do the fighting necessary to protect any state. In the more leisurely Discorsi on Livy, where the method is to compare ancient and modern events and draw from the comparison aphorisms of universal validity, Machiavelli makes clear his true republican sentiments. The ideal government is a republic in which the various social and political groups are given a say. The Mandragola, his most famous literary work, tells a typical novella story in the dramatic manner of Roman comedy. Its young lovers triumph over an old fool through the assistance of a rich parish priest and a knowing confessor. The cynicism of the play reinforced the reputation Machiavelli soon gained for being a teacher of treachery, intrigue, and immorality. His criticism of contemporary Christianity earned him the censure of the Church and spurred the popular portrait of him as a diabolical anti-Christ. In Elizabethan England, where his influence reached Spenser, Raleigh, and Bacon, his name became a popular synonym, especially in the drama, for diabolical cunning. In later years, the term Machiavellian came to connote cynical politics; The Prince became a handbook for tyrants and dictators. Modern opinion has reversed this trend, so that he is now regarded as a pioneer of political science; his republicanism and patriotism are stressed; and though the originality and value of his thought are now questioned, there is unanimous praise for his style and his literary genius. In modern times, Somerset Maugham's Then and Now (1946), which is based on the Mandragola, shows the literary influence. Similarly, there is H. G. Wells's novel The New Machiavelli.

McKay, Claude (1890–1948). Jamaican-born American poet and novelist. His Home to Harlem (1928), the story of a Negro soldier returning home after a World War I, was the first best seller written by a Negro. Of his other novels, Banjo (1929), a story of a Negro, is perhaps the best. His verse was published in the collections Songs of Jamaica (1911), Constab Ballads (1912), Spring in New Hampshire and Other Poems (1920), and Harlem Shadows (1922).

MacKaye, Percy [Wallace] (1875-1956). American poet and dramatist. He is known for his interest in the community theater and his use of older literature as the point of departure for his plays. The Canterbury Pilgrims (1903), a successful blank verse play, was produced by E. H. Sothern and Julia Marlowe as were the dramas Jeanne d'Arc (1906) and Sappho and Phaon (1907). Other plays include The Scarecrow; Caliban by the Yellow Sands; Rip Van Winkle (1920), a libretto for Reginald de Koven's opera; This Fine-Pretty World (1923), a comedy of folkways; and The Mystery of Hamlet, King of Denmark—Or What We Will (1949), a tetralogy of verse plays dealing with the major characters of Shakespeare's play up to the time the play begins.

Mackenna, Stephen (1888-1956). English novelist. Most of his novels are about the social and political inner circle of London. His best-known work is Sonia (1917).

Mckenney, Ruth (1911– ). American journalist and humorist. Although she is best known for the amusing My Sister Eileen (1938), she wrote a serious account of economic and social conditions in Akron, Ohio, from 1932 to 1936 in Industrial Valley (1939). Her other works include The Loud Red Patrick (1947), sketches about her grandfather; Love Story (1950), an account of her marriage and motherhood; and Mirage (1956), a novel about Napoleon. See Nathanael West.

Mackenzie, Sir Compton (1883– ). English novelist and writer of essays, memoirs, and other nonfiction. Summer Street is one of his best-known novels. In later life he wrote farcical comic novels, such as Whiskey Galore (1947) and Thin Ice (1956). As a young man Mackenzie was converted to Catholicism, Scottish nationalism, and to islands (he lived on Capri, two Channel islands, and Barra in the Outer Hebrides). His early writings were often iconoclastic, but he later became an English institution, and was knighted in 1952. Among his works are the novels Carnival (1912) and The Four Winds of Love (1937–1940), Gallipoli Memories (1929), Literature in My Time (1933), Catholicism and Scotland (1936), Aegean Memories (1940), On Moral Courage (1962), and My Life and Times: Octave One (1963).

Mackenzie, Henry (1745–1831). Scottish novelist who is variously known as "The Man of Feeling" (after the title of his famous novel) and "The Addison of the North." His early works include the ballad imitations Duncan (1764) and Kenneth (1765), which reflect his interest in the revival of medieval art forms, but he soon turned to sentimental fiction and produced The Man of Feeling. His other novels are The Man of the World and Julia de Roubnié. His periodicals in essay form, the Mirror (1779–1780) and the Lounger (1785–1787) contain notable critiques of the poetry of Robert Burns and of contemporary German literature. Sir Walter Scott was considerably influenced by Mackenzie's writings.

McKinley, William (1843–1901). 25th president of the U.S. (1897–1901). A veteran of the Civil War, McKinley was elected to Congress in 1876, and became known as a champion of high tariffs. After two terms as governor of Ohio, he was the Republican presidential nominee in 1896, defeating William Jennings Bryan. The Spanish-American War occurred during his first term. Running on a platform that promised voters a "full dinner pail," he again defeated Bryan in 1900, but was assassinated by an anarchist, Leon Czolgosz, in Buffalo, N.Y.

Mackintosh, Elizabeth. Pen names: Gordon Daviot; Josephine Tey (1896-1952). Scottish novelist and playwright. She wrote plays, notably the successful historical drama Richard of Bordeaux (1933). Under the name Josephine Tey she wrote...
Macklin, Charles

mystery novels, including The Franchise Affair (1951).

Macklin, Charles (c. 1700–1797). English dramatist and actor. He is remembered for his two fine comedies Love a la Mode (1759) and The Man of the World (1781). He was also one of the best actors of his time. See Shylock.

MacLeish, Archibald (1892– ). American poet. After an early volume of poetry, Tower of Ivory (1917), he became an expatriate in Paris and remained there until 1928. During this period he was greatly influenced by Ezra Pound, T. S. Eliot, and the French symbolists. He published two volumes of short lyrics, The Happy Marriage (1924) and Streets in the Moon (1926), both of which show his experiments in form and metrics. Two long poems also belong to the Paris period: The Pot of Earth and The Hamlet of A. MacLeish. In Nobodaddy (1926), a verse play based on the story of Adam, Eve, Cain, and Abel, MacLeish turned to “the dramatic situation which the condition of self-consciousness in an indifferent universe” presents.

In 1932, MacLeish published Conquistador, which was awarded a Pulitzer Prize. Throughout the 30's, he continued to publish volumes of verse, but he attracted more attention with his verse plays, each having a timely political message generalized into a universal problem of human nature: Panic, taking its point of departure from the depression years; The Fall of the City (1937), written during Hitler's rise to power, showing the people of an unnamed city accepting through blind fear a conqueror whose power is only imagined. The latter, like Air Raid (1938), was written as a radio script.

During World War II, MacLeish became more and more involved in the world's problems. He was appointed Librarian of Congress in 1939; he then held successively the post of director of the Office of Facts and Figures (1941–1942), assistant director of the Office of War Information (1942–1943), and assistant secretary of state (1944–1945). His poetry of this period was public and patriotic. He also wrote numerous essays dealing with social and political questions.

MacLeish won his second Pulitzer Prize with Collected Poems 1917–1952 (1952), a third with his verse drama J. B. (q.v.). Among other important work of the 1950's are Hypocrite Reader (1952), a poem calling on poets to invent new metaphors for their age; The Trojan Horse (1952), a radio play and satire on the Communist scare; and Songs for Eve (1954), a recasting of Eve as the heroine of intellectual and spiritual curiosity. Recent books by MacLeish include Freedom Is the Right to Choose: An Inquiry into the Battle for the American Future (1951) and Poetry and Experience (1961).

MacMahon, Comte Marie Edmé Patrice Maurice de (1808–1893). Marshal of France and 2nd president of the Third Republic (1873–1879). MacMahon was successful as a commander in three wars, but was defeated in the fourth by the Prussians at the battle of Sedan.

MacMaster, John Bach (1852–1932). American historian. He is best known for his eight-volume History of the People of the United States (1883–1913), in which he stressed the social and economic aspects of the country's past rather than the military.

MacMorris, Captain. In Shakespeare's Henry V, a captain in the army during the French campaign. Like his fellow captains, the Scottish Jamy and the Welsh Fluellen, he is typical of the stout British soldiers who overcame a much larger French force at Agincourt.

MacNeice, Louis (1907–1963). Irish-born English poet. He was associated with W. H. Auden and other left-wing poets during the 1930's, but was not as closely committed to Marxist doctrines as they were. His poetry is characterized by its colloquial, sometimes humorous tone and its use of contemporary ideas and images. His volumes of poems include Blind Fireworks (1929), Collected Poems (1949), Autumn Sequel (1954), Eighty-Five Poems (1961), and Solstices (1961). MacNeice was a classical scholar and a lecturer in Greek and Latin; he wrote a verse translation of The Agamemnon of Aeschylus (1936) and also one of Goethe's Faust (1951). Out of the Picture (1937) is a verse drama in the Auden manner. He collaborated with Auden on Letters From Iceland (1937). From 1941 he wrote a number of works for the British Broadcasting Company; The Dark Tower and Other Radio Scripts appeared in 1947.

Macpherson, James (1736–1796). Scottish poet, writer, literary forger. In 1760 he published Fragments of Ancient Poetry Collected in the Highlands of Scotland, and Translated from the Gael or Erse Language. Shortly thereafter he published first Fingal, An Ancient Epic, and then Tamburlaine, An Epic Poem, purportedly translations from the Gaelic of the 3d-century bardic hero Ossian. The Ossianic poems—in actuality, a literary hoax—aroused a great deal of interest, the author collecting funds from a number of well-known literary figures, such as John Home and Hugh Blair, to make a tour through the Highlands in search of epic material. The London critics, especially Samuel Johnson, soon became suspicious, however, and Macpherson failed to make further Ossianic "discoveries." After his death, investigation revealed that Macpherson had liberally edited traditional Gaelic poems and added passages of his own. These pseudo-Gaelic poems are written in poetic prose marked by rhapsodic descriptions of nature and an atmosphere of vague mystery and melancholy. Although critics do not now consider them to be of much literary value, they had an important influence on the development of romanticism in France and Germany.

Macpherson's later writing was historical and political, including Introduction to the History of Great Britain (1771), History of Great Britain from the Restoration to the Accession of the House of Hanover (1775), and Original Papers, Containing the Secret History of Great Britain (1775). All three showed a bias against Britain and the ruling house of the time. For a while, the author was in the U.S. as secretary to the governor of Florida; in the last years of his life, he held a number of comfortable political sinecures at home.

Macleary, William Charles (1793–1873). English tragedian, noted for his portrayals of Macbeth, Cassius, Lear, Henry IV, and Iago, among others. By 1837 he was in the first rank of his profession. He made several trips to the U.S.; during the last of these the Astor Place Riot occurred (May 10, 1849), taking the lives of 22 persons and injuring 36 others outside the Astor Place Opera House in New York City. The riot involved partisans of Macready and Edwin Forrest, an American actor, and was occasioned by a resurgence of anti-British feeling.

McTeague (1889). A novel by Frank Norris. Forbidden to practice dentistry when Marcus Schouler informs the authorities that he lacks both license and diploma, McTeague grows brutal and surly, while his wife, Trina, who had won $5,000 in a lottery, becomes a miser. He eventually murders Trina, steals her money, and is pursued into Death Valley by Schouler. McTeague kills Schouler, but the latter manages to handcuff his wrists. Tied to the corpse, McTeague is doomed to die of thirst in the desert.

MacWhirr, Captain. A heroic sea captain in Joseph Conrad’s novel Typhoon.

Madame Bovary (1856). A novel by Gustave Flaubert. With flawless style, Flaubert creates the life and fate of the Norman bourgeoisie Emma Bovary. Unhappy in her marriage to a good-hearted but stupid village doctor, Emma finds her pathetic dreams of romantic love unfulfilled. A sentimental, discontented, and hopelessly limited person, she commits adultery, piles up enormous debts, and finally takes her own life in desperation. The novel’s subject, the life of a very ordinary woman, and its technique, the amassing of precise detail, make Madame Bovary one of the crowning works in the development of the novel.

Mad Anthony Wayne. See Anthony Wayne.

Madariaga [y Rojo], Salvador de (1886– ). Spanish poet and academician. A multilingual author, exile from Spain, and Oxford professor, Madariaga is best known for the opening up of Spanish culture to foreign audiences. His wide range of interests is apparent in his varied styles and subjects. His works include the novels La jirafa sagrada (The Sacred Giraffe, 1925) and The Heart of Jade (El corazón de piedra verde; 1944); the poetic volumes Romances de ciego (1922), and Rosa de cieno y ceniza (1941); the essays Shelley and Calderón and other essays on English and Spanish poetry (1920) and Don Quijote: An Introductory Essay in Psychology (1934); the biographies Hernán Cortés (1941) and Bolívar (1951); and a historical interpretation, España (Spain, 1942), his best-known work.

mad as a hatter. A popular simile. The probable origin of this phrase is “Mad as an adder” (AS, mæddre; AS, ater, “poison”), but evidence is wanting. It was popularized by Lewis Carroll (Alice’s Adventures in Wonderland, 1865), but was well known earlier and was used by Thackeray in Pendennis (1849).

Madeleine, M. In Victor Hugo’s novel Les Misérables the assumed name under which Jean Valjean gains wealth and becomes mayor of a French town.

Madeleena, Sister Mary [Mary Evaline Wolff] (1887–1964). American poet, teacher, and essayist. She is the author of Knight’s Errant and Other Poems (1923), Gates and Other Poems (1938), and Christmas Eve and Other Poems (1938). Among her prose works are two books on Chaucer (1925, 1951) and The Pearl—A Study in Spiritual Dryness (1925).

Madelon. One of the 2 ridiculous snobs in Molière’s comedy Les Précieuses Ridicules.

Madero, Francisco I. [ndalecio] (1873–1913). Mexican revolutionary leader and statesman. Hailed as Mexico’s deliverer after the ouster of dictator Porfirio Díaz, Madero was elected president in 1911. Although honest and well-intentioned, Madero failed to sense the need for social and economic reform and was unable to cope with the conflicting demands of revolutionaries and conservatives. In 1913 he was overthrown by his commanding general, Victoriano Huerta, and shot.

Madge, Charles Henry (1912– ). English poet and professor of social science. His volumes of precise, intellectual poetry include The Father Found (1941).

Mad Hatter. See Hatter.

Madison, Dolly [Payne Todd] (1768–1849). Wife of James Madison, whom she married in 1794. Mrs. Madison was unofficial first lady during the administration of Jefferson, a widower, and her fame as a charming, tactful hostess grew after her husband assumed the presidency. When the British burned Washington in 1814, she rescued many official papers and a portrait of George Washington from the White House. After Madison’s death, she again became a social leader in Washington though her last years were marred by financial difficulties.

Madison, James (1751–1836). Fourth president of the U.S. (1809–1817). After serving in the Continental Congress during the American Revolution, Madison was elected to the Virginia House of Delegates where he helped secure passage of Thomas Jefferson’s bill for religious freedom. As a member of the Constitutional Convention (1787), he played a dominant role in the framing of the Constitution, which he later defended in the Federalist papers. He continued his close association with Jefferson, with whom he prepared the Virginia and Kentucky Resolutions condemning the Alien and Sedition Acts and under whom he served as secretary of state. After Madison’s election to the presidency, continued friction with Great Britain over U.S. neutral rights led to the War of 1812, which found the U.S. unprepared and disunited. Its opponents, especially in New England and New York, dubbed it “Mr. Madison’s war.” In the last years of his administration, Madison advocated tariff protection and a strong army.

Mad Poet. Epithet of Nathaniel Lee (c. 1653–1692). He was confined for four years in Bedlam, and wrote some of his best poetry there.
Madras House, The (1910). A play by Harley Granville-Barker. The Madras House is a great business concern. The characters are the various members of the family that control it and the employees to whom it provides a means of livelihood. Philip Madras and his wife, Jessica, the central figures, represent the new generation.

madrigal. An Italian verse form of uncertain origin and etymology, the earliest known being those of Petrarch. It is made up of a single stanza in which long and short lines appear without regularity. After Petrarch's time, it became a vernacular equivalent for the classical epigram, with its amatory subject matter treated wittily or humorously. In the 16th century the composing and singing of single and groups of madrigals became the rage, as such composers as Gesualdo, Luca Marenzio, and Claudio Monteverdi turned their talents to the form. The fashion reached England by the turn of the century with William Byrd and Thomas Morley.

Madwoman of Chaillot, The (La Folle de Chaillot; 1945). A play by Jean Giraudoux. A delightfully eccentric old woman manages to exploit and defeat the exploiters and financiers of Paris.

Maecenas, Gaius Cilnius (d. 8 B.C.). Roman statesman and patron of letters. As a friend and adviser of the young Octavius Caesar, he was instrumental in arranging the Peace of Brundisium (41 B.C.), which temporarily reconciled Octavius with Mark Antony. He was not a fawning creature of the emperor, for on one occasion he publicly reproved Octavius by warning him against becoming a common butcher (carnifex) of his own people. It was Maecenas who organized the cultural resources of the principate by subsidizing the work of young artists, among whom were Vergil and Horace. His munificence as a patron has made his name proverbial.

maenads. In Greek mythology, the female attendants of Dionysus. The word means mad or frenzied women, also called Bacchae. See BACCHANTS.

Maeterlinck, Jacob van (c. 1235–c. 1300). Flemish poet who stimulated the cultivation of a Flemish literature distinct from the French. About 1264 he adapted a number of romances from the French, such as Benoît de Sainte-Maure's history of Troy and some of the Grail legends. Then he began metrical translations and adaptations of didactic works on government, ethics, and natural history, and of the Bible and histories by Josephus. His most important work, although he died before completing it, is the Mirror of History (begun 1284), a history of the world based on the Speculum majus of Vincent of Beauvais (d. 1264).

Maeterlinck, Maurice (1862–1949). Belgian poet, dramatist, and essayist. His literary career began with the publication of two volumes of poetry: Douze chansons (1886), and Serres chaudes (1889), both mysterious and dreamy in subject matter and mood. Maeterlinck's fame, however, rests on his symbolic dramas, played chiefly at the Théâtre du Moulin de Looëse-Poë. La Princesse Maleine (1889), his first success, was followed by L'Intérieur and Les Aveugles (1890), L'Intérieur (1894), and Pelléas et Mélisande (1892). Antinaturalistic in its subject, Maeterlinck's drama portrayed the inner conflict of the individual, not the external struggle between man and his world. Antinaturalistic in method as well, it abandoned a realistic portrait of life as seen for a symbolic expression of the inner life. The romantic melancholy of his early plays was succeeded by a faith in the spiritual life of all living things. The plays Aiglaine et Selyvette (1896), Monna Vanna (1902), and L'Oiseau bleu (1909) were more hopeful in mood, founded on that belief in the spirit expressed in the essays of La Sagesse et la destinée (1898) and Le Temple enseveli (1902). The mystery of human life and death that preoccupied Maeterlinck led him to write studies of flowers and animals who share in this mysterious existence: La Vie des abeilles (1901), L'Intelligence des fleurs (1907), and La Vie des termites (1927). In 1911 Maeterlinck was awarded the Nobel prize for literature.

Maeztu y Whitney, Ramiro de (1875–1936). Spanish man of letters. Originally a member of the Generación del 98, he later abandoned their social program, turning to ardent support of traditional Roman Catholicism in Spain. This is best expressed in his most famous work, the essay Defensa de la humanidad (1934). His other works include Hacia otra España (1899), La crisis del humanismo (1919), and Don Quijote, Don Juan y La Celestina (1926).

Magda (Die Heimat, lit., Home; 1893). A melodramatic play by Hermann Sudermann, which presents the conflict between the mores of the bourgeoise homestead and the bohemian life of urban artists.

Magellan, Ferdinand. Port. Fernando de Magalhães (1480?–1521). Portuguese navigator. After serving the king of Portugal in India and the Moluccas, or Spice Islands, Magellan fell into royal disfavor and offered his services to Charles V of Spain, from whom he won permission to sail to the Orient by a westward route. Leaving Spain in September, 1519, with five ships, he sailed down the eastern coast of South America, exploring the estuary of the Plata river. After wintering at Port St. Julian, where Magellan quelled a mutiny among his men, the expedition entered what is now known as the Strait of Magellan and sailed northwestward, reaching the Ladrones (now Mariana) Islands on March 6, 1521. A month later Magellan discovered the Philippines. He made an alliance with a native chief and was killed on the island of Mactan while fighting on his behalf. His ships continued the voyage, but only one managed to return to Europe (1522), completing the first circumnavigation of the globe.

Maggie: A Girl of the Streets (privately printed, 1893; published, 1896). A novel by Stephen Crane. The first realistic American novel, Maggie is the story of a girl of the New York slums, doomed by family and environmental forces to a life that she is unable to escape. The tone of the novel is set in its opening scene of boys fighting in the streets. In this Darwinian jungle even the toughest have difficulty in surviving. Maggie Johnson is the daughter of a brutal father and a drunken mother. She goes to work in a collar factory, falls in love with Pete, a bartender who is a friend of her brother Jimmie, and is seduced by him. Her mother disowns her; she becomes a prostitute, and in despair she finally kills herself. Her final degeneration becomes almost an allegory.

The novel, like The Red Badge of Courage, is episodic in structure, relying on irony for its dramatic effect. Crane revised the original edition before the book was republished in 1896, eliminating some of the more melodramatic sections.

Maggi (Lat., pl. of magus). Literally "wise men"; specifically, the Three Wise Men of the East bringing gifts to the infant Saviour. Tradition calls them Melchior, Gaspar, and Balthazar, three kings of the East. The first offered gold, the emblem of royalty; the second, frankincense, in token of divinity; and the third, myrrh, as a symbol of death.

Medieval legend calls them the Three Kings of Cologne, and the Cathedral there claims their relics. They are commemorated on January 2, 3, and 4, and particularly at the Feast of the Epiphany.

Among the ancient Medes and Persians the Magi were members of a priestly caste credited with great occult powers. After Zoroaster's death, they adopted the Zoroastrian religion and spread its influence to Egypt and Asia Minor. In Camoens' Lusitania, the term denotes the Indian Brahmins.

magic carpet. See carpet, magic.

Magic Flute, The (Die Zauberflöte; 1791). An opera by Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, with libretto by Emmanuel Schikaneder. It is written in the form of a Singspiel, or German ballad opera, with spoken dialogue instead of recitative. The Queen of the Night gives a magic flute to the prince, Tamino, who offers to rescue her daughter Pamina from the palace of the high priest Sarastro. Tamino finds Pamina, and also discovers that Sarastro is not evil, but a magnanimous priest of Isis and Osiris. The priest permits Tamino to undergo the ordeal of the search for truth, but he is not to speak. In his trials he meets Pamina, who is mystified by his silence and nearly kills herself. The lovers finally arrive at the temple of success, and Sarastro blesses them. Mozart and his librettist were both Masons, at a time when Masonry was outlawed in Austria, and they saw in this opera a way to advertise some of the Masonic ideals.

Magic Mountain, The (Der Zauberberg; 1924). A novel by Thomas Mann. Written in the tradition of the Bildungsroman, it is concerned with young Hans Castorp and his personal development at Haus Berghof, a tuberculosis sanatorium in the Swiss Alps. In the book's symbolism, the sanatorium with its international clientele is a scale model of Europe on the eve of World War I; the pervasive atmosphere of sickness and death symbolizes a general European decadence, and the sanatorium's isolation indicates an unhealthy separation between artistic or intellectual life (the mountain) and the vital and active life below. Hans first comes there to visit his cousin Joachim Ziemsen, intending to stay only three weeks; but the place mysteriously attracts him, the discovery of a minute pulmonary defect induces him to remain, and he stays there for seven years. During this period, the other characters act upon him essentially as two forces; on the one hand, there are those like Settembrini, Peeperkorn and Dr. Behrens, the vigorous, outgoing head physician, that attract him to the side of reason and vital, nondecadent activity; on the other, such figures as Clavdia Chasuble, Leo Nephta and Dr. Krokovski, the assistant physician interested in psychoanalysis, hypnotism, and spiritism, draw him toward the mysterious and decadent, occult and aesthetic aspects of life. Hans's development reaches a climax when he gets lost in the snow and has an internal vision in which he first sees a classical temple surrounded by a society of beautiful and enlightened men, but then finds that inside the temple the two old hags are tearing apart and devouring a child. The import is that even the highest attainments of reason (symbolized by the temple) must contain an element of deadly pagan decadence and that the two contradictory human tendencies toward enlightened, constructive activity and toward superstitious, destructive decadence are inseparable. But Hans's confrontation with this truth occurs on an intellectual plane and does not lead him to make any active personal commitment. At the end of the book, he has left the mountain and is a German soldier in World War I, but the reader feels that he is still basically an uncommitted and unfufilled young man.

Mágico prodigioso, El (The Wonder-Working Magician). A drama by Pedro Calderón de la Barca, considered the best of his religious plays. It is the story, reminiscent of the Faust legend, of the pagan philosopher Cipriano who makes a pact with the devil to gain the love of Justina, a Christian who has previously rejected him. The devil tempts her in vain, and Cipriano, admiring her virtue, also becomes a Christian. The two then suffer martyrdom at the hands of the Roman governor of Antioch.

Magim, William (1793–1842). Irish writer. He is known for his satires and parodies in Blackwood's Magazine. He was editor of Fraser's Magazine (1830–1837).

Magister Ludi (Lat., "master of the game"). The title of the English translation of Das Glasertlerspiel (Ger., "the glass-bead game", 1943), a novel by Hermann Hesse. The story is set in a fictitious future in which culture is dominated by the glass-bead game. The game, which in its highest form is practiced only by a chosen few, is fundamentally a combination of music and mathematics but includes elements from virtually all human disciplines; it provides a center about which the artistic and intellectual world may orient itself, avoiding what the narrator considers the fragmentation and dilettantism of the 20th century. Still, Hesse makes clear by constant irony that he himself does not regard this culture as an ideal utopia, that it is rather to be seen as the imagined realization of a number of potentialities, some valuable and some dangerous, inherent in our own civilization. The story itself concerns the life of Josef Knecht, of his rise to the lofty position of magister ludi and of his ultimate fall, the tragedy of a life dedicated entirely to the world of the spirit.

Magna Carta or Charta (1215). The "Great Charter" of England. It permanently guaranteed the principle that the king's power must be limited by law. Embittered by King John's misgovernment, his levying of heavy taxes to support his foreign wars, and his personal injustice and cruelty toward potential rivals among the nobility, the barons advised by Stephen Langton compelled John at Runnymede to sign a document clarifying their feudal relationship. Most of the provisions sought redress for grievances; the two later glorified as the basis of modern government and bills of personal rights were the clauses establishing the principle that the king could not levy taxes without the consent of a "counsel of the realm," and that he could not imprison a free man or deprive him of his property except by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land. Pope Innocent III suspended Langton for siding against the king and annulled the Charter, which incited a civil war; but when John and the Pope died in 1216, Langton compelled a re-issue of the Charter in Henry III’s name, and a confirmation of it when the young king came of age.

Magnalia Christi Americana (1702). A history of the church in New England by Cotton Mather. Designed to extol “God's beautiful work,” especially “the great achievements of Christ in America,” the book stresses the virtues of New England’s religious way of, the dangers of backsliding, and the need for reform. Although Mather’s display of erudition is sometimes pretentious, the book gives a good picture of life in colonial New England.

magnetic mountain. A mountain of medieval legend, which drew out all the nails of any ship that approached within its influence. It is referred to in Mendeville’s Travels (c. 1371) and in many stories, such as the tale of the Third Calender and one of the voyages of Sinbad the Sailor in the Arabian Nights. It is also the title of a book of poems by Cecil Day-Lewis (1933).

Magnificat. The song of praise of the Virgin Mary, her response when she was greeted by her cousin Elizabeth in the house of Zacharias (Luke 1:46–55). It begins “My soul doth magnify the Lord” (“Magnificat anima me Dominum”). As a part of the vesper service of the Roman Catholic Church it has been in use since the beginning of the sixth century, and in the Anglican service for over 800 years.

It has been set to music numerous times, a famous version being Johann Sebastian Bach’s Magnificat in D (1723), a superb cantatilike work for orchestra, chorus, and soloists.

Magnificent Ambersons, The (1918). A novel by Booth Tarkington. The middle volume of a trilogy called Growth (1922), it tells the story of George Amberson Minafer, a pampered young snob, whose family has for two generations been a source of pride and awe to the inhabitants of their Midwestern town. He does a good deal to ruin the life of his mother and other people but finally adopts a more wholesome attitude toward life. The book is also a study of the decay of one American aristocracy and the rise of another.

Magnificent Lovers, The. See Amants Magnificues, Les.

Magog. See Gog.

Magwitch, Abel. In Charles Dickens’ Great Expectations, Pip’s convict benefactor and father of Estella. He is a terrifying, simple man with a long memory for good and ill turns. When he returns illegally to England to see what kind of a gentleman his “dear boy” Pip has become, old enemies inform on his behalf, after an abortive flight, he dies.

Mahabharata. One of the 2 great epic poems of ancient India, the other being the Rajayauna, about 8 times as long as the Iliad and Odyssey together. It is a great compendium, constantly added to; by A.D. 350 it had acquired something of its present form. Some parts are traditional and very ancient, others have been added as late as A.D. 600.

Its main story is the long struggle between the five Pandavas, or sons of Pandu, and the Kauravas, a name applied, from their ancestor Kuru, to the family of Dhritarashtra, Pandu’s brother, who refuses to give up the throne of his nephews, the rightful heirs. Of the five Pandavas, the most heroic are Yudhishthira, the eldest, who finally gains the kingdom, and Arjuna, who wins the hand of the lovely Draupadi in open contest and brings her home as the wife of all five brothers. The legend is that his mother, not knowing what he was bringing, asked him to share whatever he possessed equally with all his brothers. Friendly to the Pandavas and very prominent throughout a large part of the epic is Krishna, an avatara of Vishnu, and adviser to Arjuna in his pacific dilemma on the battlefield (see Bhagavad-Gita). After the death of Krishna, Yudhishthira tires of his throne, and the five Pandavas, accompanied by their wife and dog, start out to seek admission to the heaven of Indra on Mount Meru. Only Yudhishthira and the dog succeed in completing the journey; when the dog is refused admittance, Yudhishthira refuses to enter. The dog turns out to be Dharma, the god of justice, and all the Pandavas are admitted into heaven. The epic also contains the famous Savitri episode, the tale of Nala and Damayanti, and is in fact an encyclopaedia of Hindu life, legend, and thought. “What is not in the Mahabharata,” says the Mahabharata, “is not to be found anywhere else in the world.” See Ganesha.

Mahabhasha (Sans., maha, great; bhasha, language). A 1st century B.C. dissertation on Sanskrit grammar by Pananjali. He is considered an authority.

Mahadeva. See Shiva.

Mahagony. See Rise and Fall of the Town Mahagonny.

Mahan, Alfred Thayer (1840–1914). American naval officer and historian. A lecturer in naval history and tactics at the Newport War College, Mahan is known mainly for The Influence of Sea Power upon History, 1660–1783 (1890), in which he showed the overriding importance of naval power. His ideas influenced naval policy in the U.S., Great Britain, and Germany.

Maháyána. See Buddhism.

Mahdi (Arabic, the divinely directed one). The expected Messiah of the Muslims who is to lead to victory the hosts of Islam. A title often assumed by leaders of insurrection, it is applied especially to Muhammad Ahmad (1843–1885) who led the uprising of 1883 and who is said to be sleeping in a cavern until the time he will return to life to overthrow Dejal (Antichrist). The Shi'ahs or Shiah believe that the Mahdi has lived and that the twelfth Imam, who disappeared about 873, will someday come out of hiding to rule the Muslim world.

Mahendra. See Indra.

Mahler, Gustav (1860-1911). Austrian composer and conductor, born in Bohemia. He directed the Imperial Opera in Vienna from 1897 to 1907, and conducted at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York in 1907. He was conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra in the season of 1909–1910. He wrote ten symphonies, the last unfinished. The second or Resurrection Symphony (1894) has a choral finale, using as its text an ode by Klopfenstiel; the eighth or Symphony of a Thousand (1907) is entirely choral, in two vast movements. The first sets the medieval hymn “Veni Creator Spiritus”; the second, the final scene of Goethe’s Faust. Das Lied von der Erde (The Song of the Earth; 1908) is a setting for solo voices and orchestra of a cycle of poems by the Chinese Li-Po. Mahler’s widow, Alma Mahler, then the widow of Franz Werfel, wrote a biography, Gustav Mahler, Memories and Letters, in 1946.

Mahomet. See Muhammad.

Mahony, Francis Sylvester. Pen name Father Provost (1804–1866). Irish humorist. He is best known for his Provost Papers (1834–1836), ostensibly the autobiographical remains of a rural Irish priest. Mahony was himself a priest, but passed most of his life as a traveler and man of letters.

Mahoun or Mahound. Names of contempt for Muhammad as a Muslim and a Moor, particularly in romances of the Crusades. The name is sometimes used as a synonym for the devil.

Maia. In Greek mythology, originally a mountain nymph in Arcadia who became the mother of Hermes.

Maid Marian. In the English Robin Hood ballad cycle, the sweetheart of Robin Hood. In one version, she loved Robin Hood when he was the earl of Huntington. When he was outlawed for debt, she followed him into the forest dressed as a page and lived among his men as a virgin huntress until the marriage rites could be performed. This is a late version, arising in Tudor times. Originally she was the May queen in the early English May-day dances.

Maid of Orleans, The (Die Jungfrau von Orleans; 1801). A romantic tragedy by Friedrich Schiller, based on the life of Joan of Arc. Schiller emphasizes Joan’s determined idealism and her refusal to be diverted from her transcendent goal by earthly temptations. He varies the usual story in that Joan dies in battle and not at the stake.

Maidens, The (Les Bonnes; 1948). A play by Jean Genet. Two sisters, Claire and Solange, have betrayed their mistress’s lover to the police, and to complete their treachery they poison her tea while she prepares to follow him to the penal colony. But Madame, learning that her lover has been freed, departs and leaves her tea undrunk. In order that her sister may join the elite of the criminal and the saint, Claire takes Madame’s place as victim and forces Solange to poison her. The place illustrates two preoccupations central to Genet’s work: human identity is seen exclusively as a shifting succession of masks, roles, and states, and moral values are systematically inverted, evil being assigned the hierarchically place more traditionally reserved for good.

Maid's Tragedy, The (c. 1611). A tragedy by Beaumont and Fletcher. By order of the king, Amintor is forced to renounce his beloved Aspatia and marry Evadne, sister of his closest friend, Melanius, who has just returned a hero from the wars. But, on her wedding night, Evadne reveals that she is the king’s mistress, a fact that Amintor later confides to Melanius. Enraged, Melanius plots against the king. He makes his sister repent and promise to kill the king, while he foments a successful revolution. Meanwhile, Aspatia, disguised as her brother, has been fatally wounded in a duel with Amintor. Evadne, after killing the king, kills herself when Amintor refuses to forgive her. Then Amintor discovers that the “man” he has slain is Aspatia and takes his own life. Melanius tries to follow his example, but is restrained by the new king who promises to abide by the lessons of these bloody events.

Mailer, Norman (1923– ). American novelist. Born in Long Branch, N.J., and educated at Harvard, Mailer spent two years in the Pacific Theater with the army during World War II. He is best known for The Naked and the Dead, generally considered the best novel by an American about World War II. His next book was Barbary Shore (1951), a half-symbolic, half-realistic novel dealing with radical political ideologies. It was followed by The Deer Park (1955), a sensational novel of similar style about Hollywood. That book’s leading character, Sergius O’Shaughnessy, also appears in Advertisements for Myself on the Way Out, part of a projected novel presented in the autobiographical collection, Advertisements for Myself (1959). Mailer also wrote Death for the Ladies, and Other Disasters (1962), a collection of poems, and The Presidential Papers (1963), an indictment of American politics.

Mains sales, Les. See Dirty Hands.

Main Street (1920). A novel by Sinclair Lewis. The book that first established Lewis’ reputation as an important writer, it is both a satire and an affectionate portrait of Gopher Prairie, a typical American town, which was undoubtedly suggested by Sauk Centre, Minn., where Lewis was born. The heroine, Carol Kennicott, chafes at the dullness and sterility of her existence as the wife of the local doctor and tries unsuccessfully to make the townspeople conscious of culture and refinement. For a time she leaves to lead her own life, but eventually returns to make a kind of peace with “Main Street.” The book aroused considerable controversy; Meredith Nicholson attacked it in Let Main Street Alone! (1921), and Carolyn Wells burlesqued it in Piomaine Street, The Tale of Warble Petticoat (1921).

Maitenon, Marquise de. Françoise d'Aubigné (1635–1719). Mistress and 2nd wife of Louis XIV. After the death of her husband, the crippled poet Scarron, Mme de Maitenon became governess to the children of Louis XIV and Mme de Montespan. In 1674, she became the royal mistress and in 1684 the wife of the king. A Protestant by birth, she is thought to have exercised some religious influence over Louis.

Main-Travelled Roads (1891). A collection of short stories and sketches by Hamlin Garland. These tales, set in the Dakotas and Iowa, are local-color stories realistically told in a manner which owe much to William Dean Howells. Most of the stories depict the grim lives of farmers who are at the mercy not only of the elements but of rapacious landlords as well. Under the Lion's Paw, a much-anthologized piece, is one of the most characteristic.

Mair, Charles (1839–1927). Canadian poet. In his poetry Mair revealed a strong attachment to the soil and to the American pioneers; he is credited with having strongly influenced western immigration. His most famous work, Tecumseh (1886), describes the western movement of the white man. He also wrote Dreamland and Other Poems (1888) and The Last Bison (1891).

Mairet, Jean (1604–1686). French playwright. Author of numerous tragedies and tragicomedies, Mairet is considered to have introduced the classical unities into French drama with his pastoral tragicomedy Silvamide (1630), later formulating a theory of the unities in the preface to the published version of the play. Sophonisbe (1634), based on the legend of Sophonisba, is generally reckoned the first true tragedy in French, for it conforms not only to the rules but also to the style of classical tragedy, especially in strict simplicity of theme and rigorous exclusion of the comic. A protégé of Richelieu, Mairet was for a time one of the cardinal's cinq auteurs.

Maironi, Piero. The hero of Piccolo Mondo Moderno (1901) and Il Santo (1906), two novels by Antonio Fogazzaro. The story of Piero's father, Franco Maironi, which is told in Piccolo Mondo Antico (1896), the first novel of this series, prepares the way for an understanding of Piero's inner struggles. In Piccolo Mondo Moderno, Piero has an insane wife, Elisa, and is passionately in love with Jeanne Dessalle, a married woman who is estranged from her worthless husband. Elisa recovers her sanity just before she dies. At the end of the novel, Piera renounces his property and all thought of Jeanne. In Il Santo, Jeanne finds him as Benedetto, a lay brother in a Benedictine monastery. The news that her husband has died has little effect on him; he has become the spokesman of a new Christianity which will accept and make use of the findings of modern science. His ideas arouse tremendous opposition from within the Catholic Church, but Jeanne, whose love can find no other outlet, manages to ward off much of this opposition through her powerful friends. He sends for her on his death bed. A fourth novel, Letizia (1911), deals mainly with the love affair of the titular heroine and Masimo Alberti, a young doctor and disciple of Benedetto, “the saint.”

Major Barbara (1905). A play by George Bernard Shaw. Barbara Undershaw is a major in the Salvation Army; her father is the millionaire owner of an armament company. When Undershaw and a whisky distiller donate money to the Army, Barbara cannot stand the hypocrisy of accepting this “tainted money,” and she resigns. While never fully agreeing with her father, Barbara comes to accept his theory that poverty, not sin, breeds crime. The poor are not blessed, says Undershaw, they are cursed. This was advanced social theory in 1905 when complacent Edwardian England accepted the poor as a necessary evil.

All money is tainted, says Shaw; the problem then is to remove the taint and have a fairer distribution. Even with its moral and economic message, Major Barbara has a wealth of comic and arresting characters in the play.

Major Prophets. See Prophet.

Making of Americans, The (1925). A “novel” by Gertrude Stein. Written in 1906–1908, with no dialogue and no action, it presents the history of three generations of the author's own family, and by extension, the history of everyone else in the past, present, and future. Composed in a simpler style than much of the author's later work, it is marked by frequent verbal repetition to suggest repetition in time.

Malachi. An Old Testament prophetic book. Written about 460 B.C., it connects the economic hardships of the period with the moral laxness of the people. There are special denunciations of the priesthood.

Malade imaginaire, Le (The Imaginary Invalid, 1673). A comédie-ballet by Molière and his last play. The hypochondriac Argan allows himself to be victimized by the doctors Puroon and Diafoirus and, in order to have a doctor in the family, tries to force his daughter to marry Diafoirus' son. His second wife, however, who in reality does not love him but his wealth, schemes to send the daughter off to a convent. To test his wife's love, Argan pretends death, and thus discovers his wife's greed and his daughter's loyalty. A final ballet with interpolated Latin doggerel parodies the admission of a doctor to the Paris faculty.

Malagigi or Malagise (Fr. Maugis). In the Carolingian legends a great magician and paladin of Charlemagne. In the Morgante Maggiore of Pulci and in the Orlando poems of Boiardo and Ariosto he frequently aids the paladins with his magic (see Orlando Furioso). He is the brother of Bradamante, the warrior maiden.

Malevitch, Casimir

Malaparte, Curzio. Pen name of Curzio Malaparte Suckert (1898–1957). Italian writer. Malaparte, who cast his lot alternately with fascism and democracy, strongly reflects D'Annunzio's influence. Kaputt (1944) is an account of his experiences with Hitler's armies during the Russian campaign. The Skin (La Pelle; 1949) describes his career as Italian liaison officer with the U.S. Fifth Army. A collection of short stories, Racconti Italiani, was published in 1959.

Malaprop, Mrs. (from Fr. mal à propos, "out of place"). A character in Sheridan's comedy The Rivals, noted for her blunders in the use of words. "As headstrong as an allegory on the banks of the Nile," is one of her gross misapplications. She has given us the word malapropism to denote such mistakes.

Malaquais, Jean (1908– ). Polish-born French novelist. Les Jawanaïs (The Men from Java, 1939, also translated as Men from Nowhere) is the violent story of a community of outcasts starving for a mining company. Le Gaffeur (The Joker, 1953) is a nightmarish fantasy. Other works include Journal de guerre (Jean Malaquais' War Diary, 1943), and World Without Visa (Planète sans Visa; 1947).

Malatesta (It., "evil head"). The name of an Italian family which dominated the city and environs of Rimini during the Renaissance. Its symbol was an elephant. Of the several condottieri it produced, the most infamous was Sigismondo Pandolfo Malatesta (1417–1468), who combined a love of learning and patronage of the arts with a taste for cruelty and tyranny that earned him universal hatred. It was an earlier Malatesta, Giovanni, who murdered the lovers Paolo and Francesca, an event recalled by Dante in the famous episode of the Inferno.

Malavoglia, I (The House by the Medlar Tree or The Malavoglias, 1881). A novel by Giovanni Verga. It is celebrated for its sympathetic and perceptive portrayal of a Sicilian fisherfolk family (the Malavoglias) and its vivid depiction of the provincial town (Acì-Trezza) where they live. The Malavoglias are a family seemingly doomed by an ineluctable fate. When their vesel sinks, drowning Padron 'Ntoni's son, his grandson 'Ntoni joins the navy to support the family. The upshot of his first acquaintance with the world outside Trezza is his rebellion against family traditions. He refuses to continue the fishing trade, eventually refusing to work altogether. As a result, the family's meager fortune rapidly declines. 'Ntoni's mother and younger brother die, his proud grandfather Padron 'Ntoni dies in a pauper hospital, and 'Ntoni is forced by circumstances to leave Trezza without hope or destination.

Malbecco. See Fabrie Queene, The.

Malbrouk or Marlborough. Very old song. The French song, Malbrouk en va-t-en guerre (Marlborough is off to the wars), is said to date from 1709, when the duke of Marlborough was winning his battles in Flanders. It did not become popular till it was applied to Charles Churchill, third duke of Marlborough, at the time of his failure against Cherbourg (1758). It was further popularized in becoming a favorite of Marie Antoinette about 1780, and being introduced by Beaumarchais into Le Mariage de Figaro (1785). The tune is thought to be much older. According to a tradition recorded by Chateaubriand, the air came from the Arabs, and the tale is a legend of Mambrion, a crusader.

Malcolm. In Shakespeare's Macbeth, the elder son of the murdered king, Duncan of Scotland. Aware of Macbeth's treachery, Malcolm flees to England, raises an army, and returns to dethrone Macbeth. After Macbeth's death, he becomes king of Scotland.

Malecontent, The (1604). A drama by John Marston. Alforontio, the deposed duke of Genoa, assumes the guise of a cynical, jesting malecontent named Malvole. Aurelia, wife of the outspoken Duke Pietro, is seduced by her husband's chief minister, Mendoza, who also connives with Malvole against Pietro. But Malvole informs Pietro, sends him into hiding, and then proclaims his death. Mendoza assumes the throne, banishes Aurelia, plots to kill the outspoken Malvole, and aims to marry Maria, Alforontio's (Malvole's) wife. Malvole then reveals himself to Pietro, has him renounce the ducal throne, and gains his support. At a ball, the masked plotters surround Mendoza and depose him.

Maldon, Battle of (late 10th century). Old English poem, a fragment of 325 lines in alliterative verse. In the heroic style it describes the unsuccessful stand (991) of the English under Byrhtnoth against a Viking invasion.

Malebranche, Nicolas (1638–1715). French philosopher, scientist, and theologian. He is known as one of the best prose writers of his century. In his principal work, La Recherche de la Vérité (The Search for Truth, 1674–1675), Malebranche took issue with the metaphysics of Descartes, though admiring his physics and method. Denying the interaction of spirit and matter, Malebranche declared that God arranges an exact correspondence between our notions of material objects and the motions of the objects themselves, for He is the sole source and cause of both. This ingenious solution to the Cartesian dualism antagonised the Jansenists and Bossuet, among others, because of its pantheistic overtones, and embroiled Malebranche in endless controversy; the doctrine also won him many disciples, including Leibniz. Malebranche's later writings, mostly on religious and moral subjects, include Conversations Chrétiennes (Christian Conversations, 1676), Méditations Chrétiennes (Christian Meditations, 1683), and Entretiens sur la metaphysique et la religion (Conversations on Metaphysics and Religion, 1688).

Malesherbes, Chrétien Guillaume de Lamoi- gnon de (1721–1794). French statesman. His liberal policy made the publication of the Encyclopédie possible. He defended Louis XVI at his trial before the National Convention in 1792, during the French Revolution. He himself was arrested as a royalist and guillotined.

Malevitch, Casimir (1878–1935). Russian painter. In 1913 he derived from Cubism the rigid geometrical abstractions called Suprematism, in which all painting is reduced to the use of the square, the triangle, the circle, and the cross. White Square on White Background (1919) illustrates the subdety that this simplification can attain in its extreme manifestation.

Malherbe, François de (1555–1628). French writer. Official court poet, Malherbe became the virtual literary dictator of France during the early 17th century. Of neoclassic tendencies, he advocated a poetry of order, rationality, and simplicity; opposing all colorful eccentricity in verse, he condemned the affectation, emotionalism, and decorative qualities of the late-baroque poets. Better known for his influence than for his own writings, Malherbe wrote the poem Consolation de Monseigneur Perier sur la mort de sa fille (Consolation de Monseigneur du Perier upon the Death of His Daughter, 1598) and a scyphantic Ode (1600) to Marie de Médicis.

Malibran, María Felicita. Born García (1808–1836). Spanish contralto, taught by her father, Manuel García. A romantic figure, she burned out her life by overwork, sacrificing herself to her singing.

Mallarmé, Stephane (1842–1898). French poet. Mallarmé is known as one of the leaders of the symbolists and the formulator of their aesthetic theories. His own work shows the influence of Baudelaire, Poe, Verlaine, and the Pre-Raphaelites. Marked by elliptical phrases, Mallarmé’s poetry employs condensed figures and unorthodox syntax. Each poem is built about a central symbol, idea, or metaphor, and consists of subordinate images that illustrate and help to develop the idea. Often obscure, his work never fails to be evocative and exciting. L’Après-midi d’un faune (The Afternoon of a Faun, 1876) which inspired Debussy to write his well-known Prélude; Le Cygne; Héroïdade; and Le Tombeau d’Edgar Poe are outstanding examples of Mallarmé’s method.

Mallet, David (1705–1765). Scottish poet and scholar who collaborated with James Thomson in the masque Alfred (1740). His best-known work is the ballad William and Margaret (1724), which was later collected in Thomas Percy’s Reliques. Mallet’s chief work of scholarship is his edition (1754) of the works of Henry St. John, Viscount Bolingbroke.

Mallet-Joris, Françoise [formerly Françoise Mallet] (1930– ). Belgian-born French novelist. While still in her teens she wrote The Illusionists (1950), which, like its sequel The Red Room (1953), shows the defensive cruelty and cynicism of those who would love. The House of Lies (Les Mensonges; 1956) and Café Celeste (L’Empire celeste; 1958) use a Flemish realism of detail to expose tragedies of self-delusion. Other works include the elaborately constructed The Favorites (1961), and Cordelia (1954), a collection of short novels.

Malleus Maleficarum (Hammer of Witches, 1484). One of the most famous books of witchcraft and black magic, published in Cologne, by Henry Kramer and Jakob Sprenger.

Mallison, Charles or Chick. A character in several works by William Faulkner. The nephew of Gavin Stevens, Chick grows from childhood to young manhood in four of Faulkner’s novels. As a child he narrates part of The Town; as a 16-year-old boy he is instrumental in proving Lucas Beauchamp innocent of murder in Intruder in the Dust; and as a young man he narrates part of The Mansion and is an interested observer in Knight’s Gambit.

Malone, Edmund (1741–1812). Irish literary critic and Shakespearean scholar. He left Ireland for London to devote himself to literature and became a part of the literary and political scene, counting among his friends Dr. Johnson, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Bishop Percy, Edmund Burke, and Horace Walpole. He was the first literary critic to establish a chronology of Shakespeare’s plays in his Attempt to ascertain the order in which the plays of Shakespeare were written (1778), this work supplementing Johnson’s edition of Shakespeare (1765). His own edition of Shakespeare was published in 1790. He also published an edition of Reynolds’ works (1797) and an edition of Dryden (1800). A shrewd literary detective, he was one of the first to doubt the authenticity of Thomas Chatterton’s Rowley poems and the purported Shakespearean works of William Ireland. He was probably the ablest research scholar of his day and provided invaluable aid to Boswell in his final draft of Johnson’s biography.

Malone Dies (Malone Meurt; 1951). A novel by Samuel Beckett. As Malone, a bum, lies dying, alone in bed in a strange room, he remembers his past life. By the end we realize that Malone was actually a murderer and that in his pathetic, senile, lonely state he is an image for the condition of all men. Beckett uses the stream-of-consciousness technique throughout. The novel is linked to Molloy and The Unnamable.

Malory, Sir Thomas (c. 1408–1471). English writer. He is the author of Le Morte Darthur, the finest medieval prose collection of Arthurian romance. It was completed (c. 1469) while he was in prison and printed in 1485. Very little is known about Malory’s life except for his rendering of the Arthurian romances. He was a member of Parliament (1445) and, in 1451, was imprisoned for various offenses and remained in jail until his death.

Malraux, André (1901– ). French novelist and critic. Malraux went to Indo-China as an archaeologist and became active in revolutionary politics there, in China, and later in Spain. The theme of social revolution dominates the novels The Conquerors (1928), set in Canton, China, during the 1925 insurrection; Man’s Fate (1933); and Man’s Hope (L’Espoir; 1937), which takes place during the Spanish civil war. Such revolutions are used as the symbol of oppressed man’s struggle for dignity through revolt against his fate. By braving death for the life of their revolutionary doctrines, the leading characters transcend the individual self and accept a fate that binds them to all men. Days of Wrath (Le Temps du mépris; 1939) describes an underground Communist leader in Hitler’s Germany; The Walnut Trees of Altenburg (Les Noyers de l’Allenberg, 1943) is a novel of ideas about human potential, its setting the two world wars.

In The Psychology of Art (3 vols., 1947–1950; adapted as The Voices of Silence, 1951) Malraux describes art as another way in which mankind as a whole transcends individual man's mortal destiny and is ennobled. He analyzes the history of art as the search for an absolute, which is man's religious aspiration. His other works include the novel _The Royal Way_ (1930) and the essays _La Tentation de l'Occident_ (1926) and _La Metamorphose des Dieux_ (1957).

Under the French Fifth Republic, headed by Charles de Gaulle, André Malraux occupies the position of Minister of State in charge of Cultural Affairs.

Malthus, Thomas Robert (1766–1834). English political economist. In 1798, the year that he became a curate of the Church of England, Malthus published _An Essay on the Principle of Population as it affects the Future Improvement of Society, with Remarks on the Speculation of Mr. Godwin, M. Condorcet, and other Writers_, in which he set forth the Malthusian doctrine that population increases in a geometric ratio while the means of subsistence increases in an arithmetic ratio, and that crime, disease, war, and vice are necessary checks on population. In the 1803 revision of his work, Malthus suggested moral restraint as a fifth check. Malthus' works also include _An Inquiry into the Nature and Progress of Rent_ (1815) and _Principles of Political Economy_ (1820).

Malthusian doctrine. See Thomas Robert Malthus.

Maltz, Albert (1908– ). American writer of plays, fiction, and scenarios. While studying at Yale with George Pierce Baker and George Sklar, Maltz wrote _Merry-Go-Round_ (1932), a play about political corruption in New York City, which was closed by censors and then reopened after vigorous public protests. With Sklar, Maltz also wrote _Peace on Earth_ (1933), a pacifist play. His other works include a book of short stories, _The Way Things Are_ (1938); the novels _The Cross and the Arrow_ (1944) and _The Journey of Simon McKeever_ (1949); and several film scenarios, including _The Pride of the Marines_ (1945).

Malvolio. In Shakespeare's _Twelfth Night_, the steward of Olivia. He is a smug, pompous fool who secretly aspires to his mistress' love. Annoyed by his conceit and priggishness, Sir Toby Belch, Sir Andrew Aguecheek, and Maria concoct a scheme to turn Olivia against him. Maria forges a letter in the handwriting of Olivia, leading Malvolio to believe that his mistress returns his love. He falls into the trap, and when Olivia shows astonishment at his absurd conduct, he keeps quoting parts of the letter until he is shut up in a dark room as a lunatic.

Mambino. A legendary pagan king introduced by Ariosto into his _Orlando Furioso_. He wears a helmet of pure gold, which makes him invulnerable, but is taken by Rinaldo. In the _Don Quixote_ of Cervantes, the hero insists that a barber's basin is actually the precious helmet of Mambino.

Mamelukes (Arab. _mamluq_, a slave). The slaves from the Caucasus in Egypt. Formed into a standing army, in 1254 they raised one of their body to the supreme power. They reigned over Egypt until 1517, when they were overthrown by the Turkish sultan, Selim I. The country, though nominally under a Turkish viceroy, was subsequently governed by twenty-four Mameluke beys. In 1811 the Pasha of Egypt, Muhammad Ali, by a wholesale massacre annihilated the Mamelukes.

Mammon. An Aramaic word used in the New Testament to personify riches and worldliness; the god of this world, or of avarice, cupidity. In the Bible, the word occurs in Matt. 6:24 and Luke 16:13: "Ye cannot serve God and mammon." Both Spenser with his cave of Mammon ( _Faerie Queene_ , 1590) and Milton, by identifying him with Vulcan ( _Paradise Lost_ , 1667) make Mammon the epitome of the evils of wealth and miserliness.

Mammon, Sir Epicure. A wealthy lecher in Jonson's comedy _The Alchemist._

Man Against the Sky, The (1916). The title poem of a book of verse by Edwin Arlington Robinson. In this long elegiac work, man is symbolized as a lonely figure seen against the sky at sunset, the sunset itself representing death, World War I, and the universe described by modern science. Robinson examines five creeds that explain life and death, rejects them, and finally asserts a simple stoicism as a way of life.

Man and Superman (1905). A play by George Bernard Shaw, subtitled "A Comedy and a Philosophy." The comedy is the eternal pursuit of the male by the female; the philosophy is Shaw's brand of religion, creative evolution. These two elements are coordinated in the brilliant, discursive _Don Juan in Hell_ scene in Act III.

John Tanner, rational, morally passionate, and defiant of tradition, is plotted for, chased after, and caught by Ann Whitefield who, like most Shavian women, is instinctive, hypocritical, charming, and triumphant.

While in flight from Ann, Tanner dreams the scene of _Don Juan in Hell_. In a long, witty dialogue—the kind that Shaw excelled in— _Don Juan (Tanner), Doña Ana (Ann), the Statue from Mozart's opera Don Giovanni, and the Devil, discuss the questions so far evoked by the action of the play. Don Juan describes the moral passion or "Life Force" that drives the universe forward. He explains to the sneering Devil that it is the idea of God depending on man to get his will done that gives human life meaning. The superman of the title is the person who is able to detect and follow the will of the universe while suppressing his own. Don Juan is a superman; Tanner is not.

_Mand and Superman_ is usually performed without the _Don Juan_ scene; however, the work has its essential unity in this episode. _Don Juan in Hell_ has been acted separately and also been given many dramatic readings.

Mancini. The family name of the five nieces of Cardinal Mazarin who were brought from Rome by their uncle and played a conspicuous part in French society. Although Louis XIV fell passionately in love with Marie (1639–1715), she was married to the prince of Colonna. Hortense (c. 1646–1699) was the most beautiful of the sisters; she abandoned her husband, who had taken the name of Mazarin, and settled in England, where she was a favorite at the court of Charles II. Marie Anne (1649–1714), who became duchess of the duke of Bouillon, was an intellectual leader and the patroness of La Fontaine and other writers. The other sisters were Laure (1636–1657) and Olympia (1640–1708), who married, respectively, the duke of Mercœur and the count of Soissons.

Manciple’s Tale, The. One of the Canterbury Tales of Geoffrey Chaucer. In the Prologue the Host and the Manciple tease the Cook for being drunk. Finally the Manciple shares his own wine with the Cook, and begins his story, based on Ovid’s version of a popular folk tale. The archer Phebus has a white crow that can sing as sweetly as a nightingale and speak human language. One day the crow reports to Phebus that his beloved wife has entertained a lover in his absence. Phebus kills her with an arrow, but afterward breaks his bow in remorse and grief. Then he turns bitterly on the crow for having disturbed, unmaskd, his unsuspicous bliss; he plucks the bird’s feathers, turns him black, takes away his power of speech, changes his sweet song to a raucous creak, and flies him to the Devil—thus accounting for the present appearance of all crows and serving as a warning to all tattle-tales.

Mandalay (1892). A popular poem by Rudyard Kipling, first published in Barrack-Room Ballads. It was later set to music and became a standard amateur-night baritone air, with the famous refrain:

> Oh, the road to Mandalay, where the flyin’-fishes play,
> An’ the dawn comes up like thunder outer China ‘cross the Bay!

Mandarins, The (1954). A novel by Simone de Beauvoir. It portrays leading existentialists during and after World War II. It includes a fictionalized version of the argument between Jean Paul Sartre and Albert Camus over the subjugation of philosophical ideals to the need to act.

Mandelstam, Osip Yevnyevich (1891–1940). Russian poet. Belonging to the early Soviet period, Mandelstam’s poetry is a model of the classically concise and finished work striving for in Acsimism. His output was small, mostly contained in the collections Stone (Kamen’; 1913) and Trista (1922). His obvious lack of enthusiasm for the Soviet regime ended in his arrest during the purges of the 1930’s. He is believed to have died in a concentration camp.

Mandeville, The Travels of Sir John (c. 1371). Famous book of travels. It purports to be a guidebook for pilgrims to Palestine, but goes on to describe the marvells that the author claims to have seen in Africa and the Orient: some real, such as the Pyramids, some highly fictitious, such as the people with no heads but eyes in their shoulders. According to the work itself, Sir John Mandeville (or Maundevelle) was born at St. Albans, left England in 1322, roamed widely, and finally came under a new name to live at Liège in 1343, writing his Travels about 1357. He has been variously identified with French writers of Liège such as Jean de Bourgoigne à la Barbe (d. 1372) and Jean d’Outremoue. Actually, the work was probably originally compiled (1366–1371) in French, from early 14th-century travel books, and soon translated into Latin and English.

Mandraga, La (The Mandrake). A comedy of the Renaissance written by Niccolò Machiavelli in 1504. The plot involves the attempt of a young Florentine, Callimaco, to win Lucrezia, wife of Nicia, an old fool. The servant Ligurio joins with the mother and the confessor (Fra Timoteo) of the young wife to help Callimaco succeed. The title of the play refers to the fact that, at one point in the play, Nicia is persuaded by Callimaco, posing as a doctor, that his wife must be given mandrake to combat her supposed sterility.

mandrake. An herb found in southern Europe and northern Africa. Its globose yellow berries were once believed to have aphrodisiac powers. The root of the mandrake often divides in two and presents a rude appearance of a man. In ancient times human figures were cut out of the root and wonderful virtues ascribed to them, such as the production of fecundity in women (Gen. 30:14–16). It was said that mandrakes could not be uprooted without producing fatal effects upon the uprooter, and so a cord would be fixed to the root and tied around a dog’s neck, and the dog, being chased, would draw out the mandrake and, theoretically, die. Moreover, it was believed that
The mandrake. From a 15th-century herbal.

A small dose of mandrake made a person vain of his beauty, while a large one made him an idiot, and also that when the mandrake was uprooted it uttered a scream, in explanation of which Thomas Newton, in his Herball to the Bible, wrote, "It is supposed to be a creature having life, engendered under the earth of the seed of some dead person put to death for murder." Mandrakes were sometimes called "love apples," from the old notion that they excited amorous inclinations; hence Venus is called Mandragoritis, and the Emperor Julian, in his epistles, tells Calixenes that he drank mandrake juice nightly as a love potion. The narcotic and stupefying properties of the herb were well known to the ancients, and it was commonly said of a very indolent and sleepy man that he had eaten mandrake.

Mandricardo. In the Orlando epics of Boiardo and Ariosto, a ferocious warrior, king of Tartary, and son of Agricane (Agrican). He comes to France to avenge his father, slain by Orlando, and fights alongside Agramante (Agramant) in the battle against Charlemagne. He is killed by Ruggero.

Manet, Édouard (1832–1883). French painter. Generally regarded as the originator of IMPRESSIONISM, as early as 1863 he had executed two of his greatest and most controversial works: Lunch on the Grass and Olympia. Noted for his versatility and creative originality, he was equally adept whether painting portraits, still lifes, landscapes, or scenes from contemporary life.

Manette, Dr. Alexander. A character in Charles Dickens' A Tale of Two Cities. His spirit has been broken by 18 years of unjust imprisonment in the Bastille. After his release he recovers somewhat, but severe anxiety produces relapses in the form of par-tial amnesia and a longing for his old prison occupation of cobbbling. He is something of a hero in the eyes of the revolutionists because of his imprisonment in the Bastille, and when the Defarges learn that his daughter will marry Darnay, nephew of the hated St. Evrémonde, they are greatly disturbed.

Lucie Manette. The heroine of the novel, daughter of Dr. Manette, a gentle girl dedicated to her father.

Manetti, Gianozzo (1396–1459). Florentine Humanist. He wrote in 1452 a treatise On the Dignity and Excellency of Man (De dignitate et excellentia hominis), which anticipates the similar work of Pico della Mirandola in asserting the Renaissance theme of individual worth and glory.

Man For All Seasons, A (1961). A play by Robert Bolt (1924— ). It is based on the life of Sir Thomas More and his controversy with Henry VIII.

Manfred. Prince of Otranto and the central figure in Horace Walpole's Castle of Otranto.

Manfred (1817). A dramatic poem by Lord Byron. The hero, Count Manfred, sells himself to the prince of Darkness and lives wholly without human sympathies in splendid solitude among the Alps.

Man Friday. A faithful, versatile, and willing attendant, from the young savage in Defoe's Robinson Crusoe. Found by Crusoe on a Friday, he was kept as his servant and companion on the desert island.

Manhattan Transfer (1925). A novel by John Dos Passos. The book presents a picture of life in New York City during the 1920's through passages of impressionistic description and the simultaneous stories of several people from varying levels of society. The title, taken from the railroad station where people changed trains to get to and from the metropolis, is in itself suggestive of the shifting variegated life of the city. Although the novel has no central hero, Jimmy Herf, a journalist divorced by his actress wife, is perhaps the character of greatest interest. Only slightly less important are Bud Korpenning, a young man who fails in the city and commits suicide; Joe Harland, a Wall Street gambler, who loses his fortune and becomes a beggar; and Ellen Thatcher Ogilthorpe, Herf's former wife, who is a successful actress but loses the man she loves and is unable to find happiness. The final effect of this panoramic impression of a swarming metropolis is one of frustration and defeat.

Mani, Manes, or Manichaeus. The founder of Manichaeanism, born in Persia, probably about 216. He was prominent at the court of Sapor I (240–272) but crucified by the Magians in 277. See MANICHAENS.

Manichaens or Manichees. Followers of the Oriental dualistic religion of Manichaeanism, founded 243 by Mani. Their principal doctrine concerns the conflict between Light, or goodness, and Darkness, identified with chaos or evil. The system was drawn from the ancient Babylonian and Persian nature worship and influenced Christianity as late as the 13th century. For many centuries, Babylon, and then Samarkand, were the centers of Manichaeanism.

manifest destiny. A 19th-century slogan that expressed the conviction of many Americans that the U.S. was destined to rule the entire North American continent. The earliest known appearance of the phrase was in an editorial (1845) in The United States Magazine and Democratic Review by John L. O'Sullivan, who wrote that foreign powers opposed the annexation of Texas in order to hinder "the fulfillment of our manifest destiny to overspread the continent allotted by Providence for the free development of our yearly multiplying millions."

Manilius, Marcus or Gaius. Roman poet of the early 1st century. He is reputedly the author of the learned astrological poem Astronomica in five books.

Manilov. In Nikolai Gogol's Dead Souls, a character wholly given over to idle dreaming. The term Manilovism has since been used to describe indulgence in such vagrant reverie.

Man in Black. A character in Oliver Goldsmith's novel The Citizen of the World who professes to be parsimonious, but is profusely generous, and who finds the truest way of finding esteem is to give nothing away. He is disappointed in ambition as well as in love.

Man in the Iron Mask. A mysterious French prisoner. He was held for over 40 years by Louis XIV at Pignerol and other prisons, ultimately dying in the Bastille (November 19, 1703) with his identity still undisclosed. His name was given as "Marchialii" when he was buried. Subsequently, many conjectures as to the real identity of Marchialii were advanced.

One possibility was General du Bulonde, who in 1691 raised the siege of Cuneo against the order of Catinat. In 1691, Captain Bazeridi published in Le Temps translations of some cipher dispatches, apparently showing that this was the solution; but if it was, it could only be part of it, and Bulonde would have had to have taken the place of some earlier masked prisoner, for l'homme au masque de fer was at Pignerol in 1666 and was transferred to the island of St. Marguerite 20 years later, that is, well before the siege of Cuneo.

Other persons who have been suggested are a twin brother of Louis XIV—or, perhaps, an illegitimate elder half brother whose father is given as either Cardinal Mazarin or the duke of Buckingham—and Louis, duc de Vermandois, the natural son of Louis XIV by De da Vallières, who was imprisoned for life because he gave the dauphin a box on the ears.

Among the less likely names that have been put forward are the duke of Monmouth; Avedick, an Armenian Patriarch; Fouquet, the disgraced French minister of finance; the duc de Beaufort, who disappeared at the siege of Candia in 1669; and Mattioli's secretary, Jean de Gonzague.

Since the private papers of Louis XIV and the correspondence of his minister Louvois and Barbezéaux were made available to Franz Funck-Brentano, it has become apparent that the man in the iron mask was Count Girolamo Mattioli, minister to the duke of Mantua, a theory now widely accepted. In 1678 he acted treacherously toward Louis in refusing to give up the fortress of Cassale—the key to Italy—after signing a treaty promising to do so, and in consequence was lured onto French soil, captured, and imprisoned at Pignerol.

It was in 1790 that the Abbé Soulavie put forth the theory that the mysterious personage was a twin brother of Louis XIV. This supposition was accepted in tragedies on the subject by Zschokke in German and Fournier in French. In Dumas' romance The Iron Mask—sometimes published separately, but originally a part of his Vicomte de Bragelonne—a conspiracy to substitute the Man in the Iron Mask for his royal brother is all but successful.

man in the moon. A man seen by some among the dark patches on the face of the moon. Some say it is a man leaning on a fork, on which he is carrying a bundle of sticks picked up on a Sunday. The origin of this fable is Num. 15:32–36. Some add a dog also; thus the prologue in Midsummer Night's Dream says, "This man with lantern, dog, and bush of thorns, presenteth moonshine"; The Testament of Credid says "he stole the bush." Another tradition says that the man is Cain, with his dog and thorn bush, the thorn bush being emblematical of the thorns and briars of the fall, and the dog being the "foul fiend." Some poets make out the man to be Endymion, taken to the moon by Selene.

manitou. A great spirit of the American Indians. The word is Algonquin, and is used of both the great good spirit (Gitch-Manitou) and the great evil spirit (Matche-Manitou). The good spirit is symbolized by an egg, and the evil one by a serpent. (Longfellow, Hiawatha, xiv.)

Manley, Mary de la Rivière (1672–1724). English playwright and political pamphleteer. She is chiefly remembered as the author of Secret Memoirs and Manners of Several Persons of Quality of Both Sexes from the New Atlantis (1709, usually known as The New Atlantis), and its continuation, Memoirs of Europe (1710), both scandalous, licentious chronicles of contemporary politics and society; for these two works she was arrested, and subsequently released. She was active as a political writer during the Tory regime of 1710–1714 and was well known to Jonathan Swift, whom she succeeded as editor of the periodical Examiner (1711). She was also the author of many plays and a romanticized autobiography, Rivella (1714).

Mann, Heinrich (1871–1950). German novelist, elder brother of Thomas Mann. Around the time of World War I, his political and social attitudes were a great deal more militantly liberal than his brother's, and this led to a serious dispart between them. His interest in topical matters is also reflected in his novels, the most famous of which is Professor Unrat oder Das Ende eines Tyrannen (Professor Filth, or A Tyrant's End, 1905), a diatribe against inhumanity in the schools. Fritz Lang's famous motion picture The Blue Angel (1929) is based on this novel.

Mann, Horace (1796–1859). American lawyer, educator, and legislator. After a childhood of hardship, Mann became a lawyer and practiced in Massachusetts, where he served as state representative (1827–1833) and state senator (1833–1837). In 1837, after trying to educate the public on the proper treatment of the insane, he turned from politics to education. As secretary of the state board of education, he
The nobel prize for literature was awarded to Henry James in 1916. James was seen as the father of the modern novel. His first novel, The American, was published in 1875 and is considered a masterpiece of realism. James was also a prominent literary critic and essayist, and his works have been widely admired for their psychological insight and moral depth. His later novels, such as The Ambassadors (1903) and The Golden Bowl (1904), are considered some of the finest works in the history of the novel. James's influence on modern literature is profound, and his legacy continues to this day.
Manningoe, Nancy

(Stanzas, 2 vols., 1905–1910) and Virran Tyven (The Calm of the Stream, 1925), Manninen exhibits a fineness of mind, a subtlety of emotion, and a beautiful perfection of form. As a professor and scholar, he is known for his translations from French, German, and Greek: among them Homer, Goethe, and Moïrière.

Manningoe, Nancy. A character in William Faulkner’s short story That Evening Sun Go Down and in his Requiem for a Nun. Although it is mentioned in The Sound and the Fury that Nancy is murdered by her husband after the end of That Evening Sun, she is resurrected by Faulkner to play an important part in Requiem for a Nun, in which she is Temple Drake’s confidante and nursemaid to the latter’s children. Because Nancy’s past is as sordid as her own, Nancy is the one person whom Temple can trust. Unlike Temple, however, Nancy is able to face the question of guilt and responsibility honestly.

Mannyng, Robert or Robert of Brunne (c. 1254–c. 1340). English poet and chronicler, member of a Gilbertine monastery after 1288. His works popularize religious and historical material in an early Middle English dialect of great importance in linguistic history. His best-known work is Handlyng Synne; the first part of his chronicle The Story of England (c. 1338) is an adaptation in octosyllabic couplets of Wace’s history, the second part a translation in rhyming alexandrines from a history written in French rime by the English chronicler Peter of Langtoft (d. 1307?), continuing English history through the death of Edward I.

Man of Feeling, The (1771). A novel by Henry Mackenzie also used as an epithet for the author. The “man of feeling” is named Harley, a sensitive, bashful, kind-hearted, and sentimental hero. The novel follows the style of Laurence Sterne in its structure of episodic adventures, keyed to moods and sentiments, and in its imitation of the dreamlike fantasies of Tristram Shandy.

Man of Law’s Tale, The. One of the Canterbury Tales of Geoffrey Chaucer, based on an episode in Nicholas Trivet’s Anglo-Norman Chronicle (c. 1335) and John Gower’s version of it in his Confessio Amantis (1390). It is written in rime royal and told in the manner of a medieval legend, Constance (or Cunstance) representing an extreme degree of resignation or uncomplaining fortitude. The Sultan of Syria becomes a Christian in order to wed Constance, daughter of the Emperor of Rome. His mother, however, successfully schemes to set Constance adrift in a rudderless boat. She is washed ashore in Northumberland, where a rejected suitor frames a murder charge against her. A miracle proves her innocence to King Alla (or Ella), who then makes her his queen. In his absence she bears his son, Maurice; but the king’s mother, anxious to rid the land of Christianity, has Constance set adrift once more with the child. They are rescued by a Roman senator and live with his family until Alla, who had killed his mother as soon as he learned what had happened, discovers them by chance. The reunited family then return to live happily in Northumberland.

Man of Mode, The, or Sir Fopling Flutter (1676). A comedy by Sir George Etherege. It deals with the attempt of Dorimant to seduce another and his final match with yet another lady, the wealthy Harriet Woodvil, his equal in intellect and sophistication. Meanwhile, Dorimant’s friend Bellair wins the hand of his beloved Emilia, despite the rivalry of his own father. The most remarkable character in the play is Sir Fopling Flutter, the personification of dandyism. Part of the play’s success was due to the fact that the characters were based on real people; Beau Hewitt, a notorious fop, was the model for Sir Fopling Flutter, while Dorimant and Bellair are thought to be patterned on Lord Rochester and Etheredge, respectively.

Man of Property, The. See Forswara Saga, THE.

Man of Sin (II Thess. 2:3). The Roman Catholics say the Man of Sin is Antichrist. The Puritans applied the term to the pope; the Fifth-Monarchy men to Cromwell; many modern theologians apply it to that “wicked one” (identical with the “last horn” of Dan. 7) who is immediately to precede the second advent.

Man of the World, The (1773). A sentimental novel by Henry Mackenzie written as a companion piece to The Man of Feeling. The chief protagonist is a villain named Sindall, who is a crude descendant of the literary villains of Samuel Richardson.

Manon Lescaut (1731). A novel by Abbé Prévost, the full title of which is L’Histoire du Chevalier des Grieux et de Manon Lescaut. It is the story of a brilliant and talented young man who, as a student of philosophy with the brightest of futures, meets Manon Lescaut, a fascinating lower-class woman. She inspires in him a love for which he almost ruins his life in his efforts to satisfy her whims and expensive tastes; for her sake, and in spite of the fact that she is rarely faithful to him, he steals, lies, borrows money, is imprisoned, exiles himself with her, and gravely wounds the son of the governor of Louisiana in a duel. She dies of exhaustion in his arms in the desert where they have fled to escape the consequences of the duel. The novel inspired numerous other works, notably two operas: Manon (1884) by Massenet and Manon Lescaut (1893) by Puccini.

Manrique, Jorge (1440–1479). Spanish poet and soldier. His fame rests on a single poem, Coplas por la muerte de su padre, an elegy written shortly after the death of his father, grand master of the military order of Santiago, in 1476. In simple, almost colloquial language, the grieving son describes his father’s virtues, then submerges his personal sorrow to reflect on the impermanence of all earthly endeavor. Longfellow’s translation of the poem is well known.

Man’s Fate (La Condition humaine; 1933; also translated as Storm over Shanghai). A novel by André Malraux very freely based on the Shanghai insurrection of 1927. The Communist Reds take over the city in a shaky alliance with Chang Kai-chek’s Blues, who then turn against them and retake the city. Although the work moves swiftly, it is a probing psychological study of the men involved in the uprising.

Mansfield usually follows the slice of life technique, describing a few typical hours in her characters’ lives. Her stories are centered around some small but significant event that captures the meaning of the whole story or clarifies the character of the hero or heroine. Among her best-known stories are Bliss, A DILL PICKLE, THE GARDEN PARTY, and a number of stories, beginning with Prelude in 1918, which evoke her New Zealand childhood.

Her first collection of stories was In a German Pension (1911); Bliss (1920) established her reputation. Subsequent collections were published under the titles The Garden Party (1922) and The Dove’s Nest (1923). After her death Murry edited and published some additional stories, her poetry, a collection of her criticism, and her journals and letters.

Katherine Mansfield had an unfortunate early life before she met Murry in 1912, including a stillborn illegitimate child and a divorce. Her later life was clouded by her brother’s death in World War I. Ill health forced her to travel much in France and Germany, and eventually she died of tuberculosis. She was associated with Murry in editing and writing stories and criticism for a number of little magazines and for the Athenaeum. She was a friend of D. H. Lawrence, Aldous Huxley, and Virginia Woolf, and is said to be represented by the characters of Gudrun in Lawrence’s Women in Love and Beatrice Gilray in Huxley’s Point Counter Point.

Mansfield, Richard (1854-1907). English actor, born in Berlin. He appeared on the English stage (1877-1882) and in America (from 1882). He is famous for the title role in Rostand’s Cyrano de Bergerac and the dual roles in Stevenson’s Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde.

Mansfield Park (1814). A novel by Jane Austen. Fanny Price is adopted into the family of her rich uncle, Sir Thomas Bertram. Brought up with the four Bertram children, she is condescendingly treated as a poor relation by “Aunt Norris.” Of her cousins only Edmund, a young clergyman, appreciates her fine qualities, and she falls in love with him. He, unfortunately, is irresistibly drawn to the shallow, worldly Mary Crawford. In the meantime, Mary’s attractive, unscrupulous brother Henry flirts violently with Maria Bertram, Edmund’s sister, who is already engaged. Realizing his intentions are not serious, the disappointed Maria goes through with her marriage as planned. Henry turns his attentions to Fanny, falls in love with her, and proposes marriage. She refuses him. Henry then induces Maria to leave her husband and elope with her. Mary Crawford takes this scandal very lightly, opening Edmund’s eyes to her true nature. He turns to Fanny for comfort, falls in love with her, and marries her.

Mantalini, Madame. See Nicholas Nickleby.

Mantegna, Andrea (1431-1506). Italian painter and engraver. The great master of the early Renaissance, he worked principally in Padua and in Mantua. His study of classical sculpture and architecture, which he illustrated with archeological accuracy, led to the evolution of a style that is austere controlled and of a metallic intensity. Despite their ascetic flavor and sculptural quality, his works have brilliance of color and a feeling of movement and space. Their hitherto unknown realism and dramatic power, reinforced by the assimilation of Florentine discoveries of perspective and foreshortening, made Mantegna’s works a magnet for other artists. His unusual line engravings influenced Raphael, Holbein, and Dürer. His frescoes of the Gonzaga family in the Sala degli Sposi at Mantua, the earliest example of illusionist decoration of walls and ceilings, anticipated Correggio, Tiepolo, and the baroque penchant for trompe l’œil. The Venetian school founded by the Bellini family owed its early inspiration to his work, for he was the brother-in-law of Giovanni and Gentile Bellini. One of the tragedies of World War II was the partial destruction of Mantegna’s series of paintings of The Martyrdom of St. James in the Eremitani Chapel at Padua.

Man That Corrupted Hadleyburg, The (1900). A story by Mark Twain. A stranger leaves a sack of money in a bank in Hadleyburg, with a note instructing the cashier to give the sack to the person who makes a certain remark; secret letters then come to 19 prominent townsmen, telling them the supposed remark. All prepare to claim the treasure, which turns out to be a sack of lead; all are exposed, and the hypocrisy of the American small town is laid bare.

mantle of fidelity. A legendary garment. It appears in the old ballad The Boy and the Mantle in Percy’s Reliques as a mantle “which would become no wife that was not a lady.” Queen Guinevere tries it, but it changes from green to red, and red to black, and seems rent into shreds. Sir Kay’s lady tries it, but she fares no better; others follow, but only Sir Galahad’s wife can wear it. The theme is a very common one in old story; Spenser used it in the incident of Florimel’s girdle.

Mantuan. Pseudonym of Baptist Spagnuoli (1448-1516), Italian writer of Latin poetry, famous for his Eclogues (c. 1484). These were standard texts in English grammar schools at the time of Elizabeth.

Mantuanus, Baptista or Battista Spagnoli (1448-1516). Mantuan Humanist and Carmelite monk, widely known in Renaissance Europe for his Latin works. Of great importance are his 10 Eclogues, derived from Vergil and Petrarch, which were used as texts in the classrooms of Europe. His style and treatment of the eclogue genre influenced such writers as Erasmus and Spenser, especially the latter’s Shepheardes Calender (1579).

Manu. In Hindu mythology, one of a class of progenitors of mankind. The seventh Manu, from whom stem all men now living, is comparable to Noah in that he survived the deluge in an ark.

Manu’s Lawbook. A codification of Hindu laws and customs, written around the fifth century B.C.

Manuel, Dom. In the novels of James Branch Cabell, a swineherd who rises to be count of Poitou, a mythical medieval realm. After his death he is known as “the Redeemer.” To Jurgen, the titular hero of Cabell’s most famous novel, are ascribed the many legends that are told of Manuel. Manuel’s descendants in a complex genealogy appear in many of the other novels, all of which reveal Cabell’s ironic view of mankind as striving, like Manuel, for the unattainable.

Man Who Came to Dinner, The (1939). A play by Moss Hart and George S. Kaufman. A friendly burlesque on Alexander Woollcott, it deals with Sheridan Whiteside, a guest in the home of a Man Who Died, The

Middle Western family. He is immobilized as the result of an accident, meddles in family affairs, and insults virtually everyone in town. His health regained, he prepares to leave—only to break his leg again.

Man Who Died, The (1929). A short novel by D. H. Lawrence, first published under the title The Escaped Cock. It is a retelling of the story of Christ's resurrection. Lawrence, however, does not have Christ go to heaven, but has him mate with the priestess of Isis and declare that spiritual love and emphasis on death and heaven are a denial of life. The story is an ecstatic, symbolic presentation of Lawrence's personal religion.

Man Who Died Twice, The (1924). A blank-verse narrative by Edwin Arlington Robinson. It is the story of a composer who, in a fit of self-reproach, destroys the manuscripts of two symphonies and prepares to die. He recovers to write a third symphony and he attains salvation by joining some street evangelists.

Man Who Laughs, The (L'Homme qui Rit; 1869). A historical romance by Victor Hugo. The novel's hero, Gwynplaine, was deliberately disfigured during childhood by cuts made upward from the sides of his mouth to his ears. Inwardly kind and gentle, his outward appearance is that of a monster with a horrible grin. The willful and perverse duchess Josiane is attracted by his deformity. Only the pure love of a blind girl, Dea, rescues Gwynplaine from such a perverted liaison. When Dea dies, her protector commits suicide.

Man Who Was, The (1891). One of Rudyard Kipling's best-known short stories, published in Life's Handicap and later dramatized. The man, a mere "limp heap of rags," is living testimony to the cruelty of the Russians who have kept him prisoner long after the Crimean War. Though amnesiac, he recognizes his name in the regimental records, but lives only a few days.

Man Who Was Thursday, The (1908). A novel by G. K. Chesterton. It is a fantastic, witty allegory concerning anarchists, spies, and detectives. The theme, expressive of Chesterton's Catholicism, is the primacy and sanctity of order.

Man Who Would Be King, The (1889). A short story by Rudyard Kipling, originally published in his volume The Phantom Rickshaw. By dint of his natural shrewdness the white trader Daniel Dravot sets himself up as god and king in Kafristan, dividing the kingdom with his servant, Peachey Carnehan. A woman discovers that he is human and betrays him. After suffering terrible torture, Peachey escapes to tell the tale, but Dravot is killed.

Man Without a Country, The (1863). A story by Edward Everett Hale. Philip Nolan, a U.S. Navy officer, is involved in Aaron Burr's treason. In a moment of anger he expresses the wish never to hear the name of his country again. His desire is carried out as a sentence; for 55 years, Nolan is transferred from vessel to vessel, never landing and never hearing of his country through people, books, or newspapers.

Man with the Golden Arm, The (1949). A novel by Nelson Algren. Set in the slums of Chicago, the novel, which won a National Book Award in 1950, tells the story of Frankie Machine (Francis Majcinie) who is said to have a "golden arm" because of his sure touch with pool cues, dice, his drumsticks, and his heroin needle. Unable to free himself from his slum environment, Frankie is finally driven to suicide.

Man with the Hoe, The (1899). A poem by Edwin Markham. Inspired by Miller's celebrated painting of that title, it is a spirited protest against the wrongs of labor.

Man'yōshū (Collection of Myriad Leaves). The first Japanese poetry anthology (mid 8th century), containing some 4,500 poems written mostly during the seventh and eighth centuries. The poems reflect largely indigenous thought and beliefs and are one of the few literary sources for knowledge of Japan prior to the importation of the Chinese thought and culture of the Tang Dynasty (618-906).

Manzoni, Alessandro (1785–1873). Italian novelist, poet, and dramatist. The leader of the Italian romantic school, he is especially known for his great historical novel I Promessi Sposi. Manzoni was a patriot, a liberal, and a Catholic whose poetic and religious sensibility found expression in his fiction; in his Osservazioni Sulla Morale Cattolica (1819), an essay on the power of Christian ethics to transmute human life; and in his five hymn-poems entitled Inni Sacri (Sacred Hymns, 1822). His two tragedies Il Conte di Carmagnola (1820) and Adelechi (1821) are noteworthy for their moral, religious, and patriotic themes and for the author's intentional disregard of the traditionally accepted Aristotelian unities.

In his historical fiction Manzoni strove to synthesize historical fact and poetic imagination. His ultimate aim was to show the operation of divine providence in the everyday, seemingly insignificant actions of men. I Promessi Sposi became a model for subsequent Italian novels—for example, the work of D'Azeglio, Grossi, and Niccolini—and the refined modern Florentine that Manzoni used as a literary language established a precedent for modern Italian prose. Verdi honored his memory in his Manzoni Requiem (1874).

Mao Tse-tung (1893– ). Chairman of Central Committee of Chinese Communist Party. One of the early party leaders, he took part in the "Long March" (1934–1935), headed the Chinese Communist Party (1935), fought the Nationalists and the Japanese. He proclaimed the People's Republic (1949) and negotiated a 30-year treaty with Russia (1950). Author of many books, his Selected Works have appeared in several volumes (1954– ). His essay On Guerrilla Warfare has been translated into English (1961) and is considered a definitive work on this subject.

Map or Mapes, Walter (c. 1140–c. 1209). Welsh-born English courtier and satirist, later archdeacon of Oxford (1197–1209), a favorite at the court of Henry II. He was long considered the author of a lost prose version of the Launcelot story on which later accounts of the Arthurian legends were partly based, but the only work he is definitely known to have written is De Nugis Curialium (Courtiers' Trifles, 1180–1193), a collection of witty anecdotes, court gossip, and satirical denunciations. He was also reputed to be the author of large quantities of Goliardic verse; he certainly wrote light verse of Maradick. A character who recurs in various novels by Hugh Walpole. He first appears as the hero of Maradick at Forty (1910), and in subsequent novels as a mysterious figure in London clubs. He is connected with the village of "Treliss" in Cornwall.

Marañón y Posadillo, Gregorio (1888–1960). Spanish writer, physician, and professor of medicine. A versatile intellectual, Marañón was interested chiefly in the field of endocrinology. However, this did not prevent him from acquiring a reputation as a literary and historical scholar. He is best known for his detailed treatment of specific figures, as in Las ideas biológicas del padre Feijoo (1934), Tiberto; historia de un resentimiento (Tiberius: A Study in Resentment; 1939), and the earlier and well-known Ensayo biológico sobre Enrique IV de Castilla y su tiempo (1930).

Marat, Jean Paul (1743–1793). Swiss-born French politician and physician. At the beginning of the French Revolution he published the paper L'Ami du Peuple (1789), in which he advocated a republican form of government. With Danton and Robespierre, he overthrew the Girondists. He was assassinated in his bath by Charlotte Corday on July 13, 1793.

Marathon. A plain in Attica, northeast of Athens. Here the Greeks won a victory over the Persians (490 B.C.) that ended Darius' Greek ambitions. According to tradition, the news of the victory was brought back to Athens by a runner, Pheidippides, whose feat is commemorated in the modern marathon races, usually fixed at 26 miles, 365 yards.

Marble Faun, The (1860). A novel by Nathaniel Hawthorne. Donatello, an Italian sculptor, resembles the Faun of Praxiteles in appearance as well as in his natural spirits. An innocent admirer of Miriam, the darkly beautiful, mysterious art student, he is driven to kill her strange pursuer, Antonio. The act catapults him into reality; sinning, he moves from innocence to experience. The murder scene is witnessed by Hilda, a pure, pale artist. Guilty through her inadvertent participation in the crime, Hilda must confess the secret to a Catholic priest; later she and the sculptor Kenyon reveal their love. Donatello, matured by his crime, becomes a moral being and turns himself over to the authorities. In telling his story, Hawthorne treats the theme of the fortunate fall. Setting the novel in Rome, the author employs the landscape of that center of art and faith to add to the richness of the work.

Marbury vs. Madison (1803). The first case in which the U.S. Supreme Court declared that an act of Congress was contrary to the Constitution and was therefore invalid. The decision was delivered by Chief Justice John Marshall for "the unanimous Court." The precedent established in this case greatly increased the power of the court.

Marc, Franz (1880–1916). German artist. A founder of the Blaue Reiter group, he is known for his expressionist paintings of animals.

Marceau, Félicien (1913– ). Real name Louis Carett. Belgian novelist, essayist, and playwright. Balzacian in technique, such novels as Chair et cuir (1951), Bergère légère (1953; translated as The China Shepherdess), and Les Elans du Cœur (1955) reveal Marceau as a shrewd observer of the social scene. The style of the novels is without a trace of romanticism, lucid to the point of coldness. As author, Marceau plays the role of detached observer. His satire, often cruelly derisive, brutally rips the mask from the social comedy which he perceives. In his plays, L'Œuf (1956), La Bonne Soupe (1958) and L'Étouffé-Chrétien (1960), a deep pessimism lies beneath the keen wit. Farcical antics and comic buffoonery, as in Samuel Beckett's En Attendu Godot, express a nihilistic vision of absurdity and despair. But Marceau believes more optimistically than the dramatists of the absurds, that with his will and his intelligence man can combat absurdity.

Marcel, Gabriel (1889– ). French philosopher, dramatist, and critic. He introduced the writing of Søren Kierkegaard to France about 1925, and, a convert to Catholicism, became the leading French exponent of Christian existentialism, as presented in his Metaphysical Journal (1927), Being and Having (Etre et avoir; 1935), Homo Viator: Introduction to a Metaphysic of Hope (1944), The Philosophy of Existence (1949), The Mystery of Being (Le Mystère de l'Être; 1951). The importance of intuition and faith is also the theme of his plays, such as La Grâce (1921), A Man of God (Un Homme de Dieu; 1925), and The Beacon (Le Fanal; 1936).

Marcellus and Bernardo. In Shakespeare's Hamlet, 2 officers on night watch at Elsinore. They are the first to see the ghost of Hamlet's father.

March, Fredric (1897– ). American actor. Since 1927 he has been married to the actress Florence Eldridge (1901– ). He has appeared, often with his wife, in such notable plays as The Skin of Our Teeth, A Bell for Adano, Long Day's Journey into Night, and also in motion pictures.

March, Joseph Moncure (1809– ). American newspaper critic and poet. He is known for the two narrative poems The Wild Party (1928) and The Set-Up (1928). Both are hard-boiled stories, written in staccato rhythms and highly colloquial diction.

March, William. Pen name of William Edward March Campbell (1893–1954). American novelist and short-story writer. March's best-known novel is probably The Bad Seed (1954), the story of Rhoda Penmark, a charming but homicidal eight-year-old; it was dramatized by Maxwell Anderson in 1955. October Island (1952) deals with a missionary's wife who is transformed into a modern goddess by the natives on a South Sea island. He also wrote Company K (1933) and two collections of short stories, Some Like Them Short (1939) and Trial Balance (1945).

Marche, Olivier de la. See RHÉTORIQUES, LES GRANDS.

Märchen (Ger., little tale). A favorite narrative form in German romanticism. The term includes, but has a wider range than the English fairy tale. On one hand, it can refer to the simple Volksmärchen (folk tale), such as those collected by the brothers Grimm, or to tales written in imitation of the folk style. On the other, it can refer to the deeply philosophical, allegorical form of the Kunstmärchen (art tale), the definitive example of which is Goethe's Das Märchen (1798). Novális and Brentano also used this form. Basically, a Märchen is short and moves in a fantastic realm rather than in the real world. It March Hare usually has a happy ending, but not necessarily, as is seen in some written by Tieck. See E. T. A. Hoffmann.

March Hare. A character in Lewis Carroll’s Alice’s Adventures in Wonderland. At a mad tea party he offers Alice wine when there is none, and when reprimanded for putting butter in the Hatter’s watch, he replies, “It was the best butter.” The fact that hares are unusually shy and wild during March, their rutting season, gave rise to the popular expression “Mad as a March hare.” Carroll’s March Hare is a burlesque of the expression.

Marchioness, the. The half-starved girl-of-all-work in Charles Dickens’ Old Curiosity Shop. As she has no name of her own, Dick Swiveller calls her the Marchioness when he plays cards with her because it seems “more real and pleasant” to play with a Marchioness than with a domestic slavery. When Dick Swiveller falls sick, the Marchioness nurses him and he afterward marries her.

Taji, Marco (M. M. Millon) (1928). A play by Eugene O’Neill. The Marco of O’Neill’s play is Marco Polo, who is used as a whispering boy to express the dramatist’s scorn for mercenary souls. His Marco is interested only in making his million; he does not see that Kublai Khan’s daughter is in love with him and he serves her only for the bonus he hopes to receive. At last, he marries a fat, commonplace Venetian.

Marcus Aurelius. Full Latin name, Marcus Aurelius Antoninus (121–180). Roman emperor (161–180) and Stoic philosopher. As emperor, he was beset by internal disturbances—famines and plagues—and by the external threat posed by the Germans in the north and the Parthians in the east. As year after year he witnessed the gradual crumbling of the Roman frontiers, he turned more and more to the study of Stoic philosophy. Between battles he wrote down the philosophical reflections which were later collected and published as The Meditations of Marcus Aurelius. This collection of precepts (written in Greek) is perhaps the most readable exposition of Stoic philosophy that we possess.

Mardi and a Voyage Thither (1849). A novel by Herman Melville. His first literary treatment of metaphysical, ethical, and political problems, the book is overwhelmed by complexity. Begun as a narrative of adventure, it concludes as an allegory of mind.

A symbolic quest for Absolute Truth is undertaken by five men: Taji, the young monomaniacal hero; Bambalanja, a philosopher; Yoomy, a poet; Mobi, a historian; and King Media, a man of common sense. On King Media’s boat, they sail through the island archipelagoes of Mardi (the world), stopping at various countries, including Vivenzia, the U.S. Taji, who most resembles Melville, kills an Island priest, Aleema, in order to rescue Yillah, a beautiful white woman of seeming prelapsarian innocence. Yillah disappears, and Taji’s search for her becomes a search for truth and lost innocence. He, in turn, is sought by Hautta, the incarnation of sophisticated sexuality, who haunts him for the murder of Aleema. She becomes a symbol for guilt, and the need for repentance. Taji, pursued and pursuing, is last seen alone, sailing on desperate seas.

Mardi Gras (Fr., “fat Tuesday”). Last day of the pre-Lenten carnival in France, Shrove Tuesday. It is celebrated with all sorts of festivities. In Paris a fat ox used to be paraded through the principal streets, crowned with a fillet, and accompanied by mock priests and a band of tin instruments in imitation of a Roman sacrificial procession. In the U.S., New Orleans is famed for its Mardi Gras celebration. See also SHROVETIDE.

Marduk. A Babylonian warrior god. He was the son of Ea, the god of water and wisdom. When the other gods are all terrified by the invasion of Tiamat, the dragon of the sea, Marduk slays her. He makes heaven and earth of the two halves of her body and creates man of the bones and blood of Kingu, one of Tiamat’s henchmen. Part of Marduk’s supremacy in the pantheon of Assyria and Babylonia was due to the fact that he was the local Baal of Babylon. See WAR OF THE GODS.

Marfisa (Marphisa). A warrior maiden in the Orlando poems of Boiardo and Ariosto. In the version of Boiardo, she is the sister of Ruggero, and like him an ally of the pagan forces. In Ariosto, she joins him as a convert to the Christian faith and becomes an ally of the paladins fighting for Charlemagne.

Margarit. In an episode from the Orlando Furioso of Ariosto the father of two youths, Cilandro and Tanacro, both killed by the love of women. In revenge Margarit punishes all the women who come by his castle. He is punished in turn by Ruggero.

Margaret. See GRETCHE.

Margaret of Anjou (1430–1482). French-born queen of England. The daughter of René I of Anjou, she married Henry VI in 1445 and gave birth to her only son, Edward, in 1453, the same year in which Henry suffered a temporary fit of insanity. The rivalry between her and Richard, duke of York, who had been heir presumptive until the birth of Edward, brought on the Wars of the Roses between the houses of Lancaster and York. In 1471 she was captured, and Edward was killed at Tewkesbury, Henry dying in the Tower of London soon afterwards. She was freed in 1475.

In Henry VI: Parts I, II, and III, Shakespeare chronicles her development into a savage and imperious woman whom Richard Plantagenet calls:

She-wolf of France, but worse than wolves of France, Whose tongue more poisons than the adder’s tooth!

She also appears in Richard III.

Margaret of Navarre. Also known as Marguerite de Navarre, Marguerite de Valois, and Marguerite d’Angouleme (1492–1549). French queen and author. The sister of Francis I of France, she married Henri d’Albret, king of Navarre, after the death of her first husband, and transformed his court into a refuge for humanists, among them Marot, Calvin, and Lefèvre d’Etaples. Instilled with Platonic and Petrarchan mysticism, she devoted her life to culture and sacrifice for those she loved. She expressed her religious fervor and intimate joys and sorrows in such works of poetry as Miroir de l’amée pécheresse (1531) and Les Marguerites de la Marguerite des Princesse (1547). In the Heptameron she produced the first collection of French tales. Rabelais dedicated the third book of Gargantua and Pantagruel (1532–1564) to her soul. She is sometimes referred to as Marie de Médicis

Marguerite des marguerites (Fr., "pearl of pearls"), the name by which Francis called her.

Margaret of Valois. Known as Queen or Reine Margot (1553-1615). French queen. The daughter of Henry II of France and Catherine de Médicis, she married Henry of Navarre (later Henry IV of France) in 1572. The childless marriage was dissolved in 1599. Known for her learning and loose living, she was the author of interesting letters and Mémoires (1628).

Margaret Ogilvy (1896). A biography of her mother by J. M. Barrie.

Margawse or Morgause, Queen. In Arthurian legend, the wife of King Lot and mother of the knights Gawain, Garray, and Aggravaine. In Malory's Morte d'Arthur (c. 1469), she is also the mother, by King Arthur, of Sir Mordred. Margawse's son, Sir Gaheris, behooves her when he finds her with her lover, Sir Lamerok. Sir Gawain kills Lamerok. Margawse is Bellicent in Tennyson's Idylls of the King (1859-1872).

Marguerite. The heroine of Gounod's opera Faust and Boito's Mefistofele. She is based on the Gretchen in Goethe's Faust.

Margute. A demigiant in the Morgante Magiore of Pulci. A glutton and a vulgar scoundrel, Margute remains an excellent and loyal companion to Morgante. He dies of laughter on seeing a monkey pulling on his (Margute's) boots. One of the prime sources of Rabelais in his Gargantua and Pantagruel, Margute was referred to by Leigh Hunt as the first and greatest unmitigated scoundrel in history.

Maria. Olivia's maid in Shakespeare's Twelfth Night. A lively, quick-witted shrew, she instigates the intrigues against Malvolio and eventually marries Sir Toby Belch, Olivia's uncle.

Maria (1867). A novel by Jorge Isaacs (1837-1895), Colombian poet and novelist. Perhaps the most widely read South American novel, Maria is a romantic idyll which describes the ill-starred love affair between the title character and her cousin Efraín. Although the plot is flawingly sentimental by contemporary standards, the author's picture of life in Colombia's Cauca Valley, where the action takes place, retains its freshness and charm.

Maria Chapdelaine. See Louis Hémon.

Maria D'Aquino. The supposed natural daughter of King Robert of Naples, loved and celebrated by Giovanni Boccaccio as Fiammetta. It is now accepted that she and her affair with the author are largely fictional.

Mariage de Figaro, Le, ou La folle journée. See Figaro.

Mariage forcé, Le. See Sganarelle (3).

Maria Magdalena (1844). A play by Friedrich Hebbel in the tradition of the bourgeois tragedy, which goes back ultimately to Diderot. It is the tragedy of a girl named Klara who is pregnant by her worthless fiancé and becomes involved in a web of conflicting motives and obligations— including love for another man and fear of social reproof—that leads to her suicide.

In the preface to this play, Hebbel outlines his theory, largely influenced by Hegel, that great drama is only produced at moments in world history when an old order and a new order are in conflict. He believed that in his own day the world spirit was undergoing a crisis of self-consciousness which would eventually lead to a firmer, less superstitious basis for human institutions, and Maria Magdalena is intended to depict this crisis. The last words of the play are spoken by Klara's father, who is a representative of unbending tradition, and are "I don't understand the world any more." The play's title refers to the fact that, in her tragedy, Klara is symbolically purged of evil as St. Mary Magdalene was.

Marianne. The wife of Herod the Great. Friedrich Hebbel, in his tragedy Herodes und Marianne (1850), makes Marianne a prefiguration of the coming age of Christianity, thus interpreting the conflict between her and Herod as that between the modern and pagan world orders.

Mariana. The rejected fiancée of Angelo in Shakespeare's Measure for Measure. She remains faithful to him and pleads with Duke Vincentio to spare his life.

Marianne. The heroine of Marivaux's novel La Vie de Marianne. She combines virtue and coquetry; her reactions to the complicated series of events comprising her life are minutely analysed by the author.

Maria Stuart. See Mary Stuart.

Maria Theresa or Theresa (1717-1780). Archduchess of Austria and queen of Hungary and Bohemia (1740-1780). The War of the Austrian Succession (1740-1748) and the Seven Years' War (1756-1763) were fought during her reign to defend the Hapsburg dominions, which she inherited (see Pragmatic Sanction). Among her many children were Marie Antoinette and Joseph II.

Maria Vittoria. In the Ramayana, the half-brother of Ravana. Ravana orders him to assume the form of a golden deer to lure away Rama so that Ravana could abduct Rama's wife, Sita.

Marie Antoinette (1755-1793). Queen of France, wife of Louis XVI, whom she married when she was 15. As daughter of Maria Theresa of Austria, she sought Austria's aid against French Revolutionaries. In 1791 she counseled Louis XVI to attempt flight from France, an attempt which ended in their imprisonment. They were regarded as traitors and Marie Antoinette was guillotined on Oct. 16, 1793. Her personal charm, her naive ignorance of practical life, her extravagance, and her frank and courageous honesty contributed to her unpopularity both at court and with the French masses, who contemptuously called her Adrienne. When she was told that a revolution was threatening because the people had no bread, she is said to have replied, "Let them eat cake." See Diamond; Madame DÉFICT; M. et Mme. VÉTO; BAKER. See illustration on page 636.

Marie de France (c. 1200). French medieval poetess, thought to have been the half sister of Henry II of England. Most of her life seems to have been spent at the English court and her writings had a considerable influence on English writers. She is famous for her Breton lais, verse-narrative romances full of Celtic atmosphere and often making use of Arthurian materials. Some 15 of these lais are known, among them that of Sir Launfal. She also wrote a collection of beast fables, based on Aesop, called Ysopt or Isopt (little Aesop). See Breton Lai.

Marie de Médicis (1573-1642). Italian-born queen of France. The second wife of Henry IV, whom Marignano, battle of Marignano, battle of (1515). The meeting at which the French king Francis I defeated Massimiliano Sforza, heir of the deposed Lodovico, duke of Milan, this consolidating French control over Lombardy.

Marin, John (1872–1953). American painter. He was one of the New York artistic vanguard whose one-man shows were presented by Alfred Stieglitz at the beginning of the century. Marin used his major medium, watercolor, for his great subjects, New York’s skyscrapers and the coast of Maine.

Marina. In Shakespeare’s Pericles, the daughter of Pericles. He leaves her in Tarsus in the care of his friends Cleon and Dionyzia, who eventually attempt to assassinate her. She is abducted by pirates, sold into a brothel, but at last marries Lysimachus, governor of Mytilene, and is reunited with her family.

Marinell. See Faerie Queene, The.

Marinetti, Filippo Tommaso. See Futurism.

Marinism. A 17th-century literary style characterized by excessive ornateness and affectation. It was named after Giambattista Marino, the Italian poet famous for his artificial comparisons, pompous and overwrought descriptions, and conceits. See Gongorism.

Marino or Marini, Giambattista (1569–1625). Italian poet. During a colorful lifetime spent mainly at Italian and French courts, he produced a collection of lyrics, La Lira; a group of iconographic poems, La Galeria; pastoral idylls, such as La Sampogna; and a sacred epic (1632) on the Massacre of the Innocents. His masterpiece is the Adone (1623), a long mythological poem centered around the love of Venus and Adonis. Its style—like that of his own earlier poems and that of the Marinists, his followers—features elaborate conceits, frequent plays on words, rhetorical devices, and a floridly sensuous tone. His extension of Petrarchan love motifs and his preference for themes from classical Roman mythology are also characteristic of Marinism. In the following centuries, a reaction against Marinism, seen as part of a larger decadence (secentismo, or 17th-centuryism), lowered his reputation to near oblivion. Recently, he has returned to literary discussion as a major example of the baroque style in poetry.

Marino Faliero (1820). A historical tragedy in verse by Lord Byron. Faliero, the 49th doge of Venice, joins a conspiracy to overthrow the republic, but he is betrayed and subsequently beheaded upon the Giant’s Staircase, where doges traditionally take the oath of fidelity. Though the historical Faliero joined the conspiracy in hope of becoming king, Byron explains Faliero’s complicity as the result of his fury at the Council of Forty for meting out an insufficient sentence to Michel Steno, an indecent young noble who has scurrilously libeled the dogessa.

Mario and the Magician (Mario und der Zauberer; 1930). A story by Thomas MANN. It is told from the point of view of a German family in an Italian resort town. Centering about the performance of a magician named Cipolla who brutally humiliates several members of his audience by hypnotic means, the story is at least partly intended as a warning against a masochistic fascination with the oppression of fascism, but it is nonetheless a convincing work of art. Cipolla is finally shot and killed by a very ordinary young waiter named Mario, whom he has mocked in an especially cruel way.

Marion, Francis (1732–1795). American Revolutionary soldier. He was known as “the Swamp Fox” because of his skill in retreating—Indian-fashion—to swamps and forests after quick and effective raids on British forces. He participated in the battle of Eutaw Springs, S.C. (Sept. 8, 1781). William Cullen Bryant wrote a Song of Marion’s Men (1831). See Katherine Walton.

Maritain, Jacques (1882–1973). French Catholic philosopher and man of letters. Reared as a Protestant, Maritain was converted to Roman Catholicism in 1906; Charles Peguy and Léon Bloy were influential figures in his spiritual development. Bergson, his teacher, restored his sense of the Absolute but was severely criticized by Maritain in La Philosophie bergsonienne (1914). The philosophy of St. Thomas Aquinas, an ordered system able to reconcile faith and reason and to acknowledge the coexistence of freedom and the divine in man, alone could satisfy his needs. Systematically and energetically, he published critical studies of those philosophers whose thinking seemed to him faulty or inadequate. In Antimodernism (1922) and Trois Réformateurs (1925) he levels a sharp attack against Luther, Descartes, Rousseau, and Pascal for distorting modern thought. His own philosophy, neo-Thomism, is expounded in Eléments de philosophie (1923-1930), Distinguer pour unir, ou les Degrés de savoir (1932), Humanisme intégral (1936), and Confession de foi (1941), first published in English as I Believe (1939). Maritain came to America after the fall of France in 1940 and taught at Columbia, Princeton, and the Institute of Medieval Studies in Toronto.
The Autobiography of Mark Rutherford, The

A brilliant although often dogmatically assertive thinker, Maritain has made significant contributions to the fields of aesthetics, ethics, and politics. Art et Scolastique (1920) is a lucid attempt to use scholastic philosophy as the basis of an aesthetic. His political works include Scholasticism and Politics (1940), Le Cépiguscle de la civilisation (1941) and The Rights of Man and Natural Law (1943).

Marius, [Caius] (157-86 B.C.), Roman general, consul, and leader of republican Rome's popular party. Born of plebeian stock, Marius was a lifelong, fastidious foe of the privileged aristocracy. After a brilliant career as soldier and strategist, he won, in 107 B.C., the Roman consulate. Soon after he led a successful campaign against the African prince Jugurtha (107-105). It was here that his career first intercepted that of the aristocrat Lucius Cornelius Sulla, the man who was to become his mortal enemy. Through 15 years (105-90) Marius and Sulla vied for popular acclaim. In 90, after the Social War had been successfully concluded, Roman civil war broke out. For four bloody years thereafter, Rome was the pawn of these two ruthless generals. As one rival recovered, the other's supporters were purged. The reprisals did not end with the death of Marius (86), but continued until Sulla was absolute master of Rome (82).

Marius the Epicurean (1885). A philosophic romance by Walter Pater. The hero is a Roman noble of the time of Marcus Aurelius, and the book records his sensations and ideas rather than outward events. Though he makes no formal profession of Christianity, Marius is greatly drawn to it through his friend Cornelius and his own high principles and deeply religious nature. His death is of such a nature that the Christian Church looks upon him as a martyr.

Marivaux, Pierre Carlet de Chamblain de (1688-1763). French dramatist and novelist. He is most famous for some of his comedies which analyze the vicissitudes of the heart during courtship: timidity, jealousy, misunderstandings-in brief, the subtle psychological aspects of the game of love. Among this type of play are Le Jeu de l'amour et de l'avarice (1730), Les Fauxes confidences (1737), and L'Epreuve (1740). Other plays by Marivaux are mythological, social, philosophical, or romanesque in theme, and his treatment of them is strikingly fanciful. His subtly nuanced, precious language is so peculiar to him that the term marivaudage has been coined to describe it. Marivaux's two unfinished novels La Vie de Marianne (1731-41), completed by Mme Ricolboni, and Le Paysan parvenu (1735), combine penetrating analyses of characters' states of mind, and a vivid, often realistic picture of all classes of Parisian society.

Mark, St. The author of the Gospel of St. Mark, the second book of the New Testament. Little is known about his life. He is famed as the patron saint of Venice.

Mark, King. In the medieval legend of Tristan and Iseult, king of Cornwall, husband of Iseult, and uncle of Tristan. He has the misfortune to be in the generally unsympathetic position of cuckold, but in most versions, the drama of the tale in which his wife and favorite nephew are lovers is intensified by the nobility and sensitivity of King Mark. In the version of Gottfried von Strassburg (c. 1210) particularly, the psychological conflict becomes the more acute through the character of the king whose understanding of the situation makes of him a tragic figure almost surpassing in importance the lovers themselves. In Malory's Morte d'Arthur (c. 1469), on the contrary, he is a base figure intent only on the death of Sir Tristram (Tristan). See Tristram of Lyonesse.

Mark, The Gospel According to St. The 3rd book of the New Testament. One of the Synoptic Gospels, it is generally held to be the earliest account of Jesus' life; scholars date it about A.D. 70. Tradition ascribes it to John Mark (Marcus), the traveling companion of Paul and friend of Peter. The narrative is simple and is obviously written for Christians who wanted a history of Jesus. Mark was a source for the later gospels of Luke and Matthew.

Markandaya, Kamala (1923- ). Indian novelist writing in English. A journalist in Britain since 1947, Markandaya has published Nectar in a Sieve (1955), and Some Inner Fire (1959).

Markham, Edwin (1852-1940). American poet. He is best known for his protest against the exploitation of the poor in The Man with the Hoe. The popular success of the poem was due both to its message and to its sonorous and rhetorical style; its popularity allowed Markham to abandon teaching and to devote himself to writing and lecturing. His Lincoln, the Man of the People, published in Lincoln, and Other Poems (1901), has also been widely known and read. Markham published several other volumes of verse, including The Ballad of the Gallows Bird (1896), Gates of Paradise and Other Poems (1920), and Collected Poems (1940).

Markham, Gervase (1568?-1637). English writer on war, horsemanship, forestry, cookery, and hawking, and author of poems and plays. Markham is remembered especially for his versified account (1595) of Sir Richard Grenville's heroic naval battle against the Spanish fleet (a theme also treated by Tennyson) and for The English Arcadia (1607).

Marko Kraljevic. Literally, Marko, son of the king, a Serbian national hero. Prominent also in Bulgarian and Romanian folk lore, he lived, according to popular tradition, 300 years, fighting all the time against foreign oppressors, especially the Turks. Historians give him about 60 years (1335?-1394).

Mark Rutherford, The Autobiography of (1881). A novel by William Hale Whitt. With its sequel Mark Rutherford's Deliverance (1885), it presents the story of an idealistic young minister tormented by intellectual skepticism, his break with the church, and the gradual working out of his ideals in a life of social service.

Marlborough, 1st duke of John Churchill (1650–1722). English military leader. The son of the impoverished Sir Winston Churchill, he was assisted in advancing his fortunes by his sister Arabella, who was the mistress of the duke of York, later James II. At the outbreak of the War of the Spanish Succession (1702–1712), he was named commander of the English forces and defeated the French at the battles of Blenheim, Ramillies, Oudenarde, and Malplaquet. His wife Sarah, the famous duchess of Marlborough, was Queen Anne's closest friend for many years.

Marlow. The narrator of a number of tales and novels by Joseph Conrad. He is a kind of detective of the conscience, who studies the moral dilemma of other men in order to understand himself better. By using this character to narrate the stories (usually to his friends, at night, to the accompaniment of drinks and cigars), Conrad is able to develop the impersonal, oblique method of storytelling employed by Henry James. Marlow describes and analyzes the various sources from which he has collected his information and comments on the significance of the events he narrates. Among the tales he tells are Lord Jim, Youth, Heart of Darkness, and Chance.

Marlowe, Christopher (1564–1593). English dramatist and poet. Born at Canterbury, the son of a shoemaker, Marlowe attended Benet College (now Corpus Christi), where he took his B.A. in 1584, his M.A. in 1587. His life has become a legend, with its gay disdain for all convention, its irreverence, its reckless vitality. He was killed in a quarrel with a man named Ingram Frizer over the settlement of a tavern bill for supper and ale.

Considered the greatest figure in Elizabethan drama before Shakespeare, Marlowe raised the conventional, academic tragedy of his time, rigidly held within the limitations of the Senecan form, to a level of serious and emotionally gripping art. Tamburlaine, his first play, appeared in 1587. Blank verse, formerly stiff and wooden, sprang to life in his hands; the splendid utterances of the Scythian conqueror earned Marlowe's verse the praise of "mighty line." The Tragic History of Dr. Faustus, not entered on the Stationer's Register until 1601, was probably performed in 1588; The Jew of Malta was probably produced in 1589. Each of these dramas is dominated by a single character whose force of personality alone gives unity to the play. Tamburlaine, Faustus, and Barabas are all gripped by a master passion, a Renaissance longing for infinite beauty or riches or power. In Edward II, entered on the Stationer's Register in 1593, Marlowe revealed a ripening and maturing of his dramatic and lyrical gifts. The play has less surface glitter and a graver, wiser understanding of human weakness and limitation. No longer dependent on the superhuman power of one main figure for its coherence, Edward II contains several finely drawn characters and is skillfully plotted. Its poetry, too, is less startling but far more subtle in its varied use of the blank verse line. Marlowe may also have written Dido, Queen of Carthage (c. 1593, with Thomas Nash) and The Massacre at Paris (1593). Some scholars believe he may have had a hand in the writing of some of Shakespeare's plays, among them Titus Andronicus, Henry IV, and Richard III.

Marlowe's lyric poetry is graceful, musical, and warmly sensuous. It includes a translation of Ovid's Amores (c. 197); Hero and Leander (1598) based on the poem by Musaeus, left unfinished at Marlowe's death, and completed by George Chapman; a translation of the first book of Lucan's Pharsalia, published in 1600; and the famous lyric The Passionate Shepherd, published in England's Helicon (1600).

Marlowe, Julia. Real name: Sarah Frances Frost (1866–1950). English-born American actress. She was particularly successful in Shakespearean roles, especially after her second marriage (1911) to E. H. Sothern. The most acclaimed of their joint appearances was in Romeo and Juliet.

Marmeladov. A drunken, Micawber-like character in Feodor Dostoevski's Crime and Punishment. His comicity is compounded with tragedy when he reveals to Raskolnikov that his daughter Sonya has been forced into prostitution to support the family. Marmeladov dies after being struck by a coach in the street.

Marmion, A Tale of Flodden Field (1808). A romantic narrative poem by Sir Walter Scott, set in the time of Henry VIII. Lord Marmion rejects his betrothed, Constance, and attempts unsuccessfully to secure the wealthy Lady Clare in marriage. Ultimately he is slain at the battle of Flodden Field (1513). See Lochinvar.

Márnom, José. See Amalia.

Marmontel, Jean François (1723–1799). French critic, dramatist, and short-story writer. He contributed articles on literature to the Encyclopédie. His works include the tragedy Denys le tyran (1748); the novels Bélisaire (1766), a plea for religious tolerance, and Les Incas, ou La Destruction de l'Empire du Pérou (1777), an indictment of slavery; and the Contes moraux (1761–1786). His Mémoires d'un père (1804), written for his children, offers a valuable picture of 18th-century French society. He became a member of the French Academy in 1763.

Marnix, Philip van. Baron Sint Aldegonde (1538–1598). A Flemish writer and statesman, active in the liberation of the Netherlands and the propagation of Protestantism. His De Byencor der h. Roomschker Kercke (The Beehive of the Holy Church of Rome, 1569) is a fierce and Rabelaisian attack on Catholicism. He is the putative author of the Dutch national song "Wilhelmus van Nassouwen."

Maro, Publius Vergilius. See Vergil.

Marot, Clément (1496–1544). French poet, known for his light and graceful lyrics. His work marks the transition between medieval poetry, whose elaborate techniques were perpetuated by the Rhétoriqueurs, and the poetry of the Renaissance, which modeled itself after classical and Italian forms. He brought to the tortured poetic techniques of the Rhétoriqueurs a natural facility for playing with words and the sparkle of an engaging personality. He treated the modern forms, such as the Italian sonnet which he introduced into French literature, with the same freshness and vivacity. A critical spirit led him to question traditional Catholic doctrines and to undertake his famous translation from Latin of the Psalms (1541–1543). This religious independence caused him to be suspected of sympathizing with the Protestant reform movement and cost him imprisonment and periodic flights into exile in Navarre and Ferrara and in Calvin's Geneva (1542–1543). His buoyant verve, satirical wit, and elegant, tactful gaiety endeared him, alone of all the 16th-century poets, to the classic poets of the 17th century.
Marryat, Frederick

Marpessa. In Greek legend, daughter of Evenus, courted by both Idas and Apollo. When Idas opposed his mortal strength to that of the god and carried her off, Zeus intervened to insure Marpessa the lover of her own choice. Fearing that Apollo would tire of her when she lost her youth, she decided in favor of Idas.

Marpellite controversy. The name given to the vituperative pamphlet war (1588–1590) between the Puritans and the Church of England. In 1588 appeared a number of pamphlets, printed by a secret press and purportedly written by one Martin Marpellite, attacking the Established Church and particularly the Episcopacy. Thinking that the best way to answer “Martin” would be in his own trentach, witty style, the church authorities secretly hired writers—notably Robert Greene and Thomas Nashe—to publish replies. In 1590 the Marpellite press was discovered and the printer, one Penry, executed. The real author may have been Job Throckmorton, who escaped execution. Seven of the Marpellite pamphlets are extant, and contain some of the best satirical writing of the time.

Marquand, John Phillips (1892–1960). American novelist. He is best known for his studies of upper-class New Englanders struggling to maintain their aristocratic, Puritan standards in the 20th century. These are contained in The Late George Apley, Wickford Point, and H. M. Pulham, Esq. Marquand also wrote a number of popular detective stories about the keen-witted Mr. Moto. Marquand’s shorter writings were collected in Thirty Years (1954). His later books include B. F.’s Daughter (1946), about a domineering tycoon and his domineering offspring; Point of No Return; Melville Goodwin, U.S.A. (1951), the story of a typical American military officer; Sincerely, Willisy Wayde (1955), a satirical business novel; Women and Thomas Harrow (1958), about the New York theater of the 1920’s. The posthumously published Timothy Dexter Revisited (1960) returns to Newburyport, Mass., the setting of the earlier Lord Timothy Dexter (1925). See Timothy Dexter.

Marquina, Eduardo (1879–1946). Spanish poet and dramatist. Marquina was a leading exponent of modernism in Spanish poetry. His early works, Odas (1900) and Vendimión (1909), are somewhat romantic in tone and infused with a pantheistic flavor. Later the poet turned to social problems as in Canciones del momento (1910) and Tierras de España (1914). As a playwright he achieved success with his historical dramas, particularly with Las hijas del Cid (1908), Doña Maria la Brava (1909), and his masterpiece, En Flandes se ha puesto el sol (1910), which deals with the campaigns in the Low Countries during the reign of Philip II.

Marquis, Don[ald Robert Perry] (1878–1937). American newspaperman and humorist. In his early career an assistant editor to Joel Chandler Harris, who encouraged his tendency toward fantasy, Marquis was known for his columns “The Sun Dial” in the New York Sun and “The Lantern” in the New York Tribune. His most memorable writings are his stories and verses about Archy and Mehitabel. Among other characters created by Marquis were Glen Hawley, the Old Soak, an uninhibited enemy of prohibition; Hermione and her Little Group of Serious Thinkers, all apostles of the platitudinous; the Cave Man and his battered lady love. These appeared in several books, including Hermione (1916), The Old Soak (1916), and Love Sonnets of a Cave Man and Other Verses (1928). Noah an’ Jonah an’ Cap’n John Smith (1921) is a poem depicting the celestial reminiscences of the three dead mariners. The Dark Hours (1924) is a play about the last days of Jesus. At his death, Marquis left an incomplete autobiographical novel, Sons of the Puritans, which was later published (1939).

Marriage of Figaro, The. See Figaro.

Marriage of Heaven and Hell, The (1790). The chief prose work of William Blake, setting forth his doctrine of Contraries and emphasizing the negative side of his dualistic thinking. He writes: “Without Contraries is no progression. Attraction and repulsion, reason and energy, love and hate, are necessary to human existence.” He denies matter as reality, eternal damnation, and the right of authority; specifically, he attacks the rationalism of 18th-century Protestantism for reducing moral complexities to oversimplified formulas.

Marriage of William Ashe, The (1905). A political novel by Mrs. Humphry Ward dealing with the married life of Ashe and his turbulent, unconventional wife, Kitty, and her lover, Geoffrey Cliff. The story is said to be based on the characters of, and the relationships existing between Melbourne, Lady Caroline Lamb, and Byron.

Marric, J. J. See John Creasey.

Marrow controversy. A prolonged struggle in Scotland between Puritanism and Presbyterianism. It arose when Edward Fisher’s Marrow of Modern Divinity (1644), a book of ultra-evangelical tendency, was condemned by the General Assembly in 1718.

Marryat, Captain Frederick (1792–1848). English novelist. Marryat wrote his first novel, Frank Mildmay, or the Naval Officer (1829), in his late thirties after a distinguished career in the British Navy. With his expert knowledge of nautical life, his vigor and humor, he produced some outstanding early specimens of the novel of the sea. Such books as Peter Simple (1834), Mr. Midshipman Easy (1836), and Masterman Ready (1841; first in a series of books for children) excel in the depiction of character and incident, and still possess a considerable degree of vitality.

For many years Marryat’s books were favorites of boys all over the English-speaking world. He is also well known for his Diary in America (1839), a generally negative view of the United States written during travels here.

Mars. An Italian god of fertility whose month, March, began the spring season of growth and fruitfulness and who later took on the aspects of the Greek god of war, Ares. In Rome the great park and parade ground, the Campus Martius, was dedicated to him; when war was declared, the general would come before his legions and, striking a shield against the ground, would intone the words Mars vigilat ("Mars, awake!"). In Roman poetry the word Mars is often used, through personification, as a synonym for war.

Camões introduces him in the Portuguese epic The Lusiad (1572) as typifying divine fortune; as Bacchus, the evil demon, is the guardian of the power of Islam, so Mars is the guardian of Christianity.

Marschallin, The. See RozenKavalier, DER.

Marse Chan (1884). A story by Thomas Nelson Page. Written in dialect, the story is told by the servant of a likable Southerner, whom he calls Marse Chan. The hero and his beloved are separated by family pressures, but are reconciled just before he is killed on the battlefield. She mourns him for the rest of her life. Marse Chan is the most famous of Page's nostalgic stories of antebellum Southern life.

Marseillaise, La. The hymn of the French Revolution. Claude Joseph Rouget de Lisle, an artillery officer in garrison at Strasbourg, composed both the words and the music (April 24, 1792) with the title Chant de guerre pour l'armée du Rhin. On July 30, 1792, volunteers from Marseilles entered Paris singing the song, and the Parisians, enchanted with it, called it the Chant des Marseillais and later La Marseillaise. It has often been made use of by later composers, as for instance by Schumann in his music for Heine's poem The Two Grenadiers (1840), and by Tchaikovsky in his Festival Overture, "1812" (1880).

Marsh, Ngaio (1899— ). New Zealand detective story writer and theatrical producer. "Ngaio" is the Maori word for "flowering tree," pronounced Ny-o. Among her works are A Man Lay Dead (1934), Death in Ecstasy (1937), Night at the Valkain (1951), False Scent (1960), and Hand in Glove (1962).

Marshall, George C[atlett] (1880—1959). American general and statesman. A graduate of Virginia Military Institute (1901), Marshall served in the Philippines and with the American Expeditionary Forces during World War I. From 1919 to 1924 he was an aide to General Pershing. Named army chief of staff in 1929, he became the second non-West Pointer to hold this post and played a leading role in formulating Allied strategy during World War II. After going to China in 1945 as special ambassador in an unsuccessful attempt to mediate between Chiang Kai-shek and the Chinese Communists, Marshall was appointed secretary of state by President Truman. On June 5, 1947, in a commencement speech at Harvard, he outlined the principles of the European Recovery Program (known as the Marshall Plan) by which the U.S. contributed to the postwar rehabilitation of Europe. Marshall also served as secretary of defense from 1950 to 1951. In 1953 he was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize.

Marshall, John (1755—1835). American jurist.

After serving as one of the commissioners in the X.Y.Z. Affair, Marshall was secretary of state for a short time. He was named chief justice of the Supreme Court in 1801. During his 34 years on the bench, he greatly increased the influence of the Supreme Court and interpreted the Constitution so as to strengthen the federal government at the expense of the states. See Marbury vs. Madison.

Marshalsea. A prison in Southwark, London, long used as a debtors’ prison but abolished in 1842. It is described in Little Dorrit by Charles Dickens, whose father had once been consigned to it. The spelling of the name is derived from ‘marshalsey.’

Marshes of Glynn, The (1878). A poem by Sidney Lanier. Often considered his masterpiece, it was contributed to a volume of 175 poems by noted authors, none of whom signed his name. In this poem, notable for its skillful and varied use of anapestic meter, Lanier reached the height of his lifelong attempt to reconcile the techniques of music and poetry. Its lush imagery sensuously depicts the sea marshes of Glynn County, Ga., visited by Lanier in 1875.

Marsigli, Luigi (c. 1330—1394). Italian humanist. An Augustinian monk and disciple of Petrarch, he is considered one of the early Humanists by virtue of his influence on scholars who gathered about him in Florence in what was a prototype of the later academies of the Renaissance.

Marsile, Marsilius, Marsiglio. A king of the Saracens in medieval romances. See Roland, Chanson de.

Marston, John (c. 1575—1634). English satirist and dramatist. His plays are almost all concerned with depictions of unbalanced love and lust. In his best work, The Malcontent and The Dutch Courtezan, his satiric power is couched in a dramatic structure which, if not extraordinary, is at least adequate. In other works, such as The Insatiate Countess (pub. 1613), dramatic structure all but disappears, and moral indignation degenerates to the level of hysteria. His other plays include Historiorumastico (1599), Antonio and Mellida (1599), Antonio’s Revenge (1600), Jack Drum’s Entertainment (c. 1600), What You Will (1601), and Sophonisba (c. 1605–1606), a tragedy.

Ben Jonson attacked Marston in The Poetaster (1601), but they were reconciled and collaborated with George Chapman on Eastward Ho (1605), a comedy. Because the play contained passages offensive to the Scottish followers of James I, the three playwrights were briefly imprisoned.

Marston also wrote The Metamorphosis of Pigmotions Image (1598) and The Scourge of Villainy (1598), coarsest satirical poems.

Marston Moor. A plain in Yorkshire, England, scene of a battle (1644) during the Civil War. A combined Scottish and Parliamentary army led by Sir Thomas Fairfax and Oliver Cromwell defeated the Royalist forces under Prince Rupert of Bohemia, nephew of Charles I. As a result of the victory, Parliament won control of northern England.

Marsuppini, Carlo (1388—1453). Italian poet and man of letters. A member of the Medici circle and chancellor of Florence, he translated Homer and continued the Humanist tradition begun by the previous generation of Petrarch, Marsigli, and Salutati.

Marsyas. A Phrygian flute-player. He challenged Apollo to a contest of skill, and, being beaten by the god, was flayed alive for his presumption. From his blood arose the river so called.

Martano. A great braggart in the ORLANDO Furioso of Ariosto, he wins Origille (Origilla) from Grifone (Gryphion) but behaves in cowardly fashion during a tourney held at Damascusa. While Grifone is asleep, Martano steals his armor and masquerading as Grifone goes to receive the victor's honors, due from king Norandino. He then flees with Origille until brought back by Grifone's brother, Aquilante (Aquilant). Eventually he is hanged.

Martel, Charles. See Charles Martel.

Martello tower. A circular masonry fort. The word is a misinterpretation of the original Mortella, from Cape Mortella in Corsica where a Martello tower repulsed an attack by the British fleet in 1794. In Joyce's Ulysses, Stephan Dedalus and his friend Buck Mulligan live in one in Dublin.

Martial, Sir Oliver. In Shakespeare's As You Like It, a vicar whom Touchstone mocks.

Martha, St. The sister of Lazarus and Mary. When Jesus came to their house, Mary sat at his feet and listened, but Martha "was cumbered about much serving" and complained of her sister to Jesus. She is the patron saint of good housewives and is represented in art in homely costume, bearing at her girdle a bunch of keys and holding a ladle or pot of water in her hand.

Martí, José [Julian] (1853-1895). Cuban poet and essayist. Martí is famous, not only as the "apostle" of Cuban independence, but also as one of the most original and influential writers of Latin America. As a youth he was imprisoned and later deported from Cuba because of his opposition to Spanish rule; he remained an exile for most of his life. From 1891 to 1895 he resided in New York, earning a precarious livelihood as a newspaper correspondent, as Uruguayan consul, as a teacher and translator. At the same time he tirelessly collected funds, made speeches, and founded the Cuban Revolutionary Party in order to prepare a military expedition that would drive the Spaniards from the island. In 1895, Martí decided to return to Cuba to take advantage of renewed revolutionary sentiment there. His journal, Diario de Cabo Haitiano a Do Síos (1941), and letters to family and friends record his emotions as he and General Máximo Gómez reached Cuba with four companions and joined other insurgents. During a skirmish at Do Síos, Martí disobeyed Gómez' order to retreat and was killed by Spanish soldiers.

Martí, the poet, is often regarded as a forerunner of modernism, though in reality his work belongs to no school. His verses, written in a fresh, uniquely personal style adherent, sometimes mystically, with familial and romantic love, freedom, and death. His best-known poems are in three collections: Imágenes (1882), addressed to his young son; Versos libres, written mainly in 1882 but not published until the 20th century; and Versos sencillos (1891). Many of his prose works, such as the essays Nuestra América (1891) and Simón Bolívar (1893), express his faith in the future greatness of Hispanic America. A perceptive critic of the U.S., Martí also wrote articles on such topics as Coney Island (1881), Emerson (1882), Jesse James (1882), and Walt Whitman (1887).

Martial. Full Latin name, Marcus Valerius Martialis (A.D. 42?-1012). Latin epigrammatist born in Spain. He spent most of his life in Rome and, as a witty man of letters, was accepted in high imperial circles. His friends included the emperors Titus, Domitian, and Trajan as well as the lettere Pliny the Younger. Martial's favorite form of writing was the epigram. His epigrams have come down to us in 15 books and present a graphic picture of life and manners in first-century Rome. Unlike his satric contemporary Juvenal, Martial seems to have aimed more for elegant grotesquerie than for the exposure of moral evils.

Martianus Capella or Marcian (fl. 5th century). Latin author of North Africa. He is best known for his De Nuptiis Philologiae et Mercurii (Concerning the Marriage of Mercury and Philology), an allegorical work on the seven liberal arts, which is mentioned by Chaucer in the House of Fame and the Merchant's Tale.

Martin, St. The patron saint of innkeepers and drunkards. Usually he is shown in art as a young mounted soldier dividing a cloak with a beggar. He was born of heathen parents but was converted in Rome, and became bishop of Tours in 371, dying at Caude thirty years later. His day is November 11, the day of the Roman Vinalia, or Feast of Bacchus; hence his purely accidental patronage (as above), and hence also the phrase Martin drunk.

The usual illustration of St. Martin is in allusion to the legend that when he was a military tribune stationed at Amiens, he once, in midwinter, divided his cloak with a naked beggar, who craved alms of him before the city gates. At night, the story says, Christ Himself appeared to the soldier, arrayed in this very garment.

Martin, Violet. See E. O. Somerville.

Martin Chuzzlewit, The Life and Adventures of (1844). A novel by Charles Dickens. Wealthy old Martin Chuzzlewit, Sr. is surrounded by a greedy, grasping, selfish family: Anthony Chuzzlewit, his brother; the villainous Jonas, Anthony's son; and Seth Pecksniff, a crafty hypocrite. Detecting incipient selfishness and greed in his grandson, young Martin, Chuzzlewit turns him from the house almost penniless; Martin is in love with Mary Graham, an orphan raised by the old Chuzzlewit. Thus turned away, Martin travels to the U.S. with his loyal friend Mark Tapley. Here he becomes an architect for the Eden Land Corporation, a fraudulent enterprise in which he loses everything. He contracts a fever and almost dies. He returns home to England cured of his selfishness by his difficult experiences in America, his grandfather accepts him, and he and Mary Graham are married. A subplot deals with Jonas Chuzzlewit, who tries to poison his old father, murders Montague Tigg because Tigg knows his secret, and marries Mercy Pecksniff, making her utterly miserable. He commits suicide to save his neck from the gallows.

In Martin Chuzzlewit Dickens slashes away at the ignorant provincialism of Americans (the section of the book which takes place in the U.S. was extremely offensive to the American public) and dissects the selfish, grasping nature of Englishmen of the Chuz-zliewit variety. One of Dickens's most memorable characters, Sarah GAMP, appears in this novel.

Martin du Gard, Roger (1881-1958). French novelist and dramatist. An objective narrative and rational analysis of the intellectual and moral problems of the pre-WWI generation characterize both Jean Barois and the eight-part series Les Thibaults. The novel The Postman (Vielle France; 1933) is a satiric study of small town life, as are the peasant forces for the stage Le Testament du Père Luel (1914) and La Gondflue (1928). Martin du Gard's other works include the short novel La Conférence africaine (1931) and the drama Un Tucketune (1951). He received the Nobel Prize in 1957.

Martineau, Harriet (1802-1876). English author, a voluminous writer on religion, economics, and government. Deaf from early childhood, Miss Martineau was raised in a stern, resolutely pious, and intellectual atmosphere. Her earliest works, such as Devotional Exercises for the Use of Young Persons (1823), were of a religious character, but she became famous for a series of stories illustrating the economic theories of such contemporary thinkers as Malthus, Ricardo, and Mill. These tales, Illustrations of Political Economy (1832-1834); Poor Laws and Paupers Illustrated (1833); and Illustrations of Taxation (1843), combine sentimental fiction with dreary paraphrases of fact and theory. They were immensely popular in their time. Of continuing interest is her Autobiography (1877) and her unfavorable critiques of America, Society in America (1837) and Retrospect of Western Travel (1838). She also wrote children's stories, two novels, and a condensed translation of Comte's Philosophie Positive (1853). Her later work shows a reaction against religious principles. Her brother, James Martineau (1805-1900), was a Unitarian clergyman and author of philosophical works, very highly regarded in his day. His better-known books include Types of Ethical Theory (1885) and The Study of Religion (1888).

Martineau-Bellême, Thérèse. See Red Lily, The.

Martin Eden (1909). A novel by Jack London. Partly autobiographical, it is the story of an unsuccessful writer who is rejected by his wealthy fiancée; only Russ Brissenden, a socialist poet, appreciates his work. When Eden becomes rich and famous, the very people who once rejected him try to court his favor. In disgust, he leaves for the South Seas, but commits suicide on the way.

Martínez de la Rosa, Francisco (1787-1862). Spanish statesman and dramatist. Although his political career carried him through the posts of emissary, ambassador, and prime minister, he is better known as a dramatist, particularly as one representative of the drift from the classic to the romantic; he is credited with the first widely acclaimed romantic drama, La conjuración de Venecia (1834), which is set in 14th-century Venice. He is also the author of Abén Huyeya (1836), a historical drama containing romantic elements which deals with the Christian campaign against the Moors in the Alpujarras.

Martínez de Toledo, Alfonso. Also known as the archpriest or arciépreste of Talavera (1396-1470). Spanish prose writer. He is best known for El Corbacho o Reparación del amor mundano, similar in some respects to Boccaccio's Corbaccio. A forerunner of the picaresque novel, the work is noted for its scathing denunciation of the foibles and vices of women.

Martínez Ruiz, José. Known as Azorín (1874-1958). Spanish essayist and novelist. His sensitive use of the Castilian landscape links Azorín to the GENERACIÓN DEL 98; in fact, he was to the first to call the group by this name. Though he attempted nearly every literary genre, he excelled as an essayist. In El alma castellana (1900), he revealed the characteristics for which he is best known: an emphasis on the recurrence of time and a style characterized by short sentences and an accumulation of seemingly insignificant details. He also wrote two autobiographical novels, La voluntad (1902) and Antonio Azorín (1903), the latter furnishing him with his pseudonym, and Una hora de España (An Hour of Spain, 1560-1590, 1924).

Martínez Sierra, Gregorio (1881-1947). Spanish dramatist. Though he was the author of a volume of verse and several novels, Martínez Sierra's fame rests on his plays, particularly the widely translated Canción de cuna (The Cradle Song, 1911). A skillful depiction of convent life, the play centers about an abandoned child discovered upon the steps of a convent. The second half of the work finds the child come of age and ready to leave the convent for the world. The drama reveals Martínez Sierra to have been influenced by Benavente. Most of his work was written in collaboration with his wife, María Lejaraga, though her name did not always appear as co-author.

Martin Fierro (1872). A narrative poem by José Fernández (1834-1886), Argentine poet and journalist. The principal poetic work of the gaucho genre is a first-person account of his life of an Argentine gaucho who is drafted from his idyllic life on the pampas into the harsh discipline of the army. He rebels, becomes an outlaw, and joins the Indians. The second part, La Vuelta (1879), describes his return to a more humane and advanced society. Written in authentic gaucho dialect, the poem is a nostalgic tribute to a vanished way of life and has become the national epic of Argentina. See GAUCHO LITERATURE.

Martinus Scriblerus. See Martinus Scriblerus.

Marvel, I.K. See Donald Grant Mitchell.

Marvell, Andrew (1621-1678). English poet. Balance and detachment, strong features of Marvell's poetry, seem to characterize most of his life. During the English Civil War he was a tutor in the household of Lord General Thomas Fairfax and later became assistant to John Milton when the latter was Latin secretary of the Commonwealth; but he was also a good friend of Lovelace, who was a Royalist, and he never approved of the execution of Charles I. During the Commonwealth he was elected to Parliament and served ably in public offices until his death. He was instrumental in saving Milton from punishment after the Restoration.

One of the METAPHYSICAL POETS, Marvell is best known for his early, largely lyric, poetry, including The Garden, to His Coy Mistress, Bermudas, The Definition of Love, An Horatian Ode Upon Cromwell's Return from Ireland, and A Dialogue Between the Soul and Body. Typically, most of these poems represent a tacit, unresolved debate between two or more opposing values: contemplation vs.
activity, nature vs. civilization, power vs. justice, etc. In his later days he wrote satirical poetry directed against Stuart policies, such as The Last Instructions to a Painter, a verse satire on the Dutch War. His work is distinguished by lyric grace, striking conceits and images, and a rare intellectual balance and subtlety. Most of his poems were not published until 1681 and the satires not until 1689, after the Glorious Revolution.

In the 19th century, Marvell was known as a satirist, Swift praising this aspect of his work. The Romantics, Wordsworth and Lamb especially, appreciated his lyric poems, but it was the 20th century which saw a great revival of interest in him, in part through T. S. Eliot's influence as a critic.

marvellous boy, the. Thomas Chatterton, in an allusion to him by Wordsworth in Resolution and Independence:

I thought of Chatterton, the marvellous boy,
The sleepless soul, that perished in his pride.

Marx, Karl (1818-1883). German socialist who, with Friedrich Engels, formulated the principles of dialectic materialism, or economic determinism. Marx used Hegel's concept of the dialectic to explain history as a series of antitheses and syntheses; but whereas the Hegelian dialectic describes the conflict of ideas leading to the development of reason and freedom, the Marxian dialectic operates in terms of economic forces. Marx maintained that economic structure is the basis of history, and determines all the social, political, and intellectual aspects of life. The evils of capitalist society cannot be abolished by reform, therefore, but only by destruction of the whole capitalist economy and establishment of a new classless society (See THE COMMUNIST MANIFESTO). Because of his revolutionary activities, Marx spent most of his life outside Germany, and his major work, Capital, was written in London, where he also organized the First International, an association of European socialists, in 1864. His ideas had great influence on Nikolai Lenin and the development of Russian communism.

Marxism. The economic, political, and social doctrines of Karl Marx, Friedrich Engels, and their disciples and successors; the practice of these doctrines, specifically in countries with Communist systems of government. Marxism accepts as virtually axiomatic dialectical materialism, the labor theory of value, and the economic determination of all human actions and institutions; it is characterized by a belief in the class struggle as the fundamental force in history and holds that the increasing concentration of industrial power in the capitalist class and consequent aggravation of misery among the workers must inevitably lead to the revolutionary seizure of power by the proletariat, the dictatorship of the proletariat, and, ultimately, the establishment of a classless society. Evolutionary Marxism holds that power will accrue to the proletariat by economic evolution and that therefore revolution is unnecessary.

Though few works of literary value can be called Marxist in any technical sense, many writers have in emotional tone and moral bias echoed certain Marxist ideas, generally in protest against economic misery and injustice rather than out of any formal allegiance to Marxism. Despite elements which resemble or derive from Marxist ideology, their writings may more accurately be classed as PROLETARIAN LITERATURE.

Mary I. Mary Tudor, often called Bloody Mary (1516-1558). Queen of England (1553-1558), daughter of Henry VIII and Catherine of Aragon. Mary was declared illegitimate after her parents' marriage was dissolved, but was nevertheless proclaimed queen after the death of her half-brother, Edward VI, in 1553. She restored Catholicism in England, which had been Protestant for nearly twenty years. Despite strong popular opposition she married Prince Philip of Spain, a Catholic and a foreigner. In 1555 began the persecution and burning of Protestants under the reinstated heresy laws; nearly three hundred persons went to the stake in the last years of her reign. She is the subject of Victor Hugo's tragedy Mary Tudor (1833) and Tennison's play Queen Mary (1878).

Mary, Queen of Scots. Mary Stuart (1542-1587). Daughter of James V of Scotland, mother of James I of England and VI of Scotland, and titular queen of Scotland from six days after her birth until her abdication in favor of her son in 1567. Betrothed to the dauphin of France as a child and married to him in 1558, Mary did not actually reign in Scotland until after the death of her husband in 1560. In 1565 she married her cousin Henry, Lord Darnley, by whom she had a son, James. Darnley arranged the murder of David Rizzio, one of Mary's favorite councillors, and Darnley himself was murdered, possibly with Mary's complicity, shortly after (see CASKET LETTERS). The earl of Bothwell, who was probably responsible for Darnley's death, captured Mary, and after making a token resistance, she married him. The Scottish lords then rose up against Mary, and she was imprisoned and forced to abdicate. In 1568 she fled to England, where she was again put in prison. There were several Catholic plotters to free Mary and put her on the English throne; from a Catholic point of view Queen Elizabeth was both illegitimate and a heretic, and Mary the rightful claimant to the throne, both in terms of legitimate descent and faith. However, Mary was allowed to live in seclusion until the outbreak of the BARINGTON CONSPIRACY, after which she was brought to trial for conspiring against the life of the queen. She was condemned and executed in 1587.

Mary is a prominent character in Sir Walter Scott's Abbots (1820), which deals with her flight to England. She is the subject of Schiller's tragedy Maria Stuart (1800); Björnstjerne Björnson's drama Maria Stuart (1864); Swinburne's trilogy of verse dramas Chastelard (1863), Bothwell (1874), and Mary Stuart (1881); Maurice Hewlett's romance The Queen's Quair (1904); and John Drinkwater's Mary Stuart (1921).

Mary, the Virgin. The mother of Jesus. Jesus was her first child; Matthew (13:55) and Mark (6:3) mention other children by her husband Joseph. The day of neither her birth nor death is known. She may have been with Jesus on his travels; she was present at the Crucifixion where Jesus entrusted her to the care of John. Her last appearance is in the first chapter of Acts (Acts 1:13) shortly after the Resurrection. In the Roman Catholic Church she is an object of special veneration. She is an extremely popular subject in religious painting and sculpture where she is usually called "the Madonna."

Mary Barton (1848). A novel by Mrs. Gaskell. A work of great realism, it deals with the hardships suffered by the impoverished weavers of Manchester.

Maryland, My Maryland (1861). A poem by James Ryder Randall. First printed in the New Orleans Delta (April 26, 1861), it was reprinted all over the South; sung to the tune of the German Christmas song, O Tannenbaum, O Tannenbaum, it was adopted as a favorite battle song by Confederate soldiers. The title of Edmund Wilson's study of the literature of the American Civil War, Patriotic Gore (1962), is taken from Randall's poem.

Mary Magdalene. In the New Testament one of the followers of Jesus. She may have been the harlot whom Jesus rescued from her evil life (Mark 16:9). She is identified by the name of her home town, Magdala, which was famous for its immorality. Mary Magdalene was present at the Crucifixion and was one of the first to see the open tomb three days later.

Mary of France. Mary Tudor (1496-1533). Queen consort (1514–1515) of Louis XII of France, favorite sister of Henry VIII of England. Mary's love for Charles Brandon, and her marriage to him after the death of her royal husband, are the subject of Charles Major's novel When Knighthood Was in Flower (1898).

Mary Olivier (1919). A novel by May Sinclair. Using the psychology of Freud and the subjective technique of Joyce, she examines the mind and development of a girl brought up in a repressive Victorian household. Other members of the family become neurotic, but she finds an outlet in writing poetry and has a love affair.

Mary Stuart (Maria Stuart; 1800). A tragedy by Friedrich Schiller. It tells the conflict between Elizabeth I and Mary Queen of Scots, while the latter is in England awaiting execution for her crimes. In Schiller's version, though Elizabeth wants Mary out of the way, she is unable to make a final decision about commanding her death, and in the end, she contrives to make it seem as though a hasty official had been responsible for Mary's execution.

Massacio. Real name, Tommaso di Giovanni (1401–1428). Florentine painter. He is often called "the true father of Renaissance painting" as his influence on his contemporaries was more immediate and fruitful than that of Giotto, of whom he was, however, the logical successor and modern embodiment. Massacio stressed simplicity and evocative gesture rather than movement, and brought about a revolution in painting through his ability, learned from Brunelleschi, to construct convincing spatial relationships, and through his mastery in creating the illusion of heaviness and weight by means of light and shade. His frescoes in the Brancacci Chapel of the Church of the Carmine in Florence, though unfinished, served as a training school for Florentine painters of succeeding generations, even to the time of Michelangelo. Among the best known of the frescoes, later completed by Filippino Lippi, are St. Peter Enthroned, Adam and Eve, and The Tribute Money. Another of his most famous works, in S. Maria Novella at Florence, is The Holy Trinity, the Virgin and St. John the Evangelist, with Two Donors.

Masaniello. Original name: Tommaso Aniello (1622–1647). Italian fisherman who led the revolt in Naples in July, 1647. When his property was seized because his wife had smuggled flax, he led a popular uprising against the Spanish authorities. The viceroy was forced to flee, and Masaniello and his followers took over the government. Although the viceroy granted several concessions, Masaniello was assassinated, probably by his own followers. Aubé's opera La Muette de Portici (1829), with a libretto by Eugène Scribe, is based on Masaniello's revolt.

Masaoka Shiki (1867–1902). Japanese poet. He was influential in reviving the Haiku and restoring it to the prestige it had enjoyed during the Tokugawa period (1600–1688).

Masaryk, Tomáš [Garrigue] (1850–1937). Czechoslovak statesman and philosopher regarded as the father of independent Czechoslovakia. His son Jan [Garrigue] Masaryk (1886–1948), also a liberal statesman, was murdered or committed suicide in Prague after the communist coup of 1948.

Mascagni, Pietro (1863–1945). Italian composer. He is famous for his one-act opera Cavalleria Rusticana (1890).

Masefield, John (1878–). English poet, dramatist, and novelist; from 1930, Poet Laureate of England. He is best known for his sea poems, such as those collected in Salt Water Poems and Ballads (1902); his poems Sea Fever and Cargoes appear in many anthologies. As a boy he went to sea as a cadet officer. He then spent a number of years wandering around the world, doing odd jobs, including working as a bartender's assistant in New York. His novels, including Last Endeavour (1910), Sard Harker (1924), and The Bird of Dawning (1933), are romantic adventure stories, packed with color and action.

Masefield made his reputation with a long narrative poem, The Everlasting Mercy. Like many of Masefield's other early poems, it is notable for its realistic, robust background of country life and its sometimes harsh, unpoetic language. Masefield admired Chaucer; his narrative poem Reynard the Fox (1919), about a hunt, is particularly Chaucerian. Among his other long narrative poems are The Widow in the Bye Street (1912), about a devoted mother and a son who kills his rival in love, and Dauber (1913), the tragic story of an artist-sailor who is the butt of all his companions' jokes. He wrote a number of verse plays, of which The Tragedy of Nan is the best known. He also wrote journalism, literary criticism, and military and nautical history. His Gallipoli (1916) is a remarkable account of that World War I campaign, and The Nine Days' Wonder (1941) describes the evacuation of Dunkirk. Among his other books are Shakespeare (1911), On the Hill (1949), So Long to Learn (1952), and The Bluebells (1961).
Masham, Lady Abigail (d. 1734). Daughter of the London merchant Francis Hill, first cousin of the duchess of Marlborough, and a friend of Jonathan Swift. As a favorite of Queen Anne, superseding the duchess of Marlborough, she exercised much influence at court.

Masques and Faces. See Pio Woffington.

masochism. A sexual abnormality in which one takes pleasure in being abused or tortured. See Leopold von Sacher-Masoch.

Mason, Perry. See Erle Stanley Gardner.

Mason, William (1725–1797). English poet, playwright, and clergyman. His works include the dramatic poems Elfrida (1752) and Caractacus (1759); The English Garden (1772–1781), a poem; and Memoirs of Gray (1775), the result of his life-long friendship with the poet Thomas Gray. Gray immortalized Mason by giving him the nickname “Scroodles.”

Mason and Dixon’s line. Originally the boundary line separating Maryland and Pennsylvania, laid (1763–1767) by the English astronomers and surveyors Charles Mason and Jeremiah Dixon. It lies in 39° 43' 26" north latitude. At the time of the Civil War the name was used to designate the line separating the free states from the slave states.

Maspero, Sir Gaston Camille Charles (1846–1916). French Egyptologist. Noted chiefly for his remarkable discoveries at the temple of Karnak, Maspero also wrote a number of books on archeology.

masque (mask). A form of dramatic entertainment. The masque, like drama itself, probably finds its origins in primitive fertility rites. It appears in a number of societies in a variety of forms, although in almost all cases culminating in an impromptu dance or komos in which both spectators and performers engage. In the Middle Ages the masque took the form of an unexpected visit to a friend’s house by a group of masked players and musicians who would provide a spontaneous entertainment.

In England the masque had a dual development, on the one hand resulting in thinly disguised fertility rites such as the St. George “Sword Dance” folk plays, and on the other in the elaborate court entertainments which make their first appearance in the early years of the 16th century during the reign of Henry VIII.

These court festivities were continued (with considerably less profligacy) under the reign of Elizabeth, but it is not until the reign of James I (1603–1625) and his pleasure-loving wife, Anne, that the masque in England develops the lavish, ornate, and elaborate spectacle for which it is known. The men who made the greatest contribution to the development of the masque were Inigo Jones and Ben Jonson. Jones, an architect trained in Italy and heavily influenced by Italian neoclassicism, was responsible for the magnificent of the spectacle. Jonson, who inherited a masque tradition, which was essentially one of pantomime and in which there were no dramatic values, emphasized dialogue and song, giving the airy nothings of the Elizabethan masque a substantial literary framework. He also introduced the anti-masque, a comic interlude which parodied the major plot. The collaboration of Jonson and Jones ushered in the golden age of the masque. Together they achieved a balance of lyrical grace and sumptuous splendor that has never been equalled in stage entertainments. Inevitably, however, they quarreled over the relative importance of their contributions, and with the dissolution of their partnership and, ultimately, the success of the Puritan Revolution, the masque disappeared from England.

Among Jonson’s masques are Hymenai (1605); The Masque of Beauty (1609); The Hue and Cry after Cupid (1608); The Masque of Queens (1609); Oberon, the Fairy Prince (1611). Other writers of masques were George Chapman, Beaumont and Fletcher, and Thomas Middleton. John Milton’s Comus, though titled a masque, is often considered to be more of a pastoral drama.

Massacre of St. Bartholomew. The slaughter of French Protestants begun on the eve of St. Bartholomew’s Day, Aug. 24, 1572. Authorized by Charles IX at the instigation of his mother Catherine de Médicis, the persecutions continued for several weeks and spread from Paris to the provinces. It has been estimated that some 30,000 persons were killed, including Gaspard de Coligny and Pierre La Ramée.

Massacre of the Innocents. See Innocents, Massacre of the.

Massenet, Jules Emile Frédéric (1842–1912). French composer of operas, operettas, and biblical dramas. He is best known for his operas Mason (1884), Thaïs (1894), and Werther (1892).

Masses, The. A left-wing magazine, founded in 1911 and especially noteworthy after Max Eastman became editor in December, 1912. Socialist and pacifist in viewpoint, it stressed literature, art, and the spoofing of the bourgeoisie. Eastman ran the magazine until its suppression by federal authorities in December, 1917. Contributing editors included Floyd...
Dell, John Reed, Louis Untermeyer, and Art Young. It was succeeded in March, 1918, by the doctrinaire
The Liberator, which Eastman edited for a while and which became associated with the Communist Party in 1922. The weekly New Masses, which appeared in 1926, was a successor to The Liberator; it became a monthly in 1948 under the name Masses & Mainstream. Samuel Sillen was editor, and Howard Fast, W. E. B. DuBois, and Paul Robeson were among the contributing editors.

Massey, Gerald (1828–1907). English poet, journalist. An un schooled millhand, Massey educated himself, becoming an advocate of Chartism and Christian Socialism. His career suggested to George Elliot the theme of Felix Holt. He is the author of Poetical Works (1877) and My Lyrical Life (1889), a memoir.

Massinger, Philip (1583–1640). English dramatic writer. After attending Oxford, Massinger went to London, where he won the friendship of such men as Tourneur, Dekker, and Fletcher, with all of whom he later collaborated. His best-known play is the satirical comedy A New Way to Pay Old Debts, whose principal character, the acquisitive Sir Giles Overreach, was long a favorite role among actors. Among the plays usually ascribed to him alone are The Duke of Milan (1620), a tragedy; The Maid of Honor
(c. 1621), a romantic drama based on a story told by Boccaccio; The Great Duke of Comedy (1627), a romantic comedy; and The City Madam (1632), a comedy. The religious emphasis of some of his works, notably The Maid of Honor and The Virgin Martyr (1620), on which he collaborated with Dekker, has fostered the belief that he was converted to Roman Catholicism. With Nathan Field he collaborated on the tragedy The Fatal D로서y (1619), and he may have shared in the writing of Henry VIII and The Two Noble Kinsmen. The manuscripts of some of his lost plays were reputedly destroyed in the 18th century when a cook in the household of Bishop John Warburton used them to line pie dishes.

Master Builder, The (1892). A play by Henrik Ibsen. The Master Builder departs from the social subjects of the bulk of Ibsen's work and deals, both realistically and symbolically, with the spirit of the artist seeking to surpass its own limitations and the conflict between one's own needs and the needs of others. Master Builder Solness is afraid of being crushed by the younger generation of architects, as he himself has crushed the builders before him; yet he finds in the girl Hilda both the younger generation
he fears and the strength of purpose he lacks.
Through her urging, he attempts to do "the impossible": to climb, in spite of his vertigo, to the top of the high spire he has built on his new house, and then to build, with Hilda, "the loveliest thing in the world"—a castle in the air. He reaches the top of the spire, but falls and is killed.

Master Leonard. In medieval demonology, the grand master of the witches' Sabbaths. He had the shape of a goat with three horns and a black human face.

Master of the Sentences. See Peter Lombard.

Master Peter's Puppet Show. See Retablo de Mase Pedro, El.

Masters, Edgar Lee (1866–1950). American poet and novelist. A lawyer by training, Masters is famous for his Spoon River Anthology, a series of "auto-epitaphs" giving a dramatic and realistic picture of village life in the Middle West. Masters had earlier published several collections of verse, beginning with A Book of Verses (1898). None of these books attracted much attention. Spoon River, in the tradition of E. W. Howe, Joseph Kirkland, Hamlin Garland, and other attackers of small-town life, immEDIATELY gained Masters a large following. His later collections of verse include Songs and Serenades (1916), Starved Rock (1919), Domeday Book (1920), Poems of the People (1936), and Illinois Poems (1941).

Masters wrote several novels, including the trilogy Mitch Miller (1920), Skettes Kirby (1923), and Mirage (1924). He wrote biographies of Vachel
Lindsay (1935), Walt Whitman (1937), and Mark Twain (1938). Lincoln, the Man (1931), the only one of his later books to attract wide attention, was an attack on the Civil War president. Across Spoon River (1936) was an autobiography. Masters was buried in the cemetery of Petersburg, Ill., the village which, with Lewistown, Ill., he had used as the scene of his famous work.

Masters, John (1914– ). India-born English novelist. A resident of the U.S., he is best known for his romantic novels on episodes in Indian history such as Bhownai Junction (1954). His books include Pandango Rock (1959), The Venus of Konpara (1960), and The Road Past Mandalay (1961).

Part of the Strangers and Brothers series, it describes the negotiations and struggles for power at the election of a new president of a Cambridge college.

mastersingers. See Meistersingers.

Masuccio Salernitano. Pen name of Tomaso Guardati (c. 1415–c. 1480). Italian author of the Novellino (1476), a collection of 50 novelle. One of the stories is an early version of the Romeo and Juliet tale, from which Da Porto took his influential version.

Matadero, El (Sp., "the slaughterhouse"; 1781).
A story by Ezechvvera. Written during the 1830's, El matadero is the unfinished draft of a novel denouncing the brutality of the dictatorship of Juan Manuel de Rosas. Its crude realism standing in sharp contrast to the romanticism that characterizes Echeverria's poetry, the story is set in a Buenos Aires slaughterhouse where henchmen of Rosas murder a member of the opposition who passes by.

Matali. In Hindu mythology, the charioteer of Indra.

Mather, Cotton (1663–1728). American clergyman, theologian, and writer. The grandson of Richard Mather and John Cotton, Mather was a child prodigy who entered Harvard at the age of 12 and became an erudite historian and folklorist, as well as a staunch Puritan and tireless writer on an encyclopedic range of subjects. Although he was inclined to believe in witchcraft and is often regarded as the epitome of Puritan fanaticism, he often upheld the authority of reason and called Isaac Newton "our perpetual dictator."
One of his many quarrels stemmed from his spirited defense of inoculation for smallpox, then highly suspicious practice. Among his best-known works are The Wonders of the Invisible World (1693), a discussion of witches and the supernatural; MAGNALIA CHRISTI AMERICANA; and The Christian Philosopher (1721), essays attempting to reconcile science with religion.

Mather, Increase (1639-1723). American clergyman and theologian. The son of Richard Mather and father of Cotton Mather, he was a well-known preacher, served as president of Harvard College (1685-1701), and played an important part in the Salem witchcraft trials, though he criticized the extremism of the trials in Cases of Conscience Concerning Evil Spirits (1693). Among his better-known works are Life and Death of Richard Mather (1670), A Brief History of the War with the Indians (1676), and An Essay for the Recording of Illustrious Providences. Like his son, he was influenced by the growing scientific spirit of his time and upheld inoculation for smallpox.

Mather, Richard (1596-1669). English-born American clergyman. Mather came to Dorchester, Mass., in 1635 and became an important leader in the establishment of the Congregational Church in America. He is probably best known as one of the compilers of the Bay Psalm Book. Increase Mather was his son.

Mathew, Father Theobald (1790-1856), called The Apostle of Temperance. He was an Irish priest at Cork whose successful temperance campaigns made him influential throughout Ireland and in America, where he was partly responsible for the Temperance Movement.

Mathieu, Noël. See Pierre Emmanuel.

Title page of a sermon by Increase Mather. The first book printed in Boston (1675).

Matisse, Henri (1869-1954). French painter and sculptor. He sought to combine line and color so that each, while retaining its individual quality, would enhance the other. His style evolved from the contrast of patterns shown in 1920's in his favorite theme of the Odalisque, through daringly simplified interiors with plants and women, and culminates during his last years in bold figures cut from paper.

Matsuo Bashō (1644-1694). Japanese haiku poet. He is generally acknowledged as the developer and greatest master of this form. His writings are said to have been deeply influenced by Zen Buddhism.

Matsuo Yosuke (1880-1946). Japanese foreign minister (1940-1941). From the age of 13, he was American-educated, working his way through school and college. He pursued a diplomatic career in Japan from 1904. He was head of Japanese delegation at League of Nations' sessions (1932-1933) when his country was condemned for the "Manchurian incident." As prime minister he concluded the Tripartite Pact with Germany and Italy (1940) and Neutrality Pact with Russia. After Germany's attack on Russia, Matsuo was replaced in a reorganized Japanese cabinet. He died while on trial accused as a war criminal.

Matsya. See Vishnu.

Matta Echaurren, Roberto (1912- ). Chilean abstract artist associated with surrealism. His paintings, lighted by iridescent yellows and deep reds, are full of movement and mystery.

Matthew, St. Also called Levi. One of the 12 disciples of Jesus. He was a publican or collector of tolls paid for goods and passengers coming to Capernaum by the Sea of Galilee. He is the author of the Gospel of St. Matthew, the first book of the New Testament. According to tradition, Matthew was slain by the sword in Parthia.

Matthew, Master. In Ben Jonson's Every Man in His Humour, a melancholy "poet." His literary efforts are plagiarisms of earlier (and better) authors.

Matthew, The Gospel According to St. The 1st book of the New Testament. One of the synoptic gospels, it is the most comprehensive and authoritative life of Jesus. There is internal evidence that this gospel was written for Jewish readers: Old Testament prophecies are explained in terms of Jesus, whose ancestry is traced back through David to Abraham. The date of its composition is usually put after a.d. 75; its actual authorship is uncertain. Since it was written in Greek and does not seem to be an eyewitness account, it is unlikely that, as traditionally ascribed, its author was actually Matthew the Apostle.

months in Salzburg and Czechoslovakia in From the Heart of Europe (1948). Before his suicide in 1950 he had contributed a significant body of criticism. His well-known works include The Achievement of T. S. Eliot: An Essay on the Nature of Poetry (1935), American Renaissance: Art and Expression in the Age of Emerson and Whitman (1941), Henry James: The Major Phase (1944), and The James Family: Including Selections from the Writings of Henry James, Senior, William, Henry, and Alice James (1947). In 1949, Matthiessen began work on the posthumously published Theodore Dreiser (1951); he also wrote the introduction to and edited The Oxford Book of American Verse (1950). In October, 1950, a memorial issue of the Monthly Review was dedicated to Matthiessen; the material from his books along with essays and statements by students and friends, was reissued as F. O. Matthiessen 1902-1950: A Collective Portrait (1950), edited by Paul Sweezy and Leo Huberman. In 1952, The Responsibilities of the Critic: Essays and Reviews, selected by John Rackliffe, was published.

Maturin, Charles Robert (1787-1824). Irish novelist, one of the leading writers of the Gothic novel. His most famous work is MELMOTH THE WANDERER, a story of the sale of a soul to the devil in exchange for prolonged life. In this book, Maturin achieves power and psychological validity, but generally his work is marred by excesses of horror and mystification. His other books include The Fatal Revenge (1807), The Wild Irish Boy (1808), The Milesian Chief (1811), Women, or Pour et Contre (1818), and The Albigenses (1824). He also wrote a successful play, Bertram (1816).

Maud (1855). A poem by Alfred Tennyson. An extended dramatic monologue in a number of poetic forms, it describes the growth of love in an embittered, rather morose young man for Maud, the daughter of the man who has ruined him. Ultimately, the hero kills Maud's brother in a duel; her death and his tragic exile follow.

Maud, Aylmer (1858-1938). English writer and translator. She is best known for her translations of Leo Tolstoi's novels.

Maud, Cyril (1862-1951). English actor and manager. He founded the Playhouse (London, 1907). He was married to Winifred Emery (1862-1924), an actress and the descendant of a long line of actors.

Maud Muller (1854). A narrative poem by John Greenleaf Whittier. It records a chance meeting between the wealthy judge, and Maud, a rustic beauty. She laid aside her rake, and gave him a drink from the spring. Each married someone of more suitable station in life, but was tormented by regretful illusions:

For of all sad words of tongue or pen,
The saddest are these: "It might have been."

Maugham, Robin. Pen name of Lord Robert Cecil Romer Maugham (1916- ). English novelist, nephew of Somerset Maugham. Among his novels, which usually deal with psychological peculiarities, are The Servant (1948), The Man with Two Shadows (1959), and The Slaves of Timbuktu (1961).

Maugham, W[illiam] Somerset (1874- ). English novelist, short-story writer, and playwright. Although he uses plots and material of intended popular appeal, Maugham's work is distinguished by his skillful craftsmanship, and by his satire, cynicism, and ironical detachment. His novels include Liza of Lambeth, his first novel, inspired by his experiences as an interne in London's Lambeth slums; Mrs. Cradock (1902); The Magician (1908), a novel based on the character of Aleister Crowley; Of Human Bondage, a partially autobiographical novel and generally considered to be his finest: The Moon and Sixpence; The Painted Veil (1925); Ashenden: or, The British Agent (1928), based on the author's experiences as a World War I secret agent; Cakes and Ale; The Narrow Corner (1932); Theatre (1937); The Razor's Edge; Then and Now (1946); and Catalina (1948).

A great traveler, Maugham set many of his stories in the tropics. These works were studies of mixed marriages, class differences, and the effects of the stress of the climate on white people. Among the best known of his short stories are Miss Thompson and The Casuarina Tree. Now admired for his technique as a short-story writer, Maugham was originally known as a playwright. Among his best remembered witty, cynical, and frankly commercial plays are The Circle (1921), Our Betters (1923), and The Constant Wife (1926). The Summing Up (1938), A Writer's Notebook (1949), and The Vagrant Mood (1952) are autobiography and literary chat. The Art of Fiction (1955) is a collection of introductions to 10 great novels which he cut down to what he considered a proper length. Maugham was awarded the Order of Merit after his 80th birthday.

Maugis. See Malagigi.

Maule, Matthew. The old wizard in Hawthorne's The House of the Seven Gables.

Mauley, Sir Edward. The real name of the "BLACK DWARF" in Scott's novel of that title. Because of sensitiveness over his physical deformity and cynical disillusionment at having been robbed of his bride by his best friend, he lives alone and acquires the reputation of being in league with the Devil. Gradually, however, he wins many friends through his wisely directed kindness to all who seek his help, and at last he comes out of his retirement and assumes his own name and station.

Maundy Thursday. The Thursday before Easter. It commemorates the Last Supper, at which Christ instituted the Eucharist. After supper, Christ washed his disciples' feet, and gave them a new commandment (Lat. mandatum), that they love one another. For this reason, some churches still hold foot-washing ceremonies on this day.

Maupassant, Guy de (1850-1893). French short-story writer and novelist. A member of the naturalist school, Maupassant chose the subjects for his stories and novels chiefly from Norman peasant life, the Franco-Prussian War, the behavior of the bourgeoisie, and the fashionable life of Paris. A pupil of Gustave Flaubert, he brought the same careful attention to the writer's craft as did his master. Stories such as the famous En Famille, Le Rendez-vous, The Necklace, and The Umbrella are built around simple episodes from the humble life of every day. In tone, the tales are marked by objectivity, detachment, and a fine use of irony. Maupassant's Mauthe dog.

A ghostly black spaniel that for many years haunted Peel Castle in the Isle of Man. It used to enter the guard-room as soon as candles were lighted, and leave it at daybreak. While this specter was present the soldiers forbore all oaths and profane talk. On one occasion a drunken trooper entered the guard-room alone out of bravado, but lost his nerve and took to his heels.

Mauriac, [John] Frederick Denison (1865–1872). English theologian and reformer, founder of Christian Socialism. Mauriac was one of the most influential of Victorian thinkers, involved in many progressive movements. A founder of Queen's College for Women and a teacher at the Working Men's College, he was also active in the Cooperative movement and was a liberalizing force in the Anglican Church, in which he was ordained. He was a friend of Charles Kingsley and John Ruskin, and wrote numerous books of sermons and works on divinity and social thought, including Theological Essays (1859) and Social Morality (1869).

Mauriac, André. Pen name of Émile Herzog (1885– ). French biographer, novelist, and essayist. He is best known for his vivid biographies of Shelley (Ariel, 1923), Disraeli (1927), Byron (Don Juan, 1930), Proust (1949), Georges Sand (Lélia, 1952), Victor Hugo (Olympio, 1955) and three generations of Alexandre Dumas (The Titans, 1957). The Miracle of England (1937) and The Miracle of France (1948) are popular histories. In The Silence of Colonel Bramble (1918) and Les Discours du docteur O'Grady (1922) he presents humorous portraits of his British comrades when he served as a liaison officer in World War I. His novels include Bernard Quesnay (1926), Atmosphere of Love (Climats, 1928), The Family Circle (1932), and September Roses (1956; also translated as The Tempitress). He wrote a history of the U.S. in the 20th century, From the New Freedom to the New Frontier (1963).

Mauriac, Charles [Marie Photius] (1868–1952). French political journalist and literary critic. An editor of L'Action Française, he made it the nucleus of a Catholic royalist movement at the turn of the century, but was disavowed by the Pope and the claimant to the throne in the 1920's. L'Avenir de l'intelligence (1905) outlines his concepts of order and traditionalism; his Dictionnaire politique et critique (1932–1934) supports classicism in art and literature.

mausoleum. A tomb of great size. It is so called after Mausolus, king of Caria in the 4th century B.C., whose wife Artemisia built for him a majestic sepulchral monument at Halicarnassus in Asia Minor. Parts of this sepulcher, which was one of the Seven Wonders of the Ancient World, are now in the British Museum.

The most important mausoleums are that of Augustus; that of Hadrian, the castle of St. Angelo at Rome; that of Henry II of France, erected by Catherine de Médicis; that of St. Peter the Martyr, built by G. Balduccio in the 14th century in the church of St. Eustathius; and that erected to the memory of Louis XVI.

style is direct and simple, with attention to realistic detail. His vision of human existence is somber, for he sees clearly the toil, suffering, and the bitterly ironic happenings that twist human lives. Among his novels are Une Vie (1883), about the frustrating existence of a Norman wife; Bel-Ami (1885), which depicts an unscrupulous journalist; and Pierre et Jean.

Mauriac, Claude (1914– ). French literary critic and novelist of the New Wave, son of François Mauriac. His critical works led up to The New Literature (La Littérature contemporaine, 1958), a discussion of the new novelists who turn their back on tradition in order to risk discovery. He then began to write experimental novels that record the simultaneous dialogue and thoughts of a number of people: Toutes les femmes sont fatales (1957), Dinner Party (Le Dîner en ville; 1959), and The Marquise Went Out at Five (La Marquise sortit à cinq heures; 1961).

Mauriac, François (1885– ). French novelist, essayist, and dramatist. His native Bordeaux is the setting for most of his short novels, which present psychological analyses of middle-class characters tormented by the absence of the grace of God. A Catholic intensely concerned with the problem of sin and redemption, Mauriac presents the attempts—and inevitable failures—of those who seek satisfaction in money, property, and especially in human love. In his novels sensual desire is always sinful and eventually destructive, marriages are hateful duels between the partners. Family relationships become enslaving bonds, and even love breeds tragedy through its fiercely possessive jealousy and its attempt to manipulate another life. Yet those individuals whose passionate quests for self-fulfillment lead them deepest into sin are usually those whose capacity for self-knowledge eventually makes them most capable of spiritual fulfillment. Those who pride themselves on their virtue remain most guilty of emotional coldness and spiritual sterility. Thus the women in Generalis (1923) and A Woman of the Pharisées (La Pharisienne; 1941) harm everyone around them with their "good" intentions. A father and son find that their romantic yearnings lead only to The Desert of Love (1925); the family circle becomes a Vipers' Tangle (Le Noeud de Vipères; 1932). Mauriac is best at describing the anguish of suffering, rather than suggesting possible solutions for man's quest. His most successfully drawn characters, as in A Kiss for the Leper (Le Baiser au Lepreux; 1922) and Thérèse Descreyboux (1927) cannot achieve either earthly happiness or the salvation of divine love.

His Life of Jesus (1936) and The Son of Man (1958) present aspects of Christ as human sufferer. The development of his own philosophy is revealed through his reactions to literature and life in God and Mammon (1929), his Journal (5 vols., 1936–1953), and The Stumbling Block (La Pierre d'achoppement, 1948).

Mauriac's other novels include Young Man in Chains (L'Enfant chargé de chaînes; 1913); Flesh and Blood (Le Châtel et le sang, 1920), Questions of Precedence (Préséances, 1921), The Enemy (Le Mal; 1924), Lines of Life (Destins; 1928), The Frontenac Mystery (1933), The Dark Angels (Les Anges Noirs; 1936), and The Weakling (Le Sagouin; 1951). His plays include Asmodée (1937), Les Mal Aimés (1945), Passage du malin (1947), and Le Feu sur la terre (1951). His collections of poetry are Les Mains jointes (1909), Orages (1925), and Le Sang d'Àtys (1940). Mauriac was awarded the Nobel Prize in 1952.

Beer surveying the American literary and social scene of the 1890's. The color yellow had already been described as typical of the period in England, and Beer, trying similarly to capture the essence of the decade in America, chose mauve as the significant tone: "pink turning to purple."

Max. See Sir Max BEERBOHM.

Max, Prince. Nickname of Prince Maximilian of Baden (1867-1929). Last chancellor of the German Empire (1918) at the end of World War I. He influenced the abdication of Kaiser WILHELM II and the establishment of the Weimar Republic.

Maxime. The treacherous conspirator in Pierre Corneille's CINNA. He betrays Cinna to the emperor
Augustus, out of love for the beautiful AMFILIE.

Maxime. See Francois de LA ROCHEFOUCAULD.

Maximilian. Full name, Ferdinand Maximilian Joseph (1832-1867). Archduke of Austria. The younger brother of Francis Joseph I, he was made emperor of Mexico (1864-1867) by Napoleon III, who hoped to establish a French satellite in the Western Hemisphere. The opposition of Mexican liberals, U.S. protests, and political troubles in France led Napoleon to abandon Maximilian; after the withdrawal of the French forces, Maximilian was captured and shot by the Mexican leader Benito JUAREZ. See CARLOTA.

Max Muller, Friedrich (1823-1900). German-born British philologist best known for his Sacred Books of the East (49 vols., 1879-1894). He was a major influence, not only in linguistic studies, but on comparative religion and mythology.

Max und Moritz. See Wilhelm BUSCH.

Maxwell, William [Keepers] (1908-. American novelist and short-story writer. Maxwell is noted for his sensitive evocation of the recent American past, particularly the Midwest of the de-decades before and after World War I. His novels include They Came Like Swallows (1937), The Folded Leaf (1945), Time Will Darken It (1948), and The Chateau (1961).

Maxwell, William Babington (1866-1938). English novelist and son of the popular Victorian novelist Mary Elizabeth BRADDOO. Maxwell's second book, The Ragged Messenger (1904), was a best seller, and was dramatized and filmed three times.
The Guarded Flame (1906) consolidated his success.
He lived to produce close to 40 books, including an autobiography, Time Gathered (1937).

May, Phil (1864-1903). English caricaturist. He is noted for his studies of London characters, such as the coster-girl, the street waif, etc. In 1896 he became a member of the staff of Punch.

Maya. A term in Hindu Vedantic philosophy.
Maya refers to the cosmic illusion on account of which the One appears to be the Many and the Absolute appears as the relative. Maya is also associated with the ignorance that prevents man's realization of his identity with Brahman; on the esthetic plane, mayavan governs the realm of rasa, or the essence of esthetic relish. Some associate maya with sakti, the creative and adhesive energy in the phenomenal world.

Maya. A group of American Indians who inhabited parts of what are now Mexico, Guatemala, and Honduras. The "Old Empire" of the Mayas, which flourished between the fourth and ninth centuries, saw the rise of independent city states, such as Copan, Palenque, and Tikal, centered in southern Yucatan. For reasons that are still not clear, these were abandoned, and a "New Empire" later developed in northern Yucatan, which was dominated by the three cities of Chichen Ietz, Mayapan, and Uxmal.
The greatest achievements of the Mayas were in the fields of astronomy, mathematics, and the calendar;
their system of hieroglyphic writing was more adanced than that of any other American Indians.
The Spaniards tried to subjugate the Mayas throughout the 15th century, but the conquest was not complete until the fall of Tayasal, the last Maya stronghold, in 1697. The investigations made by John Lloyd Stephens (1805-1852), American diplomat and archaeologist, which he described in Incidents of Travel in Central America, Chiapas, and Yucatan (1841) did much to arouse interest in Maya civilization.

Mayakovski, Vladimir Vladi-mirovich (1893-1930). Russian poet. Mayakovskii, the outstanding poetic talent of the early Soviet period, was born in Georgia, the son of a forester. The family moved to Moscow in 1906, after the death of his father. Mayakovskii joined the Social Democratic Party in 1908, and for the next two years spent a good bit of time in prison for his political activities. In 1910 he began to study painting, but soon afterwards was convinced by friends that his true talent was poetic. In 1912, Mayakovskii signed the manifesto, A Slap in the Face of Public Taste, issued by the futurists. The aim of futurism that seemingly most attracted him was its rejection of tradition in art. The group's concern with formal experimentation in literature engaged his interest. As he was later to show, however, he was not so willing to neglect the content of his poetry as were some of the other futurist poets. Mayakovskii's first published work was a small book of four poems entitled I (Ya; 1913). This early work, with its startling imagery and powerful rhythms, created a stir, and Mayakovskii was marked as one of the more original young poets. He confirmed this estimate with his next work, A Cloud in Trousers (Obloku xhtanak; 1914-1915), a long poem which carried the deportment of the language of poetry to an extreme limit. The characteristic features of Mayakovskii's work were all present in this work: the declamatory nature of the lines, obviously fitted for being shouted from a platform; the hyperbolic imagery, forceful rhythm, and often coarse language. Mayakovskii had virtually accomplished single-handed the revolt against the smooth, mellifluous poetry written by the symbol-ist poets. He went another step beyond the innovations in modern Russian verse introduced by Aleksandr Blok. While Blok had based his verse on a line that took into account the number of stresses Ignoring the number of unstressed syllables), Mayakovskii abandoned metrical structure altogether, reliing on rhythmic factors for his poems' organizing principle. His chief means of poetic organization were the rhythms, often unusual and striking, which linked
Mayakovski triumphally greeted the revolution with such works as Ode to the Revolution (†Oda revolutsii; 1918), Left March (†Levyi marsh; 1918), and the long poem 150,000,000 (1920). He also produced one of the first successful plays of the Soviet era, Mystery-Bouffe (†Misteriya buff; 1918), a political satire in verse predicting the downfall of capitalism.

Throwing himself into the work of establishing the revolution, Mayakovski put his poetic talents at the service of the Russian telegraph agency, composing slogans and painting posters. He also composed many propaganda verses and read them before crowds of workers throughout the country. In 1923 he helped form LEF (Left Front), an organization of futurists who hoped to make their brand of art the standard one in the new Soviet society. Mayakovski edited the organization's journal, also entitled LEF, until 1925. The struggle between the radical approach of the LEF artists and the more conservative elements advocating realism in art finally ended in the closing of the journal. Mayakovski went on an extended tour of Western Europe, Latin America, and the U.S. During his three-month stay in the U.S., he wrote an appreciative poem about the Brooklyn Bridge (1925).

On his return to Russia in 1927 he attempted to revive the magazine LEF under the title The New LEF (†Novyi LEF). This venture lasted for just one year. A new conservative organization, RAPP (Association of Proletarian Writers) was gaining control of Soviet literature. Mayakovski's awareness that the bureaucracy he had fought was triumphing is reflected in two satirical plays: The Bedbug (†Klop; 1928) and The Bathhouse (†Banya; 1929).

Mayakovski continued his traveling and public readings. His troubles with literary opponents were compounded with unhappy romantic experiences. The burden became too much to bear, and in April, 1930, Mayakovski shot himself. Just five years earlier, he had harshly criticized the suicide of the poet Sergei Esenin.

Among Mayakovski's best-known longer poems are Vladimir Ilyich Lenin (1924), a eulogy to the Soviet leader; All Right! (†Khoroshoi; 1927); and With Full Voice (†Vo ves golas; 1929–1930), an unfinished poem. Other well-known poems include The Backbone Flute (†Finispektorom o poetom; 1926), and Letter from Paris to Comrade Kostrov on the Nature of Love (†Pismo tovarishchu kostrovu iz parizha o sukhchnosti lyubvi; 1928).

May Day. The 1st day of May. Vergil says that the Roman youths used to go into the fields and spend the calends (1st) of May in dancing and singing in honor of Flora, goddess of fruits and flowers. The English consecrated May Day to Robin Hood and the Maid Marian, because the famous outlaw died on that day. Villagers used to set up and dance around a Maypole, crown a May queen, and spend the day in archery, Morris dancing, and other amusements. See Eve May Day.

Mayer, Julius Robert (1814–1878). German physicist. He formulated the theory of the conservation of energy, which asserts that energy, although convertible from one form to another, is never created or destroyed. Similar work was done by the German physicist Hermann Helmholtz (1821–1894) and the English scientist James Prescott Joule (1818–1899).

Mayerling. A village in Austria, the site of the royal hunting lodge where the bodies of Archduke Rudolf, crown prince of Austria, and his mistress, Baroness Marie Vetsera, were found on Jan. 30, 1889. Although the official report stated that they had committed suicide, it is generally believed that Rudolf, partly because of despair over his father's command to end the affair, shot the baroness and then killed himself.

Mayflower. The ship on which 102 Pilgrims sailed from Southampton, England, to Massachusetts in 1620. See John Caver and Mount's Relation.

Upon their arrival in America after the 63-day voyage, the Pilgrims drew up the Mayflower Compact, an agreement binding them together in a "civil body politic" for the government of the colony. It remained the fundamental charter of the Plymouth Colony until its absorption by the Massachusetts Bay Colony in 1691.

Mayor of Casterbridge, The (1886). A novel by Thomas Hardy. Michael Henchard, an unemployed farmhand, becomes very drunk at a fair and sells his wife and baby for five guineas to a sailor named Newson. The next day, remorse-stricken, he takes an oath not to drink for twenty years and begins a fruitless search for his family. Eighteen years later, when the reformed and prosperous Henchard has become mayor of Casterbridge, his wife, Susan, and Elizabeth-Jane, now eighteen, reappear. Newson had been reported dead at sea and Susan has returned to be reunited with Henchard. After Susan dies, Henchard learns that his daughter died in infancy, and that Elizabeth-Jane is actually Newson's daughter, a fact which he conceals from her. A domineering, lonely man, the cliques to her as his fortunes decline because of his differences with his astute Scottish assistant, Donald Farfrae. Then the memory of Henchard's sale of his wife is publicly revived, and he reverts to his drinking habits. Newson, not dead after all, returns to claim Elizabeth-Jane, who soon marries Farfrae, now the new mayor of Casterbridge. Henchard, deserted, wanders off and dies in dejection.

Mayor of Zalamea, The. See Alcalde de Zalamea, El.

May Queen, The (1842). A ballad by Alfred, Lord Tennyson. It tells of the pride, the heartlessness, and the remorseful death of Alice, the village beauty. It contains the often parodied line:

For I'm to be queen o' the May, mother, I'm to be queen o' the May.

Mazarin, Jules (1602–1661). French cardinal and statesman of Italian birth. Succeeding Richelieu as prime minister in 1642, Mazarin was retained by the queen regent, Anne of Austria, after the death of Louis XIII. A wealthy collector of books, Mazarin bequeathed his library to France; his collection of theological and historical writings forms the core of the Bibliothèque Mazarine in Paris. See Bible, specially named editions.
Mazeppa, Ivan (1644–1709). A famous Cossack hetman, hero of Byron's poem Mazeppa (1819) and of Pushkin's drama Putilowa. He was born of a noble Polish family in Podolia and became a page in the court of John Casimir, king of Poland. He intrigued with Theresia, the young wife of a Podolian count, who had the young page lashed naked to a wild horse, which was then turned loose. In the Ukraine, Mazeppa was released and cared for by Cossacks and in time became hetman and prince of the Ukraine under Peter the Great of Russia. Byron makes Mazeppa tell his tale to Charles XII of Sweden after the battle of Pultowa, in which he had deserted to Charles and fought against Russia.

Mazikeen or Shedeem. A species of demons in Jewish mythology resembling the Arabian jinn and said to be the agents of magic and enchantment.

...swells out like the Mazikeen ass. The allusion is to a Jewish tradition that a servant, whose duty it was to rouse the neighborhood to midnight prayer, one night mounted a stray ass and neglected his duty. As he rode along the ass grew bigger and bigger, until at last it towered as high as the tallest edifice where it deposited the servant. The next morning he was found there.

Mazzini, Giuseppe (1805–1872). Italian patriot. An active member of the Carbonari, he founded (c. 1831), the secret revolutionary society Young Italy whose purpose was to liberate and unify Italy under a republican form of government. Later he fomented risings in Mantua, Milan, and Genoa. Although he gave every assistance to the expeditions of Garibaldi, he refused to support the monarchy established under Victor Emmanuel II of Sardinia, remaining a staunch republican to the end of his life.

Mc. For names beginning with Mc, see under Mac.

Mead, Margaret (1901– ). American anthropologist and psychologist. Her first work, Coming of Age in Samoa (1928), was a study of adolescent girls in a noncompetitive, permissive culture. She later made a number of other expeditions to study the customs of primitive peoples, marriage, and general sexual behavior, particularly relating to rites of adolescence. She has lectured on psychology and written frequently for both scholarly journals and popular magazines. Among her many books are Growing Up in New Guinea (1930), An Inquiry into the Question of Cultural Stability in Polynesia (1930), Sex and Temperament in Three Primitive Societies (1935), Male and Female (1949), Soviet Attitudes Toward Authority: An Interdisciplinary Approach to Problems of Soviet Character (1951), New Lives for Old (1956), and An Anthropologist at Work (1959).

Meal-Tub Plot (1679). A pretended conspiracy against Protestants. Fabricated by Thomas Dangerfield (d. 1685), it was so called because he said that the papers relating to it were concealed in a meal-tub in the house of Mrs. Cellier, a Roman Catholic. She was tried for high treason and acquitted, while Dangerfield was convicted of libel, whipped, and pilloried.

Mean, The (Chung-yung). One of the Chinese Four Books. Originally one chapter from the Book of Rites, it became important during the Sung Dynasty (960–1279), when it became required reading for aspirants to Chinese officialdom. It discusses basic moral concepts.

Meander (Maiandros). The modern Menderes River in Asia Minor. It dried up when Phaëthon drove the sun chariot. Its proverbial windings are comparable to those of the labyrinth of Minos.

Measure for Measure (c. 1604). A comedy by William Shakespeare. After deputizing Angelo to enforce Vienna's long-ignored laws, Duke Vincentio purports to leave the city but actually remains to observe the proceedings, disguised as Friar Lodowick. Angelo revives an old statute against fornication and sentences Claudio to death for seducing Juliete, his betrothed. When Claudio's sister, Isabella, a religious novice, pleads for his life, her beauty stirs Angelo's repressed passions; he promises her Claudio's freedom if she will yield herself to him, a suggestion which she angrily spurns. Claudio at first approves of her behavior but, overwhelmed by the thought of death, weakens and begs her compliance. Overhearing their conversation, Vincentio, still in monk's garb, proposes that Isabella pretend to accede to Angelo's request. In her place, however, he will send Mariana, who was formerly betrothed to Angelo but who has been spurned since the loss of her dowry. The plan is successful and, although Angelo breaks his promise by demanding Claudio's life, Friar Lodowick manages to save him. Revealing his true identity, Vincentio castigates Angelo for his severity and orders him to marry Mariana, while he himself sues for the hand of Isabella.

The main source of the play is George Whetstone's Promos and Cassandra (before 1578), which is based upon a story in Giraldo Cinthio's Hecatommites (1565).

Mecca. In Arabia, the birthplace of Muhammad and the holiest of Muslim cities. It is to Mecca that all pious Muslims make the hadj or pilgrimage at least once during their lifetime.

Mecisteus (Mekisteus). See Seven Against Thebes.

Meck, Nadezhda Filaretovna von (1831–1894). Tchaikovsky's patroness, widow of a Russian railroad contractor. She helped Tchaikovsky by getting him commissions for his work and (1877) by making him a substantial annual allowance. They never met, but corresponded continuously, she being known as his "beloved friend."

Medal, The (1682). A satirical poem by John Dryden. Like Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel, it was aimed at the earl of Shaftesbury, who had recently been exonerated from a charge of high treason. His Whig followers had a medal cast to commemorate the event.

Médard, St. Bishop of Noyon and Tournai in the 6th century. He founded the festival of the rose at Salency, which was continued even in the 20th century, the most virtuous girl in the parish receiving a crown of roses and a purse of money. This custom is the basis for De Maupassant's story Le Roi de Madame Husson on which, in turn, Benjamin Britten based his opera Albert Herring (1947). Legend says that a sudden shower once fell which watered everyone to the skin except St. Médard, who remained perfectly dry, for an eagle had spread its wings over him. Ever after he was termed maître de la pluie (master of the rain). It is said of him, as of St. Swinthun, that if it rains on his holy day, it will rain for 40 days thereafter.

Medb. In early Irish literature, she is queen of Cruachain, wife of Ailill, and dire enemy of the hero Cú Chulainn. It is she who instigates the great conflict of the CATTLE-RAID of COOLEY, and ultimately she brings about the death of Cú Chulainn.

Medea (Medea). In Greek mythology, a sorceress and priestess of Hecate, daughter of the Colchian king Aeetes, and wife of Jason, later of Aegaeus. Falling in love with Jason, she helped him to steal the GOLDEN FLEECE and to murder her half-brother Apsyrtus to delay their pursuers. (See ARGONAUTS.) Purified of murder by her aunt Circe and married to Jason among the Phaeacians, she returned with him to Iolcus. There she persuaded the three daughters of Jason's enemy PELIAS that she could rejuvenate him if they would cut him in pieces. Alcestis refused, but her sisters did so, and when Pelias was dead, Jason's Argonauts captured the city and placed Pelias' son Acacius on the throne.

Medea laid claim to the throne of Ephrye (Corinth), where Aeetes had once reigned, for Jason. Although he owed most of his successes to her, Jason later repudiated her in order to marry Glauce, daughter of Creon. Medea murdered her two children by Jason and escaped in a chariot drawn by winged serpents to Athens, where she married AEGEUS. After trying to poison his son Theseus, she was banished and ultimately returned to Colchis.

Medea was sympathetically portrayed by APOLLONIUS OF RHODES in his epic Argonautica and by EURIPIDES in his drama Medea, which told of her revenge on Jason, but neither forgot that she was both witch and barbarian. Robinson Jeffers based his poetic drama Medea on the story of the Euripides play. The story has also been the subject of operas by M. A. CHARPENTIER (1693) and CHERUBINI (1757), both entitled Medee.

Médicin malgré lui, Le (The Doctor in Spite of Himself, 1666). A comedy by Molière. Forbidden by her father GÉRONTE to marry the penniless Léandre, Lucinde feigns deafness. Géronte searches in vain for a skilled doctor to cure her. The woodcutter Sganarelle, forced by his wife to masquerade as a specialist, earns an enormous fee from Géronte merely by reciting nonsensical medical jargon; he accepts a bribe from Léandre, takes the young man on as his ostensible apothecary, and restores Lucinde's speech so successfully that Géronte begs Sganarelle to make her dumb again. Sganarelle replies that he cannot do that, but he can make Géronte deaf. Lucinde elopes with Léandre, but Géronte is mollified upon learning that Léandre has inherited a fortune from his uncle. The character Sganarelle is one of Molière's supreme comic creations.

Médée (Medea, 1635). The first tragedy of Pierre CORNEILLE. Modeled on Euripides and Seneca, it relates Medea's bloody vengeance upon the faithless Jason. While superior to earlier French tragedies, the play does not attain the simplicity and restraint of Corneille's later works.

Medici. The famous Florentine family that rose to prominence during the Italian Renaissance on the wings of economic power and widespread cultural activities. Though the name suggests "doctor" or "medicine," the family accumulated its wealth in banking and trading, bourgeois origins that did not prevent its members from eventually joining the highest nobility of Europe.

Cosimo de' Medici (1389-1464), called Pater Patriae (Father of his Country) and the first of the family to exert cultural influence by his patronage of artists and writers and his encouragement of learning.

Lorenzo de' Medici (1449-1492), called il Magnifico (The Magnificent), the grandson of Cosimo and the most famous of all the Medici. He was a patron of Picino and Poliziano, Pico della Mirandola, Botticelli, Leonardo da Vinci, the young Michelangelo, and a host of other famous Renaissance artists. He himself wrote Petrarchan and other kinds of verse, sacred drama, and literary criticism. An astute politician, he kept his city-state secure and Italy united through the expert use of diplomacy. His death brought on the regime of Savonarola in Florence and the French invasions of the Italian peninsula. Historians have seen him as the embodiment of much of the Renaissance spirit.

Giovanni de' Medici (1475-1521), son of Lorenzo who reigned as Pope Leo X (1513-1521).

Giuliano de' Medici (1478-1516), youngest son of Lorenzo, duke of Nemours, and a minor poet popular in the literary salons of his day. Castiglione made him an interlocutor in the Cortegiano.

Giulio de' Medici (1478-1534), nephew of Lorenzo who reigned as Pope Clement VII (1523-1534). During his pontificate the sack of Rome by imperial forces took place (1527). Cellini, who worked for him, described the scene memorably in his Autobiography.

Giovanni de' Medici (1498-1526), called Giovanni delle Bande Nere, descendant of the younger branch of the Medici, a famous military commander. The black armor of his feared troops gave him and them the name Bande Nere (Black Bands). He was also known as "the Invincible," and praised by Aretino, who was with him when he died of a wound received in battle. Though he was only 28 at the time of his death, he has been called the greatest soldier produced by Italy during the 16th century.

Two female members of the family became queens of France: CATHERINE DE MÉDICIS, wife of Henry II, and MARIE DE MÉDICIS, who married Henry IV in 1600.

Médico de su honra, El (The Physician of his Own Honor). A drama by Pedro Calderón de la Barca, the most extreme of his honor tragedies. Doña Mencia, in love with Prince Enrique, is forced to marry Don Gutiérrez. However, the prince continues to pay her attention, although she tries to dissuade him. Don Gutiérrez, erroneously believing that his honor has been besmirched, has a surgeon bleed his wife to death. Since Don Gutiérrez has operated within the limits of the code of honor, the king condones his act.

Medina. A city in Arabia, the second holy city of the Muslims. It was called Yathrib before Muhammad fled there from Mecca, but afterward Medina-al-nabi (the city of the prophet), from which its present name is derived. See NEGIRA; FAEBRE QUEENIE, THE.

Medium, The (1946). A two-act opera by Gian Carlo MENOTTI about a female charlatan, a medium who is haunted by her own hoaxes.
Medmenham Abbey. A ruined Cistercian abbey near Marlow on the Thames. It became the meeting place for the Hell-fire Club, founded by Sir Francis Dashwood in 1745 with John Wilkes and Bubb Dodington among its members. Its convivialities became orgies and its ritual was a mockery of all religion.

Medoro. In the Orlando Furioso of Ariosto, a Moorish youth of great beauty but humble origins; he is page to Agramante and is wounded in the battle for Paris between the pagan and Christian forces. Angelica cares for him and soon the two fall in love, thus precipitating the jealousy and madness of Orlando. The two lovers flee to Cathay, where Medoro takes the throne.

Medusa (Medousa). The chief of the Gorgons of Greek myth. It is said she dallied with Poseidon in Athena's temple and the goddess, outraged, changed Medusa's hair into serpents and made her face so terrible that it turned the beholder to stone. Perseus, with a sword given to him by the god Hermes, was able to cut off her head by looking only at her reflection in Athena's shield. From the dead Gorgon's blood sprang Pegasus, the winged horse, and Chrysaor, her children by Poseidon. Perseus used Medusa's head to rescue ANDROMEDA, and later gave it to Athena in gratitude for her protection. Athena wears it on her shield and on her breastplate.

Medwin, Thomas (1788–1869). English biographer and cousin of Shelley. In 1821 he was with Shelley and Byron in Italy. His Memoir of Shelley (1833) was later expanded into The Life of Shelley (2 vols., 1847).

Meiji. Japanese period (1868–1912). It marks the emergence of Japan as a modern state. Under the banner of the restoration of the imperial family, various clans joined to bring an end to the Tokugawa shogunate. This period saw an intense Westernization and modernization with the introduction of Occidental scientific knowledge, culture, and literature. A constitution was established, parliamentary government instituted, and Japan changed from an isolated feudal nation to a world power. Military victories were gained over China (1894) and Russia (1905) and Korea was annexed in 1910. Translations from Western literary, scientific, and philosophical works were made on a wholesale scale and much of Japanese literary production was influenced by the Occidental example. The emperor during the period was Mutsuhito (1852–1912). Meiji is the name designated for his reign.

Meilhac, Henri. See Ludovic Halévy.

Meinhold, Wilhelm (1797–1851). German author, famous especially for his skill in historical realism. His tale Maria Schüttelder, die Bernsteinhexe (Marie Schüttelder, the Amber Witch, 1843) was taken, at its publication, for an authentic chronicle from the 17th century.

Mein Kampf (My Struggle, 1924). An autobiographical work by Adolf Hitler, in which he revealed his program for political action in Germany. It was dictated to Rudolf Hess during his imprisonment after the Beer-Hall Putsch.

Meister, Wilhelm. See Wilhelm Meister.

Meistersingers (Ger., mastersingers). Members of German guilds of poets and singers, who attempted to preserve, in the 14th through 16th centuries, the medieval art form of the Minnesingers. The Meistersingers, of whom the most famous were Hans Sachs and Hans Folz, usually formed organizations similar to the craft guilds of the day: the title of "master" was given only to those who had proven their creative and vocal talent, and singing contests were often held among the masters. In general, however, the Meistergesang ("master-singing") is regarded as a degeneration of the Minnesang, retaining the external form but relinquishing the immediacy and artistic power of the original.

Meistersinger von Nürnberg, Die (1868). A comic opera by Richard Wagner. The hand of the fair young Eva Pogner, daughter of the town goldsmith, is promised as the prize for a Nuremberg singing contest. The chief rivals are Beckmesser the town clerk, and a young knight, Walther von Stolzing, who is loved by Eva and has dreamed a beautiful song. He is hampered, however, by his ignorance of all the petty artificial rules of the songfest. Walther's cause is championed by Hans Sachs, the cobbler, and with his aid Beckmesser is put to confusion. Walther sings his Preislied and scores a triumph. Beckmesser is patterned on Edward Hanslick, a distinguished music critic who had annoyed Wagner by refusing to be impressed with his skill as a poet. Sachs is a fictional portrait of the historical poet.

Meitner, Lise (1878–1968). Austrian physicist. In collaboration with Otto Hahn she did highly important work in nuclear fission.

Mejor alcalde el rey, El (The King, the Greatest Alcalde). A historical drama by Lope de Vega. It is based on an anecdote about King Alfonso VII (1126–1157). In this work, Lope contrasts royal justice with feudal tyranny.

Sancho, a poor peasant, is in love with Nuño's daughter Elvira. Don Tello, a feudal lord of the region, consents to the marriage but, on seeing Elvira, determines to possess her herself and carries her off to his castle. When Don Tello ignores Sancho's protests, the injured youth goes to the king and begs him to send a strong alcalde, or judge, to see that justice is done. The king himself, disguised as an Melampus (Melampus). In Greek mythology, a seer. He understood the language of birds and beasts. This accomplishment saved his life when he overheard some woodborers worms remarking that the roof over his head was about to fall. He was the first mortal to practice the art of healing. He also appears to have been the first psychiatrist to recognize a castration complex. Phylacus of Phylace, king of Phylace, had imprisoned Melampus for trying to steal Phylacus' famous cattle as a wedding gift for Melampus' brother Bias. Learning of Melampus' special gifts after the episode of the roof, he promised Melampus both freedom and the cattle if Melampus would cure Phylacus' son Iphiclus of impotence. Eavesdropping on a pair of vultures, Melampus learned that Iphiclus had been terribly frightened as a child on seeing his father approaching him with a gelding knife, bloodstained from some rams. Melampus fed Iphiclus a potion made of the rust of the knife and he was cured.

Melanchthon, Philipp (1497-1560). German religious reformer, friend and follower of Luther, and nephew of Johann Reuchlin. (Melanchthon is a Hellenized form of his actual German surname Schwarzzerd, which was interpreted as “black earth.”) A noted humanist scholar, Melanchthon began as a professor of Greek, and because of his pedagogical endeavors, was known as “praeproetor Germaniae” (“the teacher of Germany”). His most important religious works are the Loci Communnes Rerum Theologicarum (Common Topics in Theology, 1524), the first extensive formulation of Protestant doctrine, and the Augsburg Confession (1531) which he helped to draft. His desire to reconcile Roman Catholicism and Protestantism led to difficulties in his relationship with Luther.

Melba, Nellie (the stage name of Helen Porter Armstrong, born Mitchell; 1861-1931). Australian coloratura soprano. She made her début as Gilda in Rigoletto, was soon admired everywhere, and became the prima donna of the Royal Opera at Covent Garden, London. She was made Dame of the British Empire in 1918. She inspired two operas: Hélène (1904) by Saint-Saëns, and Elaine (1892) by Bemberg, as well as the delicacies peach melba and melba toast. Melodies and Memories (1925) is her autobiography.

Melchior. See MAGI.

Meleager (Meleagros). A hero of Greek legend, son of Oeneus of Calydon and Althaea. He was distinguished for throwing the javelin, for slaying the Calydonian boar, and as one of the Argonauts. It was declared by the Fates that he would die as soon as a piece of wood then on the fire was burnt up, whereupon his mother snatched the log from the fire and extinguished it. After Meleager had slain his maternal uncles, who had tried to prevent him from giving the boar's head to Atalanta for drawing first blood, his mother threw the brand on the fire again, and Meleager died.

Melibee. One of the Canterbury Tales of Geoffrey Chaucer. It is told by Chaucer after the Host interrupts his narration of the rhyme of Sir Thopas. It is a long prose didactic work, closely translated from a French adaptation of the Latin Liber Consolationis et Consilii by Albertanus of Brescia (c. 1193-1270). Melibee (or Melibeus) returns from the fields to find that three of his enemies have beaten his wife Prudence and killed his daughter Sophie. Grieving, he rages about vengeance, but Prudence begins to reason with him, husband and wife both making extensive use of proverbs and quotations from scholastic authorities. Finally Prudence persuades him and his repentant enemies to come together in peace, and Melibee forgives them, hoping that God will likewise forgive human trespasses.

Melicertes (Melikertes). In Greek mythology, the son of Athamas and Ino. Ino led him with him into the sea. Possibly a Greek form of the Phoenician Melkarth, he became the sea-god Palaemon.

Mélisande. (1) The heroine of Maeterlinck's play * Pelléas et Mélisande*. She is a beautiful creature of mysterious origins.

(2) Another name for the water-spirit Melusina.

Melisenda, Melisendra. In medieval Spanish romance, the daughter of Charlemagne and the wife of Don Gayferos (Gwyferos). She is captured by the Moors and imprisoned for seven years before her husband rescues her. In the second part of Cervantes' Don Quixote the story is played as a puppet show. This scene from the novel was made into a one-act opera, El Retablo de Maese Pedro, by Manuel de Falla.

Melissa. A prophetess in the Orlando Furioso of Ariosto, who lives in Merlin's cave. Bradamante, the warrior maiden, asks her to use an enchanted ring and rescue her beloved Ruggiero, who is in the power of the lovely witch Althaea. Assuming the form of Atlantes, she rescues Ruggiero and Astolfo, then disenchants all the forms metamorphosed in the island. Later, posing as Rodomonte, she persuades Agramante to break the league which was to settle the contest by single combat, thus precipitating a general battle.

MELKARTh. The BAA of Tyre. His name ("lord of the city") may appear in Greek mythology as Melicertes, and is thought by some to bear a relation to Heracles.

Mell, Max (1882— ). Austrian dramatist. His early plays on religious themes, all strongly influenced by Hofmannsthal's Jedermann (Everyman, 1911), include Das Apostelspiel (The Apostle Play, 1922), Das Schutzengelspiel (The Play of the Guardian Angel, 1923) and Das Nachfolge-Christi-Spiel (The Play of the Imitation of Christ, 1927). Later, he attempted to recreate the grandeur of classical tragedy in his Seven Against Thebes (Sieben gegen Theben, 1952), but he soon turned toward more nationalistic ideas in Das Spiel von den deutschen Ahnen (The Play of the German Ancestors, 1935) and in Der Nibelungen Not (The Distress of the Nibelungs, 1944) which draws from the medieval Nibelungenlied. Among his recent works is a historical Jeanne d'Arc (Joan of Arc, 1957).

Mellichamp. See PARTISAN, THE.

Mellors. In D. H. Lawrence's novel Lady Chatterley's Lover, the gamekeeper lover of the aristocratic heroine. He is an ideal Lawrence hero, forthright, sexually potent, and close to nature. Lawrence himself was of working-class origin and his wife, Frieda, of an aristocratic family.

Melmoth, Sebastian. A name adopted by Oscar Wilde after his exile to France following his release from prison in England. Melmoth is from Maturin's novel Melmoth the Wanderer; Sebastian is after St. Sebastian, whose martyrdom was suggested by the arrows on Wilde's prison garb.

Melmoth the Wanderer (1820). A horrific Gothic novel by Charles Maturin. The hero, Melmoth, sells his soul to the devil in exchange for prolonged life. The pact can be canceled if Melmoth finds anyone willing to accept the same terms, but no one, not even those in the worst of circumstances, is willing to make the bargain.

Melozzo da Forli (1438-1494). Italian painter. He was a follower of Piero della Francesca, though much more emotional than his austere master. He is best known for his paintings of music-making angels and of Pope Sixtus and his Court, a Vatican mural.

Melpomene. In Greek mythology, the Muse of tragedy.

Melusina or Mélisande. A fairy in medieval French romance who is turned into a water sprite, fish-shaped from the waist down. She resumes human form when she marries Count Raymond of Poitiers, but he must promise never to see her on Saturdays, for then her mermaid appearance returns. He builds her the castle of Lusignan and others, but one Saturday secretly observes her in her bath. Melusina is now forced to leave and wander as a spirit forever. Jean d'Arras recorded the story in 1387.

Melvil, Count Rendalo de. See Ferdinand Count Pathom.

Melville, Herman (1819-1891). American novelist, short-story writer, and poet. Member of a once prominent New York family, Melville was raised in an atmosphere of financial instability and genteel pretense. After the death of his father in 1832, he tried several jobs to help the family, among them clerking in a bank, school teaching, and going to sea.

His first voyage to Liverpool became the background for his fourth novel, Redburn, the story of a young boy's initiation into manhood. Next he sailed for the South Seas, where he deserted his ship, the Acushnet, and took refuge among the cannibalistic Types. Escaping from this beguiling imprisonment, he became involved in a mutiny, worked in Hawaii, and finally sailed home with the navy in 1844. He had never considered writing as a career, but, at the behest of friends, published his travel memoirs. Typee: A Peep at Polynesian Life was a literary success, and the new author continued his adventures in a second book, Omoo.

Melville, who had been sporadically educated, now began reading widely to broaden his knowledge of the world's literature. Marrying Elizabeth Shaw in 1847, he moved to New York. His next book, Mardi and a Voyage Thither, begins as an adventure story but ends in philosophical allegory. Melville, intoxicated by metaphysics, was no longer content with the comparatively simple aims of his earlier books. In Mardi, Melville makes his first real use of a questing hero and a consciously symbolic level of meaning. Discouraged by the book's failure, the young author, now a father, dashed off Redburn. Apparently a return to autobiographical adventure, Redburn was a financial success. The following year, Melville wrote White Jacket; or, Life in a Man-of-War, based on his life in the navy. Unable wholly to ignore symbolic significance, he does introduce a deeper meaning in both books, especially in White-Jacket.

Traveling to England, Melville arranged for the English publication of his books. In 1851 he completed his masterpiece, Moby-Dick: or, The Whale. An epic of a literal and metaphysical quest, it belongs to no genre. Although characters appear and disappear without explanation, and point of view changes, the book succeeds. Melville's contemporaries did not appreciate it; however, and mentally exhausted, he began Pierre; or, The Ambiguities. A pessimistic, deeply personal book, Pierre mirrors his author's psychological state.

Melville supported his family, during the 1850's, by farming and writing stories for magazines. Among these tales are Bartleby the Scrivener, and Benito Cereno. He also wrote a serialized novel, Israel Potter; or, Fifty Years of Exile, an ironic view of the state of American democracy. His last prose, until his final years, was the cynical and satirical novel The Confidence-Man, His Masquerade.

Melville then traveled to England, where he saw his friend Nathaniel Hawthorne for the last time. Troubled and exhausted, he visited the Holy Land, returning to New York in 1857. After an unsuccessful attempt at lecturing, he became a customs inspector in New York, a job he held for 20 years.

Unnoticed by the literary public, he turned to writing poetry. Among his poetic works are Battle-Pieces and Aspects of the War, Clarle: A Poem and Pilgrimage in the Holy Land, John Mark and Other Sailors, and Timoleon. Published posthumously were two books: a volume of poetry called Weeds and Wildlings (1924) and the novella Billy Budd, Foretopman.

Like other American artists in the latter half of the 19th century, Melville was a member of the literary underground. He had a small coterie, but was remembered, if at all, as the man who had lived with cannibals. It was not until the 1920's that he began to be recognized as one of the greatest of American writers. See Piazza Tales, The.

Member of the Wedding, The. A novel by Carson McCullers. A perceptive study, it tells the story of a motherless girl, 13-year-old Frankie, who wants to accompany her brother and his wife on their honeymoon. The wedding is seen through her eyes; as a chorus to her remarks and thoughts, one hears her six-year-old cousin and the Negro cook. The author's highly successful dramatic version of the novel was produced in New York in 1950.

Mening, Hans (c. 1430-1495). Flemish painter. He is known for the sweetness of his melancholy Madonnas, as well as for his sensitive handling of portraits and landscape backgrounds.

Memmi, Albert (1920- ). Tunisian-born French novelist. Memmi wrote of the poignant failure of the meeting of different cultures and religions in The Pillar of Salt (La Statue de Sel; 1953) and Strangers (Ager; 1955).

Memnon. An Oriental or Ethiopian prince. In the Trojan War, he went to the assistance of his uncle Priam and was slain by Achilles. His mother Eos (the Dawn) was inconsolable for his death, and wept for him every morning.

The Greeks called the statue of Amenophis III, in Thebes, that of Memnon. When first struck by the rays of the rising sun, it is said to have produced a sound like the snapping asunder of a cord. Poetically, when Eos kissed her son at daybreak, the hero acknowledged the salutation with a musical murmur. Memnon is the title of a novel by Voltaire, the object of which is to show the folly of aspiring to too much wisdom.

Mémoires d'Outre-Tombe (Memories from beyond the Tomb, 1848–1850). A volume of personal reminiscences by François René de Chateaubriand. Written during the period 1811–1841, the work was first published in La Presse.

Memoirs of a Midget (1921). A novel by Walter de la Mare. It is a fantastic romance, in which the world is seen from the midget's-eye-view of the heroine.

Memoirs of Barry Lyndon, Esq., Written by Himself, The (1844). A novel by William Makepeace Thackeray. The Irish narrator, Redmond Barry, is an utter scoundrel and manages to involve himself in a steady succession of affairs, which he writes of as though he were invariably in the right, “the victim of many cruel persecutions, conspiracies and slanders.” He courts and wins the widowed Countess Lyndon, spends her money and keeps her in his power, but finally goes from bad to worse and dies in the Fleet prison.

Mena, Juan de (1411–1456). Spanish poet and scholar. Educated in Italy, Mena served as Latin secretary to King John II of Castile. His best-known work is El laberinto de Fortuna or Las trescientas, an allegory suggested by Dante’s Paradiso, in which the poet is transported to the palace of Fortune, where he is offered a vision of the past, present, and future. Mena is also remembered for having introduced many neologisms of Latin origin into the Spanish language.

Menaka. In Hindu legend, the heavenly nymph, seducer of Visvamitra. Her daughter is Shakuntala. The gods sent her to distract Visvamitra from his penance.

Menander (Menandros); 342–292 B.C.). An Athenian comic playwright, perhaps the best-known writer of New Comedy. His work was practically unknown until 1905, when considerable sections of three plays were discovered on a papyrus in Egypt. In 1957 the extant complete play of Menander was discovered in Egypt, Dyskolos (The Bad-tempered Man). Although he employed the type characters and standard plot devices of New Comedy, Menander was a sophisticated and witty playwright. Many of the better-known plays of Plautus and Terence were adapted from his works.

Men and Women. See Robert Browning.

Mencius, The. One of the Chinese Four Books. It concerns the teachings of the Confucian philosopher Mencius; 372–289 B.C.), compiled by his disciples after his death. After the Sung dynasty (960–1279) it became one of the basic texts in the Chinese educational system. Mencius, living in a time of constant warfare, advanced a doctrine which maintained that the original nature of man was good and that through virtue and benevolence on his part the ruler could inspire similar sentiments in his subjects. See James Legge, The Works of Mencius (1895). The Chinese spelling of Mencius is Meng-tzu. See Confucianism.

Mencken, H[enry]L[ouis] (1880–1956). American newspaperman, editor, and writer. Mencken began his career on the Baltimore Herald; he joined the Sun papers in 1906. In 1908 he became literary editor of the Smart Set; with George Jean Nathan he edited the magazine from 1914 to 1923. In 1924, he and Nathan founded The American Mercury, which became known for its “debunking” articles and its section entitled “Americana.” Mencken excelled at framing insults and elicited violent retorts from those he labeled the “booboisie.” He attacked Puritanism, conservatism, religion, and countless other subjects. In 1918, he was divested of his usual occupations by his developing interest in American English; in a detailed and well-organized volume called The American Language, he opened up a new field of study. In 1933, Mencken withdrew from The American Mercury; he continued his vitriolic attacks, however, against Hoover, Wilson, and Roosevelt and his New Deal. Critics credit Mencken with skill at satire, and admire the vigor and trenchancy of his attacks on the shams of his day; but they also call attention to his intolerance, frequent crudity, and misinformation.

Mencken’s views are best promulgated in these collections of his essays: A Book of Burlesques (1916), Dawn: a Book of Callamny (1917), and Prejudices (6 vols., 1919–1927). He also wrote many other books, among them Ventures into Verse (1903), poems; George Bernard Shaw, His Plays (1905); Philosophy of Friedrich Nietzsche (1906); The Art of (1912) and Heliobagis (1920), plays; and Menckeniana: A Schimpflextion (1927), compiled from his usual press notices about Mencken. His autobiography was published in three volumes: Happy Days (1940), Newspaper Days (1941), and Heathen Days (1943). Mencken appears as the character E. K. Hornbeck in the play Inheret the Wind (1955), by Jerome Lawrence and Robert E. Lee.

Mendel, Gregor Johann (1822–1884). Austrian botanist and Augustinian monk. Through his breeding experiments with peas in the monastery garden, he formulated the laws of heredity bearing his name and laid the foundation for modern genetics.

Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, [Jakob Ludwig]Felix (1809–1847). German composer-conductor and pianist. He was a grandson of Moses Mendelssohn. He became instrumental in reintroducing the works of Bach, performing in 1829 that composer’s Passion According to St. Matthew for the first time since Bach’s death. He became conductor at the Gewandhaus, Leipzig, in 1835. He composed symphonies (among them the Reformation in 1830, the Italian in 1833, and the Scottish in 1842); overtures (A Midsummer Night’s Dream in 1826, The Hebrews in 1830–1832, Ruy Blas in 1839, and others); piano concertos in G minor (1831) and D minor (1837); a famous violin concerto in E minor (1844); choral works, especially the oratorios St. Paul (1834–1836) and Elijah (1846–1847); complete music for Shakespeare’s A Midsummer Night’s Dream (1843); and many smaller works. His earliest mature work shows superb craftsmanship and a great melodic gift, but the many works he later wrote showed little development in technique or deepening of expression.
Mendelssohn, Moses

Mendelssohn, Moses (1729–1786). Popular German Jewish philosopher who, with his friend Lessing, was a staunch defender of religious tolerance. His major work is \textit{Phaëdon} (1767), the title taken from Plato’s \textit{Phaedo}, which supports belief in the immortality of the soul. Dorothea Veit was his daughter. Felix Mendelssohn, the composer, was his grandson.

Mendès, Catulle (1841–1909). French poet and man of letters. Mendès founded the \textit{Revue fantaisiste} (1859), a poetry review which first published several of the Parnassian poets. In his \textit{Légende du Parnasse contemporain} (1884) he describes the beginnings of the new poetic movement. See Parnassians.

Mendicant Orders. Orders of the Franciscans (Grey Friars), Augustines (Black Friars), Carmelites (White Friars), and Dominicans (Preaching Friars). So called from the wandering mode of life in the early years of the orders, before permanent homes were allowed.

\textbf{Mending Wall} (1914). A poem by Robert Frost. The dramatic situation of the poem is simple: once a year Frost and a neighbor mend the wall which separates their property. Frost, however, contends that the wall is unnecessary, while the neighbor simply repeats the saying of his father, “Good fences make good neighbors.”

\textbf{Menelaus} (\textit{Menelaos}). In Greek mythology, a son of Atreus, brother of Agamemnon, and husband of Helen. His wife’s abduction by Paris was the ostensible cause of the Trojan war. Menelaus was king of Lacedaemon or Sparta. He appears prominently not only in the \textit{Iliad} but in three plays by Euripides, \textit{The Trojan Woman}, \textit{Helen}, and \textit{Andromache}.

\textbf{Menen, Aubrey} (1912– ). English novelist and essayist, of East Indian and Irish parentage. Much of his work, such as the autobiography and essay \textit{Dead Man in the Silver Market} (1953), is directed against nationalism and group prejudice. The \textit{Prevalence of Witches} (1948) is a satiric novel about the difference between tribal and British civil law in a remote Indian province. He has also written comedies of Italian life, such as \textit{The Duke of Gallipolo} (1952).

\textbf{Menéndez Pidal, Ramón} (1869– ). Spanish literary historian. He is considered the chief romance-language philologist and medieval authority in Spain, and his scholarship has inspired a generation of literary historians and critics. He also is a linguistics specialist of major repute. His works include \textit{La leyenda de los infantes de Lara} (1896); his critical text in 3 volumes, \textit{Cantar de mio Cid} (1908–1912); \textit{La España del Cid} (\textit{The Cid and his Spain}, 1930); and \textit{Los orígenes del español} (1926). Menéndez Pidal founded the \textit{Revista de filología española} (1914), a journal; he also established the Madrid Center of Historical Studies (1907).

\textbf{Menenius Agrippa}. In Shakespeare’s \textit{Coriolanus}, an aged counsellor and friend to Coriolanus. “One that hath always loved the people,” he represents the judicious attitude of the Roman nobility, aware of their own superiority and yet aware that the people must be flattered to maintain peace.

Měng Tzū. See Meng Tzu, THE.

\textbf{Men in White} (1933). A play by Sidney Kingsley. It reveals the internal workings of a hospital when a surgeon is faced with a conflict between love and professional duty. The play won a Pulitzer Prize in 1934.

\textbf{Menken, Adah Isaacs} (1835–1868). American actress and poet. Her stage career began in New Orleans in 1857, while her poems were appearing in the \textit{Cincinnati Israelite} and the New York \textit{Sunday Mercury}. A frequent subject of scandal, she charmed many writers, including Joaquín Miller, Bret Harte, Mark Twain, Dickens, Reade, Swinburne, Rossetti, Dumas père, and Gautier. Her flamboyantly romantic autobiographical verse was published in a volume called \textit{Infelicitas} (1868).

\textbf{Menonite}. A member of an evangelical Protestant sect. Originating in Switzerland during the 16th century, they took their name from Menno Simons (1492–1559), a Dutch religious reformer who belonged to the less fanatical wing of the Anabaptists from which they sprang. Personal regeneration by adult baptism, a refusal to bear arms and take oaths, and rejection of worldly concerns, as exemplified in a uniform plainness of dress, are among their characteristic tenets. The sect still exists in Holland and Germany although most of its membership is now to be found in Canada and the U.S., the Amish Church being one of its major branches.

\textbf{Menoeceus} (\textit{Menókeus}). In Greek mythology, a son of Creon. When, in the war with the \textit{Seven against Thebes}, Tiresias predicted that Thebes will be saved only if one of its heroes voluntarily sacrifices himself for the city, Menoeceus promptly flings himself from the walls.

\textbf{Men of Good Will}. See Jules Romains.

\textbf{Menshevik}. See Bolshevnik.

\textbf{Menteur, Le} (\textit{The Liar}, 1643). A comedy by Pierre Corneille. It concerns the misadventures of the invertebrate but sympathetic liar, Dorante, who ultimately confuses the name of the lady he is courting with that of another and so embroils himself in lies that his only recourse is to transfer his affections to the other lady.

\textbf{Mentor}. An old man, mentioned in the \textit{Odyssey}. In his care Odysseus left his son Telemachus on embarking for the Trojan War. He appears prominently at the beginning of the \textit{Odyssey}; his name has become synonymous with a wise and faithful counselor.

\textbf{Men Without Women} (1927). A collection of 14 short stories by Ernest Hemingway. The finest examples of Hemingway’s mastery of description, dialogue, and atmosphere are to be found in this volume. The story most often anthologized is \textit{The Killers}, a narrative remarkable for its aura of impending doom and dramatic restraint. \textit{The Undersea and Fifty Grand} deal with one of Hemingway’s favorite subjects—the courage of an aging man. \textit{Hills Like White Elephants} and \textit{A Simple Inquiry}, both consisting of dialogue and a few vividly drawn descriptions, appear to be simple, almost trivial sketches, but have a sinister and dramatic undertone.

\textbf{Mephistopheles}. Also \textit{Mephistophiles}, \textit{Mephistophilis}, \textit{Mefistofele}, \textit{Mephostophilus}. Name of the demonic tempter in all the literary versions of the Favst legend, although his characteristics vary among them. The derivation is disputed, possibly Greek for not loving the light and thus the lord of the darkness, possibly Hebrew for destroyer and liar. Mephis-topheles inherits his varying form and personality from both the Christian system of demonology, in which he is one of the seven chief devils, and from the pagan Germanic tradition of the kobold, or misichevous familiar spirit. Thus he is never identified with the Devil who is the fallen angel Lucifer, although he resembles him in part; he is more the pure fiend of pagan superstition in the earlier stories, and by Goethe’s time the fiendish sneerer at all values has an air of urbane sophistication.

In Goethe’s Faust, Mephistopheles is the tempting spirit of hell who uses his supernatural powers in Faust’s service, after receiving a contract to the effect that Faust will sacrifice his soul to him at death.
Mephistopheles characterizes himself as “der Geist, der stets verneint” (“the spirit who always negates”), that is, the spirit of absolute destruction, whose wish is that the entire world return to nothingness. Faust, on the other hand, never desires destruction for its own sake, but is always in some sense idealistic, despite the constant immorality of the means he employs for his ends. The pact between Faust and Me-phistopheles, unlike that in other versions of the story, sets no time limit. Faust is to continue living with Mephisto as his servant until the time when he is so completely satisfied that he begs the present moment not to pass away.

He appears in Gounod’s opera Faust, and Boito’s opera Mefistofele. He is mentioned by Shakespeare (Merry Wives, I.1) and Fletcher as Mephostophilus, and appears prominently in Marlowe’s Dr. Faustus as Mephostophiles.

Mercator, Gerhardus. Latin for Gerhard Krämer (1512–1594). A Flemish geographer. He is especially remembered for the system of projection, first used in his map of 1568 and now known as Mer-cator’s projection, in which the meridians are drawn as parallel lines so that only comparatively small areas can be made to appear in correct relative dimensions.

Mercer, Cecil William. See Dornford Yates.

Merchant of Venice, The (c. 1595). A comedy by William Shakespeare. In order to finance Bas-iano’s voyage from Venice to Belmont to win the hand of Portia, Antonio, a Venetian merchant, bor-rrows money from the Jew Shylock and signs a bond stipulating that if the money is not repaid within three months Shylock may cut a pound of flesh from Antonio’s body. In Belmont, Bassanio is about to wed Portia when he learns that the ships from which Antonio would have obtained the money to pay Shylock have been lost and that Shylock is demanding his pound of flesh. After a hasty wedding, Bassanio returns to Venice to attend his friend’s trial.
Without telling her husband, Portia obtains legal advice and, accompanied by her maid Nerissa, appears at the trial disguised as a lawyer. She wins the case by insisting that Shylock may take neither more nor less than the exact pound of flesh specified in the bond and that, if in the process a single drop of blood is shed, Shylock must pay for the infliction with his life. Because he had sought the life of a Venetian citizen, Shylock also loses half his property to Antonio, but the merchant returns it to him on the condition that it be bequeathed to Shylock’s daughter Jessica, who has recently eloped with Lorenzo, a friend of Bassanio. The play ends happily as Portia reveals her identity to her astonished husband and Antonio’s ships are recovered.

The sources of the plot are a play called The Jev, first mentioned in 1579, Fiorentino’s Il Pecorone (1558), and the Gesta Romanorum (c. 1472).

Merchant’s Tale, The. One of the Canterbury Tales of Geoffrey Chaucer. The Merchant bewails his own unhappy marriage, then begins his tale with the arguments for wedded bliss which persuade the aged knight January to marry young May despite anxious warnings from his friends. At the marriage feast his suitor Damyan falls sick of a passion for her, and she cures him by writing that she will respond.
January becomes blind and possessively jealous, but May steals an impression of the key to January’s private garden, and Damyan precedes the couple there one day and climbs into pear tree. Meanwhile, in a marital argument between the rulers of Fairyland, Pluto says he will restore January’s eyesight to see May betray him, and Proserpina vows to help her fool him anyway. May asks January to help her into the pear tree to taste the fruit. Soon January can see his wife happily sporting with Damyan, and roars with rage. May replies that his new sight must be distorted as yet, and complains that she had learned she might cure his sight by struggling with a man in a tree, but now is getting no thanks for her suc-sessful undertaking. January is convinced, and in the Epilogue the Host exhales bitterly over the slyness of women.

Mercier, Louis (1870–1935). French poet of the Poez region. Mercier describes his native countryside in Voir de la terre et du temps (1903), Le Poème de la maison (1912), and Les Pierre: Sacrées (1920).
His novels Hélène Sorbiers (1912) and Les Demoiselles Valéry (1923) exalt peasant life.

Mercilla, Queen. See Fabrie Queen, The.

Mercury. The Roman equivalent of the Greek Hermes, son of Maia and Jupiter to whom he acted as messenger. He is probably of totally Greek origin, brought to Rome by Greek traders. He was the god of science and commerce, the patron of travelers and also, of rogues, vagabonds, and thieves. Hence, the name of the god is used to denote both a messenger and a thief. Mercury is represented as a young man with winged hat and winged sandals (talaria), bearing the caduceus and sometimes a purse.

Mercury fig (Lat. Ficus ad Mercureum). The first fig gathered off a fig tree was by the Romans devoted to Mercury. The proverbial saying was applied generally to all first fruits or first works.

Mercutio. In Shakespeare’s Romeo and Juliet, an elegant and high-spirited young nobleman, kinsman of Prince Escalus and Romeo’s friend. When Romeo refuses to quarrel with Tybalt, Mercutio, who does not know that Romeo’s animosity towards the Capulets has diminished since his secret marriage to Juliet, draws his sword in exasperation and is slain by Tybalt.

Mercutio is one of the most highly coveted of Shakespearean roles, actors often preferring Mercutio’s mocking wit to the blander and less biting lyricism of Romeo. His famous Queen Mab speech, Mére Coquette, la

in which he describes the nocturnal activities of the mischievous fairy queen who delivers men of their dreams, is a masterpiece of spontaneous fancy:

O! then, I see, Queen Mab hath been with you. She is the fairies' midwife, and she comes
In shape no bigger than an agate-stone
On the fore-finger of an alderman...

Mére Coquette, la. See Philippe Quinault.

Meredith, George (1828–1909). English novelist, poet and critic. Born into a family of naval outfitters, Meredith spent two years in a Moravian school in Germany and there developed cosmopolitanism of outlook and encountered the excesses of German romanticism. Twice married, he supported himself until 1894 as a newspaper writer and reader for a publisher. His poetry includes Poems (1831), Modern Love, a marital tragedy based on his own unhappy first marriage; Poems and Lyrics of the Joy of Earth (1883), a celebration of evolutionary naturalism and his finest collection of verse; Ballads and Poems of Tragic Life (1887); A Reading of Earth (1888); A Reading of Life (1901); and Last Poems (1910). His fiction includes The Shaving of Shagpat (1857), an oriental fantasy in extravagant style; Fa-rina (1857), a lampooning of German romanticism; The Ordeal of Richard Feverel, the partly autobiographical tragedy of an educational theory mistakenly applied; Evan Harrington; Sandra Belloni (1864), a burlesque of sentimentalism; Rhoda Fleming, a rural melodrama; Vittoria (1866), his only historical novel; The Adventures of Harry Richmond, a picaresque romance (1870); Beauchamp’s Career (1874), a political novel mixed with romantic intrigues; The Tale of Chloe (1879), a tragedy; The Egoist, a biting study of selfishness; The Tragic Comedians (1880), a fictionalized biography of the Jewish socialist leader Ferdinand Lassalle; Diana of the Crossways (1885); One of Our Conquerors (1891); Lord Ormont and His Aminta; The Amazing Marriage (1895); and an unfinished novel, Celt and Saxon (1910). The influence of Meredith’s father-in-law Thomas Love Peacock is evident in the writer’s hatred of egoism and sentimentality, in his affirmation of the intellectual equality of women with men, and above all in his belief in the beneficial power of laughter—a belief expounded in the critical work The Idea of Comedy and the Uses of the Comic Spirit (1877), in which he put forth the thesis that comedy corrected the excesses of sentimentality, selfishness, and vanity. Though Meredith’s later novels are marred by an opacity of dialogue, narration, and style, and though many of the ideas that placed him politically and socially ahead of his time now seem dated, the evolutionary philosophy of his poetry and prose, the happy acceptance of life as a process of becoming, has lost little of its power. In 1905, Meredith was awarded the Order of Merit.

Meredith, Owen. Pen name of Edward Robert Lytton Bulwer-Lytton, 1st earl of Lytton (1831–1891). English poet and diplomat. The son of Edward George Bulwer-Lytton, the novelist, Meredith was once termed “third among living poets” and won the qualified praise of the Brownings and George Meredith. His works include The Wanderer (1857), Lucile, and King Poppy (1892).

Meres, Francis (1565–1647). English critic. His Paladis Tamia, Wits Treasury, published in 1598, contains the most complete and extensive contemporary references to Shakespeare now extant. His work is invaluable to scholars engaged in establishing the chronology of Shakespeare’s plays.

Merezhkovski, Dmitri Sergeyevich (1865–1941). Russian historical novelist, poet, and critic. Merezhkovski, who published his first collection of verse in 1888, was one of the Russian symbolists. With his wife, Zinaida Hippius, he opened a salon in St. Petersburg, holding meetings of the Religious and Philosophical Society founded by him. This group, whose purpose was to spread mystical philosophical ideas, for a time attracted the poets Aleksandr Blok and Andrei Bely. Merezhkovski’s own ideas of the dualism of flesh and spirit in human history were expressed in his trilogy of historical novels, entitled Christ and Antichrist. The separate volumes were Death of the Gods (Smert’ bogov; 1895), also known as julian the Apostate; The Gods Reborn (Vojkresenie bogov; 1902), also known as Leonardo da Vinci; and Peter and Alexis (Piotr i Aleksei; 1905). Merezhkovski also used antithetic contrast in his critical study Tolstoi and Dostoevsky (1901–1902). He and his wife emigrated to France in 1919.

Mérimée, Prosper (1803–1870). French novelist and man of letters. The fondness for literary hoaxes, which was one of Mérimée’s characteristics, showed itself at the outset of his literary career with the publication of Théâtre de Clara Gasul (1825). These six plays presented to the public as translations from the work of a Spanish actress were actually Mérimée’s own work. Mérimée is known as a writer of vivid and skillful historical novels. Although fiery passions are portrayed, in exotic settings, Mérimée uses irony to control his tone. His works include La Chronique du Temps de Charles IX (1829), Colomba (1841), Carmen (1852), and La Double Méprise (1833). A student of archaeology, Mérimée served as Inspector General of historical monuments in France. During the Second Empire, Mérimée held the position of senator. His novel Carmen was made by Georges Bizet into one of the finest and most durable of all operas.

Merlin. The marvelous magician who plays an important role in Arthurian legend. His origins seem distinctly Celtic, and especially in early Welsh writings he figures prominently. Perhaps the first known full-fledged treatment of him is to be found in the Libellus Merlini (Little Book of Merlin; c. 1139), a Latin tract written by Geoffrey of Monmouth, which was later incorporated into his History of the Kings of Britain (1137). In this work, Merlin has all the flavor of an ancient Celtic druid, removing, for example, the great stones of Stonehenge from Ireland to Amesbury by his magic. Most important to the legends of Arthur, however, it was Merlin in Geoffrey of Monmouth’s work who arranged for Uther Pendragon to go to Igraine in the likeness of her husband, for it was from that meeting that Arthur was born. Merlin the magician was elaborated on by Wace in Roman de Brut (1155), and achieved full growth in Malory’s Morte d’Arthur (c. 1469), where he is the force behind Arthur’s achievement of the throne and otherwise instructs Arthur, insuring his continuing invincibility and future greatness as king. Then the great seer and magician proceeds to fall in love with the Lady of the Lake, the sorceress who, soon tiring of him, imprisons him for eternity in an enchanted tower.

Merlin also appears in Spenser’s Faerie Queen (1590–1596), Tennyson’s Idylls of the King (1859–1865), T. H. White’s The Once and Future King (1958), and C. S. Lewis’s That Hideous Strength (1945). See Round Table.

Merlin (1874). A poem by Ralph Waldo Emerson. Analyzing the methods of the poet, Emerson advises waiting for inspiration, rather than mechanically devising a form. Whitman, rather than Poe, would have been admired by the author of “Merlin.”

mermaid. A fabulous marine creature, half woman and half fish. She is allied to the Siren of classical mythology. Popular stories of the mermaid probably arose from sailors’ accounts of the manatee dugong, a cetacean whose head has a rude approach to the human outline, and the mother of which while suckling her young holds it to her breast with one flipper, as a woman holds her infant in her arm. If disturbed, she suddenly dives under water and tosses up her fishlike tail.

In Elizabethan plays the term is often used for a courtesan. Cf. Massinger’s Old Law, iv, 1; Shakespeare’s Comedy of Errors, iii, 2.

Mermaid Madonna, The (Panageia e Gorgona, 1949). A novel by Stratis Myrivilis. The story is a curious but effective combination of folklore and realism. A sea nymph grows up in a modern fishing village in Mytilene (the author’s native Lesbos) but, like Undine, cannot be happy in the bonds of an ordinary mortal marriage. The book is remarkable for its blending of the stuff of myth with a living and detailed picture of the day-by-day existence of Greek fishermen.

Mermaid Tavern. A famous English tavern of the early 17th century. In Bread Street, Cheapside, it was a meeting place for the wits, literary men, and men-about-town. Among those who met there were Ben Jonson, Sir Walter Raleigh, Francis Beaumont, John Fletcher, John Selden, and possibly Shakespeare. In his Lines to Ben Jonson Beaumont wrote:

What things have we seen Done at the Mermaid! Heard words that have been
So nimble, and so full of subtile flame,
As if that ever one from whence they came
Had meant to put his whole wit in a jest.

Merodach. See MARDUK.

Merove. (1) One of the Pleiades. Merove is dimmer than the rest, because, according to Greek legend, she married Sisyphus, a mortal. She was the mother of Glauce.

(2) In classical myth, the daughter of Oenopion, king of Chios. Her too-eager lover Orion was blinded for his treatment of her.

(3) The mother of Aebythus by Crespontes, king of Messenia. Her royal husband was murdered by Polyphontes, who possessed himself of both throne and widow, but years later Aebythus returned under pretext of claiming a reward for having murdered Crespontes’s son and avenged his father’s death. This legend is the subject of a drama by Euripides, now lost, and dramas in Italian by Maffei (1731) and Alfiero, in French by Voltaire, and in English by Matthew Arnold.

(4) The wife of Polybus, king of Corinth, who adopted Oedipus. In some versions of the legend Polybus is called Periboea.

Merovingians. The first dynasty of Frankish kings (reigned 428–751). Clovis I was the most important, establishing the capital at Paris; after 638 the nominal kings lost all real power to the officials called mayors of the palace, a position held by the Carolingians until they assumed the crown.

Merrilies, Meg. A brilliant and exotic character, the half-crazy queen of the gypsies who appears in Scott’s Guy Mannering. She is the nurse of the young heir before he is kidnapped, and recognizes him when he returns as Brown. She is also the subject of a poem by Keats.

Merrill, Stuart [Fitzrandolph] (1863–1915). American-born French poet. An early American expatriate and lifelong socialist, he lived most of his life in France and wrote his works in French. The only book of his to appear in English was Pastels in Prose (1890), a collection of translations from 19th-century French symbolist writers. His own poetry was part of the symbolist movement and appeared in Les Gammes (1887) and Les Fastes (1892). Merrill’s most important work is Une Voix dans la Foule (1909), expressing deep pity for the suffering of man.

merry. Originally, “pleasing; delightful”; hence, “giving pleasure; mirthful, joyful.”

The old phrase Merrie England (Merry London, etc.) merely signified that these places were pleasant and delightful, not necessarily bubbling over with merriment; and so with the merry month of May.

Merry Andrew. A buffoon, jester, or attendant on a quack doctor at fairs. The name is said by the English antiquary Hare to have no evidence—to derive from Andrew Bore (d. 1549), physician to Henry VIII, who to his vast learning added great eccentricity. Matthew Prior wrote a poem on Merry Andrew. Andrew is a common name in old plays for a manservant, as Abigail is for a waiting woman.

Merry Mount. See Thomas Morton.

Merry Widow, The. Operetta in 3 acts by Franz Lehár. It was produced (1905) as Die Lustige Witwe. The leading characters are Princess Sonia and Prince Danilo.

Merry Wives of Windsor, The (c. 1598). A comedy by William Shakespeare. Sir John Falstaff, knowing that Mrs. Ford and Mrs. Page control the purse strings in their respective households, decides to seduce them, but the two ladies learn of his scheme and resolve to make a fool of him. When he is informed of Falstaff’s designs by the disgruntled Nym and Pistol, Mr. Ford, who doubts his wife’s fidelity, disguises himself as a Mr. Brook and, pretending to be another aspirant for Mrs. Ford’s favors, engages Falstaff to intercede for him. After the unsuspecting Falstaff has undergone several misadventures—including a ducking in the Thames—in his pursuit of Mrs. Ford and Mrs. Page, the ladies and Mr. Ford, who by now knows of his wife’s plan and is convinced of her virtue, reveal themselves to the old lecher and pardon him. A subplot deals with the romantic affairs of Mrs. Page's daughter Anne, who is courted by Slender, Dr. Catus, and Fenton, whom she loves and with whom she eventually elopes.

No single source for the play, which makes use of several traditional comic devices, has been identified.

Meru, Mount. The Olympus of Hinduism; a fabulous mountain in the center of the world, 80,000 leagues high, the abode of Vishnu, and a perfect paradise.

Méséglise Way. See Remembrance of Things Past.

Meshach. See Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego.

Mesmer, Franz Anton. See Mesmerism.

Mesmerism. A method of medical treatment by hypnosis developed by the Austrian physician Franz Anton Mesmer (1734-1815), who called it "animal magnetism." He cured hysterical patients by what is now known to be hypnotic methods, but attributed his success to a magnetic power, pervading the whole universe, which was concentrated in his own person. In 1778, he went to Paris where he established his famous clinic.

Mesager, Charles. See Charles Vildrac.

Message to Garcia, A (1899). An essay by Elbert Hubbard. Hubbard based his tale on a newspaper story about a certain Lt. Andrew Summers Rowan (1857-1943), who had been given a mission by the war department to make his way to the Cuban insurgents in revolt against Spain, and learn something of their numbers and the possibility of cooperation with the U.S. Rowan accomplished his task against great odds, and finally reported the results of his interview with General Calixto Garcia Iniguez to the U.S. government. Hubbard retold the story, using it as a pretext for a sermon. The story sold out at once, and millions of reprints were issued during World War I; the reason for its popularity was Hubbard's moral: no matter what odds you face in the performance of your duty, you must carry out the assigned task, you must carry your message to Garcia.

Messalina, Valeria (d. a.d. 48). Notorious Roman empress. The third wife of the emperor Claudius of Rome, she was executed by order of her husband. Her name has become a byword for lasciviousness and incontinency. Catherine II of Russia (1729-1796) has sometimes been called "the modern Messalina."

Messer Gaster (Gr., "stomach"). In Rabelais' Gargantua and Pantagruel, the prosperous master of arts who lives with Dame Prénè (Lat., "poverty"). He symbolizes Rabelais' view that progress and civilization are spearheaded by the energetic poor who want more, not by the sluggish rich, whose wants are satisfied. Though Messer Gaster is monstrously greedy and his cult of gluttony is repulsive, it is precisely his vital need for bread that has led to the invention of all the arts.

Messer Marco Polo (1921). A novel by Donn Byrne. Purporting to be the real story of Marco Polo, it is told by Malachi Campbell, an Ulterman. Polo is described as falling in love with the daughter of Kubla Khan. When her magicians save him from death in the desert, he stays, marries her, and returns to Venice only in old age after her death.

Messiah, The (1742). The most popular oratorio in the English language, music by George Frideric Handel, libretto compiled from the Bible by the Rev. Charles Jennens. First performed in Dublin, it treats the life of Christ in a spiritual and theological manner, rather than in a narrative.

Mester de juglaria. A Spanish literary style of the Middle Ages. The term was used as early as the 12th century to describe the popular, anonymous epics recited by minstrels, or juglares. See Mester de clerecía.

Metamorphoses. A series of tales in Latin verse by the Roman poet Ovid. Dealing with mythological, legendary, and historical figures, they are written in hexameters, in 15 books, beginning with the creation of the world and ending with the deification of Caesar and the reign of Augustus. Metamorphoses is also the title of a satire by Apuleius more commonly known as The Golden Ass.

Metamorphosis, The (Die Verwandlung; 1915). A story by Franz Kafka. Often regarded as Kafka’s most perfect finished work, The Metamorphosis begins as its hero, Gregor Samsa, awakens one morning to find himself changed into a huge insect; the story proceeds to develop the effects of this change upon Gregor’s business and family life, and ends with his death. It has been read as everything from a religious allegory to a psychoanalytic case history; but its really attractive qualities are its clarity of depiction and attention to significant detail, which give its completely fantastic occurrences an aura of indisputable truth, so that no allegorical interpretation is necessary to demonstrate its greatness.

metaphor. In figurative language, an implied comparison identifying the two things compared with each other. As distinguished from simile, in which the comparison is stated, metaphor pretends that the two things compared are identical; the comparison is understood. Thus, in “the waves were soldiers moving,” the poet (Wallace Stevens) does not expect to be taken literally; he is comparing the waves, his first term, with moving soldiers, his second term. Through metaphor, as through other figures of speech (SIMILE, METONYMY, PERSONIFICATION, and SYNECODCHE, for example), the poet seeks to concretize his meaning, thereby making his poem more vivid and immediately appealing to the senses.

An extension of the metaphorical process may lead to the development of a symbol; in a symbol, the comparison is no longer even implied, the second term stands for the first, and the first is no longer present. This is easily grasped when we think of universal symbols, such as the flag for a nation or the cross for Christianity. * Allegory is also an extended metaphor.

Metaphysical poets or school. A term generally applied to several English poets of the early 17th century. Their poetry is marked by highly complex and greatly compressed meanings; by complex and long-sustained conceits; by a frequent avoidance of smooth and regular meter in order to achieve dramatic or conceptual effects; by unusual syntax and an unconventional type of imagery chosen from philosophy, religion, and theology, and the arts, crafts, sciences, and ordinary daily life of the period in which the poets lived.

The most famous of the metaphysical poets are John Donne, George Herbert, Richard Crashaw, Francis Quarles, Andrew Marvell, Henry Vaughan, Thomas Traherne, Abraham Cowley, and John Cleveland. Donne is the founder of the school and is considered its greatest member; Herbert, Crashaw, and Marvell follow in importance; Cowley and Cleveland are regarded as the most culpable in the use of farfetched conceits.

These poets, among whom there is wide variation in individual style, represented a reaction against the tradition of the Elizabethan sonnet sequence of the late 16th century, the products of which had become feeble and overconventionalized as the vogue died out, and a return in some ways to the cruder, more homely type of imagery in poetry of the middle of the 16th century, as well as to the scholasticism of the Middle Ages. The awakening interest in science in the early 17th century is also considered to have had an influence on metaphysical poetry. Its complex conceits, most popularly associated with the school, were paralleled and excelled in “fantastic” character in the baroque Spanish and Italian schools, and its use of imagery from the trades, professions, arts, and crafts was foreshadowed by practice in Italian and French poetry of the 16th century and by a critical recommendation in the Défense et Illustration de la Langue Française of Joachim du Bellay.

The poets in this loosely associated school were first called “metaphysical” by Samuel Johnson in his study of Cowley in his Lives of the English Poets (1779–1781), in which he condemns them for their excessive use of “learning” in their poetry. The term had been implied, however, in the early condemnations of the poets by Drummond of Hawthornden and Dryden. In the 20th century, interest in the metaphysical poets was revived, and their work was highly praised by such English and American critics as H. J. C. Grierson, T. S. Eliot, I. A. Richards, William Empson, Allen Tate, John Crowe Ransom, and Cleanth Brooks. Eliot, Richards, and Brooks use metaphysical poetry, especially that of Donne, as examples in their studies of poetic theory.

A number of 20th-century poets came under the influence of the metaphysicals and revealed this influence varryingly in their own work; according to critics, these include T. S. Eliot, Louise Bogan, Horace Gregory, Elinor Wylie, Ruth Pitter, Richard Eberhart, John Crowe Ransom, Allen Tate, Hart Crane, Wallace Stevens, and R. P. Blackmur. Gerard Manley Hopkins is regarded as a 19th-century poet whose work greatly shows metaphysical influence, and the poetry of Emerson, Jones Very, and Emily Dickinson has also been called metaphysical.

Metastasio, Pietro. Original name, Pietro Trapassì (1698–1782), Italian poet and dramatist. Associated with the Academy, he became court poet at Vienna (1730), serving the Emperor Charles VI and later the Empress Maria Theresa. Although his work served as a basis for many oratorios, cantatas, and operas, the most famous being Mozart’s La Clemenza di Tito (1791), he is also known for his own lyrical dramas, such as Demetrio, Demofoonte, Olimpiade, and Attilio Regolo, which were produced from 1730 to 1740. Generally, his themes were taken from classical history, mythology, and the Bible. He was noted for the melodious quality of his style and for proverblike comparisons.

metempsychosis (Gr., from meta, beyond, and empsychoun, to animate). Transmigration of souls. The doctrine, originating in India and Egypt, that the human soul after death enters into another body, human or animal.

meter. In English verse, the measurement used in determining the rhythm of a line insofar as established by the regular or almost regular recurrence of accented syllables. (Other, less important factors that determine the rhythm of a line include the length of syllables, sense and rhyme.) Meter is based on units called feet, each foot being a set relation between one accented syllable and one or two unaccented syllables. The four types of feet in English verse are IAMB, TROCHEE, ANAPEST, and DACT-TYL; occasional variations, such as SPONDEE, occur.
Verse lines are named according to the type of foot they contain and the number of feet in the line. A line made up of five iambs, for example, is called IAMBI-PENTAMETER.

Classical meters, upon which subsequent European versification is based, depended not upon alternations of accent as in English verse but on quantity or length of syllables. For the purposes of meter, one long syllable counted as two short syllables. Obviously, however, quantity plays a part in the nuances of rhythm in English meter. "Ten" and "strange," though they both be accented in a line, do not have the same value, and the poet is as aware of such quantitative distinctions as he is of alternation of accent. See SCANSION.

Method acting. See STANISLAVSKI SYSTEM.

Methodism. The doctrines of a Protestant denomination, originally of an evangelical nature, which grew from a loose religious association formed at Oxford University in 1729 by a group which included John and Charles WESLEY, and George Whitefield. The name began as a term of derision applied by the Oxford students to the members of the association because they displayed a methodical regularity in their meetings for Scriptural study and spiritual edification, and in their fasts and prayers. John Wesley's sermons are still the doctrinal standard of the Methodist communion. In the course of time, the movement became even more widely evangelical and broke away from the Church of England.

Methuselah. In the Bible, the son of Enoch. He is the oldest man mentioned in the Bible where it states that he died at the age of 969 years (Gen. 5:27).

Gelett Burgess entitled one of his humorous volumes MAXIMS OF Methuselah (1907). George Bernard Shaw wrote BACK TO Methuselah (1921), a play.

Metonymy. In rhetoric, a figure of speech using substitution of the name of an object for that of something related, usually a larger concept. Examples are "scepter" substituted for "sovereignty," "the ring" for "wedding," and so on.

Mettlach, Prince Clemens von (1773-1859). Chancellor of Austria (1809-1848). His reactionary policies dominated European diplomacy from the Congress of Vienna (1814-1815) until the revolutions of 1848. He worked to maintain the security of Austrian power through a continental balance of power and suppression of nationalistic and liberal forces. During the insurrection of 1848 in Vienna he fled to England.

Meursault. See STRANGER, THE.

Mew, Charlotte (1869-1928). English poet. Her small output includes some Georgian verse and some individual, somber poems. Collections of her poems are THE Farmer's Bride (1915) and THE Rambling Sailor (1929).

Mexican War (1846-1848). A war between the U.S. and Mexico, caused mainly by Mexican resentment against the annexation of Texas (1845) and by boundary disputes arising out of the annexation. During the war, California was conquered, and U.S. forces under General Winfield Scott captured Mexico City. By the terms of the treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo, Mexico gave up its claims to Texas and ceded to the U.S. the territory that now comprises New Mexico and California and parts of Utah, Nevada, Arizona, and Colorado. In return, the U.S. agreed to pay $15 million and to assume the claims of U.S. citizens against Mexico. Many Whigs opposed the war, claiming that it was motivated solely by the desire for territorial expansion. The war was an important training ground for many Civil War generals, including Grant, Sherman, and Lee.

Meyer, Conrad Ferdinand (1825-1898). Swiss poet and novella-writer. Among German-language poets, he was a pioneer in the use of symbolist techniques; that is, he often did not directly express his feelings and thoughts, but tended to let them be tacitly implied in an objective description (see DINGENDER). He is also famous for his historical ballads, and many of his novellas are based on historical material from the Italian Renaissance: for example, Plautus im Nonnenkloster (Plautus in the Convent, 1882) and Die Hochzeit des Mönchs (The Monk's Wedding, 1884). Like his poems, they are objective and realistic on the surface, but deeply metaphysical in essence.

Meyerbeer, Giaccomo. Pen name of Jakob Liebmann Beer (1791-1864). A composer of German birth, but of the French school. Immensely popular in his day, his grand, somewhat grandiloquent operas have lost favor, partly for want of singers who can muster the grand style. Chief among them are Robert le Diable, Les Huguenots, Le Prophète, and L'Africaine.

Meyerhold, Vsevolod Emilievich (1874-1940). Russian director and actor. Known for his stylized, highly theatrical productions, Meyerhold began his career as an actor with the Moscow Art Theatre. He later became manager of the Revolutionary Theatre, in Moscow, where in his staging of political propaganda plays he introduced such innovations as dispensing with the theatrical curtain, the use of the bare stage, and purely symbolic scenery.

Meynell, Alice [Thompson] (1847-1922). English poet and essayist. A convert to the Roman Catholic religion, she carried her religious beliefs into her writings. Volumes of her poetry include Preludes (1875), Poems (1893), Later Poems (1901), Father of Women (1918), and Last Poems (1923). Among her books of essays are THE Rhythm of LIfe (1893), THE Color of LIfe (1896), THE Children (1896), THE Spirit of PEACE (1898), Ceres Runaway (1910), and THE Second Person Singular (1921). She and her husband Wilfrid Meynell befriended the poet Francis Thompson when he was living in London in poverty and loneliness. Her daughter Viola Meynell, author of novels and short stories, wrote Alice Meynell, a Memoir (1929).

Mezentius. A legendary king of Caere in Etruria. Noted for his cruelty and impiety, he put his subjects to death by binding them to dead men and then leaving them to starve. According to Vergil's Aeneid, he was driven from his throne by his subjects and fled to Turnus, king of the Rutuli. When Aeneas arrives, he fights with Mezentius and slays both him and his son Lausus.

Mezzo Cammin (1842). A sonnet by Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. The poet laments that his ambition to build a "tower of song" has been defeated by sorrow. The title, from Dante, refers to the fact that Longfellow was in the "middle way" of his life, 35 years old. The sorrow to which he refers is evidently the death of his first wife, Mary Potter.

Michelangelo. See under Mac.

Micah. The 6th Minor Prophet of the Old Testament, whose prophecy is recorded in the book bearing his name. He predicted the fall of Israel and Judah, but saw hope of redemption in the Messiah.

Michawber, Mr. Wilkins. A well-known character in Charles Dickens' David Copperfield. He is a great projector of bubble schemes sure to lead to fortune, but always ending in grief. In spite of his indigence, he never deserts; he feels certain that something will "turn up." Having failed in every adventure in England, he emigrates to Australia where he becomes a magistrate. Micawber is said to be drawn from Dickens' father.

Michael (1800). A narrative poem by William Wordsworth. It tells the story of an honest, hard-working herdsman whose virtues are ill rewarded by the failures of both his nephew and son.

Michael, St. The great prince of all the angels and leader of the celestial armies.

And there was war in heaven: Michael and his angels fought against the dragon; and the dragon fought and his angels, and prevailed not.—Rev. xii, 7, 8

Go, Michael, of celestial armies prince,
And thou, in military prowess next,
Inavincible, lead forth thy armed Saints
By thousands and my millions ranged for fight.

Milton, Paradise Lost

His day (St. Michael and All Angels) is September 29 (see Michaelmas Day), and in the Roman Catholic Church he is also commemorated on May 8, in honor of his apparition in 492 to a herdsman of Monte Gargano. In the Middle Ages he was looked on as the presiding spirit of the planet Mercury, and bringer to man of the gift of prudence.

In art St. Michael is depicted as a beautiful young man with severe countenance, winged, and clad in either white garments or armor, bearing a lance and shield, with which he combats a dragon. In the final judgment he is represented with scales, in which he weighs the souls of the risen dead.

Michael and his Lost Angel (1896). A play by Henry Arthur Jones. It portrays the struggle of the stern and upright young minister, Rev. Michael Faversham, to resist his love for Mrs. Lesdon, a wilful, lovable, irresistible woman who comes suddenly into his life and will not be put out. He sins and forces himself to make public confession, but finds he cannot forget her.

Michael Angelo. See Michelangelo.

Michaelis, Karin (1872–1950). Full name Katharina Marie Bech Michaelis. Danish novelist and short-story writer. She lived in the United States for many years and spent time in both Austria and Germany. Den fjarlige Aider (The Dangerous Age, 1910), the best known of her many novels, is a perceptive psychological study of a woman.

Michael Kohlhaas (1808). A novella by Heinrich von Kleist. It is set in the 16th century and Kleist calls its hero "one of the most upright and, at the same time, most terrifying men of his time." Kohlhaas, a common horse-trader, is tricked into leaving two of his best horses at the nearby castle of a dissolve young nobleman, and when he returns, he finds that they have been ruined by being used in the fields. After failing to obtain restitution from the government, he takes the law into his own hands, gathers a band of men, razes the nobleman's castle, and burns several cities in his quest for justice. The book then develops into a constantly wider field, embracing the religious struggles and international politics of the time, and the occult operations of fate. Finally, Kohlhaas obtains twofold justice in that his horses are returned in perfect condition and he is executed for his crimes. The story is not based on historical facts.

Michaelmas Day. September 29, the Festival of St. Michael and All Angels. In England it is one of the "quarter-days" when rents are due and the day when magistrates are elected. It also gives its name to the full term of the English universities.

Michaux, Henri (1899– ). Belgian poet. His visits in Asia and South America produced Qui je fus (1927), Ecuador (1929), and Un Barbare en Asie (1932). The hero of Plume (1930), who symbolizes modern man in his futile revolt against a hostile world reappears in some of the prose poems of Epreuves, Exorcismes (1945). This volume describes the German Occupation, but also discovers the mystic joy and peace of creation that exorcises the anguish of life's absurdity. Espace du dedans (1944) is a selection of his poetry.

Michelangelo [Buonarroti] (1475–1564). Italian sculptor, architect, painter, and poet of the Renaissance. One of the greatest and most influential artists of all time, he was born in Florence and began his apprenticeship in the studio of the painter Ghirlandajo at Florence. Later he studied antique sculpture under Bertoldo in the Medici academy, where he produced his first carving, the relief entitled The Rape of Dejanira. In the Florence of the time he also absorbed the influence of Giotto, Dante, Savonarola, and the Neoplatonist circle of Ficino. His study of anatomy during this period was important for his later treatment of the human form. His first trip to Rome in 1496 produced the Bacchus statue, and in 1498, the famous Pietà of the Vatican. Having returned to Florence, he finished in 1504 the colossal statue of David and the famous cartoon for the Battle of Cascina, in competition with Leonardo da Vinci. The painting was never finished, and only partial studies and copies remain, but Cellini and Vasari assert that it was considered a marvel of the age. In 1504, Michelangelo also completed his Holy Family, one of his best-known paintings. Called to Rome again by Pope Julius II, for the purpose of executing the pope's tomb, he grew impatient with papal procrastination and left in a huff, refusing urgent pleas to remain. After a reconciliation with Pope Julius, he executed a huge bronze statue of him for the cathedral of Bologna (1507), but it was melted down shortly thereafter. In 1508, the pope diverted him from the tomb project to paint the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel, which was finally unveiled in 1512. This masterpiece consists of scenes from Genesis—the Creation to Noah—frescoed the length of the vault. Around these scenes he painted architectural motifs (molding, ribs, pilasters), and where they intersected he inserted the Old Testament prophets, the sibyls, and, in the spandrels, the Atlases figures bursting with power and vitality despite the mellow hues consistently employed. During the next three decades the artist worked sporadically on the Julian tomb, which was finally abandoned. Its surviving elements include the colossal Moses now in S. Pietro in Vincoli, and the unfinished figures of captives and slaves.

Back in Florence again, Michelangelo carved the Medici tombs for Lorenzo and Giuliano de' Medici in the new sacristy of S. Lorenzo, with the celebrated reclining figures of Day, Night, Dawn, and Dusk, as they are called (1520–1524). He also erected the Laurentian Library (1523–1534) in this period. During the remaining decades of his life, spent mainly in Rome, he painted the celebrated Last Judgement on the end wall of the Sistine Chapel (1542), erected the Palazzo Farnese (1547), laid out the current plan of the Capitoline Hill, and erected the dome of St. Peter's, begun in 1547. Among his surviving literary works are letters and some 200 poems, mainly sonnets, addressed to Vittoria Colonna and the young boy Tommaso Cavallieri, for whom he felt a platonic affection. First published in bowdlerized form by his grandson, new in 1623, they were finally given to the world in their original state in 1863. The poems have been translated by Wordsworth, Southey, Symonds, Emerson, Longfellow, Norton, and Santayana. They reveal Michelangelo's preoccupation with his art, his struggle to reconcile a Platonic sense of the beauty of the human form and of all material things as a revelation of the soul within, and the Christian sense of sin he remembered in the sermons of Savonarola and the poetry of Dante. During the last week of his life he worked on the so-called Rondanini Pietà, which, like several others done at this time, reveals the depth of his spiritual struggle. In addition to acknowledging with the past the greatness of individual works, modern opinion credits Michelangelo with having written the best lyrics of the Italian cinquecento, with being the inspiration of the stylistic movement known as manierism and baroque and responsible for the direction taken by art for the next two centuries after his death.

Michelet, Jules (1798–1874). French historian. Michelet is noted for the vividness and penetration of his accounts of French history. He consistently expressed sympathy for the proletariat and the ideals of 1789, and consistently opposed the Church, the crown, and the bourgeoisie. His great work is Histoire de France (1833–1867).

Michelet came from a background of poverty and secured his education through his own efforts. He lost his position as professor in the Collège de France because of his attacks on the Jesuits. Later, when Napoleon III assumed power and destroyed Michelet's hopes for liberty, he was dismissed from his employment in the national archives.

Micromégas (1752). A philosophic tale by Voltaire, which discusses the relativity of dimensions and the insignificance of mankind in the universe. It is written in imitation of Cyrano de Bergerac's Histoire comique and of Jonathan Swift's Gulliver's Travels. Micromégas, a 120,000-foot-tall inhabitant of the star Sirius, and his friend from Saturn, a "dwarf" 6,000 feet tall, visit the earth. Micromégas has about 1,000 senses, and the Saturnian about 72, which, he complains, aren't enough. They happen to observe a shipload of scientists through a microscope they fashioned from a diamond. The earthlings proudly describe humanity's scientific accomplishments and religious history. The giants are impressed with the scientific knowledge of humans, but are horrified by the stupidity of religious wars and dogmas. Before leaving the earth, Micromégas bequeaths to the scientists a book containing the correct answers to philosophic questions. When the men open it later, they find only blank pages. In his description of the Saturnian giant, Voltaire satirizes the French philosopher and scientist Bernard de Fontenelle. The work is a satire on the philosophic systems of Descartes, Leibniz, and Nicolas de Malebranche.

Midas. A legendary king of Phrygia. He requested of the gods that everything he touched might be turned to gold. His request was granted, but as his food became gold the moment he touched it, he prayed the gods to take this favor back. He was then ordered to bathe in the Pactolus, and the river ever after rolled over golden sands.

Another story about Midas tells that, when appointed to judge a musical contest between Apollo and Pan, he gave judgment in favor of the satyric; whereupon Apollo in contempt gave the king a pair of ass's ears. Midas hid them under his Phrygian cap, but his barber discovered them, and, not daring to mention the matter, dug a hole and relieved his mind by whispering in it, "Midas has ass's ears;" then covering it up again. The rushes were ever after murmuring the secret to the winds.

Middle Ages. The period of European history extending roughly from 476 (the fall of the Roman Empire) to 1453 (the capture of Constantinople by the Turks), although the dates vary with each nation. During this period feudalism was the characteristic form of social and economic organization. In the 8th century the Carolingians established a connection between the Roman Catholic Church and the power of the kings and emperors as highest feudal lords. It was an uneasy alliance, however, resulting in a continuous struggle between the Church and the kings for supreme temporal authority.

The early part of the period (until about the 12th century) is occasionally referred to as the Dark Ages because of the supposed extinction of culture and learning. It is true that classical Greek and Roman manuscripts existed only in ecclesiastical libraries and were largely though certainly not totally ignored; the revival of general interest in classical learning and literature led to the Renaissance. The Church dominated such education and scholarship as there was: compendiums of knowledge were written in the monasteries, and the great universities began as colleges of theology and divinity. But by the 12th century a fair amount of new literature was being written, largely under the patronage of the royal and ecclesiastical courts, based both upon the oral folkloric traditions and upon scholastic learning.

Middlemarch: A Study of Provincial Life (1871–1872). A novel by George Eliot, with a double plot interest. The heroine, Dorothea Brooke, longs to devote herself to some great cause and for a time expects to find it in her marriage to Rev. Mr. Casaubon, an aging scholar. Mr. Casaubon lives only eighteen months after their marriage, a sufficient period to disillusion her completely. He leaves her... his estate with the ill-intentioned proviso that she will forfeit it if she marries his young cousin Will Ladislaw, whom she had seen frequently in Rome. Endeavoring to find happiness without Ladißlaw, whom she has come to care for deeply, Dorothea throws herself into the struggle for medical reforms advocated by the young Dr. Lydgate. Finally, however, she decides to give up her property and marry Ladißlaw. The second plot deals with the efforts and failure of Dr. Lydgate to live up to his early ideals.
Handicapped by financial difficulties brought about by his marriage to the selfish and ambitious Rosamond Vincy, and by the opposition of his medical associates, he drifts into cultivating a wealthy practice at the expense of his medical standards. There is a subplot dealing with the love affair of Rosamond’s brother Fred Vincy and Mary Garth, the daughter of Caleb Garth, the builder.

Middleton, Thomas (1580–1627). English dramatist. One of the most popular playwrights of his period, Middleton possessed considerable comic and satiric talents but seldom gave way to caricature.
His observation was keen and balanced, so that his characterizations remain, on the whole, remarkably credible. His masterpieces are, perhaps, The Change-ling, written with Thomas Rowley and one of the most powerful tragedies of the period, and A Trick to Catch the Old One, one of the best comedies of manners. Among the finest of his other plays are The Roaring Girl, written with Thomas Dekker, A Mad World, My Masters (c. 1606), Women, Beware Women (c. 1623), A Chaste Maid in Cheapside
(c. 1612), No Wit, No Help Like a Woman’s (1613?), Michaelmas Term (c. 1609), A Game at Chess (1624), and The Family of Love (c. 1606), as well as a number written in collaboration with William Rowley: A Fair Quarrel (1616); The Old Law
(1599?); an undated masque entitled The World Lost at Tennis; The Mayor of Queenborough (c.
1618); and The Spanish Gypsy (1623), in which John Hard was also a collaborator.

Midgard. The region of earth in Scandinavian mythology, meaning, literally, the yard in the middle.
The abode of the first man and woman, Ask and Ember, it was made from the body of Ymir and was joined to Asgard by the rainbow bridge, Bifrost.

Midgard serpent (also known as Jormungard, the earth’s monster, and Midgardorm, the serpent of Midgard). In Scandinavian mythology, the venomous serpent, fathered by Loki, the spirit of evil, and the brother of Hel and Fenris. He lay at the root of the celestial ash until Odin cast him into the ocean, where he grew so large that in time he encompassed the earth and was forever biting his own tail. Thor finally killed him with his hammer, but his flood of venom drowned the god.

Midrash. The rabbinical investigation into, and interpretation of, the Old Testament writings. It began when the temple at Jerusalem was destroyed, and was committed to writing in a large number of commentaries between the 2nd and 11th centuries.
Three ancient Midrashim contain both the Hal-achim, which deals with the legal sections of the Bible and the Haggadah, treating the nonlegal.

Midsummer day. June 24, the Feast of the Nativity of St. John the Baptist. Its eve (June 23) is called midsummer night. It occurs near the time of the Summer solstice, which was associated with solar ceremonies long before the Christian era. The bonfires still lighted in parts of Europe on the eve are relics of these customs.

Midsummer Night’s Dream, A (c. 1594). A comedy by William Shakespeare. Plans are on foot for the wedding of Theseus, duke of Athens, and the Amazon queen Hippolyta, whom he has defeated in battle. Egeus, an Athenian, has promised his daughter Hermia to Demetrius, and although she is in love with Lysander, the duke orders her to obey her father. The two lovers escape to the forest, followed by Demetrius and by Helena, who is in love with Demetrius. Here they are found by Oberon, king of the fairies, his queen Titania, with whom he is extremely disgruntled, and the merry Puck. Puck has a magic love-juice that will make the one whose eyelids are anointed fall in love with the first object he sees upon awakening. As Puck uses the potion somewhat indiscriminately a strange comedy ensues, but eventually Demetrius abandons Hermia to Lysander Mies van der Rohe, Ludwig and devotes himself to Helena. At the duke's marriage feast, which celebrates three weddings in place of one, Bottom the weaver and his blundering group of players present as an interlude the play of Pyramus and Thisbe.

There is no single source for the play. The story of Theseus and Hippolyta is found in Chaucer's "Knight's Tale" as well as in Plutarch's "Lives." The "tragical comedy" of Pyramus and Thisbe is a burlesque of the tale in Ovid's "Metamorphoses."

Mies van der Rohe, Ludwig (1868–1969). German architect. Last director of the Bauhaus, he came to the U.S. in 1938. His design of the new campus of the Illinois Institute of Technology exerted a great influence on contemporary architecture. A master of the rectilinear and of elegant mass relations, he has brought the glass wall, with its metal grid, to a refinement exemplified by the famous Seagram Building in New York City (1958).

Mignon. In Goethe's "Wilhelm Meisters Lehrjahre" (see Wilhelm Meister), a young girl whom Wilhelm finds in a troupe of side-show performers and buys from her brutal guardian. She is Italian in origin and filled with a constant yearning to return to her sunny native land. Her complete devotion to her savior Wilhelm is too deep and mystical to be considered a simple manifestation of love between the sexes; and in fact, everything about her is permeated with a sense of mystery. She wills, finally, in her uncongenial northern surroundings, and dies. Her story, considerably altered, formed the basis for the one-act operatic "Mignon" (1866) by Ambroise Thomas.

Mikado or the town of Titipu, The. A Gilbert and Sullivan comic opera. Nanki-Poo, the son of the Mikado, traveling in disguise, falls in love with Yum-Yum, the lovely ward of Ko-Ko, the Lord High Executioner. Ko-Ko, who never beholds anyone, is now informed by Pooh-Bah, Lord High Everything Else, that he will lose his office unless there is an execution within a month. Nanki-Poo agrees to be the victim if he may marry Yum-Yum. When the Mikado is told that his son, Nanki-Poo, has been executed, his wrath is fearful, but luckily Ko-Ko's report of the execution was false, so all is well.

Milbanke, Anne Isabella. Called Annabella (1792–1860). English heiress and wife of Lord Byron. A beautiful and rigorously moral woman, she was unsuited to a man of Byron's temperament. The two were married in 1815 and separated a year later, after the birth of their daughter Augusta Ada. It was rumored at the time that the separation was caused by Lady Byron's discovery of an incestuous relationship between the poet and his half sister Augusta Leigh; it is more certain, however, that Byron was tired of his strait-laced wife and would have encouraged any belief that assured a separation.

Miles. See TURN OF THE SCREW, THE.

Miles Gloriosus (Lat., "boastful soldier"). A comedy by Plautus. The hero is Captain Pyropolines, a character who is the prototype of a long line of military braggarts in European and English drama.

Milesean Fables. A Greek collection of witty but obscene short stories, written, or more likely compiled by Aristides of Mileus (2d century B.C.). They were translated into Latin as the "Mileziæ Fabulæ" by Sisenna about the time of the civil wars of Marius and Sulla, and were greedily read by the luxurious Sybarites, but are no longer extant. Similar stories, however, are still sometimes called Milesean Tales.

Mileseans. Properly, the inhabitants of Mileus. The name has also, however, been given to the ancient Irish, because of a legend that two sons of Mileus, a fabulous king of Spain, conquered the country and repopulated it after exterminating the Firbolgs that lived there at the time.

Milesean School. A school of Greek philosophers originating in Mileus. It was of the period preceding Plato. The Mileseans tried to find a unifying principle for the universe in a basic world-stuff which maintained its integrity throughout all physical change. Water, air, and the infinite were suggested. The members of the school were Thales, Anaximander, and Anaximenes.

Milhaud, Darius (1892– ). French composer, member of Les Six. In his many works he has explored the possibilities of jazz style, as in the ballet "La Création du monde" (The Creation of the World, 1923); Latin American music, as in "Saudades do Brazil" (a piano suite, 1921); and polytonality. His operas include "La Brebis égarée" (1910); "The Lost Sheep," based on a novel by Francis Jammes, "Christophe Colomb" (1930); to a book by Paul Claudel, and others based on Greek legends and plays, such as "Medée" (1939).

Mill, John Stuart (1806–1873). English philosopher and economist. A precocious child, he was put through a rigorous education by his grim and exacting father, James Mill (1773–1836), a utilitarian philosopher. In 1823 he entered India House as his father's assistant, became assistant examiner in 1828, was in charge of relations with native states (1836–1856), and chief of office in 1856, retiring with a pension when the East India Company dissolved in 1858. Mill formed the Utilitarian Society (1822–1826) for reading and discussing essays at the home of Jeremy Bentham. He was chief contributor to the "Westminster Review" and was recognized as a leading utilitarian before the age of 20. His first literary undertaking of note was the editing of Bentham's "Rationale of Judicial Evidence" (1825). After a severe mental crisis (1826–1827), at the root of which was probably the strict training by his father, he departed somewhat from the utilitarianism of Bentham and his father by humanizing it and introducing a note of idealism. His first successful work was "System of Logic" (1843). Mill's best-known works are a series of treatises, including "On Liberty" (1859), "Thoughts on Parliamentary Reform" (1859), "Representative Government" (1861), "Utilitarianism" (1863), and Examination of Sir William Hamilton's Philosophy, (1865), a defense of association philosophy. Mill was a member of Parliament (1865–1868), voted with the Radical party, and advocated women's suffrage. His later works include "The Subjection of Women" (1869), "The Irish Land Question" (1870), and "Autobiography" (1873). He lived the last years of his life at Avignon in France. See UTILITARIANISM.

Millais, Sir John Everett (1829–1896). English painter. With Holman Hunt and Daniel Gabriel Rossetti, he originated the PRE-RAPHAELITE BROTHERHOOD (1848). He illustrated the works of Trollope and of Tennyson, and painted portraits of Gladstone, Disraeli, Wilkie Collins, Carlyle, John Bright, Irving, Tennyson, and other distinguished men of his day. After 1870, his work deviated from Pre-Raphaelite style and subject matter.

Millay. See Way of the World, The.

Millay, Edna St. Vincent (1892–1950). American poet. One of the best-known poets of her time, she is noted for her verse of the 1920s, celebrating life, love, and moral freedom with lyrical gaiety and freshness. After her graduation from Vassar and the appearance of her first volume, Renascence and Other Poems (1917), she went to live in Greenwich Village, and for a time acted with the Provincetown Players, who produced some of the plays she had written at college. With her second book of poetry, A Few Figs from Thistles, she began to reach the reading public. In 1923 she won a Pulitzer Prize for The Harp-Weaver and Other Poems. Influenced by Shakespeare, Keats, and Gerard Manley Hopkins, she retained conventional forms and was especially noted for her sonnets. Among her later books of poetry are The Buck in the Snow and Other Poems (1928), Fatal Interview (1931), Conversation at Midnight, Huntsman, What Quarry? (1939), and Make Bright the Arrow (1940). Her Collected Poems were published in 1956. Her other works include Three Plays (1926); Aria da Capo (1920), also a play; The King's Henchman (1927), an opera with music by Deems Taylor. She also wrote satirical sketches, such as Distressing Dialogues (1924), under the pen name of Nancy Boyd.

After her marriage in 1923 to Eugen Boissevain, Miss Millay lived in the Berkshires, leaving their farm only for occasional travel or public readings. As time went on, she wrote less and less, her later poetry being concerned with political and social themes. See Renascence.

Mille, Pierre (1864–1941). French short story writer and journalist. An authority on colonial life, he is best known as the humorous creator of Barnavax (Sur la vaste terre, 1906) of the French Foreign Legion. This hero reappears in Under the Tricorol (1908) and Louise and Barnavaux (1912), The Monarch (1914), and Partonneau (1924), which deals with colonial administration, are among his other works.

Miller, Alice Duer (1874–1942). American poet, playwright, and novelist. Her light, entertaining novels The Charm School (1919) and Come Out of the Kitchen (1916) were successfully dramatized. Gowns by Roberta (1933) formed the basis of the musical comedy Roberta. The White Cliffs of Dover (1940), the fervid and sentimental verse eulogy she wrote about England during the dark days of World War II, became a great popular success. Her Selected Poems (1949) were collected by her son after her death.

Miller, Arthur (1915– ). American playwright and novelist. Miller began writing plays at the University of Michigan. Returning to New York, he published a novel, Focus (1945), an ironic study of race prejudice. All My Sons (1947), his first successful play, dealt with the emotional aftermath of World War II. The Pulitzer Prize-winning Death of a Salesman established Miller as one of the leading playwrights of his generation. The play exemplified Miller's contention that tragedy is possible in the modern theater and that its proper hero is the common man. The Crucible confirmed his already secure reputation. Miller won a second Pulitzer Prize and the New York Drama Critics' Circle Award for A View from the Bridge (1955). His Collected Plays appeared in 1958. The scenario for his film, The Misfits (1961), which evolved from a short story published in Esquire (1957), was issued in book form in 1961. After the Fall (1964), an autobiographical drama which was the first production of the Lincoln Center Repertory Theater in New York City, caused considerable controversy, partly because of the characterization of Maggie, supposedly modeled on Miller's second wife, the actress Marilyn Monroe.

Miller, Henry (1891— ). American writer. After holding various jobs—including a position as employment manager for the Western Union Telegraph Co.—Miller became an expatriate, living in France for a nine-year period beginning in 1930. During these years he published the books usually considered his best: the controversial Tropic of Cancer; Black Spring (1936), stories and sketches including The 14th Ward; Tropic of Capricorn (1938), an autobiographical work about the hilarious years with Western Union; Max and the White Phagocytes (1938), a collection of stories, many of which were reprinted in the later The Cosmological Eye (1939).

Miller was in Greece when World War II began. One product of the Greek trip was The Colossus of Maroussi (1941), a highly praised travel book which saw the genius of Greece, not in her ruins, but in the spirit of her living people. On his return to America, Miller made a nationwide tour; his critical reaction to the country was contained in The Air-Conditioned Nightmare (1945) and its continuation, Remember to Remember (1947). In 1949, Miller published Sexus, the first of a long autobiographical double trilogy called The Rosy Crucifixion, which includes Plexus (1953) and Nexus (1958). The Book in My Life (1952) lists hundreds of obscure volumes by which Miller was profoundly affected. He has written several pieces on literary censorship, among them an eloquent letter to the Supreme Court of Norway after it banned Sexus; it was reprinted with other material from the trial in Henry Miller—Between Heaven and Hell: A Symposium (1961). Miller's extensive correspondence with Lawrence Durrell was published in 1962.

Miller, Joaquin. Pen name of Cincinnatus Hiner (or Heine) Miller (1837–1913). American poet. As a boy, Miller traveled west from Indiana with his impoverished family; they settled in Oregon, and, at the age of 17, Miller ran away to the California gold fields. He led an adventuresome life, mixing schoolteaching, editing, living with Indians, and establishing a pony express route between Washington and Idaho. He wrote two volumes of poetry during this period, but received no attention. Arriving in London in the early 1870s, he posed as a Westerner, wearing cowboy boots and sombrero. It is said that he smoked three cigars at once, and bit the ankles of English debutantes, thus confirming the image that the English had of American Westerners. Songs of the Sierras (1871), earlier published in England, was well received there. In 1873, Miller wrote a prose autobiography, Life Among the Modocs. Returning to California, he continued to behave in an eccentric manner. Several other volumes of poetry were published, including Specimens (1868), Songs of the Sunlands (1873), The Danites in the Sierras (1881), and Complete Poetical Works (1893). Miller's most famous poems are Columbus and Kit Carson's Ride; learned by thousands of school children, are extravagant celebrations of the vigor of the West.

Miller, Merle (1919– ). American novelist. An editor of Yank in World War II and later an editor of Harper's Magazine, Miller won critical praise for his novel That Winter (1948), the story of three veterans after the war. Island 49 (1945) was an earlier war novel. He dealt with freedom of expression in the novel The Sure Thing (1949) and the nonfiction The Judges and the Judged (1952). His later works include Reunion (1954) and A Gay and Melancholy Sound (1961).

Miller, Perry [Gilbert Eddy] (1905–1965). American historian. A member of the faculty of Harvard University from 1931 until his death, Miller is best known for his two-volume analysis of The New England Mind, a work notable for its erudition, profundity, and wit. In the first volume, The Seventeenth Century (1939), he examined the origins and implications of the religious, political, and social thought of the Puritans; the sequel, From Colony to Province (1953), covers the period from 1657 to 1731, with emphasis on the figure of Cotton Mather. Miller also edited Images, or, Shadows of Divine Things (1948), a compilation of itemized manuscript notes by Jonathan Edwards. His other works include Orthodoxy in Massachusetts (1933); The Raven and the Whale (1956), a literary study of Poe and Melville; and Errand into the Wilderness (1956), a collection of essays.

Miller's Tale, The. One of the Canterbury Tales of Geoffrey Chaucer, based on a French fabliau. The Host asks the Monk to follow the Knight with a tale, but the drunken Miller insists on telling a ribald story. Alison, young wife of the old carpenter John, scorns the attentions paid her by Absolon, a foppish parish clerk, but would gladly return those of Nicholas, a young scholar boarding in their house. Nicholas convinces John that a second Flood is coming, and persuades him to suspend three tubs in the attic, so that they can float away in safety. John falls asleep in his tub, and Nicholas and Alison steal down from theirs to the bedroom. Absolon begs outside for a kiss, and Alison offers her rump at the dark window. Furioulsy insulted, Absolon borrows a hot brand from the smithy and returns, pretending to beg a second kiss in exchange for a gold ring. For a joke, Nicholas sticks his rump out this time, and is thoroughly scorched. His cries for water awaken John, who thinks the Flood has come and cuts loose his tub; he crashes through to the ground and is thereafter considered a fool by the townsfolk.

Milles, Carl (1875–1955). Swedish sculptor. A pupil of Rodin, Milles achieves the powerful quality of his sculpture through the clarity and simplicity of his clean, strong lines. Some of his finest work, sculptured allegorical figures, may be seen at Rockefeller Center in New York City. In Stockholm and Göteborg there are fountains created by Milles. Frequently made of bronze, his fountains use light and water skillfully as part of the entire design.

Millet, Jean François (1814–1875). French painter. One of the leaders of the Barbizon school, he extended his landscapes to include scenes of peasants, whose earthy bodies express Christian resignation and the dignity of work. Among his best-known works are The Angelus and The Man with the Hoe, which inspired Edwin Markham's poem of that title.

Millin, Sarah Gertrude (1889– ). South African novelist. She is the author of God's Stepchildren (1924), a tragic story of Cape colored people; The People of Africa (1951), a history; Two Bucky Without Hair (1957); and The Wizard Bird (1962).

Mill on the Floss, The (1860). A novel by George Eliot. The principal characters are Maggie Tulliver and her brother Tom, who grow up together at Dorlcote Mill, united by a strong bond in spite of their opposite temperaments. Maggie is loved by Philip Wakem, the deformed son of the lawyer responsible for the ruin of Maggie's father, but Tom's opposition makes the relationship impossible. Later, she falls in love with Stephen Guest, the handsome and passionate fiancé of her cousin Lucy Deane. They go off together on impulse, and although Maggie repents before it is too late, her return is misconstrued and her life is made desperately unhappy. Only death unites her with Tom; the two are drowned together in a great flood of the Floss.

Milne, A[lan] A[lexander] (1882–1956). English dramatist, novelist, and humorous journalist. He is best remembered for his children's books. First written for his son, Christopher Robin, Winnie-the-Pooh (1926) and The House at Pooh Corner (1928) have a toy bear, Pooh, as their hero. When We Were Very Young (1924) and Now We Are Six (1927) are collections of verse for children, Milne was also a successful dramatist of the 1920's. His whimsical, rather sentimental plays include The Truth About Blayds, the comedy Mr. Pim Passes By (1920), and the fantasy The Dover Road (1923). The Red House Mystery (1922) is a detective story.

Milo. An athlete of Crotona. It is said that he carried a four-year-old heifer through the stadium at Olympia, and ate the whole of it afterward. When an old man, he attempted to tear an oak tree in two, but the parts closed upon his hands, and he was devoured by wolves while held fast by the tree.

Milosz, Oscar Venceslas [or Vladislas] de Lubioz (1877–1939). Lithuanian-born French poet, dramatist, diplomat. His early poetry shows the influence of symbolism and his interest in the occult: Le Poème des décadences (1899) and Les Sept Scènes (1904). Later poetry and the plays Miguel Mañara (1912) and Mephisto (1914) continue to explore spiritual problems and the mystery of the universe. His metaphysics are explained in Ars magna (1924) and Les Arcanes (1926).

Miltiades (540–489? B.C.). A tyrant of the Thracian Chersonese. As a general of the Athenian forces, he defeated the Persians at Marathon. He later died in prison for having tricked the Athenians into giving him a large force of ships in order to settle a private grudge.

Milton (1804). A symbolic poem by William Blake in which the poet John Milton returns from heaven and corrects the misinterpretations given to his works on earth. Eventually he enters the spirit of Blake himself and preaches redemption and forgiveness.

Milton, John (1608–1674). English poet and prose writer, one of the best-known and most respected figures in English literature.

Milton's father, a London notary who was raised a Catholic but became a convert to the Church of England, gave his talented son the best of educations. After private tutoring, the boy entered St. Paul's School and Cambridge, then was supported through five years of independent study, and finally sent on a two-year tour of Europe to perfect his learning. During this period Milton wrote some of his most brilliant poetry, including L'Allegro and Il Penseroso, the masque Comus, and the splendid elegy Lycidas, as well as other poems in English and Latin. He returned to England before the outbreak of the Civil War, for a while conducting a sort of private school in which two of his pupils were his nephews, the writers Edward and John Phillips, and supporting the Puritan cause in various tracts and pamphlets. In 1649, his reputation as a learned controversialist won him the position of Latin secretary to Cromwell, in which office he handled correspondence with foreign nations and was apologist for the Commonwealth to the world at large. In 1657, Andrew Marvell became his assistant—by this time the service had cost Milton his eyesight. After the Restoration he was arrested and fined, but escaped imprisonment or death, probably (in part) through Marvell's intercession. Aged, blind, his public career over, his hopes for a godly and republican England dashed, Milton turned to a cherished plan of composing a great national epic and in 1667 published his masterpiece, Paradise Lost, following it in 1671 with its sequel, Paradise Regained, and the fine dramatic poem Samson Agonistes.

Milton was a noble and difficult man. Though he was a Puritan, morally austere and conscientious, some of his religious beliefs were unconventional to the point of heresy, and a number of his works, such as the Areopagitica and the Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce, came into conflict with the orthodox or official Puritan stand. He was also a humanist, convinced of the high possibilities of human nature, a lover of music, literature, and the various amenities of civilized life. Milton's character was a paradoxical mixture that combined passion, sensuality, pride, and ambition with high idealism, self-discipline, self-sacrifice, and fortitude. He was least admirable in some of his personal relationships, specifically with Mary Powell, the first of his three wives, and with his three daughters to whom he showed little understanding or consideration; and in some of his controversial writings he also revealed arrogance and coarseness.

Milton's writing reflects his rich and divided nature. Perhaps the most characteristic theme of his work is "temptation"—a theme running from drink of its waters, and thereby became the wisest of the gods.

Minerva. The Roman goddess of wisdom and patroness of the arts and trades, famed to have sprung, with a tremendous battle cry, fully armed from the head of Jupiter. Remarkably similar to the Greek Athene, she became identified with her. She was one of the three chief deities, the others being Jupiter and Juno. She is represented as grave and majestic, clad in a helmet, with drapery over a coat of mail, bearing the aegis on her breast.

Minerva Press. A printing establishment in Lendsenhall Street, London, famous in the late 18th century for its trashy, ultrasentimental novels, which were characterized by complicated plots and the labyrinths of difficulties into which the hero and heroine got involved before they could be married.

Ming. Chinese dynasty (1368-1644). A native Chinese house that replaced the Mongols of the Yuan dynasty. This era was famous for naval expeditions to Arabia and Africa and the enormous amount of printed works on all subjects which appeared. Blue and white Ming porcelain is highly esteemed.

Minister’s Black Veil, The (1836). A tale by Nathaniel Hawthorne. Parson Hooper covers his face with a black veil, as a symbol of secret sorrow and sin. “What mortal,” he asks, “might not do the same?” The emblem, separating him from friends and from happiness, is not removed even at his death.

Minister’s Wooing, The (1859). A novel by Harriet Beecher Stowe. In 18th-century Newport, Mary Scudder is wooed by the orthodox minister, Samuel Hopkins. Truly in love with her cousin, James Marvyn, she will not marry him, for he has not been “saved.” When James is reported dead in a shipwreck, Mary accepts the minister. She is prepared to marry him, when James returns, having found both salvation and a fortune. Hopkins releases Mary, and the book ends happily.

Miniver Cheevey (1907). A poem by Edwin Arlington Robinson. An ironic character sketch, it tells of Miniver and his longing for the Middle Ages, his scorn of money, although he is “sore annoyed without it,” and his general feeling of having been born out of his time.

Minna von Barnhelm (1767). A comedy by Gotthold Ephraim Lessing. Major von Tellheim, because of a question of honor and military justice, refuses to marry Minna, whom he has long loved. To overcome his hesitation, Minna pretends to be poverty stricken and in dire need, whereupon Tellheim rushes to her aid. In the end, Tellheim gets both Minna and satisfaction for his honor.

Minnehaha. A Sioux word meaning waterfall, or laughing water. In Longfellow’s Hiawatha, Minnehaha is the Sioux maiden who becomes Hiawatha’s bride.

Minnesingers. The lyric poets of the German courts in the 12th and 13th centuries. The Minnesang is by definition a song of love, although the Minnesingers also sang of religion and politics. Their poetry was greatly influenced by that of the French trouvères and the tradition of courtly love; they were succeeded by the Meistersingers. The most famous Minnesingers, usually men of the lower nobility, include Heinrich von Veldeke and Friedrich von Hausen (12th century), then Gottfried von Strassburg, Walther von der Vogelweide, and Wolfram von Eschenbach. See also Wartburg.

Minor Prophets. See Prophet.

Minos. In Greek mythology, the king and lawgiver of Crete. At his death he became a judge in the underworld. The beginning of his reign was somewhat disturbed by the episode of the Minotaur, the last of the treachery of his daughter Ariadne in helping Theseus to kill the beast and release the Greek captives. In spite of this, another daughter, Phaedra, married Theseus, who had abandoned Ariadne. Theseus lived to regret it.

Minos may well have been the name given to a dynasty of priest-kings of Crete, whose magnificent palace at Knossos has been extensively excavated and restored. He gave his name to the Minoan period, about 2500 to 1400 B.C., during which Crete was a predominant power in the Eastern Mediterranean area.

Minotaur, The. In Greek mythology, a monster with a bull’s head on a human body. Poseidon sent a bull from the sea as a sign to prove Minos’ right to become king of Crete, but Minos failed to sacrifice it to him. In revenge, the god caused Minos’ wife Pasiphae to conceive a passion for the bull. Aided in satisfying it by Daedalus, he bore the Minotaur, whose name was Asterius. It was shut up by Minos in the Labyrinth. Every ninth year it was fed with fourteen youths and maidens, a tribute exacted from Athens, until Theseus killed it with Ariadne’s aid.

In Minoan Crete, a sacred bull was regarded as the animal form of the priest-king Minos, consort of the high priestess of the Mother-goddess, Pasiphae. A version of the Minotaur story based on the discoveries of modern archaeology and anthropology is told in The King Must Die, a popular novel by Mary Renault.

Minstrel, The; or The Progress of Genius (1771). The chief poem of James Beattie, dealing with the growth of a young poet’s mind. Edwin, under the instruction of a hermit, passes through the various dreams of youth to a survey of moral duties, and is told at length of man’s cultural progress. Beattie himself, describing the poem, wrote: “It is a moral and descriptive poem, written in the stanza of Spenser, but not much in his style. The hint of the subject was taken from Percy’s Essays on the English Minstrels.”

Minturno, Antonio (c. 1500-1574). Italian literary critic and bishop of Ugento. His works, the De Poetae (1559) and Arte poetica (1563), shaped the thought and practice of Tasso, Ronsard, and Sidney, especially the latter’s Apologie pour Poëtrie (1595).

Minuit, Peter (1580-1638). Dutch governor of New Netherland (1626-1631). He purchased Manhattan Island (1626) from the Indians for trinkets valued at 60 guilders (about $24).

Minutemen. The armed citizens or militiamen who, just prior to and during the American Revolution, agreed to be ready to fight at a minute’s notice. The term is also used specifically for the militia organized in Massachusetts. The Minuteman, a statue by Daniel Chester French, stands at Concord, Mass.

Mirabeau, Comte de. Honoré Gabriel Victor Riqueti (1749-1791). French orator and revolutionary leader. In spite of his early notoriety as a pleasure-seeker, his unusual gift for oratory won him a firm and respected place in public life. One of the most important figures in the first two years of the Revolution, he advocated a limited, or constitutional, monarchy after the English model. Although his popularity died down gradually, his oratorical prowess enabled him to continue to sway the National Assembly. His death was the result of a decisive life.

Miscellaneous

Mira. See W. of the World, the.

Mira. (San., sister Mira). Name of the Pajput princess who gave up all worldly possessions to follow Krishna, the Hindu god. It became the Hindu name of Miss Madeleine Slade, daughter of the British admiral Sir Edmond Slade, when she left England in 1925 to join Gandhi. She remained in India and established a center, Gopal Ashram, to help the peasants, along the lines of Gandhi's teachings.

Miracle plays or miracles (13th-16th centuries). Medieval dramas presenting miracles of the Virgin Mary or the saints. There are about 40 extant French miracles from the 14th century, all in octosyllabic couplets with a short prose sermon. Many of the English miracle plays were adapted from the French; there is more variation of metrical form, however. In English drama the miracle plays also include what are now usually called the MARRYING PLAYS, and the terms are generally interchangeable. See Morality PLAYS; INTERLUDE.

Mira de Amescua, Antonio (1574-1644). Spanish dramatist and priest. After serving the court of Lemos in Naples, he became archdeacon of his native Guadix in 1631. He is best known for El esclavo del diablo, a drama about a hermit who makes a pact with the devil but is ultimately saved through divine intervention. His other plays include La rueda de la fortuna and numerous autos sacramentales.

Miranda. The innocent daughter of Prospero in Shakespeare's The Tempest. Raised without human companions, she is overcome with awe at the first men she sees:

O, wonder!
How many goodly creatures are there here!
How beauteous mankind is! Oh, brave new world,
That has such people in't!

She marries Ferdinand, son of Alonso, who is her counterpart in innocence and purity.

Miriam. (1) A Hebrew prophetess of the Old Testament, the elder sister of Moses and Aaron, who led the celebrative music and dances of the Hebrew women after Moses brought the Israelites across the Red Sea (Exod. 15:20).

(2) A mysterious, beautiful, and passionate art student in Rome in Hawthorne's Marble Faun (1860).

(3) A poem by John Greenleaf Whittier (1870) about a Christian maiden and her Muslim lover.

(4) In D. H. Lawrence's novel Sons and Lovers, the shy, intense farm girl who is the first love of Paul Morel. She also occurs in Lawrence's early poems. The character is based on the girl in Lawrence's own life who first encouraged his writing and submitted some of his early poems to Ford Madox Ford, then editor of The English Review. Ford published several, and handled the manuscript of Lawrence's first novel, The White Peacock, to Edward Garnett, who saw to its publication. "Miriam" wrote D. H. Lawrence, a Personal Record (1936) under the initials E. T.

Miró [Ferrer], Gabriel (1879-1930). Spanish novelist. A delicate writer, he is best known for his treatment of religious themes, as in Las Figuras de la pasión del Señor (1916), Nuestro padre San Daniel (Our Father, Saint Daniel, 1921), and El obispo leproso (1925).

Miró, Joan (1893- ). Spanish abstract painter. His works, notably Harlequin's Festival and Composition (1936) are full of fantasy and humor.

Miroir de l'homme. See Speculum Meditantis.

Mirror for Magistrates, The. A work, in verse, on the fall of great men in English history, modeled after Boccaccio's De Castibus Virorum Iustissimorum and Lydgate's Falls of Princes. The first edition (1559) contained nineteen tragedies written by various authors; each tragedy is purportedly narrated in the first person by the ghost of its subject. The second edition added eight more tragic histories, including Thomas Churchyard's Shore's Wife (see Jane Shore) and Thomas Sackville's Induction and Complaint of the duke of Buckingham. The best piece in the collection, the Induction is one of the most important examples of early Elizabethan verse, and is considered to be inaugurus of a new age.

The Mirror for Magistrates was avowedly of moral rather than purely literary purpose, intended to warn contemporary rulers to study tragic stories and thereby learn to avoid tragedy. It is interesting primarily... as a reflection of the new Renaissance conception of man in which not only fickle Fortune but moral flaws in a great man's character are responsible for his tragic end. The Mirror was very popular, and appeared in numerous editions and expansions from 1559 to 1610.

Misalliance (1910). A play by George Bernard Shaw. Almost a fantasy, Misalliance is one of Shaw's most loquacious plays. Its central theme is the variety of relationships between parents and their children. Hypatia Tarleton wants to get married, as she explains to her mother, not for love, but to have something happen. Her family and the family of her suitor are all present. Nothing happens, but the conversation goes on apace. The arrival on stage, via a plane crash, of a Polish lady acrobat and her handsome pilot finally makes the plot to a conclusion somehow. Hypatia says, "Papa: buy the brute for me," meaning the pilot.

In the last scene, Mr. Tarleton says, "I suppose there's nothing more to be said." "Thank goodness," answers Hypatia. Most audiences have agreed.

Misanthrope, Le (The Misanthrophist, 1666). A comedy by Molére. The play centers on Alceste, who has vowed to speak and act with complete honesty and no longer to adhere to the conventions of a hypocritical society. Pursued by the pretended prude Arsinoé, unable to accept the affection of the gentle and sincere Eliante, Alceste is in love with the sharp-tongued, vain coquette Célimène, epitome of all that he despises. After losing a lawsuit in which justice was on his side, Alceste resolves to abandon society and asks Célimène to accompany him. She refuses to give up her gay life, and he departs alone, gloomy and disillusioned.

Miscellany, Poetic. See Tottell's Miscellany.

Miserables, Les (The Miserable Ones, 1862). A novel by Victor Hugo. The central figure of the tale is the convict Jean Valjean. One of society's victims, Valjean, originally an honest peasant, stole a single loaf of bread to feed his sister's starving family and was sentenced to five years in prison at hard labor. He was caught trying to escape, and given a 19-year term on the galleys. On his release he has become a hardened criminal until he is befriended by a bishop and enabled to begin life anew. He becomes M. Madeleine, a successful industrialist and mayor of a northern French town, but, because of an impulsive, bitterly regretted former crime, he is discovered and compelled to return to prison by the implacable, ever-searching detective Javert. Escaping once again, Valjean befriends an unhappy woman of the streets, Fantine, and rescues her daughter Cosette from the abusive family with whom she has been living. The canvas of Les Misérables is an enormous representation of innumerable episodes and characters. Among the most famous chapters are the account of the battle of Waterloo and Valjean's flight through the Paris sewers.

Miserere. The 51st psalm (50th in the Latin numbering). It is so called because its opening words are Miserere mei Deus (Have mercy upon me, O God).

Mishnah (Heb., "repetition"). The collection of moral precepts, traditions, and law forming the basis of the Talmud. Compiled by Rabbi Judah I (c. 135–220), the Mishnah is divided into six parts: (1) agriculture; (2) Sabbaths, fasts, and festivals; (3) marriage and divorce; (4) civil and penal laws; (5) sacrifices; (6) holy persons and things. See GEMARA.

Misrule, Abbot or Lord of. See Lord of Misrule.

Mississippi Bubble. The South Sea Bubble of France (1717–1720), projected by John Law (1671–1729), a Scot. Law proposed that in return for his exclusive control of trade in Louisiana, on the banks of the Mississippi, he would assume the national debt of France. It was a notorious fiasco.

Miss Julie (1888). A long one-act play by August Strindberg. Described by the author as a naturalistic tragedy, the play has twin centers of conflict in the love-hate relationship of men and women and the social relationship of the upper and lower classes. Miss Julie is the daughter of a count. She has been brought up by her mother to hate men, and when, to express her contempt for them, she forced her fiancé to jump over a horsewhip at her command, the man broke the engagement. As the plays opens, Miss Julie joins in a servants' party and flirts with Jean, a footman. She seduces him and, unable to live with the conflicts this act creates in her, commits suicide.

Miss Lonelyhearts (1933). A novel by Nathanael West. The story of a man who writes an "advice to the lovelorn" column, the theme of the book is the loneliness of the individual in modern society. The hero tries to live the role of omniscient counselor he has assumed for the paper, but his attempts to reach out to suffering humanity are twisted by circumstances, and he is finally murdered by a man he has tried to help.

Miss Lulu Bett (1920). A short novel by Zona Gale. The heroine, a plain but not unattractive woman of 34, is disdained by her married sister's family and exploited by them as a household drudge. When her sister's brother-in-law, Ninian, arrives, Lulu Bett's salvation begins, and she shows courage, initiative, and wisdom. The author's dramatization (1921) of the novel was awarded a Pulitzer Prize.

Missouri Compromise (1820). In U.S. history, an act of Congress by which Maine was admitted into the Union as a free state, Missouri as a slave state, and slavery was barred from the territory acquired in the Louisiana Purchase north of the line 36° 30'. This act, which kept the number of free and slave states equal, was the first of numerous attempts to settle differences between the North and South. It was repealed in 1854 with the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska Act.

Miss Ravenel's Conversion from Secession to Loyalty (1867). A novel by John William de Forest. Dr. Ravenel, a New Orleans doctor, is forced to leave Louisiana when he refuses to support the Confederate cause; he and his daughter, Lillie, who remains loyal to the South, move to New Boston (obviously New Haven, where De Forest lived). There the Southern girl is wooed by two army officers; her marriage to the unfaithful and unstable Carter ends with his death in battle, and she finally recognizes her devotion to Colbourne. The book satirizes puritanical New England, and includes realistic battle scenes anticipating those in Stephen Crane's Red Badge of Courage (1895).

Miss Thompson (1921). A short story by W. Somerset Maugham. The Reverend Alfred Davidson, a repressed missionary on a South Sea island during the rainy season, attempts to convert Sadie Thompson, a carefree young tart, to religion. His efforts are successful, but when he seduces her, she reverts to her former ways. Guilty and despairing, he commits suicide.

The story was dramatized as Rain in 1922 by John B. Colton and Clemence Randolph. Actress Jeanne Eagels scored her greatest success in the role of Sadie.

Mister. For titles beginning with Mister, see also under Mr.

Mister Johnson (1939). A novel by Joyce Cary. Set in Nigeria, it is the story of an African clerk called Johnson who is so imaginative that he believes in his own stories, and so is a rogue and a liar as well as a poet. He finally commits a murder and is executed.

Mister Roberts (1946). A novel by Thomas Heggen. It is about a popular lieutenant (j.g.) on a U.S. Navy cargo ship in World War II. The novel depicts the boredom of the men on the ship, their dislike of the captain, and their fondness for Mr. Roberts. The novel was adapted for the stage (1948) by Joshua Logan and later filmed.

Mistrall, Frédéric (1830–1914). French poet, famous as a member of Le Parnasse, an association of Provençal poets. With Roumanille, he gave new life to the language and literature of Provence. In the tongue of his native region, Mistrall wrote the pastoral Mèrio (1859), the narrative Lou Pouème dou Rose (1897), and the lyrics of Lis islo d'or (1875).

Mistral, Gabriela. Pen name of Lucila Godoy Alcayaga (1889–1957). Chilean poet. The daughter of a rural schoolmaster who often composed songs and poems for village fiestas, Gabriela also became a teacher. Her first verses were inspired by an unhappy romance with a man who committed suicide, and in 1914 she won a poetry contest in Santiago with her Sonetos de la muerte, which were later included in her first collection, Desolación (1922). All her work is a variation on the single theme of love. Initially, she expressed her own tragic and frustrated passion; her outlook grew, however, until it encompassed all creation, particularly children and the humble and persecuted everywhere. The change is reflected in the title of her collection of songs and rounds for children, Ternura (1924), or “tenderness. Later she donated the proceeds of Talá (1938) for the relief of Basque children orphaned in the Spanish Civil War. Acclaimed as an educator as well as a poet, she received the Nobel Prize for literature in 1945.

Misunderstanding, The (Le Malentendu; 1944). A play by Albert Camus. Known also under the translated title Cross Purposes, it exposes different ways in which men and women fail to face themselves and communicate with each other in their common plight before the unresponsiveness of the universe.

Mitchell, Donald Grant. Pen name: Ik Marvel (1822–1908). American writer and farmer, Mitchell wrote largely for newspapers and magazines, and later wrote of his travels. His first popular book was Reveries of a Bachelor, followed by a sequel, Dream Life (1851). He also became the first editor of “The Easy Chair" for Harper's Magazine. In 1852, after more time abroad, he settled at his family farm in Connecticut. The love of rural pleasures dominates his writings, among which are Fudge Doings (1855), Doctor Johns (1866), and Rural Studies (1867).

Mitchell, James Leslie. Pen name: Lewis Grassie Gibbon (1901–1935). Scottish novelist, archaeologist, and historian. Under his pen name he wrote the trilogy of novels A Scots Quair (1933–1934), which is regarded as a major work of Scottish literature. (Quair is an older form of guire, booklet.) The trilogy consists of Sunset Song, Cloud Howe, and Grey Granite. Mitchell collaborated with Hugh MacDiarmid on Scottish Scene (1934). Under his own name he published a number of popular romances, books on explorers and exploration, and The Conquest of the Maya (1934), a standard history of Mayan civilization. See Scottish Renaissance.

Mitchell, Margaret (1900–1949). American novelist. Mrs. Mitchell wrote only one book—the best-selling Civil War novel, Gone with the Wind. She wrote it during a long period of hospitalization.

Mitchell, S[ilas] Weir (1829–1914). American physician and writer of historical novels. Noted as a writer of historical romances and psychological studies, he specialized in neurology as a doctor, thus combining his talent for historical narrative with his professional insight into human psychology. Hugh Wynne: Free Quaker (1897) is, perhaps, his best book, but he produced several other novels of value, including Roland Blake (1886), a story of a possessive woman set in the Civil War; The Adventures of Francois (1899); and The Red City (1907), a novel laid in Revolutionary Philadelphia.

Mitchison, Naomi [Margaret] (1897– ). English writer of novels, short stories, plays, and poetry. She is also a classical scholar and political and educational reformer. Among her historical novels of ancient Greece and Rome are The Corn King and the Spring Queen (1931) and The Conquered (1923). Other books include The Rib of the Green Umbrella (1960), The Young Alfred the Great (1962), and Memoirs of a Space Woman (1962).

Mitford, Mary Russell (1875–1855). English novelist and dramatist. Her magazine sketches of country life, collected as Our Village (5 vols., 1824–1832), are notable for their continuing freshness, sympathetic humor, and naturalism. Of her plays, Poverty (1826) and Reizen (1828) were the most successful. She also wrote a novel, Atherton (1854); several volumes of reminiscence, Recollections of a Literary Life (1852); and a number of collections of poetry and children's stories.

Mitford, Nancy (1904– ). English author. Her witty and ironic satirical novels include Pursuit of Love (1945), Love in a Cold Climate (1949), The Blessing (1951), and Don't Tell Alfred (1961).
She edited Noblesse Oblige: an inquiry into the identifiable characteristics of the English aristocracy (1956) and popularized the terms U (upper class) and Nox-U.

Mithras or Mithra. A Persian god. Probably ancient, his cult was little known west of Assyria until the first century B.C. As Rome extended its rule into Asia, the cult became very popular, especially with Asian traders and mercenaries in the Roman army. It soon came into favor with the Roman emperors, and was the principal rival of Christianity until the time of Constantine. It did not wholly disappear in the Near East until the domination of Islam.

In spite of the wide popularity of Mithraism, there is no record of the actual myth attributed to the god. This is probably due to the fact that it was a mystery religion whose secrets were as well kept by its initiates as those of the Eleusinian mysteries. The very little that is known of Mithras himself has been deduced from the many extant icons. Most of these represent the young god sacrificing the sacred bull, often in the presence of the sun-god. The strong rivalry of Mithraism with Christianity resulted in part from the striking resemblance of a number of their rituals. Both involve shepherds, a flood escaped in an ark, and a communion service. These factors point to the remarkable uniformity of mythological themes throughout the Near East.

Mithridate (Mithridates, 1673). A tragedy by Jean Racine. Drawn loosely from Roman history, it centers around Mithridate, the aged enemy of Rome, who is betrothed to the young Greek girl Monime. When he is reported dead in battle, his son Pharnaces attempts to force Monime into marriage. Monime begs Xiphares, Mithridate's second son, to protect her. When Mithridate returns alive to learn of Pharnaces' act, he orders his son to marry the princess of Parthia. Pharnaces refuses, is arrested, and reveals that Xiphares also loves Monime. Mithridate discovers that Monime returns Xiphares' love, and, when Pharnaces leads a Roman attack against him, he orders Monime to poison himself and, believing defeat imminent, stabs himself. Xiphares routs his treacherous half brother and the Romans, and, before dying, Mithridate bestows his blessing and his betrothed on his loyal son.

Mithridates. King of Pontus (120–63 B.C.). To guard against being poisoned by his enemies, he so accustomed his system to poisons of various sorts that when, on being conquered by the Romans, he wished to end his life by this means it was impossible for him to do so. For this reason, an antidote against poison is called a mithridate.

Mitra, Premendra (1904– ). Bengali poet and novelist. He is also known for his children's stories and as a magazine editor. He received the Rabindra Prize for Sagar Thake Phera, poems, and the Padma Sri, a high government honor, in 1961.

M'iss (1863–64). A novella by Bret Harte. It is the story of a neglected child among the rough characters in a mining camp, during the days of the gold rush.

Mnemosyne. Goddess of memory and mother by Zeus of the nine Muses of Greek mythology. She was the daughter of Heaven and Earth (Uranus and Ge). A mere personification of memory, she was not worshiped.

Moby Dick, or The White Whale (1851). A novel by Herman Melville. A story of whaling as well as being a profound symbolic study of good and evil, the book was almost forgotten at the time of its author's death.

Moby Dick, the great white whale, is pursued by the monomaniacal Captain Ahab, whose ivory leg is testimony to their last encounter. The crew of Ahab's ship, the Pequod, is composed of a mixture of races and religions, including the God-fearing mate Starbuck; three primitive harpooners, Queequeg, Daggoo, and Tashtego; the Negro cabin boy, Pip; and the fire-worshipping Parsee.

The whale, perhaps representing knowledge of reality, is hunted by Ahab at the cost of his own dehumanization and the sacrifice of his crew. It seems to be a sacrilegious quest, and only Ishmael, who does not share the greed and pride of most of the others, is saved. He is borne up out of the vortex of the sinking ship on the coffin prepared by his friend Queequeg. Sustained by a belief in love and human solidarity, he alone remained to tell the tale. Ahab, determined to pierce the "pasteboard masks" of this world to glimpse reality, is tied to the whale by his harpoon line, and continues his pursuit even in death.

Mock Turtle. A character in Lewis Carroll's Alice's Adventures in Wonderland. The Mock Turtle, who is always weeping, shows Alice how to dance the Lobster Quadrille. His conversation consists largely of puns and ingenious plays on words, and he himself is "the thing mock turtle soup is made from." The original illustrator of the book, John Tenniel, accordingly gave the Mock Turtle the head, tail, and hooves of a calf.

Modern Chivalry. A once widely popular satirical novel by Hugh Henry Brackenridge, published in parts between 1792 and 1805 and reissued with final additions in 1815. It is a sort of American Don Quixote in which the hero, Captain Farrago, and his man Teague O'Regan leave Pennsylvania to travel about and "observe human nature," meanwhile drawing an unflattering picture of manners in the early republic. The novel satirizes primarily the rule of political upstarts, of whom the scalawag Teague is chief. In Part II, when Farrago becomes governor of a backwoods community, the settlers are persuaded to give the vote to beasts as well as men and to make use of a monkey clerk and a hound lawyer. "The great moral of this book," Brackenridge concludes, "is the evil of men seeking office for which they are not qualified."

Modern Instance, A (1882). A novel by William Dean Howells. Bartley Hubbard, a shrewd young journalist, marries the passionate Marcia Gaylord, against the wishes of her father. The story begins in Equity, Maine, but Bartley and his wife soon leave for Boston. Working as a free-lance writer, the self-indulgent Bartley progressively disintegrates morally; Marcia's fierce possessiveness adds to the strain of their relationship. Deserting his wife and child, Bartley is not heard from in two years. When he tries to procure a divorce in an Indiana court, his attempt is frustrated by Marcia's enraged father; Squire Gaylord gains the decree in his daughter's favor, dying in the law court. Bartley, later shot in a brawl, dies in a Western town; Marcia and her child return to the East, where Ben Ha Heck, who has always loved her, debates the morality of marrying a divorced woman.

The book was considered daring on its publication for its open handling of the problem of divorce.

modernismo or modernism. A literary movement that arose in Spanish America in the late 19th century and was subsequently transmitted to Spain. In their quest for pure poetry, the modernists displayed a dazzling verbal virtuosity and technical perfection that revolutionized Spanish literature.

According to some critics, the publication of José Martí's Ismaelillo (1882) marks the beginning of the movement. Others assert that, while Martí exerted enormous influence on Spanish-American writing and thought, his poetry is so individual that he cannot be considered even a precursor of modernism. There is no disagreement, however, as to the dominant role of Rubén Darío, whose work defined and stimulated modernism in America and in Spain. The publication of his Azul (1888) is sometimes said to signify the birth of modernism, and Proses profanas (1896) is held to show modernism at its zenith. Other early modernist poets (often considered precursors of the movement) were Manuel Gutiérrez Nájera, José Asunción Silva, and Julián Casal (1863–1893), the Cuban. Modernists of the later, or post-1896, phase include Leopoldo Lugones, José Enrique Rodó, Julio Herrera y Reissig, José Santos Chocano, Amado Nervo, and Rufino Blanco Fombona.

In rebellion against romanticism, from which, however, they were not always able to free themselves, the modernists drew their initial inspiration and technique from European, particularly French, sources. From French Parnassians and symbolists, such as Gautier, Coppée, and Verlaine, came their pessimism and melancholy, their belief in "art for art's sake," their zeal for technical excellence and musicality, their love of exotic imagery and a vocabulary in which swans (one of Darío's favorite symbols), peacocks, genii, and palaces abound. Another distinctive characteristic of the modernists was their unceasing experimentation with old and new verse forms. In their desire to escape from the sordidness of reality, the early modernists usually shunned political and native themes. Their successors, however, inspired no doubt by the impassioned verses that Darío hurled at Theodore Roosevelt and his ode to Argentina, turned increasingly to American subjects, as exemplified by Chocano's Alma América (1906). In prose writing, particularly the essay, modernism fostered a new simplicity and elegance, the finest examples of which are to be found in the works of Rodó.

Modern Love (1862). A sequence of 50 poems by George Meredith. Containing 16 lines each, they present the various thoughts and emotions of a married couple who perceive that their love for each other is dying, the husband occasionally speaking in the first person. The sequence is considered to have been based on Meredith's own difficulties in his unfortunate first marriage with Mary Ellen Nicos.

Modern Painters (3 vols. 1845–1860). A critical treatise on painting by John Ruskin. The purpose of the first volume, which concentrated almost exclusively on landscape painting, was to prove the superiority of contemporary artists, especially Turner, over the old masters. Its brilliant style and original ideas established his reputation as an art critic. The four succeeding volumes cover a far wider area and expand Ruskin's views on the principles of true art in general.

Modest Proposal, A (1729). The shortened title of A Modest Proposal for Preventing the Children of the Poor People in Ireland from being a Burden to their Parents or Country; and for Making them beneficial to their Publick, a pamphlet by Jonathan Swift. The pamphlet, which is a masterpiece of bitterness and irony, turns the tables on a favorite theory of contemporary Whig economists: that people are the real wealth of a nation. The terrible suffering in Ireland is revealed in the mocking suggestion that the poor should devote themselves to rearing children to be killed and sold for eating. Swift gives recipes and six advantages of his proposal.

Mogg Megone (1835). A long narrative poem by John Greenleaf Whittier. Intended as a framework for a series of New England sketches, the story is melodramatic, a tale of seduction and murder. Mogg Megone, an Indian sachem, is killed by a white girl named Ruth Bonython. The poem includes an indictment of war.

Mogul Empire. The Muslim-Tartar Empire in India. It began in 1526 with Baber, grand-grandson of Timur, or Tamerlane, and split up after the death of Aurangzeb in 1707, the power passing to the British and the Maharrats. The emperor was known as the Great or Grand Mogul; besides those mentioned, Akbar, Jahangir, and Shah Jehan are the most noteworthy.

Mohammed. See Mohammad.

Mohism. See Mo Tzu.

Mofra (1950). A novel by Julien Green. The hero Joseph Day, obsessed by puritanism, can see physical love only as sinful. His revulsion, linked to a compulsive interest, causes him to commit a crime and to destroy his life.

Moley, Raymond (1886– ). American journalist and educator. Appointed assistant secretary of state (1933) by President Franklin D. Roosevelt and a member of the so-called brain trust, Moley described the inner workings of the administration in After Seven Years (1939). From 1928 to 1954 he was professor of public law at Columbia University and in 1937 became a contributing editor of Neuesweeke.

Molière. Pen name of Jean Baptiste Poquelin (1622–1673). French comic dramatist. Born in Paris, son of an upholsterer who served the royal household of Louis XIV, Molière received his education under the Jesuits at the Collège de Clermont. In 1643 he became an actor and cofounder of the Illustre Théâtre, for which he wrote his first plays, notable among them L'Etourdi, and Le Dépit Amoureux (The Amorous Vexation, 1659). Initially unsuccessful in Paris, the company toured the provinces from 1645 to 1658, returning to the capital when the king granted it a theater in the Louvre, the Théâtre du Petit-Bourbon. The playwright's first success in Paris was also his first comedy, Les Précieuses Ridicules, a one-act proscenium satire on the affectation and absurd pretension displayed by members of such refined salons as the Hôtel de Rambouillet. Enormously popular, the play was followed by Scanaelle, a one-act comedy in verse. The company moved to the Palais Royal the following year. *Dom
Molinet, Jean

Garcie de Navarre (1661), its first production in its new home, was a failure. In the same year Mollière completed L'Ecole des Maris (The School for Husbands); see Sganarelle (2) and the first of his many comic ballets, Les Fâcheux. Presented to the king during a sumptuous entertainment at his country mansion, Les Fâcheux met with a delighted reception, won Mollière a pension, and marked the beginning of the playwright's years as a royal favorite. A marriage to Armande Béjart, in 1662, proved unhappiness and probably provided the embittering experience that led to the writing of one of Mollière's masterpieces, Le Misanthrope. L'Ecole des Femmes revealed a psychological penetration unprecedented in the comic theater of the period, but the author's unsparing power of ridicule attracted the attention of disgruntled clergymen, courtiers, physicians, and rival dramatists—all victims of Mollière's merciless wit—and Boileau and the king himself were forced to defend Mollière against attacks. The Critique de l'Ecole des Femmes (Criticism of The School for Wives) and the Impromptu des Versailles (both 1663) constituted Mollière's own reply to his critics and enemies. In 1664 Le Mariage Forcé (The Forced Marriage; see Sganarelle (3)) and La Princesse d'Elide. A three-act version of Le Tartuffe produced the same year aroused clerical opposition and the play was forbidden until 1667 when, presented as L'Imposteur (The Impostor), it received a second interdiction. The ban was finally lifted in 1669, and Le Tartuffe enjoyed its deserved popularity and established itself as one of Mollière's greatest comic achievements. Because of continuing attacks, Dom Juan ou Le Festin de Pierre had to be taken out of the repertory, and with L'Amour Médicin, Le Médecin Malgré Lui, and Mélicerte, Pastoraire Comique, and Le Sicilien (all written in the winter of 1666-1667) the company passed through a period of financial hardship. Amphitryon was a success, and the company enjoyed a degree of good fortune for five years with L'Avare, George Dandin (1668), Monsieur de Pourceaugnac (1669), La Bourgeoys Gentilhomme, Les Amants Magnifiques, Psyché (in which Mollière collaborated), Les Fourberies de Scapin (The Ruses of Scapin, 1671), La Comtesse d'Ecibragnas (1671), and Les Femmes Savantes. After taking the part of Argan in the fourth performance of his last comedy Le Malade Imaginaire, Mollière collapsed from a sudden and severe hemorrhage and died the same day. At the insistence of the clergy he was denied holy burial.

Sometimes called the father of modern French comedy, Mollière rejected the Italianate farces and comedies of intrigue dear to his predecessors, for his was a theater relying on sound observation of the foibles and complexities of human nature and on an incomparable skill in humorous presentation. Actor and director, as well as author, Mollière could boast a total command of his art; few playwrights can equal his understanding of dramatic construction and effect his sparkling verse or comic strength. His virtuosity ranged from the most buffoonish farce, full of "salty and absurdity, to the highest comedy, where the subtlety of his observation rivals many tragedians'. Mollière's masterpieces are those plays in which, attacking hypocrisy and vice, he created characters that have become immortal types. His gallery of peasants, noblemen, servants, and bourgeois offers not only an astonishingly wide view of 17th-century French society but also a telling moral: the wise man is he who observes moderation and remains within the bounds that good sense imposes on nature. Though many of the episodes and plots of his plays are borrowed, though—unlike Shakespeare—he dealt mainly in types rather than in individuals, and despite his occasionally arbitrary denouements and the faults of style inevitable in hasty writing, Mollière's work triumphs over its weaknesses; a laughing yet compelling advocate of all that is natural and reasonable in man and an enemy of all that is false and pretentious, Mollière remains to this day without rival in the comic exposition of human character.

Molinet, Jean. See Rhétoriqueurs, Les Grands, Molinos, Miguel. See Querist.
Molnár, Ferenc (1878–1952). Hungarian playwright. A native of Budapest, he was a war correspondent on the Austro-Hungarian front (1914–1918). His plays, many of which have been successfully produced in the U.S., are usually comedies, civilized in outlook, ingenious in theme and plot. They include The Devil (1907), Liljan, The Guardsman (1910), The Swan (1920), The Play's the Thing (1925), The Good Fairy (1930), and No Greater Glory (1934). He is also the author of several novels, of which The Street Paul Boys (1907) is the best known.

Moloch or Molech. A title, "the king," for a Canaanite baal. He was propitiated with the sacrifice of first-born children, who were killed and burned in the "high places." The Hebrew prophets inveighed against his widespread worship among the Israelites, some aspects of which seem to have been frequently applied to the worship of Yahweh.

Moltke, Count Helmuth Karl Bernhard von (1800–1891). Chief of staff of Prussia (1861–1891) and the German Empire (1871–1891). He helped Bismarck to reorganize the army and directed the military campaign of the Franco-Prussian War (1870).

Moltke, Helmuth von (1848–1916). Chief of the German General Staff (1906–1914). Because of his hesitant attack and subsequent retreat in the battle of the Marne (1914), he was replaced by Falkenhayn. Nephew of Count von Moltke.

Molly. A mythical herb. It was given, according to Homer's Odyssey, by Hermes to Odysseus as an antidote against the sorceries of Circe, which had turned his crew into swine.

Molza, Francesco Maria (1489–1544). Italian poet. Modenese by birth, he spent most of his literary life at Rome, which inspired his best-known work, La ninfa Tiberina (The Nymph of the Tiber), a pastoral poem in octaves.

Mommsen, Theodor (1817–1903). German historian. His best-known work is his unfinished Roman History (Römische Geschichte; 1854–1856); it is particularly notable for its admiring portrayal of Julius Caesar, whom Mommsen described as "the complete and perfect man," and for its aura of contemporaneity. He won the Nobel Prize for literature in 1902.

Mommur. The capital of the empire of Oberon, king of the fairies. It is here that he is said to have held his court.

Momus (Monos). The sleepy god of the Greeks, son of Nyx (Night). He was always railing and carping. Being asked to pass judgment on the relative merits of Poseidon, Hephaestus, and Athene, Momus railed at them all. He said the horns of a bull ought to have been placed in the shoulders, where they would have been of much greater force; as for man, he said Zeus ought to have made him with a window in his breast, whereby his real thoughts might be revealed.

Monaco, Lorenzo (c. 1370–c. 1425). Italian painter. Siennese by birth but Florentine by training, he was the master of Fra Angelico and Fra Lippo Lippi, both like himself members of the clergy. The style of the easel pictures he painted is characterized by exquisite color, graceful line, and tender feeling. As a Dominican friar he naturally painted religious subjects exclusively, his best known being The Meeting at the Golden Gate in the Church of the Holy Trinity at Florence.

Monad. See Gottfried Wilhelm Leibniz.

Mona Lisa. See Gioconda, La.

Monastery, The (1820). A novel by Sir Walter Scott set in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, in which the supernatural White Lady of the Avenels appears.

Mondrian, Piet (er Cornelis) (1872–1945). Dutch painter, a leader of the Stijl school. Influenced by cubism, he continued to investigate abstraction, limiting his compositions until he reduced them to a play of horizontal and vertical lines on a light background, with only a few areas of solid, primary color.

Monet, Claude (1840–1926). A French painter. As Monet is one of the founders and leading representatives of impressionism, it is fitting that his view of Le Havre entitled Impression, Sunrise, which was rejected for the Salon of 1863, should have given its name to the movement. Today Monet is regarded as one of the greatest of all landscape painters; his luminous landscapes in which water adds a frequent note, as in his treatment of Venice and of the sea, are noted for their use of light, Monet's great interest and forte. In 1891, he painted haystacks in a series of studies observing the effects of light at different times of the day and under varying conditions. He continued this experimentation in his paintings of Rouen Cathedral; in these works form is transmuted by dazzling light or mist into a new poetic harmony. His no less beautiful, later paintings of Water Lilies, which concentrate upon the reflection of light and color as perceived through water, may be viewed from a purely abstract point of view.

Monkis, The (1835). A social satire by James Fenimore Cooper. The monikins of the title are monkeys whose homes are in the polar regions. They persuade Noah Poke, a Connecticut sea captain, and Sir John Goldencalf to accompany them on a visit to their countries. Three monikin lands are visited, which obviously represent the U.S., France, and England; they are all treated in a bitterly sarcastic way. A lengthy book, The Monikins has never found an audience.

Monime. The young Greek girl beloved by the aged Mithridate, in Jean Racine's tragedy Mithridate.

Monk, The (1795). Best-known, shortened title of Ambrosio, or the Monk, a Gothic novel by Matthew Gregory Lewis. Ambrosio, abbot of the Capuchins at Madrid, is renowned for his holy life. Matilda, a young noblewoman, is so smitten by his eloquence that she enters the abbey, disguised as a monk. Her passion, however, soon discloses itself; Ambrosio succumbs, and goes from crime to crime, until he is discovered and condemned to death by the Inquisition. Supposedly following the example of Matilda (who is actually a demon in disguise), he now bargains with Lucifer for release. The Devil, as usual, barely performs his part by "releasing" Ambrosio in a desert waste. Ambrosio enragés him by a gesture of repentance, and the Devil dashes him to pieces against the rocks.

Moniker and Nakir. Two black angels in Muslim mythology who interrogate the dead after burial, inquiring the name of their Lord and prophet. Their voices are like thunder, their aspects hideous. If the scrutiny is satisfactory, the soul is gently drawn... from the lips of the body; otherwise, the body is beaten by flaming iron clubs and the soul is wrenched forth by racking torments.

Monk’s Tale, The. One of the Canterbury Tales of Geoffrey Chaucer. In the Prologue the Host complains that his wife is not more like Prudence in the tale of Melibee; then he asks a merry tale of the Monk, jokingly lamenting that such a virile-looking man is forbidden procreation. The Monk says he can tell a hundred tragedies “of the falls of illustrious men.” He tells 17 tragedies in eight-line stanzas, written about 1374 (before the Canterbury Tales were begun), except for the account of Bernabo of Milan, murdered by his nephew in 1385, and possibly the accounts of Ugolino, Pedro of Spain, and Pedro of Cyprus. Besides these “modern instances” of the reverses of Fortune, there are examples taken from the Bible, mythology, and history: Lucifer, Adam, Samson, Heracles, Nebuchadnezzar, Belshazzar, Zenobia of Palmyra, Nero, Holophernes, Antiochus of Syria, Alexander the Great, Julius Caesar, Croesus of Lydia. In the Prologue to the Nun’s Priest’s Tale the Knight interrupts the Monk, complaining of the “heavyness” of so much woe, and wishing to hear about a rise to prosperity for a change.

Monluc, Blaise de (1502–1577). French memorialist and marshal of France. His Commentaires (1592), which Henry IV called the “soldier’s Bible,” are written in a crude, spontaneous style. They reveal him as a man of action, cold-blooded and ruthless, and provide a valuable eye-witness report of a turbulent period.

Monmouth, duke of. James Scott (1649–1685). Claimant to the throne of England. Known also by the names of James Fitzjames, James Crofts, and “the Protestant Duke,” he was the natural son of Charles II, who named him duke of Monmouth in 1663. His religion, his clemmency to the Scottish Covenanters, whom he defeated at Bothwell Bridge, as well as a persistent rumor that his mother had been secretly married to Charles led some Protestants to urge that he be named heir to the throne in place of James II, the king’s brother, whose Roman Catholic sympathies were well known. After the death of Charles, he led the unsuccessful uprising against James which is known as Monmouth’s Rebellion, but he was defeated at Sedgemoor and beheaded. He is the Absalom of Dryden’s Absalom and Achitophel. See Bloody Assizes.

Monmouth’s Rebellion. See Duke of Monmouth.

Monocle de Mon Onele, Le (1923). A poem in 12 sections by Wallace Stevens. A dramatic monologue, the poem has been interpreted both as a commentary on the imagination of youth and the sadness of age and as a celebration of “the faith of forty,” an affirmation of the imagination of middle age as opposed to the invalid fancy of youth.

Monodante. In the Boiardo poem, Orlando Innamorato, an old king of India, father of Zillante, Brandimarte, and Orgirille. Orlando rescues his son Zillante from the witch Morgana and restores him to his father.

Monometer. In prosody, a line of verse containing one metrical foot. This may be in any meter, usually identified together with the name of the meter, as iambic monometer, trochaic monometer, etc.

Monosyllabic foot. In English prosody, a foot in accent meter composed of a pause and an accented syllable, or an accented syllable followed by a pause. An example is from the ancient Scottish ballad Sir Patrick Spens.

LONG/ (pause) LONG/ will the LA/dies STAND

Monro, Harold (1879–1932). English poet and critic. Associated with the Georgians, he is best remembered for founding and running the Poetry Bookshop, and for his work as an editor. He generously encouraged younger poets.

Monroe, Harriet (1860–1936). American editor and poet. Born in Chicago, she was chiefly known for founding and editing Poetry: A Magazine or Verse. This magazine, which is still published, became immensely influential among American poets. With Alice Corbin Henderson, Miss Monroe edited the anthology The New Poetry (1917). Her own poetry was collected in Valeria and Other Poems (1892), You and I (1914), and Chosen Poems (1935). The Passing Show (1903) consists of five verse plays.

Monroe Doctrine. A statement of U.S. foreign policy first presented to Congress by President James Monroe (1758–1831) in 1823. The presidential message resulted from a suggestion by George Canning, foreign secretary of Great Britain, that his country and the U.S. issue a joint declaration warning the quadruple Alliance not to attempt the restoration of Spanish rule in the newly independent republics of South America. At the urging of Secretary of State John Quincy Adams, who did not want the U.S. “to come in as a cockboat in the wake of the British man-of-war,” Monroe and the Cabinet decided on a unilateral statement. Scholars still disagree as to Adams’ precise role in the wording of the doctrine, though he is often regarded as its chief architect. Monroe’s statement declared in part that the U.S. would not permit Europe to extend its political system to the Western Hemisphere and that it would not interfere with existing European colonies in America or in the internal affairs of Europe.

Monsarrat, Nicholas (1910— ). English novelist, author of The Cruel Sea (1951), a best-selling novel about naval combat in World War II. He also wrote The Story of Esther Costello (1953), The Tribe That Lost Its Head (1956), and Smith and Jones (1963).

Monsieur Beaureau (1900). A novelette by Booth Tarkington. A French duke in the days of Louis XV, seeking adventure, goes to England as a barber in order to find just the right bride. He falls in love with the beautiful Lady Mary Carlisle, but eventually returns to France to marry his cousin.

Monsieur Quinse (1945). A novel by Georges Barnabé. A bitter, unhappy study of the anguish of modern man, Monsieur Quinse has as its hero a man who comes to loathe his own flesh and to feel tormented scorn for all mankind.

Monsieur Teste (1947). A fictional sketch by Paul Valéry. An Evening with Mr. Teste (Une Soirée avec Monsieur Teste; 1896) was the first sketch of a character who represents pure consciousness or mind (teste derives both from the old form of the French tête, meaning "head," and from the Latin testis, meaning "witness"). A Letter from Mme Emilie Teste (Lettre d'Émilie Teste; 1924) added the character of his wife who, representing soul and sensibility, attempts to describe the way their marriage works. Valéry later added other letters, dialogues, sketches, and diary excerpts to present Teste from other angles.

Monstre Gai. See Human Age, The.

Montagu, Mrs. Elizabeth (1720–1800). English author and bluestocking, known as "the queen of the blues." She was the author of a sensational defense of Shakespeare against Voltaire in her Essay on the Writings and Genius of Shakespeare (1769).

Montagu, Lady Mary Wortley (1689–1762). English bluestocking, best known for her lively and amusing letters published in Turkish Letters (1763), and Letters and Works (1837). Her other works include Town Eclogues (1716) and Court Poems by a Lady of Quality (1716). She introduced smallpox inoculation into England on her return from Constantinople, where her husband had been ambassador. She was the cousin and early patroness of Henry Fielding, and a close friend of Alexander Pope until their bitter quarrel of 1727–1728. Pope, in his Moral Essays, satirized her notorious slovenliness in the character of "Sappho."

Montague. See Capulet and Montague.

Montague, Charles E[dward] (1867–1928). English essayist, novelist, short-story writer, and journalist. His most important work reflects his combat experience in World War I. Montague attacks militarism and romantic patriotism in Disenchantment (1922), a mixture of essay and autobiography, and in the novels Rough Justice (1926) and Right Off the Map (1927). A Writer's Notes on his Trade (1930) is a collection of essays on prose style. C. E. Montague was noted as chief editorial writer and theater critic of the Manchester Guardian.

Montaigne, Michel [Eyquem] de (1533–1592). French moralist and creator of the personal essay. His father, kindled by the enthusiasms of the Renaissance, hired a tutor who spoke only Latin to Montaigne until he was six and had him awakened every morning by music. He became a counselor in the Bordeaux Parlement, where he met Etienne de la Boëtie, a young judge who encouraged his interest in philosophy and whose death affected him deeply. In 1571 he retired to his château in Dordogne and devoted himself to reading and writing until 1580, when he published the first two books of his Essays. After a trip through Switzerland, Germany, and Italy, partly in search of treatment for gall stones, he served two terms as mayor of Bordeaux. As a result of an outbreak of the plague, he and his family spent six months wandering through the countryside, an experience which he described in the third book of Essays.
